There are two provisions of the constitution which somewhat relieve the pressure against local and special legislation. One is section 5, art. 11, not particularly applicable here, which provides that the legislature, for the purpose of regulating the compensation of county officers, may "classify the counties by population"; and section 6 of the same article, which provides that "corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws, but the legislature, by general laws, shall provide for the incorporation, and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended or repealed." Now, this court has held that, when there has been a classification, authorized by the constitution, of counties or municipal corporations, a law which applies to all of any one class is not invalid upon the ground that it is local or special. The construction of the constitution on this subject has been quite liberal; it being held that, if the classification be in other respects such as the constitution warrants, the fact that only one or two counties or municipalities are put in a class will not invalidate it. Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. 1081. But there must be a classification, it must be by a general law (which, of course, may be amended), and the classification must include all the counties or municipalities. Before 1883 the legislature neglected the duty imposed on it by the constitution to make such classification; and its attempts before that time to legislate specially for certain municipalities were held invalid. Desmond v. Dunn, 55 Cal. 242; Earle v. Board, Id. 489. In Desmond v. Dunn the court held that "sections 6 and 7 of article 11 of the constitution evidently contemplated the enactment of general laws providing for all corporations for municipal purposes, and not for some only; and such laws must be as general as the subject to which they relate." In 1883 the legislature made a classification of municipal corporations as follows: "All municipal corporations within the state are hereby classified as follows: those having a population of more than one hundred thousand shall constitute the first class; those having a population of more than thirty thousand, and not exceeding one hundred thousand, shall constitute the second class,"—and so on to the sixth class; and this classification has never been repealed or amended. St. 1883, p. 24. Since then this court, by Temple, C., said: "On the 3d day of March, 1883, the legislature did, by a general law, as the constitution requires, classify all the cities of the state. The class mentioned by the law in question is not one of those classes. It is a class created by the act itself. I am of the opinion that this cannot be done. Section 5 of article 11 was evidently intended to limit, and not to enlarge, the power of the legislature; and I think that it was intended that the classification there authorized was to be by a general law, in the same sense and in the same way in which it was necessary to provide for the incorporation and organization of cities and towns. Legislation in regard to such corporations would thereafter be made by reference to the classes thus made. * * * I think a law in conformity with this special permission in the constitution must be a law classifying all cities in the state, or a law amendatory of such a law. It must leave all the municipal corporations classified." Darcy v. City of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500. We see no distinction in principle between that case and the case at bar. In that case, for the purpose, no doubt, of affecting the city of San Jose alone, an act was passed by which a certain provision was made applicable only to "all cities containing a population of not less than ten thousand nor more than twenty-five thousand"; but there was no such classification under the general law. San Jose was in the third class, which is constituted of cities with a population of more than 15,000 and not exceeding 30,000; and therefore the act in question in that case did not affect all the cities of the third class, and was invalid. With respect to the case at bar, there is no classification of cities, or cities and counties, "having one hundred and fifty thousand or more inhabitants." Cities, or cities and counties, having that number of inhabitants are in the first class, which includes "all municipal corporations * * * having a population of more than one hundred thousand" (St. 1883, p. 24); and the act here in question, therefore, does not affect all the corporations of the first class. Moreover, there is an attempt by the act itself to create a class for a special purpose, without reference to the existing classification by general law, which was held to be unauthorized in Darcy v. City of San Jose. It is, therefore, local and special, and for that reason unconstitutional and void.

We see no force in the point that the respondent has no interest in the question here involved. The act under which petitioner claims being unconstitutional and void, there is no law authorizing respondent to draw the warrant; and to do the act demanded of him would be to violate his official duty and oath, and subject himself to liabilities and penalties. Neither is there any room here for the play of the principle that separable parts of a statute may be valid while other parts may be unconstitutional. All of the parts of said section 1075, under which alone petitioner claims his salary, are alike involved in the vice of unconstitutionality. Neither is there any distinction, with respect to the point here involved, between cities and consolidated cities and counties. They are both "municipal corporations," and with respect to the constitutional provisions herein discussed they are in the same category. Desmond v. Dunn, supra. The views above expressed relieve us from the necessity of determining the many other important and serious objections made by respondent to the validity of the statute here in question. We hold that it is unconstitutional and void for the reasons heretofore given. The prayer of the petition is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

MAHONEY et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO & S. M. RY. CO. (No. 15,944.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 16, 1896.)

Action by Mary Mahoney and others against the San Francisco & San Mateo Railway Company to recover for the death of the husband and father of plaintiffs. From a decision of department 2 (42 Pac. 968) reversing a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, plaintiffs apply for a rehearing in bank. Modified, and rehearing refused.

PER CURIAM. A hearing in bank is denied, but that portion of the opinion commencing with the sentence. "I think the court also erred in discharging the juror Cooper from the panel," down to and including the phrase, "if a new panel had been taken they could still insist upon their exception," is eliminated therefrom.

GAROUTTE, J. (dissenting). I think a rehearing should be granted, and the judgment affirmed.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint against a flume company alleging incorporation of defendant; that defendant maliciously had plaintiff arrested and imprisoned, necessitating bail, and tried, on a charge of interfering with its flume meters without authority; that he was tried and duly acquitted; that by these acts he was injured in reputation, and suffered great anxiety, to his damage in a certain sum,—sufficiently states a cause of action for malicious prosecution.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by J. B. Runk against the San Diego Flume Company and others for malicious prosecution. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Aitken & Smith, for appellant. McDonald & McDonald and Works & Works, for respondents.

VAN CLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for an alleged malicious prosecution. A demurrer to the complaint on the grounds that it does not state a cause of action, that in specified particulars it is uncertain, and that two causes of action are improperly joined therein, was sustained by the trial court; and thereupon, plaintiff declining to amend his complaint, judgment passed for defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and contends that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The following is a copy of the complaint: "(1) That on the 19th day of July, A. D. 1894, the said defendants, contriving and maliciously intending to injure the said plaintiff in his good name and reputation, and to cause him to be imprisoned, falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause therefor, procured and caused plaintiff to be charged before E. J. Ensign, a justice of the peace of San Diego township, county of San Diego, state of California, with the crime of: 'Without authority from the San Diego Flume Company (a corporation), of said county, or any agent thereof, did raise, disturb, and open an appurtenance attached to a flume belonging to said San Diego Flume Company, then and there used for the purpose of holding and conveying water for agricultural and domestic uses, and which said appurtenance was so attached to said flume or conduit for the purpose of measuring and controlling water held and conveyed in and by said flume or conduit, and used for said purposes,'—and thereupon caused said justice to make out a warrant, in due form of law under his hand, for the apprehension of plaintiff, and falsely and maliciously, and without probable cause therefor, caused plaintiff to be arrested on said charge, and to be imprisoned for two hours, and compelled to give bail in the sum of one hundred dollars ($100) for his release. (2) That on the 31st day of July, 1894, at the trial of said cause, the plaintiff was acquitted of said crime, and said prosecution is wholly ended and determined. (3) That by means of which said acts the plaintiff has been greatly injured in his credit and reputation, and brought into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace, and has suffered great anxiety and pain of body and mind, to his damage in the sum of five thousand dollars, and has been forced to lay out and expend the sum of one hundred dollars in procuring his discharge from said imprisonment, and in defending himself. (4) That the defendant San Diego Flume Company is a corporation duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and has its principal place of business at San Diego, California. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against said defendants for the sum of five thousand one hundred dollars ($5,100), and all costs of suit." The cause was submitted to this court by written stipulation, "upon the briefs of the respective parties now [then] on file." But there is no brief on file on the part of respondents; and, without aid from counsel for respondents, I have been unable to perceive that the complaint is open to attack upon any ground specified in the demurrer. It seems to state a single cause of action, conformably to the precedents, and with sufficient certainty. 2 Chit. Code, § 624, under which the alleged prosecution of plaintiff in the justice's court was probably intended. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction that the court below overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below is instructed to overrule the demurrer.

BARRETT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF PLACER COUNTY. (S. F. 216.)[1]

ADMINISTRATOR — HEARING ON SUFFICIENCY OF BOND—APPEARANCE—SERVICE OF ORDER —WAIVER.

1. An administratrix cited to appear, under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1394, 1395, for a hearing as to the sufficiency of her bond, and who appears in person and by attorney on the first day of such hearing, cannot object to the jurisdiction of the court to enforce an order entered at a date to which the hearing was adjourned, and which order was excepted to by her attorney, on the ground that such order was not served on her; no service being required by the statute, and she being constructively present in court.

2. An administratrix who tenders a new bond required by an order of the court, though not within the time fixed, thereby waives service of the order, if it were necessary.

In bank.

Petition of Maggie G. Barrett against the superior court of Placer county (J. E. Prewett, judge) for a writ of review. Denied.

Geo. B. Merrill, for petitioner. John M. Fulweiler, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The petitioner was appointed the administratrix of the estate of Joseph Byrne, deceased, January 23, 1895; and having filed an undertaking as such administratrix, in accordance with the order of the court therefor, in the sum of $7,000, with two sureties, who were approved by said court, letters of administration were issued to her. June 15, 1895, the judge of said court, of his own motion, ordered a citation to be issued to the sureties on said undertaking, requiring them to appear before him at the court room in said county on the 24th day of June, to be examined touching their property and its value, and that a citation be issued also to the administratrix, requiring her presence at said hearing. In obedience to said citation said sureties and the administratrix appeared at said time and place, and the sureties were then examined by the judge, and the further hearing continued for one week. July 1st an order was made and entered by said court to the effect that said sureties were insufficient, and requiring the administratrix to file additional security within five days. This order was not served upon the administratrix, nor was any notice thereof given her, nor was any order made that she be notified thereof. July 9, 1895, an order was made by the court suspending the powers of the administratrix, and also another order appointing a special administrator of said estate. The present application is for a writ of review, and to annul the last-named orders, upon the ground that they were without the jurisdiction of the court. The ground upon which it is claimed by the petitioner that the order was without the jurisdiction of the court is that no notice of the order requiring her to give the additional security was ever served upon her, and that before she could be in default for not complying therewith she was entitled to notice thereof, and that without such service of notice the court had no power to make an order visiting her with any penalty.

The proceedings were taken under the provisions of section 1394, Code Civ. Proc., and the petitioner was present in person and by her attorney at the hearing under the citation. At the close of the examination on that day an order was made by the court, and entered in its minutes, "that the further hearing of the matter be regularly continued and deferred for one week, to wit, July 1, 1895, at 1:30 p. m." July 1st the court made an order finding that the sureties were insufficient, and "that said administratrix, within the five days next ensuing, cause to be executed and presented to this court, or the judge hereof, for approval, additional security, as follows" (specifying the amount); and it was also stated in this order, "that said administratrix is represented in court at the time of the rendition and entry of this order by her attorney, and that she was regularly cited to be present at this hearing." The minutes of this day were subsequently amended by the court to show "that said administratrix was represented in said court at said time by her attorney, W. B. Lardner and that said Lardner then and there, on her behalf excepted to the said order requiring further security, and granting her five days within which to give the same." July 9th an additional bond was presented on behalf of the administratrix, with a request by her counsel that the same be approved by the court. This request was denied, and the court then made an order "that the right of the administratrix to the administration of this estate cease," and on the same day made another order "that her powers as such administratrix be and the same are hereby suspended, and her letters as such revoked, until a further hearing upon the question of her permanent removal, now pending, be heard on September 12, 1895." The administratrix was present in person, and was also represented by her attorney, at the hearing on June 24th; and, if the court, at the close of the hearing on that day, had determined that the sureties were insufficient, and made the order requiring her to give additional security within five days, it would have been a personal direction to her to that effect, and her failure to comply with such order would have caused her right to the administration to cease. Section 1395 does not require any order to be served upon the administratrix, but declares that the mere failure to give the security within the time fixed by the judge's order shall of itself without any further action on the part of the court, cause the right of the administrator to the administration to cease. The continuance of the hearing from June 24th to July 1st had the legal effect to continue until that day the appearance in person and by attorney, which the administratrix made on the 24th of June, and to give to the order that was made on the 1st of July the same effect as if it had been made at the close of the hearing on the 24th of June. Having taken an exception to the order when it was made, it would not be competent for the administratrix afterwards to make the objection that the order had not been served upon her. Her subsequent request to the court to approve "the additional bond heretofore required by the court" must also be regarded as a waiver of the service of the order, even if a service thereof was required.

Upon the failure of the administratrix to file the additional security required by the order of June 24th, and the consequent cessation of her right to the administration of the estate, the court was required by section 1395 to appoint as administrator "the person next entitled to the administration on the estate, who will execute a sufficient bond," and was authorized to make an order suspending the powers of the petitioner until such further appointment could be made, and in the meantime to appoint a special administrator of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1411. The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged.

EMBEZZLEMENT — INDICTMENT — ALLEGATION OF OWNERSHIP—EVIDENCE—OTHER CRIMES—ADMISSIONS — CROSS-EXAMINATION — REBUTTAL — INSTRUCTIONS AS TO DEFENDANT'S CREDIBILITY.

1. In an indictment for embezzlement of money collected by defendant as an agent from a debtor of his principal, after his discharge, the debtor may properly be alleged as owner.

2. In such a case a demand by the debtor for the return of the money is not necessary.

3. In a prosecution against an agent for embezzlement of money collected by him from a debtor of his principal, after his discharge, the indictment alleging ownership in the debtor, evidence of embezzlement from the principal about the same time is admissible.

4. In embezzlement against an agent, receipts given by him to debtors of his principal over his own name are admissible in evidence against him.

5. That defendant's counsel on cross-examination presented a paper to the witness, and requested him to identify certain entries therein, but did not offer the paper or the items in evidence, does not entitle the prosecution on re-examination to introduce the paper in evidence.

6. In a prosecution for embezzlement, it is error to allow the prosecution to cross-examine defendant as to bets made by him at a race track, defendant not having testified in regard thereto on his examination in chief.

7. It is error to allow witnesses to reiterate their testimony under the guise of rebuttal.

8. Under Const. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting judges from instructing in criminal cases as to the matters of fact, an instruction to the jury on defendant's testimony that in "weighing his testimony you are to consider what he has at stake. You are to consider the temptations brought to bear upon a man in his situation to tell a falsehood for the purpose of inducing you to acquit him or to disagree," is ground for reversal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

W. W. Van Eman was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Reversed.

Bruner & Bruner, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was charged with embezzling $100, the property of one J. Poppa, and was convicted. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Although the case must be reversed for reasons hereinafter given, a few of the points made by appellant which are not tenable must be noticed because they may arise upon another trial.

1. It is contended that the money alleged to have been embezzled was not the property of Poppa, but was the property of the Savage Commercial Company. The appellant had for several years been the agent of said company, with authority to sell goods and collect bills. He had sold goods frequently to Poppa, and had collected the amounts due said company for said goods. On December 13, 1893, he collected from Poppa the $100 alleged to have been embezzled. Now, witnesses for the prosecution testified that appellant had been discharged from the employ of said company several days prior to said December 13th. If this is true, then there was no fatal variance between the indictment and the proof; and, in that event, the fact that Poppa was not notified of appellant's discharge, and therefore could compel the company to credit him with the money, makes no difference. If, however, appellant had not been discharged on the 13th, then the money was the property of said company, and appellant could not be convicted under the indictment. We do not think that a demand by Poppa on appellant for the money was, under the circumstances, necessary. We do not think that the court erred in allowing evidence tending to show other embezzlements by appellant of moneys of said company about the time of the alleged embezzlement charged in this indictment. Neither do we think that the court erred in admitting receipts given by appellant over his own signature to certain customers of said company. We do not mean to say that such a receipt would, itself, be sufficient to show an embezzlement; but it would be an act of a defendant admissible as evidence on that issue. The question presented in Ford v. Smith, 5 Cal. 314, was a very different one. There it was attempted to introduce the receipt of a third party to prove that the defendant in that case had paid money.

2. On the cross-examination of the people's witness, Ade, counsel for appellant presented a paper to the witness and asked him to identify two items in it, but did not offer the paper or the items in evidence. On re-examination the prosecution offered the paper in evidence in explanation of the two items, and it was admitted over appellant's objection; but as the appellant had not offered the items in evidence, it was clearly erroneous to allow the introduction of the paper by the prosecution at that time. The court also erred in allowing appellant to be cross-examined about some bets which he made on said December 13th, at the race track. It was not proper cross-examination, for it was not a matter about which he testified in chief, nor was it relevant; and its effect was to prejudice appellant in the minds of the jurors. We think that the court improperly allowed witnesses for the prosecution to reiterate their testimony under the guise of rebuttal. There are also minor points made on alleged errors in rulings on the admissibility of evidence, which are hardly of importance enough to demand special notice.

3. But, whether or not the errors above noticed are sufficiently grave to cause a reversal, the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed on account of the instructions given by the court to the jury on the subject of the credibility of the appellant as a witness. If the question were entirely an open one, we would feel constrained to hold, upon principle, that any instruction at all as to the credibility of any witness, or the weight to be given to his testimony, is violative of section 19 of article 6 of the constitution, which provides that "judges shall not charge jurors with respect to matters of fact," and section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, referring to a witness, provides that "the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility." But in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191, which was decided nearly a generation ago, an instruction was approved which stated in general terms that, when a defendant had appeared himself as a witness, the jury should consider the situation under which he gave his testimony, the consequences to him from the result of the trial, and the inducements and temptations "which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation." During succeeding years a similar instruction was several times approved, and as district attorneys and trial courts persisted in asking for and giving it on all occasions, it was evident that the rule could not be changed without causing reversals in nearly every case on its way here by appeal. Moreover, the instruction in the Cronin Case was very general in its language, and could hardly be construed as an intimation from the judge that he doubted the truth of the defendant's testimony in a particular case, and as therefore it could probably do no harm, it was no doubt better to allow the rule to stand than to disturb the course of justice in many cases by overruling it. But trial courts, moved, no doubt, in many instances by prosecuting officers, began to gradually expand the Cronin instruction, and to substitute for it their own language; and the danger of that course has been many times pointed out by this court. It will be profitable, perhaps, to notice here a few of the opinions and decisions upon the subject, with the hope that officers intrusted with the administration of the criminal law who have not read those opinions and decisions may happen to notice the present opinion.

In People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802, the court, speaking of the Cronin instruction, said: "That instruction has been affirmed in subsequent cases, and it is now too late to question its correctness; but if courts and prosecuting attorneys think it their duty to have an instruction on that subject in every case, they should be careful to go no further in that direction than courts have already gone. An instruction giving the general rule can do no harm, and is not of much consequence, for every intelligent juror knows, without any instruction on the subject, that a defendant, whether innocent or guilty, is deeply interested in being acquitted. But when such an instruction is reiterated, and put into exceedingly strong language, so as to give it peculiar emphasis, it is too apt to lead the jury to believe that the court thinks the defendant in the particular case on trial to be unworthy of belief. The credibility of the witness in such a case should be left as much as possible to the jury." In People v. Faulke, 96 Cal. 20, 30 Pac. 837, the court, after alluding to the Cronin instruction, and saying "that it is too late now to question its correctness," and that "it is an instruction that can rarely be necessary," and alluding to the danger of changing it, say: "If district attorneys, as well as courts, would be careful while framing instructions not to tread upon that dangerous borderland which lies between matter of fact and matter of law, the result of the trial would rarely be changed, and the occasion for an appeal would be avoided. After a proposition of law involved in an instruction has been often approved upon appeal, the trial court will obviate further appeal thereon if it will limit its instruction upon that proposition to the terms in which it has been approved, rather than attempt a variation upon such terms." In People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 182, 31 Pac. 45, the court, speaking of a like instruction, say: "As a slight change in the phraseology of the instruction, however, is liable to be construed as going beyond the limits of what has been approved, it would be a safer course, and one which would work no injustice to the people, if it were entirely omitted from the instructions asked and given on behalf of the prosecution." In People v. Curry, 103 Cal. 549, 37 Pac. 503, the court, speaking of a similar instruction about a defendant's testimony as a witness, say: "We have often suggested that the better practice would be to refrain from instructing jurors to the effect as evidenced by the foregoing instruction, but the suggestion appears to fall upon stony places, and brings forth no results. We shall limit the rule strictly as it has been heretofore declared, and new trials will be the result if those limits are overstepped to any extent." In People v. Lang, 104 Cal. 368, 37 Pac. 1031, the court quoted with approval the language used in the opinion in People v. Murray, supra. In People v. Anderson, 105 Cal. 35, 38 Pac. 513, the court, speaking of a similar instruction, said: "While the instruction is not so wide a departure from instructions which have been allowed to pass by this court as not furnishing sufficient ground for reversal, we deem it proper to again call attention to the criticism of similar instructions in the recent cases of People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802, People v. Curry, 103 Cal. 548, 37 Pac. 503, and People v. Lang, 104 Cal. 363, 37 Pac. 1031." In People v. Hertz, 105 Cal. 663, 39 Pac. 32, the trial court had undertaken to carry the doctrine so far as to include the relatives of the defendant; and the court, in its opinion reversing the case, said: "An instruction to the jury bearing upon the credibility of a defendant's testimony is not looked upon with favor by this court. We have repeatedly frowned upon the doctrine, and said that it would be limited within the strictest lines." And in the recent case of People v. Shattuck, 42 Pac. 315, in which the judgment was reversed for an instruction touching the testimony of a relative of the defendant, and in which the case of People v. Hertz, supra, was approved, the court said: "The court has frequently hinted that a similar instruction in regard to the defendant is erroneous, because it violates the constitutional provision that the judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact."

As to the general proposition that a judge is precluded from instructing about the credibility of a witness, or any matter of fact, see People v. McNamara, 94 Cal. 509, 29 Pac. 953; People v. Cesena, 90 Cal. 383, 27 Pac. 300; People v. Travers, 88 Cal. 233, 26 Pac. 88; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 169, 20 Pac. 396; People v. Dick, 34 Cal. 663; McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 320; People v. Stanton, 106 Cal. 142, 39 Pac. 525; People v. Choynski, 95 Cal. 643, 30 Pac. 791. Instructions about the credibility of a defendant as a witness are, no doubt, sometimes given through habit, or to round out a charge; but, considering the many expressions of opinion and decisions above referred to, it is difficult to logically attribute the giving of any instruction whatever on the subject to anything else than a purpose to expressly disparage a witness before a jury,—the very thing that a court has no authority to do. However, if the language used be kept well within the general terms of the instruction in the Cronin Case, this court, for the reason that has been so frequently given, will not, on account of such language, reverse the judgment; but when the language used is such as to strongly suggest to the jury that in the case then before them the defendant testified falsely, or to intimate that such is the opinion of the court, then the judgment cannot stand. And in the case at bar we think that the language used, as was said in People v. Murray, supra, tended to "lead the jury to believe that the court thinks the defendant in the particular case on trial to be unworthy of belief." There was considerable said in the charge about the defendant's testimony. The jury was called upon to consider "what he said," and "what he didn't say"; and they were finally told: "In weighing his testimony you are to consider what he has at stake. You are to consider the temptations that may be brought to bear upon a man in his situation to tell a falsehood for the purpose of inducing you to acquit him, or to disagree." This was going far beyond the general platitudes of the instruction in the Cronin Case. It is difficult to see how it was intended for anything else than an argument against the truthfulness of appellant's testimony. Why were the jurors warned against the temptation that appellant was under to cause them, by his false testimony, to disagree? Why was anything said about disagreement before the case had been submitted to the jury? The suggestion at that time of a disagreement was a suggestion that at least some of the jurors would, or ought to, be in favor of a conviction. Indeed, it is almost impossible to conceive how the jury could have failed to understand that the opinion of the court was adverse to the credibility of the appellant. And where the language used by a court in commenting on the testimony of a defendant is materially different from that used in the Cronin Case, and we cannot see that the difference has not been prejudicial, the judgment must be reversed. An instruction on the subject that is kept within proper limits is of no real benefit to the prosecution, and therefore unnecessary; if pushed beyond those limits, it is erroneously prejudicial to the defendant. Justice would therefore be more surely accomplished if no instruction at all were given, and the credibility of the defendant were left entirely to the jury. The correctness and justice of such a course has been frequently pointed out by this court; and if it were followed, there would be no difficulty on the subject.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PURSER v. EAGLE LAKE LAND & IRRIGATION CO. et al. (Sac. 33.)

EVIDENCE AS TO ACTION OF DIRECTORS OF CORPORATION—MORTGAGES—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. An instrument, in form a certified copy of a resolution by the board of directors of a corporation, duly attested by the signatures of the president and secretary, under the corporate seal, ratifying the execution of a mortgage, and sent to the mortgagee, is presumably the act of the corporation, and admissible in evidence to prove the ratification, without proof of the loss of the corporate record of such resolution.

2. An instrument reciting that defendant, to secure a certain indebtedness to plaintiff, conveys to him certain land, and that the agreement is on the express condition that, if defendant conveys to plaintiff certain other land, the instrument shall be void, and that, when defendant shall have conveyed to plaintiff the land, he shall pay defendant a certain sum, and, after defendant has made certain improvements on the land, plaintiff shall pay him a further sum, is a mortgage, entitling plaintiff to foreclose on default in payment or conveyance of the other land, without demand for such conveyance, or tender of the price to be paid thereon.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Action by Edward T. Purser against the Eagle Lake Land & Irrigation Company, a corporation, and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Goodwin, J. E. Pardee, and Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Shinn & Shinn and F. A. Kelley, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage given by defendant, Eagle Lake Land & Irrigation Company, to secure a promissory note of the corporation. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendants appeal therefrom, and from an order denying them a new trial.

1. It is claimed that the finding that the corporation executed the mortgage in suit is not sustained by the evidence. This is based upon the contention that no authority was shown in the officers of the corporation to execute that instrument, and that there was no sufficient evidence of ratification of their act. The original instrument was shown to have been lost, and a certified copy of the record thereof in the county recorder's office was introduced in evidence. From this copy it appeared that the instrument had been signed and acknowledged in due form by the president and secretary of the corporation, but it did not appear that the seal of the corporation had been affixed thereto. No proof was offered to show that the seal was attached to the original instrument, nor was there evidence tending to show any antecedent authority by the corporation for the execution of the mortgage; but plaintiff produced, and was permitted, against the objection of defendants, to put in evidence an instrument purporting to be a ratification of the execution of the mortgage. This instrument was, in form, a certified copy of a resolution by the board of directors of the corporation, duly attested by the signatures of the president and secretary, under the corporate seal. It recites that the resolution was unanimously adopted, at a special meeting of the board called for the purpose, refers to and identifies the note and mortgage in suit and certain other notes, and resolves that the execution of said instruments was "for the best interests of said corporation, and each, every, and all of said acts are hereby ratified and confirmed, and are hereby declared to be the acts of this corporation, with the full and unqualified approval of the directors of this corporation." The objection was, not that this paper, if established, did not show a ratification, but that its contents could only be competently proven by the production of the record thereof in the books of the corporation, or after a showing that no such record had been kept. We think the resolution was properly admitted. It was shown that it had been furnished to plaintiff by the secretary of the corporation, and it was authenticated by the corporate seal. It was, therefore, presumptively the act of the corporation, and admissible in evidence as such; and, in the absence of any countervailing proof, its recitals were binding upon the corporation. Hawley v. Paving Co., 106 Cal. 337, 39 Pac. 609; Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 597; Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 300, 28 Pac. 1049.

2. It is further contended that, assuming the execution of the mortgage or instrument in suit to have been competently proven, it is not, in fact, a mortgage, but an executory contract for the sale and purchase of land; and that, as such, the plaintiff did not make a case entitling him to recover thereunder, for the reason that he failed to show that he had tendered the balance of the purchase price of the land and made demand for a conveyance, and that the defendant corporation was, consequently, not put in default. The instrument recites that the party of the first part, the corporation, "is justly indebted to the party of the second part in the sum of $6,800, United States gold coin, secured to be paid by a certain promissory note," and then follows a copy of the note; that "for the better securing of the payment of the said sum of money so secured to be paid by the said promissory note, with interest," etc., the corporation grants, bargains, sells, and conveys to the party of the second part (the plaintiff here) certain lands, describing them. It is then provided "that these presents are upon this express condition: that if the said party of the first part shall, on or before March 1, 1893, convey or cause to be conveyed to the said party of the second part, by good and sufficient deed, free from all incumbrances," certain described lands (other than the mortgaged lands), containing 680 acres, together with a deed to sufficient water from the irrigation system of the corporation, at certain stipulated annual rates, to perpetually irrigate said land, "then, in that case, these presents and the estate hereby granted shall determine and be void." It is further provided "that, when said corporation shall have conveyed said 680 acres of land to said party of the second part, as aforesaid," the latter shall pay to the corporation the further sum of one dollar per acre for the 680 acres; that the corporation "shall grub, clear, burn, and remove the brush from said 680 acres of land, and break and plow said land" in a manner to make it suitable for seeding and cultivation; and that, upon the completion of such work, the plaintiff shall pay the corporation the additional sum of four dollars per acre for the 680 acres, on demand, in a manner therein provided. It is then finally provided that, in case the corporation makes default in the conveyance of the land as provided, then plaintiff is empowered to foreclose, and to sell the mortgaged premises, and out of the proceeds pay the principal and interest of said note, with costs, charges, and attorneys' fees, etc.

Regarded in its entirety, we think this paper was clearly a mortgage. It was designed to serve a double purpose, perhaps, but its primary purpose was to secure the indebtedness due the plaintiff. It gave the corporation the option of liquidating that indebtedness by the conveyance of certain lands and water rights, it is true; but it is not clear that it conferred upon plaintiff any corresponding right to enforce such conveyance in the event the corporation failed to exercise its right to make it. Assuming, however, that it did, it clearly gave plaintiff his election between such remedy and that of foreclosure,—upon the default of the corporation to either make such conveyance or pay the indebtedness. Nothing remained for plaintiff to perform to put the corporation in default. It is said he should have tendered the balance of the purchase price, and demanded deeds of the land and water, before suing. But we fail to discover wherein, under the peculiar provisions of the contract, there was any balance of purchase price due. All of plaintiff's money was up which he was required to put up until a conveyance of the land and the water right, when, and when only, he was required to pay an additional dollar per acre, and upon certain other conditions an additional four dollars per acre. These conditions were wholly independent, and plaintiff was not required to pay or tender such further payments until after the making of the conveyances. The giving of the deeds and the payments of the additional acreage were in no sense contemporaneous or dependent covenants. The corporation was in default when it failed to either convey the land and water or pay the indebtedness within the stipulated time, and plaintiff was then entitled to foreclose. The recitals in the instrument of ratification in no way added to or detracted from the terms of the mortgage, or in any way limited the construction to be put upon them. We think the evidence fully supports the findings, and the judgment and order must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

CORPORATIONS — REQUIRING FILING OF ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION AND COPIES—RIGHT TO SUE—PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

1. Civ. Code, § 296, requires every corporation to file its articles of incorporation in the county of its principal place of business, and a certified copy in the office of the secretary of state. Section 299 provides that it shall file "a copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation filed in the office of the secretary of state, duly certified by such secretary of state," in the office of the clerk of any county in which it holds any property, and, further, that it shall not maintain or defend any action in relation to such property "until such articles of incorporation, and such certified copy of its articles of incorporation, and such certified copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation, shall be filed at the places directed by the general law and this section." Held, that a certified copy of the copy on file with the secretary of state was the only one required by section 299 to be filed in counties because property was there situated.

2. The failure of a corporation to file a copy of its articles of incorporation in a county where it has property, and in which it brings an action, as required by Civ. Code, § 299, does not affect its cause of action, and can only be taken advantage of by plea in abatement.

3. The provision in Civ. Code, § 299, that a corporation "shall not maintain" any action until it complies with the terms of such section, does not prevent it from commencing an action, but suspends its right to maintain it if proper objection is made; and where it complies with the statute after the commencement of an action, but before the filing of a plea in abatement, the latter should be overruled.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Madera county; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the California Savings & Loan Society against Harris. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Larew and W. C. Wallace, Jr., for appellant. J. F. Cowdery and Francis A. Fell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Plaintiff is a corporation, whose principal place of business is the city and county of San Francisco, and commenced the present action for the foreclosure of a mortgage that had been assigned to it. The mortgage was executed October 18, 1888, upon lands which at its date were situated in that portion of the county of Fresno which was afterwards included in the county of Madera. The complaint was filed in the county of Madera September 6, 1893, and on April 25, 1894, the defendant Harris filed an amended answer, in which he set up as a separate defense "that said plaintiff did not file in the office of the county clerk of the county of Madera its articles of incorporation, a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, and a certified copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation, as required by section 299 of the Civil Code, prior to the 6th day of January, 1894." The cause was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Upon the matter set forth in the foregoing defense, the court made findings in the same terms as it was pleaded. The defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll, and urges in support of his appeal that, inasmuch as the plaintiff had not filed a certified copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk of Madera county prior to the commencement of the action, it was not entitled to judgment.

Section 299, Civ. Code, requires every corporation to file in the office of the county clerk of any county in the state in which it holds any property, except the county where the original articles of incorporation are filed, "a copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation filed in the office of the secretary of state, duly certified by such secretary of state," and declares, as the penalty for failure to comply with this requirement, that "any corporation failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall not maintain or defend any action or proceeding in relation to such property, its rents, issues or profits, until such articles of incorporation, and such certified copy of its articles of incorporation, and such certified copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation, shall be filed at the places directed by the general law and this section." The last clause of this sentence shows that the previous clause is to be construed distributively, and that the documents therein named are to be filed at the places required therefor, respectively. As section 296, Id., requires the original articles of incorporation to be filed with the county clerk of the county in which the principal business of the company is to be transacted, and a certified copy of these articles with the secretary of state, and, as the principal place of business of the plaintiff herein is in the city and county of San Francisco, it is evident that the only document referred to in this portion of section 299, which is required to be filed with the county clerk of the county of Madera, is the copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation certified by the secretary of state.

The failure to file this certified copy does not impose upon the corporation a loss or forfeiture of its property, or impair or deprive it of any cause of action or defense it may have in reference to such property. A previous filing of the certified copy is not a fact essential to the cause of action, or an element constituting the plaintiff's right of action; and the omission of such an averment in the complaint is not a ground of demurrer (Mining Co. v. Rosa, 80 Cal. 333, 22 Pac. 222), or for the reversal of a judgment (Labory v. Orphan Asylum, 97 Cal. 270, 32 Pac. 231), and consequently is not a jurisdictional element in the suit. Nor does such failure afford to the other party any defense to the cause of action upon which a suit has been commenced, but is merely a special defense, in the nature of a plea in abatement (Bank v. Tibbits, 80 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 66), by which the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action is suspended "until" the statute is complied with, and is subject to the same rules of pleading as are other pleas in abatement. Being matter merely in abatement, it is a defense which may be waived by the defendant, and which is waived by him unless it is affirmatively pleaded.

Pleas in abatement, or dilatory pleas, have never been favored, and are to be strictly construed. Tooms v. Randall, 3 Cal. 438; Larco v. Clements, 36 Cal. 132. "The party pleading them relies on technical law to defeat the plaintiff's action, and is held to a technical exactness in his pleading." Thompson v. Lyon, 14 Cal. 39. Matter in abatement of the plaintiff's action must exist at the time of filing the plea. A plea of nonjoinder of a party plaintiff is unavailing, unless at the time it is made such party can be joined as a plaintiff. 1 Saund. 291a. A plea of a pending suit is ineffective unless the former suit is pending at the time the plea is filed. Pew v. Yoare, 12 Mich. 16. In Moore v. Hopkins, 83 Cal. 270, 23 Pac. 318, it was held that the effect of such a plea was obviated by the dismissal of the former suit at any time after the plea had been filed, and before the trial. A statutory defense which does not affect the cause of action, and which is limited by its terms "until" the removal of the grounds upon which it is authorized, is to be construed with the same strictness. The act of April 1, 1876 (St. 1875–76, p. 729), provided that a banking corporation should not maintain or prosecute any action until it had filed and published the statement therein required. In Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 307, 35 Pac. 899, it was held that this provision did not deprive the plaintiff of its right of action, and that, as the defense was available only "until" the statute had been complied with, a repeal of the statute pending the action took away the defense, and that a judgment which had been rendered in disregard of such defense would not be reversed where the statute was repealed pending the appeal from such judgment. The defense which is authorized by section 299 does not confer any right upon the defendant, and is authorized for the purpose of enforcing a compliance by the plaintiff with a statutory requirement. It is limited by its terms "until" such compliance has been had, and, when its object has been effected, its terms prescribing a penalty should be strictly construed, and in favor of the corporation. At the commencement of this action the plaintiff had not filed the certified copy with the county clerk of Madera county, but it did file it with that officer several months before the defendant filed his amended answer, setting up this defense, so that at the time this defense was pleaded by the defendant the plaintiff had complied with the statute. The defense pleaded by the defendant was therefore unavailing to him to prevent the plaintiff from thereafter maintaining the action. Section 299 does not declare that the plaintiff shall not commence an action in any county unless it has filed a certified copy in the office of the county clerk, but merely declares that it shall not maintain an action until it has filed it. To maintain an action is not the same as to commence an action, but implies that the action has already been commenced. "The verb 'maintain,' in pleading, has a distinct, technical signification. It signifies to support what has already been brought into existence." Moon v. Durden, 2 Exch. 30. The expression in the opinion in Byers v. Bourret, 64 Cal. 73, to the effect that the provision of section 2468, Civ. Code, must be complied with before the commencement of the action, was not involved in the case then before the court. That section provides that an action cannot be maintained by the partnership until the publication of the certificate therein referred to has been made for four weeks, and it appeared at the trial of that case that the publication of the certificate had been commenced only one week prior thereto. If the completion of the publication had been essential to the commencement of the action, there would have been no occasion for any discussion respecting its publication subsequent to the commencement. The judgment is affirmed.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.
For prior report, see 43 Pac. 1.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing is denied. We desire to say, however, that the right of appeal of a defendant charged by accusation under section 772 of the Penal Code is not here involved. JOHNSON v. THOMAS. (L. A. 63.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1896.)

NEGLIGENCE—FAST DRIVING—VIOLATION OF CITY ORDINANCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Plaintiff was run over at a street crossing by a wagon driven at great speed by defendant's servant. Plaintiff saw the wagon when it was about a block away, but, thinking that it would not be turned towards the side street where he was standing, because of the high speed, paid no further attention. Held, that the question of contributory negligence was properly left to the jury.

2. In an action for injuries due to fast driving, a city ordinance prohibiting fast driving is admissible to show negligence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Peter Johnson against Albert Thomas for personal injuries due to negligence of defendant's servant. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Cassidy, for appellant. Variel & Davis, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action by Peter Johnson to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff by being knocked down and run over by a horse and wagon driven by a servant of defendant, upon a public street in the city of Los Angeles, California. Plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $500, from which judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Appellant makes three points for reversal: (1) That the court below erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit. (2) That the court erred in admitting in evidence, on the part of plaintiff, section 4 of Ordinance 202 of the city of Los Angeles. (3) That the verdict of the jury is not sustained by the evidence.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff, among other things, tends to show that Macy street, in the city of Los Angeles, runs east and west, is, say, 57 feet wide, and is crossed at right angles by Alameda street, which is 96 feet wide, with a sidewalk on the west side thereof 12 feet wide, and two railroad tracks running longitudinally through it, at or near the center thereof. Macy street, going east thereon, has, at the point in question, a down grade of, say, 7¾ feet in a distance of 175 feet. Plaintiff is a cabinet maker and carpenter, and has a shop on the west side of Alameda street 150 feet south of its intersection with Macy street. On the 15th day of January, 1894, plaintiff started to go from Kerchkoff & Cuzner's mill, on Macy street, to his shop, on Alameda street. He had his apron full of blocks, brackets, etc., which he held with his right hand, and in his left hand he carried some larger articles of like character. His course took him west along the south side of Macy street, to and across Alameda street, thence south, on the west side of the latter street, to his shop. When crossing Alameda street, the horse and heavy spring wagon of defendant, driven rapidly by Albert Jennings, the servant of defendant, came east down Macy street, turned south into Alameda street, and struck plaintiff, who was upon the crossing, and within 8 to 10 feet of the sidewalk, on the west side of Alameda street, knocking him down, and two wheels of the wagon passing over him, whereby he was seriously injured, etc. Plaintiff first saw the horse and wagon of defendant a block away (175 feet) coming down Macy street, when he was near the center of Alameda street, and, as he testified, coming down Macy street "at terrific speed," and supposed from the rapidity with which the horse was being driven he would continue on straight down Macy street, and did not further observe the team or look for it until at or about the moment he was struck down. To the question asked plaintiff, on cross-examination, "Well, at the time when you saw him coming rapidly, didn't it excite your fear of danger at all?" He answered, "No, sir; it didn't. I supposed by the way he was coming that he was going on right down Macy street." Again, he said, in answer to what reason he had for thinking he would continue down Macy street, "He was going so fast. It is kind of a sharp turn there for a man down Macy; and, as I said, I paid no attention." There was other testimony tending to show that defendant's horse was driven down the grade at "about a four-minute gait," and that there were no obstructions to a clear view. There was also evidence tending to show that defendant's horse was restive and nervous; had been frightened by a passing freight train, and as a consequence was not fully under control of his driver when he came down Macy street, but that he was stopped within "ten or fifteen feet" after the accident. That the horse came down Macy street at a speed so great as to attract the attention and excite the interest, if not fears, of witnesses, is apparent from the testimony. Allen J. Cobb says: "I saw a wagon coming very rapidly down Macy street. I watched it to see which way it was going, as it was coming so fast I thought I might have to dodge." Plaintiff introduced in evidence section 4 of Ordinance No. 202, of the city of Los Angeles, which is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person to immoderately ride or drive any horse upon any public street of the city of Los Angeles, or to permit any horse or horses attached to any vehicle to gallop, run or race upon any public street of said city."

Upon the showing made by plaintiff, the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. Treated as a question of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, which proximately led to the result, the evidence falls short of a case in which the court is authorized, as matter of law, to say the plaintiff was inhibited from a recovery. As a general proposition, cases of negligence (to which those of contributory negligence form no exception) present a mixed question of law and fact, in which it devolves upon the court to say, as matter of law, what is or amounts to negligence, and upon the jury to determine, as matter of fact, whether or not, in the particular case, the facts in proof warrant the imputation of negligence. Where, however, the facts are undisputed, and the inference of negligence is irresistible, and not open to doubt, debate, or rational difference of opinion, the question becomes one of law, to be passed upon by the court. Dufour v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 319, 7 Pac. 769; Long v. Railroad Co., 96 Cal. 269, 31 Pac. 170; Jamison v. Railroad Co., 55 Cal. 593; Van Praag v. Gale, 107 Cal. 438, 40 Pac. 555;

Davis v. Button, 78 Cal. 248, 18 Pac. 133, and 20 Pac. 545; Holmes v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 161, 31 Pac. 834; Wardlaw v. Railway Co. (Cal.) 42 Pac 1075. As was said in Van Praag v. Gale, 107 Cal. 438, 40 Pac. 555, "it by no means follows that the facts are admitted because there is no conflict in the testimony. * * * What the plaintiff did is established without dispute and beyond cavil; but whether from this conduct the deduction is inevitable that he did not exercise the precautions for his own safety which a reasonable man would have done under precisely the same circumstances is not so clear. That this is the ultimate fact to be determined must be conceded." When plaintiff saw the servant of defendant coming down the street, driving like "Jehu, the son of Nimshi," he reasoned that he would continue down Macy street, and not make the short turn at such a rate of speed onto Alameda street. This conclusion was very likely one warranted by observation in like cases, and the inference of negligence on the part of plaintiff in not further watching the team depended upon whether or not he was justified in this reasoning. It was certainly an inference upon which minds might well differ, and hence proper to be submitted to a jury, under proper instructions. There is nothing in the testimony to show that plaintiff could have reasonably escaped injury by any amount of care, after the horse and wagon turned upon Alameda street, and to hold that a foot passenger in crossing a side street must watch and plan to escape injury from vehicles upon a main street without some indication that the latter are about to leave such main street, and that a failure so to do is conclusive evidence of negligence, is to carry the doctrine of contributory negligence to a romantic and unwarranted length. The evidence of negligence on the part of defendant's servant was ample, and the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

2. The section of the city ordinance was properly admitted in evidence. "The violation of any statutory or valid municipal regulation, established for the purpose of protecting persons or property from injury, is of itself sufficient to prove such a breach of duty as will sustain a private action for negligence, if the other elements of actionable negligence concur. Thus, the violation of a statute or ordinance regulating the speed of vehicles, horses, or trains * * * is such a breach of duty as may be made the foundation of an action by any person belonging to the class intended to be protected by such a regulation, provided he is specially injured thereby." Shear. & R. Neg. (4th Ed.) § 13, and cases there cited.

3. The evidence was sufficient to uphold the verdict. To discuss it at length can be productive of no good. Many of the incidents testified to by Jennings, the driver of the horse, were sharply contradicted, and in such a case the action of the jury thereon is conclusive. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

SCHWARZ et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 251.)

CONTEMPT—VIOLATION OF INJUNCTION—EFFECT OF APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS—CERTIORARI—EXTENT OF REVIEW.

1. An appeal from an injunction ordering the removal of trade signs, and prohibiting the future use of the trade name thereon, stays proceedings as to the mandatory portion of the injunction, so that a failure to remove such signs could not, pending appeal, be punished as contempt.

2. Plaintiffs were ordered by the court to remove certain trade signs from their premises, and prohibited from using the trade name thereon, and, pending an appeal from the order, made no new use of the name, and removed it from their business stationery, but failed to remove the signs, claiming that they were the property of their lessor. Held, that the fact that they continued to do business on the premises was not a violation of prohibitory portion of the injunction, which could be punished as contempt pending the appeal.

3. On certiorari to review proceedings for contempt for violation of an injunction, the court is not limited to the record proper and the order of commitment in determining the power to make such order, but may look to evidence not in the record.

In bank. Certiorari by Gustave Schwarz and another to review an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco adjudging petitioners guilty of contempt. Order annulled.

Morrison, Stratton & Foerster, for petitioners. J. J. Scrivner, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is a proceeding to review by certiorari an order or judgment of department 7 of said superior court (Hon. A. A. Sanderson, J.) convicting petitioners of contempt for the alleged violation of an injunction. The facts pertinent to the inquiry are briefly these: The petitioners are the defendants in an action pending in said superior court, brought by Rudolf Hagen and Felix Eisele, wherein it is alleged that the latter are conducting a saloon and restaurant business at No. 8 O'Farrell street, in the city of San Francisco, under the name and designation of "Louvre"; that they are the owners of said designation as a trade name by right of purchase from their predecessors in interest, by whom it was appropriated for the purpose; that the defendants (these petitioners) have established a like business at No. 1 O'Farrell street, in said city, and have without right adopted the words "Louvre" and "Old Louvre" as a business designation for their saloon and restaurant, and have had said words placed upon the gaslight lamps in front of the entrance, and upon large glass signs over the entrances to their place of business, and elsewhere about the premises, etc.; and it is prayed that they may be forever enjoined and restrained from using the said words in connection with or in any manner in or about their said restaurant and saloon, and that defendants be required to remove said signs and other objects upon which said name appears, etc. Pending the trial of the action, the superior court, on July 19, 1895, made an order in said action whereby petitioners, the defendants therein, were "enjoined and restrained from using said word 'Louvre,' or the words 'Old Louvre,' upon any sign or signs, lamps, transparencies, either engraved or painted or otherwise arranged thereon, in connection with or in any manner in or about defendants' restaurant and saloon at No. 1 O'Farrell street, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, or any other words or devices printed, painted, or stamped or written on such signs or street lamps in such manner as to be a colorable imitation of the trade name of plaintiffs; and that defendants be required to remove their said lamps and transparencies upon which is now in any manner placed or appears the word 'Louvre,' or the words 'Old Louvre,' or any colorable imitation thereof; and that the said defendants, and each of them, be further enjoined and prohibited from using the said words, or either of them, in connection with the said business at No. 1 O'Farrell street, in said city and county of San Francisco." From this order, petitioners, on August 1, 1895, duly perfected an appeal to this court. Thereafter, the petitioners, having been cited to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt in failing to comply with said injunction order, appeared, and objected that said court had no jurisdiction to hear or proceed in the matter, by reason of the appeal from said order, the taking and perfecting of which appeal were duly called to the attention of the court; but, notwithstanding said objection and the said appeal, the superior court proceeded with said hearing. Thereupon petitioners introduced affidavits showing that the premises No. 1 O'Farrell street, where petitioners carry on their business, were at the time, and for several years prior thereto had been, held under a lease from the owner of the building by the Pabst Brewing Company, a corporation, which latter, previous to the occupation by petitioners, had at its own cost fitted up and furnished said premises in a complete manner for the purposes of a restaurant and saloon, and had caused said premises to be designated by the name "Old Louvre," by having said designation placed upon the several signs complained of; that two of said signs, one over each of the two entrances to said premises, are of fancy stained glass of an expensive character and make, and another of said signs is painted upon the wall of the Phelan building, in which said premises are situated; that all of said signs were so placed by said corporation before petitioners occupied said premises, and are the personal property of said corporation; that in March, 1895, petitioners rented said premises, with the furniture and fixtures therein, from said Pabst Brewing Company, as subtenants, for the purpose of conducting a saloon and restaurant business therein, and have since been carrying on such business, and were so engaged when the injunction was served upon them; that, immediately after the service of said injunction, petitioners complied therewith, and have since continued to do so in all respects, excepting only that they have not removed or interfered with the said signs above adverted to, which, as aforesaid, do not belong to them; that upon their wine cards and bills of fare the words "Old Louvre" have been left off, and the word "Louvre" in no manner or connection appears thereon, but instead appears the designation "Schwarz & Beth's Restaurant and Family Resort"; and that neither said name of "Louvre" or that of "Old Louvre" has since existed or been used in connection with their said business upon any signs, street lamps, or transparencies, or otherwise, excepting only upon the said signs, belonging to said brewing company. At the conclusion of said hearing, on August 27, 1895, the court made an order finding that petitioners were continuing to "use the said word 'Louvre' and the said words 'Old Louvre' in connection with their said business," in violation of said injunction, and adjudged them guilty of contempt therefor, and it was ordered and adjudged that they be committed to the county jail "until they, and each of them, shall desist and refrain from carrying on or conducting their said business at said No. 1 O'Farrell street, under the trade name of 'Louvre' or 'Old Louvre,' or from in any manner using said names in connection with their said business, or from carrying on the business of restaurant and saloon at said No. 1 O'Farrell street, under the said name of 'Louvre' or 'Old Louvre,' in said city and county of San Francisco"; and it was adjudged that they be fined in the sum of $150, and that they pay the same with the costs of the proceedings to plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs have execution therefor.

It is conceded that the injunction, in so far as it requires petitioners to remove the signs bearing the name in controversy, is mandatory in character; and it is further conceded that, as to the mandatory features thereof, it is stayed and suspended in its effect by the appeal taken by petitioners from the order granting the same. The appeal, however, has no such effect upon that part of the injunction which is merely prohibitory, but that remains in force and unimpaired, notwithstanding the appeal; and the question therefore arises: What was the particular in which the petitioners failed to conform to the requirements of the injunction, and for which they were found guilty of contempt? Was it in failing to observe the prohibitory features of the writ, or in not doing the affirmative thing required thereby,—that is, the removal of said signs? If the latter, then the court had no power to punish petitioners for their failure, since, that part of the writ being in suspension, the court could not proceed to enforce it pending the appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 949; Dewey v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. 64, 22 Pac. 333; Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543, 35 Pac. 156, 563. While the recitals of the judgment of contempt are general in terms, that the petitioners "have continued to and do now use" the prohibited name "in connection with their said business," it is quite manifest, we think, from the record, that the failure to remove the obnoxious signs was the fact upon which that finding is based, and that it was this fact which in the mind of the court constituted the failure of petitioners to comply with the injunction, and rendered them guilty of contempt. This is very apparent, not alone from the facts above recited, and which were wholly uncontradicted, but also by reference to the charge in the affidavit upon which the contempt proceedings were predicated. In substance, this affidavit is to the effect that, notwithstanding petitioners have been restrained from using the word "Louvre" or the words "Old Louvre" upon their signs, transparencies, etc., and are required to remove the same, they still continue, in violation of the injunction, to employ said designation. It is not charged specifically that the name is so being used in any other manner than upon said signs, and the affidavit can therefore be construed only as a charge that the name is being so used thereon, and not otherwise. The judgment follows the general language of the affidavit in this respect, and should receive no broader construction than the latter will bear. Contempt being a criminal proceeding, and the party being entitled to know with what he is charged, it will not be presumed that he was held guilty of some act not specifically alleged in the affidavit or fairly covered thereby. The offense being criminal in its nature, both the charge and the finding and judgment of the court thereon are to be strictly construed in favor of the accused. Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 412; Maxwell v. Rives, 11 Nev. 221; Phillips v. Welch, 12 Nev. 158 (Opinion of Beatty, J., 187).

The objection that we are not at liberty to go beyond the recitals or findings in the judgment itself, in reviewing the action of the court below, is no well taken. While the writ of review is not a writ of error, and is not a means by which, as upon appeal, the mere manner of conducting the proceedings, the rulings of the court upon questions of evidence, and other matters within the jurisdiction, involving the merits, however erroneous they may be, can be reviewed, it is, nevertheless, a means by which the power of the court in the premises can be inquired into; and for this purpose the review extends, not only to the whole of the record of the court below, but even to the evidence itself, where necessary to determine the jurisdictional fact. People v. Board of Delegates of San Francisco Fire Department, 14 Cal. 479; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 301; Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 49; Bodine v. Goodwin, 5 N. Y. 568. In Blair v. Hamilton, supra, in reviewing by certiorari the order of the court below, it is said: "In many cases jurisdictional facts may not appear of record, either by failure of the inferior court or officer to follow the requirements of the law and make them of record, or because the law itself does not require it to be done. In such cases this court and all other courts having jurisdiction to review and correct the proceedings of inferior courts would be powerless unless it can compel the inferior tribunal to certify to this court not only what is technically denominated the 'record,' but such facts, or the evidence of them, as may be necessary to determine whatever questions as to the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal may be involved; and the grossest abuses of power, to the great reproach of the law, might be perpetrated with impunity and without the possibility of a remedy."

But, while it is conceded that the removal of the signs cannot be compelled pending the appeal, it is contended that petitioners, in continuing business with the signs in place, were thereby using the said trade name in connection with their business, in contravention of the prohibitory features of the injunction, and that this constituted a contempt of the order of the court; that such use could have been avoided by either quitting their business or removing it to other premises, and, failing to do this, the petitioners were properly punished. But assuming that this would constitute such use as would, under the facts of this case, render it obnoxious to the injunction in any sense, to hold under such circumstances that petitioners could be punished therefor pending the appeal would simply be enabling that to be accomplished indirectly which could not be done directly, and to deprive petitioners entirely of the benefit of the stay afforded by their appeal. "The stay of proceedings pending an appeal has the legitimate effect of keeping them in the condition in which they were when the stay of proceedings was granted. It operates so as to prevent any future change in the condition of the parties." Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130. To require petitioners to abandon their business or the premises would be working a very material, if not an irreparable, change in the condition of the parties, notwithstanding the effect of the appeal was to stay all affirmative action in the premises.

It results inevitably from these considerations that the record discloses a case where the court had no power to proceed and punish the petitioners as for a contempt, and its judgment in that respect must be annulled. It is so ordered.

ELECTION CONTEST—RETURN DAY.

The "return day," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1115, providing that, when an elector contests the right of a person declared elected, he must within 40 days after the return day of such election file a statement, is not the day on which the result of the election is declared, but the day on which the canvass begins, under Pol. Code, §§ 1278, 1280, 1281, declaring that the board of supervisors shall meet on the first Monday after the election to canvass the returns; that, if they have not all been received, the canvass must be postponed from day to day, till all the returns have been received, or till six postponements have been had; and that the canvass shall be made by opening the returns and estimating the votes.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Proceeding by William H. Carlson against John P. Burt. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, for appellant. H. S. Utley and Charles Wellborn, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is a contest for the office of assessor of the county of San Diego. The case was decided against the contestant on demurrer to the complaint. The court held that it had no jurisdiction, because the complaint (or "written statement," as it is termed) was not filed with the county clerk within 40 days after the return day of the election, as required by section 1115, Code Civ. Proc. The complaint shows that the election was held on Tuesday, November 6, 1894; "that the respective boards of election of the several precincts of said county, on or before Monday succeeding the said Tuesday, made their returns to the board of supervisors of said county of San Diego, of the votes cast at the said general election; and that upon said Monday said board of supervisors met, and, finding that all of the returns in the several precincts in which said election was held had been duly and properly received, they thereupon proceeded to canvass said returns." It is also averred that on the 19th day of November, 1894, the board caused to be entered in the record of said board a statement which purported to show the various matters required by section 1282 of the Political Code, and that thereupon the board declared John P. Burt elected county assessor of San Diego county. The complaint in this case was filed December 29, 1894. This was the fortieth day after the entry was made in the records of the board declaring Burt elected, and the forty-sixth day after the day on which it is averred that the board proceeded to canvass the votes. If the return day is the day upon which the result of the canvass is declared, then this contest was inaugurated in time. On the other hand, if the return day is the day upon which the returns being all in are produced before the board, which then proceeds to canvass them, the statement was filed too late, and the court properly refused to entertain the case.

Section 1115, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, "When an elector contests the right of any person declared elected to such office, he must, within forty days after the return day of such election, file with the county clerk a written statement," etc. The Codes do not in any other place speak of any return day, but several sections in the Political Code direct the precinct officers to transmit to the county clerk certain matters pertaining to the election. The papers to be transmitted must be in packages, and in section 1278, Pol. Code, are spoken of as returns. The board is directed to meet on the first Monday after the election to canvass the returns. If the returns have not all been received, the canvass must be postponed from day to day until all the returns have been received, or until six postponements have been had. The canvass shall be made by opening the returns and estimating the votes. Pol. Code, §§ 1278, 1280, 1281. The clerk of the board is required as soon as the result is declared to enter on the records a statement similar to that which the complaint shows the board caused to be entered on the 19th. Id. § 1282. In other sections the election returns are mentioned, so that there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the phrase "election returns." But what is the return day of an election? The phrase "return day" has been long a familiar phrase in legal practice. Blackstone says (book 3, p. 277) that they are called "days in banc"; that is, days of appearance in the court of common bench. They were stated days in the term on which writs were returnable. These were original writs by which suits were commenced. If the defendant did not then appear and submit to the jurisdiction, process was issued to compel him to do so. In analogy, the last day on which any process can be returned is called "return day"; or, in case of an order to show cause, the "day of the hearing." The statute fixes no precise day in which election returns must be made. They should be sent to the clerk at once. But it would seem that any return is timely which is received before the board commences the canvass. Naturally, then, the return day would be the first Monday after the election, with authority in the board to adjourn return day six times from day to day, if all returns have not been received.

Appellant argues that this construction may deprive an elector of the right to contest altogether, as the board may not declare the result until 40 days after the canvass begins. Unquestionably, the argument is entitled to great weight; and, if any reasonable construction can be given to the law which would not result in nullifying the law as applied to a possible case, such construction should be given, rather than a construction which would have that effect. But this right to contest is not given to enable a candidate to vindicate his rights, but to any elector. Public policy requires that it should be inaugurated at once. If commenced within 40 days after the commencement of a canvass, it will be before the commencement of the term of the person declared elected. If delayed much longer, it will be after the commencement of the next term of office. To contest the right to an office in this mode is not a natural right, but one given by statute. The phrase "return day" refers to the election returns, and to some day fixed by reference to something done in regard to the returns. If it had been intended that the time should run from the day on which the person was declared elected, it was easy to say so, and the very language required was in the precise sentence in which the limitation was made. How natural it would have been to say that a contest as to the right of a person "declared elected" shall be commenced within 40 days after he has been so declared elected, instead of changing the expression, making it read "from the return day of the election." There is nothing in the expression used which naturally refers to the day on which the person whose right is contested was declared elected.

To the suggestion that the board may take more than 40 days to canvass the votes, it may be said that it may be possible, but it is quite improbable. If it should take much more than 40 days, the vote would not be canvassed until the term for which officers are to be elected will begin. Such a contingency was not anticipated, and can rarely happen, except through a criminal intent. The presumption is that in fixing the election at a certain period before the commencement of the terms of office, and in limiting the period for the commencement of a contest, the legislature has taken all these things into consideration, and has concluded that the period fixed will always prove sufficient, and I believe that in practice it always has.

It must be held, then, that the return day is the day on which the board actually commences the canvass, or, rather, the day on which, under the law, they ought to do so. It follows that the contest was commenced too late, and the judgment is affirmed.

In re TREADWELL et al. (No. 15,954.)

APPEAL—ACQUIESCENCE IN JUDGMENT—DISMISSAL.

Where a guardian, pending an appeal by him from an order revoking his appointment, tenders his resignation, which is accepted, and his account settled, it is an acquiescence in the order appealed from, and the appeal will be, on motion of appellee, dismissed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Appeal in the matter of the estate and guardianship of one Treadwell and others. Heard on motion by appellant to recall remittitur on dismissal of appeal. Denied.

Jackson Hatch, E. M. Rosenthal, W. C. Burnett, and L. C. Burnett, for appellant. Myrick & Deering and C. D. Wright, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. When this cause was called for argument, in its order upon the calendar, August 19, 1895, there was no appearance on behalf of the appellant, and the counsel for the respondent then stated to the court that, since the appeal was taken, the oldest of the minors had attained majority; and he also presented a certified copy of an order settling the account of the appellant as guardian of the estate of said minor and discharging him from his trust, and also a certified copy of another order of said court discharging the appellant as guardian of the other minors, made upon his own application, both of said orders having been made subsequent to the taking of the appeal herein, and submitted the matter to the court for such order as should be proper. Thereupon the court made an order that, as it appeared that all matters involved in the appeal were disposed of, the appeal be dismissed. September 20th the remittitur upon this order was filed in the superior court, and on the 18th of October a notice on behalf of the appellant was given to the attorneys for the respondent of a motion to set aside the order dismissing the appeal, and to recall the remittitur, upon the ground that said order had been improvidently granted upon a false suggestion, and under a mistake as to the facts of the case. At the hearing thereon, the appellant based his motion upon the ground that no notice of a motion to dismiss the appeal had been previously served upon him, but made no showing of any false suggestion to the court or of any mistake as to the facts of the case. In support of the order, the respondent, in addition to the above-certified copies, presented a certified copy of a petition made by the appellant to the superior court subsequent to the taking by him of the appeal herein, in which the appellant stated that on the 13th of August, 1894, he resigned his trust as guardian of the minors, and that his resignation was duly and regularly accepted by the court. The order from which the appeal herein was taken was made July 31, 1894, and was an order revoking and annulling a previous order appointing the appellant guardian of the minors. The resignation by the appellant of his office as such guardian, subsequent to the order revoking his letters, and the acceptance of such resignation by the court, together with the settlement of his account, operated as an acquiescence by him in the previous order of the court annulling his letters, and precluded him from assigning any error in such order, and rendered the order dismissing the appeal proper. The motion is denied.

ROZECRANS MIN. CO. v. MOREY. (Sac. 12.)

CORPORATIONS—DIRECTORS—DE JURE AND DE FACTO.

Under Civ. Code, § 305, providing that directors of a corporation must be stockholders, a person owning no stock in the corporation, elected a director without his knowledge, does not become a director, either de jure or de facto, so as to prevent his purchasing corporate property at a judicial sale, though a share of stock was, subsequently to his election, issued and delivered to him, which he retained; he never having acted as a director or been called upon to do so until 10 years after his election, when he repudiated his office.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Eldorado county; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by the Rozecrans Mining Company against H. S. Morey. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Everett Ball and Irwin & Irwin (Van R. Paterson, of counsel), for appellant. Williams & Witmer, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action in equity, involving the ownership of certain mining property. Plaintiff became financially embarrassed, and the property was sold under execution sales, and also sold for nonpayment of taxes. Deeds passed to Morey, the defendant, under these execution sales, and also under the delinquent tax sale. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment rendered against it, and also from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

There are many questions discussed by counsel in their respective briefs, but at the threshold of the case a single matter presents itself, which, upon consideration, we think necessarily points the judgment. The regularity of the proceedings leading up to the execution sales and the tax sale are not attacked, but it is insisted that Morey during all these times was a director and trustee of the corporation plaintiff, and, as such director and trustee, all his dealings with the property of plaintiff must be held to have been for its benefit, and that, by reason of his fiduciary relation, whatever title to plaintiff's property came to him is held as trustee for plaintiff. Of course, this principle of law is elementary, and must prevail here if the facts present those conditions. But we think they fail to do it, as may be readily seen from the following finding of fact made by the trial court. After hearing all the evidence the court found: "That on the 19th day of June, 1883, H. L. Robinson, owning the entire stock of the plaintiff, held a stockholders' meeting for the election of trustees. That said Robinson conducted the election, and cast a ballot for the election of five trustee, as follows: H. L. Robinson, 64,000 shares; A. Everett Ball, E. D. Sawyer, E. W. Scott and C. A. Darby, each 64,000 shares. That none of said parties owned any stock of plaintiff, except Robinson. That, immediately after the election aforesaid, a trustees' meeting was held, and Sawyer, Scott, and Darby resigned. That thereupon E. S. Chester, James Blair, and H. S. Morey were elected to fill the vacancies caused by the resignations of Sawyer, Scott, and Darby. That, at the time of said election, the said Morey was not a stockholder, had no interest in the corporation, had no knowledge of the meeting of the stockholders or trustees, or of his election, and in no manner consented to be elected or to act as trustee of plaintiff. That, on the 3d day of July, 1883, a certificate of one share of the stock of plaintiff was issued to said Morey. That said Morey did not know of the issuance of said share of stock, paid nothing for the same, nor did he authorize it to be issued to him. That at some time subsequent to the 3d day of July, 1883, and prior to the 23d day of February, 1886, said share of stock was delivered to said Morey by H. L. Robinson. That he (Morey) has had possession of said share of stock ever since. That said Morey, at the time of the delivery to him of said share of stock by said Robinson, learned that he had been elected a trustee of plaintiff. That said Morey at no time acted as a trustee of plaintiff; that he was not at any time consulted as trustee by any officer or agent of plaintiff; that he did no act or thing whatever as trustee of plaintiff; and when, for the first time, he was notified, in September, 1893, to attend a meeting of the trustees, he refused to act or to have anything to do with plaintiff or the other trustees at said meeting." Upon an examination of the evidence, we find this finding in all its material parts is fully supported; and such being the fact, the whole superstructure of plaintiff's case must fall, for the foundation upon which it was built has been absolutely undermined and taken away. We think such is the necessary and only construction to be placed upon this finding. It discloses that Morey was neither a director de jure nor de facto. Morey was not a director de jure, for he was not a stockholder of the corporation when elected. Section 305 of the Civil Code declares that the directors must be selected from the stockholders, and also declares that directors must be holders of stock in an amount fixed by the by-laws of the corporation. Conceding that the by-laws of the corporation plaintiff fixed no amount of stock to qualify a stockholder for election as a director, still, under the provision of the Code quoted, the director must be a stockholder. He must own stock in some amount, or his election is invalid. The fact that Robinson gave Morey one share of stock, weeks, and perhaps months, after the day of election, of which share of stock "Morey has had possession ever since," entirely fails to meet the case, and is wholly lacking in curing the invalidities existing in his election. Neither is Morey a director de facto. The rule of law for the protection of third parties as to the acts of de facto officers may well be doubted when applied between the corporation and its own illegally elected officers. It is said in State v. Curtis, 9 Nev. 339: "In order to protect third persons transacting business with such officers under such circumstances as to induce them to believe that they were dealing with legal officers, the law has reached out its strong arm to a dangerous extent, upon the principle that, although not officers de jure, they were officers in fact, whose acts public policy required should be considered valid. Such a principle ought not to be extended to a case where the rights of the public are not affected, nor where all the parties interested have knowledge that the person pretending to be an officer is not an officer de jure; for in such a case the reason of the rule no longer exists, and the law should not be invoked for protection." But, conceding this principle of law is a proper one to be here invoked, still there is nothing in this finding to indicate Morey to be a director de facto. Upon the contrary, the showing prevents the drawing of any such inference. He never did an act as a director. He never accepted the office. He was never consulted as a director by any officer of the corporation. He never held himself out as a director in any way, and, when notified of a meeting of the directors some 10 years after his alleged election, he repudiated his office. It is not necessary to cite authorities as to who are and who are not officers de facto, for we apprehend that no legal precedent may be found which would justify us in holding Morey a de facto director, as tested by the facts of this case. We conclude that defendant Morey was neither a de jure nor a de facto director and trustee of the plaintiff corporation at the times set out in its complaint, and for such reason plaintiff fails to prove a cause of action. We find no error in the record authorizing a reversal of the judgment and a new trial of the case. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CALIFORNIA TITLE INSURANCE & TRUST CO. v. PAULY. (L. A. 66.)

MORTGAGES — DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY — PAROL EVIDENCE—APPURTENANCES.

1. Findings that a street-railroad company, after executing a mortgage, acquired pavilion grounds "for use on or about its said lines of railway"; that they were "adapted to" such use, and were operated and held by the company in connection with its railroad, and for use in and about it,—bring such grounds within the description of the mortgage: "Its real * * * property * * * that it may hereafter acquire for use, or adapted to use, on or about its said lines of railway."

2. A court having made findings bringing pavilion grounds acquired by a street railway, after making a mortgage, within the description thereof: "Its real * * * property * * * that it may hereafter acquire for use, or adapted to use, on or about its said lines of railway,"—the word "appurtenances," in its further finding that "such pavilion grounds, with said accessories, are an important and necessary part of the appurtenances and equipment of said railroad," will be construed as one that the grounds and improvements thereon, as used in connection with the railroad, are needful aids to the business of the road, in that they add to its income.

3. To bring pavilion grounds within the description of a street railway company's mortgage of real property, that it might afterwards acquire "for use or adapted to use, on or about its said lines of railway," parol evidence is admissible that the purchase of the grounds was contemplated by the road at the time of the mortgage, that one of the termini of its road was therein, and that the sole object of the purchase thereof was to increase travel on the road.

Action by the California Title Insurance & Trust Company against Charles W. Pauly, assignee of the San Diego Cable-Railway Company, an insolvent debtor. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James E. Wadham and Frederick W. Stearns, for appellant. Dorn & Dorn and E. W. Britt, for respondent. T. J. Bergin, Works & Works, E. Parker, A. E. Cochran, Luce & McDonald, and Gibson & Titus, for various interveners.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the San Diego Cable-Railway Company, a corporation, to the plaintiff, in trust, to secure the payment of a series of bonds executed by the mortgagor. Before the commencement of the action, the said railway company had been adjudged an insolvent debtor, pursuant to the insolvent act of 1880, and all its estate, real and personal, had been duly assigned to the defendant, Pauly, who was the duly elected and qualified assignee of the estate of said insolvent debtor. The plaintiff prevailed in the lower court; and the defendant, Pauly, appeals from the judgment of foreclosure, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The appellant contends that the court erred in finding that a certain piece of land, known as the "Pavilion Grounds," was embraced in the description of the mortgaged property, and in ordering a sale of those grounds as a part of the property mortgaged; and this is the principal point in controversy on this appeal. Subsidiary to this, however, a question is raised as to whether the court erred in admitting certain parol evidence, for the purpose of applying the description contained in the mortgage to the pavilion grounds.

The description of the mortgaged property in the mortgage is as follows: "All and singular the franchises and lines of railway, and appurtenances thereof, of the said San Diego Cable-Railway Company, which lines of railway commence at the corner of Sixth street and L street, in said city of San Diego, and thence extend along said Sixth street to C street, on C street to Fourth street, on Fourth street to Newhall avenue, and thence on Newhall avenue and connecting streets eastward to terminus at University Heights, in said city of San Diego,—a distance, including curves and switches, of five miles; and all the concrete subway, cables, cars, dummies, and other rolling stock, equipment, machinery, power houses, fares, rents, income, and other property of the said San Diego Cable-Railway Company, appurtenant to its lines of railway above described; and its real, personal, and mixed property, franchises, rights of way, privileges, interests, and appurtenances, of every kind and nature, that it now owns, or that it may hereafter acquire, for use, or adapted to use, on or about its said lines of railway; also the following described parcel and tract of land, situated in the city of San Diego, county of San Diego, state of California, to wit: Block three hundred and fifty-eight (358) of Horton's addition to said city of San Diego, according to the official map of said addition by Lockling, on file in the office of the recorder of said county; the same being the block of land containing the power house of the said cable-railway company, together with the appurtenances."

1. Appellant contends that "the only ground on which the court holds the pavilion grounds to be included in the mortgage is that said grounds are an appurtenance of the line of railway," and insists that whether or not those grounds are appurtenant to the railway is the only material question involved; and then proceeds to controvert the proposition that they are so, on the ground that land cannot be appurtenant to land, etc. But I think counsel mistaken as to the ground on which the court held the pavilion grounds to be included in the mortgage. The court found, as alleged in the complaint, that the pavilion grounds were acquired by the railway company after the execution of the mortgage, "for use on or about its said lines of railway," and that said grounds are "adapted to" such use, and were "operated and held by said cable-railway company * * * in connection with said railroad, and for use in and about such railroad." These findings brought the pavilion grounds clearly within the description in the mortgage as a part of "its real * * * property * * * that it may hereafter acquire for use, or adapted to use, on or about its said lines of railway," though not appurtenant to the railway in the technical legal sense of the word; and therefore it is wholly immaterial whether the pavilion grounds were appurtenances or not, in any sense of the word. The only ground upon which it is insisted that the court found the pavilion grounds to be appurtenant to the railway is that, after finding facts which bring those grounds within the mortgage description, and show that they could not be appurtenant to the railway in the legal sense of the word, the court added the following: "And that such pavilion grounds, with said accessories, are an important and necessary part of the appurtenances and equipment of said railroad." But it is quite apparent that the word "appurtenance" was not here used in its technical legal sense. Read in connection with its context, the legal technical meaning of the word cannot be attributed to it without making the finding inconsistent with other material findings to the effect that the pavilion grounds consist of about five acres of land which, by no legal possibility, could be appurtenant to the railway in the technical law sense of the word. Under these circumstances, the finding should be so construed, if possible, without doing violence to the language expressing it, as to make it consistent with all other material findings (Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 28 Pac. 1053; Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 Pac. 742; Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 154); and that the word "appurtenance" may properly be used in a sense broader than its technical legal meaning,—as, for example, in the sense of the word "addition,"—has been judicially recognized. In Frey v. Drahos, 6 Neb. 10, Lake, C. J., speaking of the word "appurtenances," said: "It is, however, doubtless true that the word is frequently used in a more enlarged and comprehensive sense [than its technical legal sense], and when it can be gathered, from all the attendant circumstances, that it was so understood and used by the parties, a corresponding effect should be given to it in the interpretation of a contract." See, also, Harris v. Elliott, 10 Pet. 25, 54, and Cent. Dict., where the law meaning is distinguished from other senses in which the word may be used. I think the obvious meaning of the finding in question, read in connection with the other findings above stated, is that the pavilion land, and the improvements thereon, as used in connection with the railway, are important and necessary additions or appendages thereto; which meaning does not imply that they are appurtenances of the railway in the technical sense of the word, nor even that they are indispensable to the use of the railway for the purposes of transportation, but only that they are needful aids to the business, in that they increase the profits or diminish the losses of the business. If, as claimed by counsel for appellant, the finding, as they construe it, is not justified by the evidence, this is an additional reason for adopting a different construction which is justified by the evidence, provided the language of the finding is susceptible of such different construction. My conclusions on this point are (1) that the judgment is supported by those unchallenged findings which bring the pavilion land within the description in the mortgage, as real estate acquired after the execution of the mortgage, and appurtenant to nothing; and (2) that the above-discussed finding relied upon by appellant is not inconsistent with those. It is not questioned that a mortgage may be given on property to be acquired by the mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage. As a case in point, see Omaha & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 108 Mo. 298, 18 S. W. 1101. See, also, Jones, Mortg. §§ 152–157. It should also be noted here that it is not claimed by counsel for appellant, either in their brief or statement on motion for a new trial, that the findings of the court are not self-consistent. They have wholly ignored or overlooked those findings which identify the pavilion grounds as the after-acquired real estate described in the mortgage.

2. Counsel for appellant say: "The court erred in admitting parol evidence showing the general course and termini of the cable road, the location of the pavilion grounds, and the amount of travel induced by reason of the pleasure resort maintained thereon." In this connection, it was proved by undisputed parol evidence that the purchase of the pavilion grounds was contemplated by the railway company before, and at the time, the mortgage was executed; that one of the termini of the road was within those grounds; that the sole object of the purchase was to increase travel upon the road; that the grounds were used in connection with the road for that purpose only; that they were adapted to such use, and did increase the traffic on the road about 100 per cent.; that the grounds were improved at the expense of the railway company, and were opened to the public as a pleasure resort at the same time the road was finished and opened for travel, no distinct charge being made for admission of the public to those grounds; that the railway company furnished music, a dance hall, and other conveniences for visitors and picnic parties, on Sundays and holidays, at an expense of $200 to $300 per month; and that the grounds thus used by the railway company were worth three to four times as much as they would be for any other purpose. The purpose for which such evidence was introduced, and which it served, was to prove that the pavilion grounds were acquired by the railway company for use, and adapted to use, "on or about its said lines of railway;" and thus to identify them as being after-acquired real estate described in the mortgage, or, as may be otherwise expressed, to apply to those grounds the description contained in the mortgage, though the description of itself is unambiguous and sufficiently certain. That parol evidence is competent for this purpose does not admit of a doubt. Greenl. Ev. § 287; Hancock v. Watson, 18 Cal. 137; Began v. O'Reilly, 32 Cal. 11; Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. 386; Towle v. Coal Co., 99 Cal. 397, 33 Pac. 1126.

3. In their reply brief, for the first time, counsel for appellant contend that there is no allegation in the complaint to support the finding that the pavilion grounds were mortgaged otherwise than as appurtenances to the railway. It is alleged in the complaint, after exhibiting the mortgage, that "by said mortgage the railway company did mortgage to plaintiff * * * all its real, personal, and mixed property * * * that it then, on said 1st day of April, 1890, owned, or might thereafter acquire, for use, or adapted to use, on or about said line of railway. * * * That since said 1st day of April, 1890, to wit, on or about November 18, 1891, the said railway company * * * became the owner, and thereafter, until its assignment in insolvency, was the owner in fee, and in possession of," lots and blocks (particularly describing them) "known as the 'Pavilion Grounds.'" Then, after alleging the use of said grounds by the railway company, as above stated, "in and about said railroad," proceeds to allege that said pavilion grounds "were, as plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, intended to be, and by said indenture were, mortgaged to this plaintiff to secure payment of said bonds." I think these allegations afford a sufficient answer to the contention that the judgment as to the pavilion grounds is not supported by the complaint. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

APPEAL—REVIEW.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by William F. Smith and others against John I. Sabin. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. Heynemann, for appellants. Stanley, Hayes, McEnerney & Bradley, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs were architects, doing business as partners under the firm name of Smith & Freeman. They brought this action in July, 1893, to recover the balance alleged to be due them for services performed at the request of the defendant, in 1891, in drawing plans and specifications, and procuring bids thereon, for a hotel, to be called "Hotel Edison," and to be situated at the corner of Sutter and Hyde streets, in the city of San Francisco, but which was never constructed. It is alleged that the hotel was to cost about the sum of $134,000, and that the reasonable value of plaintiffs' services was $3,350, of which sum $1,000 had been paid, leaving still due $2,350, for which judgment was asked. The answer of defendant denied that the proposed hotel was to cost about the sum of $134,000, and alleged that the plans and specifications prepared by plaintiffs were made under the express agreement that they should not require the expenditure of, and the hotel should not cost, any greater sum that $100,000; that all of the services performed by plaintiffs were performed under that special contract, and that the plans and specifications made and furnished by plaintiffs required the expenditure of $134,775, and that no other plans or specifications had ever been prepared by plaintiffs for defendant for the erection of said or any hotel. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were that the Hotel Edison was not to cost about the sum of $134,000, but, on the contrary, before the performance of any services by plaintiffs for defendant, it was understood and agreed between them that the plans and specifications to be prepared should not require the expenditure of more than about $100,000; that the plans and specifications made by plaintiffs were made under the express agreement that the hotel should not, under said plans and specifications, cost any greater sum than about $100,000; that the only plans and specifications made and furnished by plaintiffs required the expenditure by defendant of the sum of $134,775; that while the plaintiffs were engaged in drawing said plans and specifications, and while their contract to draw the same was unfinished and unperformed, the defendant, at the request of the plaintiffs, paid on account thereof the sum of $1,000; and that upon the trial of this case the return of said sum of $1,000 was waived by defendant; and, as a conclusion of law, it was found that the defendant was entitled to judgment against the plaintiffs for his costs. Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiffs take nothing by the action, from which, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, they have appealed.

In support of the appeal it is earnestly urged—and this is the only point made—that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and hence that the judgment should be reversed. This position cannot be sustained. After carefully going over the record, we are satisfied that there was evidence tending to support the theory of the defense, and to justify the findings. This being so, the case comes within the well-settled rule of this court that where there is a conflict of evidence the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal. It would subserve no useful purpose to detail the evidence introduced by the respective parties, and it is therefore passed without more particular notice. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; SEARLS, C.

POPE v. J. K. ARMSBY CO. (Sac. 81.)[1]

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RATIFICATION OF AGENT'S CONTRACT.

Plaintiff wrote defendant that he had a contract for the sale of fruit, signed in defendant's name, "By W., Agent," and wanted to know if W. was in fact defendant's agent, and if the contract was correct. Defendant's manager replied that W. had bought some apricots "on our advice, but we are not aware he bought them in our name. We will handle them, however, and think there is no question on the money part of the transaction," adding that the writer would be in plaintiff's neighborhood shortly, and would arrange the matter. A few days later, and before plaintiff shipped the fruit to defendant, the manager visited plaintiff's locality, but made no effort to see him. Held, that defendant was estopped from repudiating the contract.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgeford, Judge.

Action by J. H. Pope against J. K. Armsby Company to recover money due on a contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. H. M. Alberry, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action to recover a balance due upon a contract for the purchase of fruit, alleged to have been made by defendant with the plaintiff. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial. The only question involved is whether the evidence sustains the finding that defendant made the contract sued upon; and this question depends upon whether one F. W. Willis, who made the contract with plaintiff, in the name of defendant, was the agent of the latter for the purpose. Whether the evidence is sufficient to establish precedent authority in Willis, either express or implied, to make the contract in question, is one sharply mooted; the defendant claiming that it is not, and the plaintiff, with apparently equal confidence, contending that it is, ample. In the view we take of the case, however, it is unnecessary to state or discuss the evidence or the divergent views of counsel upon that phase of the controversy, since, in our judgment, the record very clearly discloses a subsequent ratification of the contract by defendant. Defendant's place of business is in the city of San Francisco, where it deals in dried fruits and other commodities. The contract with plaintiff was made on May 19, 1894, at the home of the latter, in the county of Colusa. It was made by Willis, who represented himself to plaintiff as the agent of defendant for the purchase of the fruit, and was in writing, and was signed, "J. K. Armsby Company. By Frank W. Willis, Agent." Subsequently, on May 25, 1894, and before the delivery of any fruit under the contract, plaintiff wrote to defendant this letter: "Colusa, Cal., May 25, 1894. J. K. Armsby Co., San Francisco—Gentlemen: I have sold my green fruit to you, and have a contract signed to that effect, signed 'J. K. Armsby Company,' by Frank Willis, as agent. Now, what I want to know, is F. W. Willis your agent for buying green fruit, and is the contract correct? Your immediate answer and oblige, Yours truly, J. H. Pope." In response, defendant, through its general manager, Mr. Freeman, on May 26, 1894, wrote: "San Francisco May 26, 1894. John H. Pope, Esq., Colusa, Cal.—Dear Sirs: We have yours of the 25th. Mr. Willis bought some apricots on our advice, but we are not aware he bought them in our name. We will handle them, however, and think there is no question on the money part of the transaction. The writer expects to visit your section within the next week or two, and will arrange the matter satisfactorily with you then. Yours truly, J. K. Armsby Co. Freeman." It is at once apparent that this letter from the defendant is not entirely open and ingenuous. It does not answer the question put by plaintiff, whether Willis was its agent in the premises, in a categorical manner, by saying, in terms, that he was or was not such agent. But the language used, and the assurances therein conveyed, authorize, we think, but one inference, and that the one put upon it by plaintiff, that the contract was all right, and defendant would see it carried out. If this is not what the defendant intended plaintiff to understand, it was exceedingly unfortunate in the choice of language to express its meaning. If defendant intended to repudiate the transaction, it was its duty to do so explicitly, and in such terms as to leave no room for plaintiff to be misled by drawing an inference which defendant did not intend to convey. It was not essential that the ratification should be in express terms, in order to bind the principal. If it is fairly inferable from the words or conduct of the party, it is sufficient. Like the act of conferring antecedent authority upon an agent, it may be either express or implied. Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 296, 32 Pac. 243; Lumber Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 237, 26 Pac. 902. It is said that defendant's letter was not a ratification, because it was not written with a perfect knowledge of the transaction; that the terms of the contract were not stated in plaintiff's letter, and they were not known to defendant when its letter was written. In the first place, there was evidence tending to show that Willis, who was admittedly representing defendant in a certain capacity, talked with the manager of defendant over the telephone and told him about the transaction with plaintiff, the same evening the contract was made. But, in the next place, defendant was positively and plainly informed by plaintiff's letter that he had a written contract signed in its name; and it was clearly the duty of defendant, if it did not know the terms or purport of the contract, to inform itself thereof before writing as it did, if it did not wish to be bound thereby. It would have been a very easy thing to have asked plaintiff to send it a copy of the contract, before replying to his inquiry; and not to have taken this simple precaution was negligence on its part, and precludes it from denying the effect of its assurances to plaintiff, which induced the latter to proceed and deliver his fruit under what he had a right to suppose was a valid contract. Scott v. Jackson, 89 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 898. The general rule is that "where a person by word or conduct induces another to act on a belief in the existence of a certain state of facts, he will be estopped, as against him, to allege a different state of facts." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 19. Mr. Bigelow defines estoppel in pais to be "a right arising from acts, admissions, or conduct which have induced a change of position, in accordance with the real or apparent intention of the party against whom they are alleged." Bigelow, Estop. (4th Ed.) 445. Defendant did not excuse himself from further inquiry by merely asking its representative, Mr Willis, if he had made such a contract in its name, and getting his assurance that he had not. It knew that Willis was operating in plaintiff's neighborhood in buying fruit, in which he was to a certain extent representing the defendant; and being explicitly informed that he had made the contract with plaintiff in its name, it was charged with further inquiry of the plaintiff to ascertain the fact. This it had perfect and convenient opportunity to do, through its manager, Mr. Freeman, who was in Colusa only three or four days after the receipt of plaintiff's letter, and before plaintiff had acted under the contract. But Mr. Freeman made no effort to see plaintiff, notwithstanding the statement in his letter to plaintiff that he would do so; and the result was that plaintiff was left to indulge the inference that everything was all right, and he could count upon the contract being carried out. Under these circumstances we think the defendant clearly estopped from denying the contract. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PUBLIC LANDS—TIMBER-CULTURE CLAIM—INTEREST OF APPLICANT—DEVISABILITY—RIGHTS OF HEIRS.

1. Testator entered lands as a timber-culture claim, and before performance of all conditions precedent to obtaining title, died, leaving his wife sole beneficiary of his will. Plaintiff was excluded from its provisions, but would have taken as an heir by descent. The property was distributed to the widow, who mortgaged it to defendant, to whom it passed in fee under foreclosure. Subsequently a patent was issued by the United States, conveying the land in terms to the heirs of decedent. Held, that the claimant's interest was not devisable, and his heirs took as donees of the United States, and not by inheritance from the claimant.

2. A timber-culture claimant died before obtaining title, and the patent was issued in terms to his heirs. Held that, since the United States has no general law of succession, who are the heirs must be determined by the law of the state in which the land is situated.

3. Such heirs took equally, and not according to the laws of descent of the state where the land was situated.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Suit by Chas. Edward Cooper, an infant, by his guardian ad litem, against H. G. Wilder, to quiet title to lands. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. H. C. Ecker and Haines & Ward, for appellant. James E. Wadham and F. W. Stearns, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Action to quiet title to 40 acres of land in San Diego county. The land was entered as a timber-culture claim, in November, 1879, by David Cooper, plaintiff's father. David Cooper died testate in July, 1881, leaving his widow sole beneficiary of his will, and expressly excluding plaintiff from any share of his estate. The property was duly distributed to the widow. In 1892 a patent was issued by the United States, conveying the land in terms to the heirs of David Cooper, deceased. In 1891, before the issuance of the patent, the widow, who was sole devisee of David Cooper, and the sole distributee of the estate, mortgaged the land to defendant, who subsequently foreclosed, and purchased the property at the foreclosure sale, and in due time received a deed therefor. Defendant at the trial proved his deraignment of title from the widow of David Cooper, deceased. The question is, in whom did the title vest? Appellant claims it as heir; the defendant, that it passed, by the will and the decree of distribution, to the widow of David Cooper, or, if it did not vest under the will and decree, then the widow and the son of David Cooper took equally.

The applicant for the government bounty is required to subscribe an oath to the effect that he makes the filing for the purpose of cultivating timber for his own exclusive benefit, and not for the purpose of speculation, and that he intends to hold and cultivate the land. He is required to break or plow five acres the first year; five acres the second year, and to cultivate the five acres broken or plowed the first year; the third year, to cultivate the five acres plowed the second year and to plant, in timber, seeds, or cuttings, the five acres first plowed, and to cultivate the remaining five acres; and the fourth year, to plant, in timber, seeds, or cuttings, the remaining five acres. To get his certificate he must prove, or, if he is dead, his heirs or legal representatives must prove, that he or they have planted, and for not less than eight years cultivated, that quantity and character of trees, and that there are then growing at least 675 thrifty trees per acre. A failure at any time to perform the conditions works a forfeiture. The property could not be taken in satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuance of the final certificate, which could not be had until full proof of performance, as above stated, was made. Obviously, the privilege or right acquired by the entry and filing is personal, and cannot be transferred except as authorized in the act. The death of the applicant before performance renders him incapable of performance, and that event would end the claim but for the provisions of the act which authorize the heirs to prove that he or they has or have performed. Does the heir in such case take by inheritance from the applicant, or is he, by appointment in the act itself, a substituted beneficiary of the government, to whom the title goes by direct grant? It is admitted, at once, that the condition of the applicant prior to full performance is in no wise analogous to that of a pre-emptor, either before or after the pre-emptor has received his certificate of purchase. The applicant has a right in the land, of which the government cannot deprive him, but which will be lost if he fails to perform; and death, before performance, renders such failure certain, and ends the estate of the applicant. In view, however, of the hardship of such a result, the law continues its offer to certain persons whom it is presumed the applicant himself might have selected; but they take, not by inheritance from the deceased, but as grantees from the government. No case is cited under the timber-culture act, but cases have arisen under other acts of congress which are in all essential respects similar to the act in question. The Oregon donation act (9 Stat. 496) granted to qualified settlers on public land, who had occupied and cultivated the same for four years, and performed certain acts in regard to making application for the land, proving up, etc., 320 acres of land. The opening words of that act were, "That there shall be, and hereby is granted," and it was provided, in case of death before the expiration of the four years' possession required, "All the rights of the deceased under this act shall descend to the heirs-at-law of such settler." In 1852 one Loring, who had all the qualifications necessary to enable him to take and hold under the act, entered upon 320 acres of land in Oregon, with the intent to acquire the title under the act. He died within one year after his entry upon the land, having by his will devised all his estate. Whether the land or his right was devisable arose in Hall v. Russell, 101 U. S. 503. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, said the question was whether "the heirs took by descent from the settler or as donees of the United States. If by descent, it is conceded the settler had a devisable estate; if as donees, he had not." It was held that by entering under the act the settler acquired at once a present right to occupy and maintain possession so as to acquire a complete title to the soil, but got no title until he had completed his four years' continued residence and cultivation. His rights were, however, statutory, and must be ascertained by the language of the act. It is said: "The object of congress undoubtedly was to allow a settler's heirs to succeed to his possessions, and thus keep his rights alive. But for some such provision, all the rights of the settler would have been lost by his death. As the law required full four years' residence by the person who claimed the grant, if no provision had been made for a continuance of his possession, the land would have become vacant on his death, and open for a new settlement by a new settler, if the law authorizing new settlements still remained in force. Hence it was provided that the possessory rights of a deceased settler should go to his heirs, and that they might get the land, on making requisite proof, without further residence and cultivation of their own. Their title to the land was to come, not from their deceased ancestors, but from the United States." Every word of this is as applicable to the timber-culture act as to the Oregon donation act, so far as concerns the question under consideration. Here, as there, a series of acts were to be performed, running through a number of years before the applicant was entitled to a patent, and a failure at any point during that time defeated the claim, and left the land open to another. In each case, the death of the applicant rendered performance impossible, and the right would have entirely lapsed but for a provision giving the heirs of the applicant the privilege of procuring the title which would have gone to the deceased. Hall v. Russell has been followed many times. The cases are reviewed in Hershberger v. Blewett, 55 Fed. 170.

Respondent contends that the position of a claimant under the timber-culture act is like that of a homestead claimant before full performance, and he thinks in such case a homestead claimant has a devisable interest. This is, I think, a mistake. The homestead act is, if possible, less doubtful than any of the others; for it is expressly provided that the right to complete performance and receive the patent shall go to the widow, if there be one; if there be none, to the devisee of the deceased, or to his heirs. Obviously, the right is not devisable in any just sense. If there be a widow, the right goes to her; if none, the settler may appoint the grantee. It was so held by the secretary of the interior in Dorame v. Towers, 1 Copp's Pub. Land Laws, 438, which is cited by respondent as an authority to the contrary. Towers was in possession of the land before he made his entry, but died within two weeks after the entry. Contest was inaugurated six months afterwards by Dorame, who sought to establish an abandonment, as the heirs did not reside on the land. The secretary said: "The death of the party casts whatever of title or estate the statute has created, directly, by operation of law, upon the first, the widow; second, the heirs or devisees. And, the substitution being effected, the requirement of proof of residence or cultivation attaches to the person or persons succeeding to the right, title, or estate." He further says that by the laws of California the executor was entitled to possession during administration, and that the right of the heirs to possession is subject to this administration, and therefore "the time allowed by the court for the settlement of the estate must either be counted for the heir or devisee, in making final proof, or excluded, in his favor, from the period required by the statute, and further time allowed him, on the ground that, the land being in the custody of the law, the time does not run against the party who is required to perform the acts of residence or occupation upon it." We must hold, therefore, that the land was not devisable, and is not affected by the decree of distribution in the estate of David Cooper, deceased. The grant is to the heirs of David Cooper, but they do not take by inheritance. The heirs will therefore take equally, regardless of the proportions in which they would have taken under the law of succession of the state. The United States has no general law of succession. The heirs must, therefore, be found by the law of the state or territory in which the land is situated. By the law of this state, the widow is an heir of the husband. The plaintiff and the widow would therefore take equally. It would follow that the one-half interest which vested in the widow was subject to defendant's mortgage. A new trial will be necessary, because the findings would not support the judgment as it would be modified by this opinion, and they are against law. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

1. Where an objection to a question is erroneously sustained, and it appears that, notwithstanding the ruling, witness immediately went on, without further objection, and answered the question, the ruling is without prejudice.

2. On a trial for murder, a witness was asked "Did [accused] ever take a meal at your house before?" An objection to the question was sustained. The question was an isolated one, and there was no intimation that the purpose was to show that witness and accused were not intimate acquaintances. Held that, in absence of such showing, the ruling was not erroneous.

3. The wife of accused was asked, on cross-examination, "What have you done with the pistol with which your husband killed M.?" The fact of the killing was admitted. Held, that the question was without prejudice.

4. The exclusion of evidence that accused was dissuaded from giving himself up to the officers was without prejudice, there being no evidence that accused attempted flight.

5. A witness for the prosecution, near whose house the shooting took place, testified that he stood in his yard at the time of the shooting, and had an unobstructed view of both men. A witness for the defense testified that the prosecuting witness had told him that he stood in the barn. A request for the recall of the prosecuting witness, for the purpose of laying a predicate for his impeachment was refused. All of the facts in the testimony sought to be impeached had been established by other witnesses, or admitted by accused. Held, that the ruling, while not commended, was not sufficient ground for reversal. Beatty, C. J., Henshaw, and Temple, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

H. M. Shaw was charged with the murder of Eugene Mason, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. From a judgment on the verdict, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the prisoner appeals. Affirmed.

S. F. Geil and J. J. Wyatt, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was charged with the murder of one Eugene Mason, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. It is not seriously urged that the evidence introduced is insufficient to justify the verdict, or that the court committed any material error in the matter of instructing the jury; but it is contended that there should be a reversal, on account of certain errors claimed to have been committed by the court during the progress of the trial, in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence. These alleged errors could and should have been avoided; but criminal cases are too often conducted upon the preconceived theory that defendant is guilty, and that if he be given a fair trial, according to the established rules of evidence, the jury may not convict him. Hence, embarrassing questions are frequently presented on appeal, unnecessarily caused by want of ordinary care and due consideration of the rights of the accused on the part of those who conduct the trial in the court below. The purpose of a criminal trial is to discover and determine whether or not a defendant is guilty; not merely to maintain, at all hazards, a theory of guilt entertained beforehand by any one man, or any community of men. An examination of the points made in the brief of appellant shows that one or two of the rulings of the court complained of were clearly erroneous, and that others, whether strictly erroneous or not, are not to be commended; but we think that it sufficiently appears that said rulings did not prejudice the appellant, or injuriously affect his substantial rights. We will notice them in detail.

1. Mrs. Mary Steele was a witness for the prosecution, and testified that an hour or two after the commission of the homicide the appellant came to her house and made some incriminating statements to her about the homicide. On cross-examination, she testified that Mr. Wyatt, one of appellant's attorneys, had called upon her, and asked her what she knew about the case; and counsel for appellant asked her if she had "refused to give him any information." An objection by the prosecution to this question was sustained. This ruling was clearly erroneous. As tending to prove bias and feeling of the witness against appellant, it was entirely legitimate to show, upon her cross-examination, that, while she had evidently informed the prosecution of her knowledge, she refused to give any information to the appellant. But, notwithstanding the erroneous ruling, the witness immediately went on, without further objection, and said: "I did not give him any information, and did not tell him why I would not give him any; I told him positively I would not tell him anything." This was an answer to the question asked by appellant's counsel; and it is apparent, therefore, that appellant was not prejudiced by the former ruling. (It seems that this witness had been "ordered" not to speak of the case to the appellant's attorneys, under the mistaken notion which some prosecuting officers have that they can order persons whom they want as witnesses not to speak to other persons about what they know.)

2. The same witness (Mrs. Steele) had testified in chief that the statements made to her by appellant were made while he was eating supper at her house; and she was asked, on cross-examination, "Did Shaw ever take a meal at your house before?" Objection was made to the question, and it was sustained. It would, no doubt, have been proper and fair to have allowed an answer to this question. It was a small matter, and we can hardly see why the prosecution should have objected to it. But we cannot say that the ruling was absolutely erroneous. Appellant's counsel here now argue, correctly, that it was admissible for him to show that the witness and the appellant were not intimate acquaintances, because it would be improbable that he made to a comparative stranger the incriminating statements testified to by the witness. But the question ruled out was an isolated question; its purpose was not disclosed; there was no intimation that it was asked to show want of intimacy; and upon its face it was apparently irrelevant and immaterial, and asked without any legitimate aim in view. Therefore we do not think the exclusion of the question was, under the circumstances, erroneous. And the same may be said of another question asked this witness which was ruled out, namely, "Did you on that occasion request him [appellant] to perform 'some service for you?' "—the occasion being the morning after the homicide, when the witness had seen the appellant.

3. Appellant's wife was a witness for him, and on cross-examination she was asked, "What have you done with the pistol with which your husband killed Mason?" To the question appellant objected, and his objection was overruled. She answered: "I turned it over to Mr. Wyatt, one of the attorneys." Conceding that this question was not proper cross-examination, or was inadmissible on other grounds, it is apparent that the question and answer could have done appellant no injury. It was admitted that appellant did kill deceased with a pistol.

4. The refusal of the court to adjourn the trial of the cause from the middle of the afternoon until the next day was not, under the circumstances, an abuse of discretion.

5. When appellant was testifying on his own behalf, he stated that on the evening of the homicide he went to Paso Robles, and his counsel asked him, "For what purpose did you go to Paso Robles?" The district attorney objected to the question; and appellant's counsel stated to the court that he desired to show that appellant, immediately after the shooting, went to Paso Robles for the purpose of surrendering himself to the officers, but that, acting on the advice of a Mr. Korn, he returned home and waited for the officers to come after him. The court sustained the objection. This question might well have been allowed; and in many cases the refusal to allow such a question would be material error, but in the case at bar there was no evidence, or pretense, that appellant attempted flight, and therefore he could not have been prejudiced by the rejection of the testimony. The same may be said of the rejection by the court of the offered testimony of said Korn to the effect that he advised appellant not to surrender himself at Paso Robles.

6. We do not think that the alleged misconduct of the district attorney, in saying what he did about appellant's drinking beer, was of importance enough to be seriously considered as a ground of reversal. Neither is there any importance to be attached to the fact that the district attorney was allowed to ask appellant how many times his attorneys visited him.

7. The most serious question in the case arises out of the refusal of the court to allow appellant to recall the people's witness Christopher, for the purpose of laying a foundation for showing that he had made a certain statement contradictory of a part of his testimony. The shooting which resulted in the death of the deceased took place about 80 or 100 yards from the house of said Christopher, who testified to the circumstances of the shooting, and said that he stood in his yard, and had an unobstructed view of both of the men. Appellant called a witness named Eubanks, who testified that he knew Christopher, and had a conversation with him regarding the shooting; and he was then asked, "Did he [Christopher] inform you where he stood when the shooting took place?" To this the district attorney objected, on the ground that "no predicate had been laid for the impeachment of Mr. Christopher," and the objection was sustained. Counsel for appellant then said: "If the court so rules, I desire to have the privilege of recalling Mr. Christopher to lay the foundation. Our attention was just called to this information. We intend to show by this witness that Mr. Millard Christopher told him that he stood right in the barn at the time the shooting took place. It has taken us by surprise. We have just ascertained this information, and we ask the court to be allowed to recall Mr. Christopher for the purpose of laying the predicate." The court denied this request, and appellant excepted. The request was certainly not an unreasonable one; and we apprehend that most courts would have allowed it. But it was a matter of discretion of the trial court, and the question here is whether there was such a gross abuse of discretion as to warrant a reversal; and that depends, in great measure, upon the character and importance of the testimony of Christopher. If the fact that appellant shot the deceased, and thereby caused his death, had been an issue, and Christopher had been the main witness testifying to the shooting, then the judgment would have to be reversed for the said action of the court now under review. But the fact of the shooting was admitted and testified to by the appellant, who claimed that he shot the deceased (Mason) under reasonable apprehension of danger to his own life; and the circumstances of the shooting were testified to in detail by the witness Richardson who was traveling with appellant at the time, was much nearer the scene of action than Christopher, and had much better opportunity than the latter for closely observing what occurred, and, although called by the prosecution, was evidently not unfriendly to the appellant. And, upon examination of the testimony of Christopher, we do not perceive that it was in any important sense inconsistent with the testimony of Richardson. It is apparent, therefore, we think, that no substantial right of appellant was affected by the refusal to allow Christopher to be recalled at the time appellant made said request. It does not appear that he was in attendance on the court at that time. Moreover, Christopher was afterwards recalled as a witness by the prosecution; and when he was on the witness stand the appellant did not then offer to ask him about his statement to Eubanks. Under these circumstances, while we do not at all approve the court's refusal to allow Christopher to be recalled at appellant's said request, we cannot say that such refusal is sufficient ground for a reversal of the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

I dissent: TEMPLE, J.

HENSHAW, J. I dissent, being unable to agree with the conclusion reached in the matter discussed under paragraph 7. I think the refusal of the court to allow defendant to recall the witness Christopher, for the purpose of laying the foundation for his impeachment, was an abuse of discretion, which denied the appellant his right to a fair and impartial trial. Christopher's evidence, much more strongly than did Richardson's, indicated that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. If that evidence was false,—if it could be established to the satisfaction of the jury that Christopher did not witness the occurrences he described, or if his testimony could be legally discredited by showing that he made contradictory statements regarding the facts, a man on trial for his life should not have been denied the important right of proving it. If it does not appear affirmatively that Christopher was present when permission was asked, still the presumption is that he was within call, since the summons commands his presence during the trial of the cause, and it does not appear that he had been excused. To the contrary, it does appear that he was afterwards recalled by the prosecution. It is true that defendant did not then attempt to ask the impeaching question, but the reasons are obvious. He had once asked the privilege, which, under the circumstances, amounted to a right of, examining the witness upon these matters, and had been denied. He was not to expect that a different result would follow another application. He could not with propriety have asked the questions as tending to impeach the witness upon the evidence he had last given, as that evidence did not bear upon the occurrences of the killing, to which Christopher had declared he was an eyewitness, and upon which alone it was sought to impeach him.

WILLIAMS v. ASHE. (No. 15,656.)[1]

PLEDGE—CONVERSION.

1. Where the pledgee sells the absolute property in the pledge to a bona fide purchaser, the purchaser is entitled to retain the pledge until the pledgor discharges the debt for which it was pledged.

2. In replevin by such purchaser to recover the property from the pledgor, who has taken it from his possession, the fact that he in good faith claimed the absolute title will not defeat his right to recover possession as owner of the pledgee's rights.

3. A complaint in replevin alleging that plaintiff was, "on and after" a certain time, the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, is sufficient, where defendant answered over, without demurring specially.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Thomas H. Williams against R. P. Ashe. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes, Gaston M. Ashe, and Ryland B. Wallace, for appellant. W. W. Foote and T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeals from the judgment in an action of claim and delivery, and from the order denying a new trial. The action was for the recovery of certain race horses, or their value in case a delivery could not be made, the horses having been taken by defendant from the possession of plaintiff after the sale of them to him by one Kelly. The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and averred that he was the owner of the horses, and that he was indebted to one M. J. Kelly in the sum of $4,721.50. To secure this indebtedness, he executed to Kelly bills of sale of the horses, which bills of sale, absolute in form, were understood by defendant and Kelly to be, and were in fact, mere evidences of a pledge of the horses as security for the debt. Kelly thereafter wrongfully, and without notice to defendant, executed a bill of sale for the horses to plaintiff. Plaintiff took possession of the horses from Kelly, without payment of any consideration, and with full knowledge of the transaction between Kelly and defendant. Defendant tendered to Kelly and to plaintiff the amount of the said indebtedness. Kelly refused to accept it, as did plaintiff, the latter claiming absolute ownership of the horses. These allegations are set forth in the answer, as matter of defense, as the basis of a counterclaim, and by way of cross complaint. The evidence of the principal witnesses, more or less corroborated, amounted about to this. Defendant testified, as he had pleaded, that the bills of sale were, and were understood to be, only pledges of the horses to Kelly as security. Kelly testified that originally he had held the horses in pledge, but that, becoming dissatisfied with this arrangement, and being about to leave defendant's employ, he had insisted upon receiving, and had received, the horses, and bills of sale therefor, in payment of defendant's debt to him, the defendant being unable to pay him the money, and that he represented to plaintiff, before plaintiff purchased the horses from him, that his title to them was perfect. Plaintiff testified that he bought the horses after these representations in good faith, paying therefor over $4,000, and owing thereon nearly $2,000 more. The court instructed the jury that as they determined upon the evidence so should they render their verdict—First, for plaintiff as the owner of the horses, if they found that the bills of sale from Ashe to Kelly were absolute; second, for plaintiff as having an interest in and a lien upon the horses, to the extent of Ashe's indebtedness to Kelly, if they found that Kelly was merely a pledgee, and that the transaction between Williams and Kelly was had with knowledge by Williams of Kelly's position; and, third, for defendant, fixing the amount of any damages he might have sustained, if in their opinion he was entitled to such a verdict. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for the return of the property, and found "the value of his interest in said property to be the sum of $4,909.74." The judgment entered conformed to the verdict, and decreed a return of the horses and a lien upon them for the sum named. The jury thus found that Kelly was merely a pledgee of the property in question, and not the owner; that Ashe was the owner, but that Williams had a lien upon the horses for the amount of the indebtedness owed by Ashe to Kelly,—or, in other words, that Williams had succeeded to Kelly's interest as pledgee. As the corroborated evidence of Kelly was that he was the absolute owner of the horses, and so represented to Williams when the latter purchased from him; and, as Williams' testimony was that he purchased after due inquiry, and upon these representations,—in view of the fact that there is no evidence in the record to charge Williams with knowledge that Kelly was a mere pledgee, and in view of the further fact that Kelly, with possession of the horses under bills of sale from Ashe absolute in form, was thus, by Ashe's acts, enabled to hold himself out to the world as the owner of them, it is not easy to see how the jury could have arrived at any other conclusion than that Williams had acquired full title. This, of course, would have been the result to one purchasing under such circumstances, in good faith and for value. McNeil v. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325; Weirick v. Bank, 16 Ohio St. 304; Fullerton v. Sturgis, 4 Ohio St. 529; Smith v. Clews, 114 N. Y. 190, 21 N. E. 160. But, as Williams is not attacking the judgment, it may be assumed that the evidence warranting the finding that the sale did not vest absolute title in him was omitted from the statement.

The essential question thus presented is whether, under the pleadings and proofs, such a judgment can be upheld. Williams, it is to be remembered, is suing primarily for the recovery of the possession of the horses, and is basing his claim upon an absolute purchase of them from Kelly. Kelly insists that he was the owner, and sold the horses (and not any pledgee's interest in them) to Williams; that Ashe's debt to him had been completely extinguished, and that the relation of creditor and debtor did not exist between them at the time he made the sale. Ashe, upon the other hand, has the horses in possession, and asserts that Kelly was but a pledgee, and, having sold contrary to his rights as pledgee, having repudiated the pledge and asserted ownership,—in short, having made a wrongful conversion of the property,—the lien is extinguished, and he is entitled to retain possession against both of them. So far as concerns the rights of one who has a mere lien, as distinguished from one who claims as pledgee, the question has been answered repeatedly. It is the general rule that a lienholder who refuses, upon proper demand, to deliver property, without setting up his lien thereon, or who bases his refusal upon a claim other than that of lien, waives his right to claim a lien after action commenced. It is so held in this state by the cases of Lehmann v. Schmitt, 87 Cal. 15, 25 Pac. 161, and Sutter v. Stephan, 101 Cal. 545, 36 Pac. 106; and, from the number and uniformity of the authorities examined, it may with safety be said that this rule is universal. Section 2910 of the Civil Code enunciates the same principle. It is also the rule that, if one having but a lien is sued in replevin, and answers claiming absolute ownership, he will not be permitted upon the trial to assert any right as lienor. His lien is absolutely lost. Mexal v. Dearborn, 12 Gray, 336; Tuthill v. Skidmore, 124 N. Y. 155, 26 N. E. 348; Everett v. Saltus, 15 Wend. 474; Ballard v. Burgett, 40 N. Y. 314; Maynard v. Anderson, 54 N. Y. 641. The latter rule is, however, subject to this manifestly just limitation that, if one who has claimed as owner is afterwards proved to have but a lien, he shall not thereafter be deprived absolutely of his lien, if his claim was honestly, though mistakenly, entertained and pressed; but, before he can be allowed his lien, he must abandon the false claim of ownership. Hudson v. Swan, 83 N. Y. 552. The cases in which this question has arisen are usually those in which the defendant to the action has repudiated his lien, but the principle is no different when it is the plaintiff who maintains the untenable position. Hudson v. Swan, supra. We are, however, here concerned more particularly with the rights of one who, in the belief that he was purchasing an absolute title, has bought property from a pledgee under circumstances which, as found by the jury, did not vest that title in him. Does the purchaser under such circumstances obtain no property or interest in the goods, or does he at least succeed by purchase to the interest of the pledgee? In the case of a mere lienholder, in the case of bailees generally, and even of factors, it is the rule, as has been said, that a wrongful conversion forfeits the lien. But in the case of a pledgee the rule is otherwise. The reason for the distinction seems to be based upon two considerations,—the first, that the pledgee has a special property in the chattels, which the other class does not possess; the second, that a contract of pledge carries with it the implication that the security may be sold to discharge the obligation, while in the case of a lien (except as aided by statute) the right of lien is not understood to carry with it any general right of sale. Story, Bailm. §§ 311–325. But, whatever may be the foundations for the distinction, it is now most firmly established in the law that a pledgee may sell or assign either the property or his interest in it to a bona fide purchaser, who will be allowed to hold the property until extinguishment of the original obligation. Judge Story (Bailm. §§ 324, 327) thus states the proposition: "If the pawnee should undertake to pledge the property [not being negotiable securities] for a debt beyond his own, or to make a transfer thereof to his own creditor, as if he were the absolute owner, it is clear that in such a case he would be guilty of a breach of trust, and his creditor would acquire no title beyond that held by the pawnee. The only question which, under the circumstances, would seem to admit of controversy, is whether the creditor should be permitted to retain the pledge until the original debt was discharged, or whether the owner might recover the pledge in the same manner as if the case was a naked tort, without any qualified right in the first pawnee." The hardship and injustice of the latter alternative have been so obvious to the courts that late decisions have removed the doubt expressed by Judge Story, until the rule may be taken as settled that the purchaser, under such circumstances, succeeds to the rights of the original pledgee. And there can be no reason seen why it should not be so. If one purchases what he believes to be the absolute title, he should not for his mistake be denied the right of taking the limited property which the seller (the pledgee) could convey. It works no hardship upon the pledgor who, as against the substituted pledgee, has all the rights he possessed against the original. In the leading case of Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 389, the authorities are reviewed and the principle thus enunciated: "From these cases it appears that the pawnee may deliver the goods to a stranger without consideration, or he may sell or assign all his interest absolutely, or he may assign it conditionally, by way of pawn, without in either case destroying the original lien, or giving the owner a right to reclaim them on any other or better terms than he could have done before such delivery or assignment." This principle has been still further extended by the supreme court of Illinois under the following facts: Plaintiff had pledged some corn as security. The pledgee made an illegal sale of it to defendant. Plaintiff sued defendant in assumpsit for money had and received, seeking to recover the value of the corn. It was held that, as the original pledgee, had he been sued in assumpsit or for conversion, would have been permitted to set off the amount of his secured debt, the purchaser from the pledgee in such an action should be allowed the same right of recoupment, and should be permitted, even under an illegal sale, to hold the pledged property until satisfaction of the original secured debt. Belden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449. The supreme court of Colorado, in a case involving rights under an illegal sale of a pledge, has said: "The sale being void upon any hypothesis, the certificate in the hands of the purchaser remained a pledge, as it was before, and every right which Williams [the pledgor] had remained unaffected." Moffat v. Williams (Colo.) 36 Pac. 914. The case of Talty v. Trust Co., 93 U. S. 321, arose upon an unauthorized sale by the pledgee of a claim or warrant against the city of Washington to defendant. Plaintiff was the pledgor, and sued the defendant in replevin. The court decided that the defendant succeeded to the rights of the pledgee in the claim, quoting Judge Story to the effect that, in case of a strict pledge, if the pledgee transfers the same to his own creditors, the latter may hold the pledge until the debt of the original owner is discharged. In this case it is to be noticed that the pledgee made a sale, not of his interest in the pledge, but of the absolute property.

But, after this brief consideration of a few of the cases, it remains to be added that in this state the question was early considered, and decided in accordance with the foregoing views, in the case of Dewey v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 145, wherein it is declared that if a pledgee sells the property absolutely, without demand or notice to one having full knowledge of his title, while the absolute title does not pass, still the property remains in the hands of the purchaser as a pledge, with the rights to the purchaser which were enjoyed by the original pledgee. Williams, therefore, succeeded to Kelly's interest, and to his right of possession, and the verdict and judgment are within the evidence and responsive to the pleadings. For, as has been intimated, the fact that Williams mistakenly claimed a title larger than the jury found him to own cannot defeat his action of replevin, if he shows that he has even a limited interest in the property, coupled with the right of possession. Miller v. Adamson, 45 Minn. 99, 47 N. W. 452. And these propositions, at least, he established to the satisfaction of the jury. The objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not well taken. Plaintiff alleged that, "on and after the 17th day of November, 1892, he was the owner and in possession of the property." It is contended that the pleading contains the same defect which vitiated the complaints in the cases of Afferbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 268, 21 Pac. 837, and Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750. But in both of these cases the radical error was in pleading ownership upon a day certain, and upon no other day, and there was no implication which could be construed as a pleading of continued ownership or right of action at the time of the commencement of the suit. Here, however, the averment is of ownership and possession on and after the date. It was insufficient against a special demurrer, doubtless, but defendant did not demur at all. He answered over. It was not obnoxious to a general demurrer; for, however imperfectly pleaded, there is still by fair intendment to be gathered from the complaint that he claimed ownership and right of possession at the time of the commencement of his action. Amestoy v. Transit Co., 95 Cal. 311, 30 Pac. 550; Alexander v. McDow, 41 Pac. 24. The evidence does not show a tender to Williams. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PUBLIC LAND—HOMESTEAD—LIABILITY FOR PATENTEE'S DEBTS—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. Where the patentee of land as a government homestead conveys it, on its subsequent reconveyance to him by his grantee the land is divested of its homestead qualities, and is liable in his hands for debts contracted prior to the issuance of the patent.

2. Where land so apparently divested of its homestead qualities is sold for a debt contracted prior to the issuance of the patent to the creditor who purchased in good faith, that the conveyance by the patentee was with intent to defraud his creditors subsequent to the issuance of the patent does not, as to the patentee or his grantees, affect such purchaser's title.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by G. F. De Lany against S. E. Knapp and another. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Hendricks and W. J. Murphy, for appellant. Daney & Wright, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. The action was to quiet title to 160 acres of land. The facts of the case are as follows: One Neil, from whom both plaintiff and defendants deraign title, entered the land in controversy under the United States homestead laws, and thereafter, pursuant to the statute, commuted and paid for the land, receiving a patent therefor, which, by way of preamble and recital, declared that "whereas, George Neil, of San Diego county, California, has deposited in the general land office of the United States a certificate of the register of the land office at Los Angeles, California, whereby it appears that full payment has been made by the said George Neil, according to the provisions of the act of congress of the 24th of April, 1820, entitled 'An act making further provision for the sale of the public lands,' and the acts supplemental thereto, for [the land, describing it], which said tract has been purchased by the said George Neil," etc. Upon March 18, 1893. Neil, by deed of grant duly recorded, conveyed the land to Mrs. A. L. Treanor. Upon the 5th day of May following, Mrs. Treanor, by like deed of grant, also duly recorded, reconveyed the same property to Neil. Upon May 10th, five days after, a deficiency judgment was docketed against Neil, and in favor of this plaintiff. The land in controversy was then subjected to levy, and on the 15th day of June, 1893, was sold at public auction, and purchased by this plaintiff. Thereafter, upon the 23d day of November, 1893, Neil executed his deed of grant to the same land to one Pauly, to whose title these defendants afterwards succeeded.

For the reasons hereafter given, we consider it unnecessary to pass upon the question whether, by his commutation, the character of the title Neil received from the government was that inuring under a homestead or that attaching to a pre-emption patent. For the purposes of this consideration, it will be assumed (though not decided) that Neil took the land as a government homestead. So taking, the land was not liable for any debt of Neil contracted prior to the issuance of the patent. Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 2296. The deficiency judgment of plaintiff against Neil was for such a pre-existing debt. Neil's deed to Mrs. Treanor was upon the face of the recorded instrument a conveyance of all his interest in the property; and, when he subsequently acquired title from her by deed of grant, he took the land divested of its homestead exemptions. The patentee sells his land. It is protected in the hands of the purchaser from any debt of the grantor which could not have been enforced against it while the title remained in him, and this is all that the case of Russell v. Lowth, 21 Minn. 167, decided upon the matter. But as with a state homestead, so with a federal; its character and exemptions do not revive on a subsequent repurchase by the original holder, by whom it has been sold. Herbert v. Mayer, 42 La. Ann. 839, 8 South. 590.

But to overcome the effect of the deeds from Neil to Treanor, and from Treanor to Neil, defendants were permitted, over objections and exceptions, to call Mrs. Treanor, who testified that Neil, who was sick, sent for her, and said to her: "My creditors are pushing me pretty hard. Would you object to having my property put in your name, so that it will be beyond the reach of my creditors?" Mrs. Treanor consented, the deed was made under these circumstances, without consideration, and the property thereafter, in like manner, reconveyed by her to him. Plaintiff's claim was for a debt due prior to the issuance of the patent. The land was therefore not liable for it, and plaintiff was not one of Neil's creditors who could have been injuriously affected by the transfer. Upon the other hand, these transactions originated and were executed in fraud. Plaintiff had no knowledge of the secret trust. She bought at the execution sale in good faith and for value, upon the security of the title which stood in Neil, and which by the record was freed from homestead exemptions. Under these circumstances, is she protected against the effect of this private agreement? I think she should be, and is. It is true she was not one of those creditors who could complain of the original fraud, and cause the conveyance to Mrs. Treanor to be set aside. Nevertheless, she was a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice at the execution sale, and her rights are the same as those which would have attached to an innocent third person buying under like circumstances. She is protected against latent equities of which she had no notice. Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 Pac. 579. The defendants, deriving their title from Neil after the rights of plaintiff as purchaser had accrued, occupy no better position than would he. Where he would be estopped, so are they; and what binds him concludes them. The fact that plaintiff was not one of those whose injury was intended by the original fraud would not be a reason for permitting Neil to prove it against her, if, in fact, she had innocently suffered by reason of it; and, if Neil could not prove it, neither could those claiming under him. If the transfers had been made with the understanding that they were designed merely to effect an apparent destruction of the homestead character of the land, no one would assert that Neil could prove this fact against one who had changed his situation under a belief in the bona fides of the matter. Yet this is the precise result which, if not intended, necessarily followed the fraud of Neil and Mrs. Treanor. Neil held out to the world that he had purchased the land under circumstances which, by operation of law, freed it from its homestead exemptions. An innocent third person dealing with this property relied upon these circumstances, and bought the property after a levy and sale, which were legal except for this secret and fraudulent transaction. Neil cannot, nor can those claiming under him, defeat the title thus obtained by proof of any such "latent equity." The admission of the evidence of Mrs. Treanor was thus error, for which the order denying a new trial must be reversed, and the cause remanded. So ordered.

LIEN FOR STREET WORK—FORECLOSURE—"REPUTED OWNER"—CONTRACT BY HUSBAND—LIEN ON LAND OF WIFE.

1. Evidence that a husband signed a contract for street work in front of a lot the record title to which was in the wife, and stated to the contractors that the lot was community property, will sustain a finding that he was the "reputed owner," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, as amended, providing that any person performing work on a street in front of a lot at the request of the "reputed owner" shall have a lien on the lot for work and materials.

2. The presumption that property conveyed to a married woman becomes her separate estate (Civ. Code, § 164, as amended) is not conclusive.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Company against Ellen Lyons and another to foreclose a lien for street work. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Allen, McAllister & Frohman and John B. Carson, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action was brought to recover the sum of $482.88, alleged to be due from defendants to plaintiff for setting granite curbs, and grading and paving the street, in front of a certain lot in the city of San Francisco, and to foreclose a lien on the lot for the said sum, together with the cost of verifying and filing the claim of lien and a reasonable attorney's fee. The defendants, James M. and Ellen Lyons, were husband and wife, and had been such for about 21 years. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant Ellen Lyons was at all the times mentioned therein the owner of record of the said lot, and that the same was and is community property; that her husband was the reputed owner of it, and that he requested the plaintiff to do the work while he was such reputed owner; that he entered into a written contract with plaintiff for its performance, "both in his own individual behalf and as the agent of his wife, Ellen, and in her behalf, though in his own name"; that he individually, and on behalf of his wife, promised to pay plaintiff for the work done; and that she "had full knowledge of said contract and of the performance of said work prior to and during the performance of said work, and that she did not within three days after having obtained knowledge thereof, nor at all, give notice that she would not be responsible for the same, by posting a notice in writing to that effect, in some conspicuous place upon said land, nor upon any land, nor at all"; that the plaintiff duly performed all the terms and conditions of its contract, and that the work was completed on August 1, 1892, and was duly accepted by the superintendent of streets; that the amount due plaintiff under the contract was $482.88, no part of which had been paid; and that it filed its claim of lien on August 26, 1892. The defendants answered separately. The answer of Mrs. Lyons denied that the lot in question was the community property of herself and husband; denied that her husband was ever the reputed owner of the lot; denied that he, as her agent, ever requested the plaintiff to do the work for which it seeks to recover, or ever promised to pay plaintiff for said work, or ever entered into any written contract with plaintiff for the performance of said work, or any work; denied that at any time mentioned in the complaint she had full or any knowledge of the contract mentioned therein, or that she ever agreed to the same; and alleged that she never at any time entered into any contract with the plaintiff for the performance of any street work, or authorized her husband, as her agent, to enter into any such contract; that he has never had any interest in the property affected; and that she at all the times mentioned in the complaint was the sole and separate owner thereof. The answer of Mr. Lyons denied that the said lot is or ever was community property; that he was ever the reputed owner of it, or had any separate interest in or claim upon it; that he ever entered into any contract with the plaintiff, as the agent of his wife, to improve the street in front of the property, or ever promised on her behalf to pay any sum of money for any street work or improvements in front of it; and alleged that he was never authorized by her to enter into any contract with plaintiff for the performance of any street work in front of said lot. Upon the issues thus raised, the case was tried, and the court found, among other things, that, at all the times mentioned in the complaint, the "defendant Ellen Lyons was, and she now is, the owner of the lot of land described in said complaint as her separate property, but at all said times said James M. Lyons, individually, was the reputed owner thereof; that, while said James M. Lyons was so the reputed owner of said lot of land, he requested said plaintiff to do the work hereinafter named, and he, both in his own individual behalf and as the ostensible agent of his wife, Ellen, and in her behalf, though in his own name, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff for the performance of the same, and thereupon, at the request of said defendant James M. Lyons, said plaintiff improved the street in front of and adjoining said lot of land, and, in so doing, did the work and furnished the materials hereinafter mentioned." And, as conclusions of law, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant James M. Lyons, individually, the sum of $482.88, with interest thereon from August 26, 1892, and the cost of verifying and filing its claim of lien, its costs of suit, and an attorney's fee fixed at $50, the whole aggregating $611.22; and that it had a lien on said lot for the said amount. Judgment against Mr. Lyons, and a decree foreclosing the lien, and directing a sale of the lot, were accordingly entered, from which decree, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 48 Pac. 1097, 117 Cal. 212.

It is not claimed that the work for which plaintiff seeks to recover was not well and properly done, or that the amount allowed therefor was not justly due from Mr. Lyons, but it is contended that there was no legal obligation resting upon Mrs. Lyons to pay for the work, and hence that the court erred in determining that the amount allowed was a lien on her lot; and, in support of this position, the finding that Mr. Lyons was the reputed owner of the lot, and, as such, requested the plaintiff to do the work, and entered into the contract therefor, is assailed as not justified by the evidence. The lot in question is 87 feet wide, and is situated on the easterly side of Lyon street, between Post and Sutter streets, in San Francisco; and the contract relied on was to set granite curbs (where necessary), and to pave with bituminous rock Lyon street between the other two streets named. The contract was dated June 29, 1892, and purported to be executed by all the lot owners on both sides of the street to be paved, "whose names are hereunto subscribed, with the number of feet frontage of lots represented and owned by each, respectively, set opposite their respective names, each contracting severally," and each for himself, and not one for the others, promising to pay "for the work done in front of his or her own property, respectively," at certain stipulated rates. At the time the contract was signed, a contract to do the work was about to be let under an order of the board of supervisors. The plaintiff corporation desired to obtain a private contract for the work, and to that end sent two of its solicitors (Mr. Robertson and Mr. Gould) to interview the lot owners. The solicitors went out to the block, and met several of the lot owners, and talked the matter over with them. They were all invited into the house of one of the owners, and others were then sent for, and came in. Among others present was Mr. Lyons. The matter was talked over for a considerable time, and Mr. Lyons said he wanted basalt blocks put down. Mr. Gould told him that the order of the board of supervisors required bitumen. After further talk, according to the testimony of both Robertson and Gould, Mr. Lyons said he could not sign a contract that night. Mr. Gould asked him why, and he said, "I have got somebody else to see." Mr. Gould asked, "Who is it?" and he said, "My wife." Mr. Gould then asked if it was community property, and he said it was, and that he and his wife owned it together. It was then agreed that the parties would meet again the next evening, at the same place. At the meeting on the next evening, Mr. Lyons signed the contract, his name being the fourth in the list of 13; and, as he was doing so, Mr. Gould again asked him, "Do you own the property, or does you wife own it?" and he said, "We both own it." Mr. Gould then said, "All right; then you sign your name there." The work was commenced two or three days after the contract was signed, and was completed and approved by the superintendent of streets, and the lien filed, as alleged in the complaint. Mrs. Lyons testified that she purchased the lot about two years after her marriage to Mr. Lyons, and paid for it with money derived from the estate of her first husband, and money raised on mortgages, and that she never authorized her husband to sign the contract, and he never told her he had signed it until after the bill was presented; that she "was under the impression that these people were obtaining it from the city." Mr. Lyons testified that he did not own any real estate or other property, and that he was a carpenter, and used the money he earned to raise his family; and, when asked if he did not put his money into paying off mortgages on this property, he answered that he could not tell where it went; that, when he made a few dollars, he gave it to his wife. He also testified that his wife never authorized him to sign the contract; that he signed it of his own will, with the understanding that he would have time to pay for it; that he thought, according to the agreement, that he would have time to make the payment, and he assumed it as a personal affair; and that he never stated to Mr. Gould or Mr. Robertson that the property was community property, or that he had somebody else to see before he could sign the contract. He further said: "I never mentioned at home that I had signed the contract until after the work was going on. It was after everybody could see that it was started. On Thursday evening the contract was signed, and on Saturday morning the work was started. I told her that I would have to pay for it; that is all. Q. By the Court: When did you tell her that? A. After the work was started. Q. How long after that? A. Well, probably the next day or two. Q. You told her you had signed the contract? A. Yes, sir; I told her then."

In 1885, section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended so as to read as follows: "Any person who, at the request of the owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the street or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, has a lien upon such lot for the work done and materials furnished." And in the same year a general law to provide for work upon streets within municipalities was passed (St. 1885, p. 147), by which, in section 16, the word "owner" was declared to be (for the purpose of this law) "the person owning the fee, or the person in whom, on the day the action is commenced, appears the legal title to the lots and lands, by deeds duly recorded in the county recorder's office of each county, or the person in possession of lands, lots, or portions of lots or buildings under claim, or exercising acts of ownership over the same for himself," etc. In 1887 section 1191, supra, was again amended by prefixing to the word "owner" the word "reputed," so that it has since read: "Any person who, at the request of the reputed owner of any lot," etc.

The question, then, is, what is meant by the words "reputed owner," as used in the Code? Counsel for appellants argue that there is no material difference in the meaning of these words and that of the word "owner," as used in the statute; and they say that "the legislature therefore could not have contemplated anything else by the expression 'reputed owner' than cases where a person contracts for street work who has the apparent title to property by deeds of record, or who has the apparent possession by reason of exercising acts of ownership over the property for himself." And hence it is insisted that, as shown by the evidence, Lyons was not, and could not have been, the reputed owner of the lot in question. But, if this theory be true, then it is evident that nothing was accomplished by the amendment, and it might as well not have been made. The Century Dictionary defines the words "reputed owner" as "a person who has to all appearances the title to and possession of property." Anderson's Law Dictionary defines the same words as "one who, from all appearance, or from supposition, is the owner of a thing; as of property subject to taxation or to assessment for a municipal improvement." And Burrill's Law Dictionary defines the word "reputed" as "considered; generally supposed." And it is added: "This word has a much weaker sense than its derivation would appear to warrant; importing merely a supposition or opinion derived or made up from outward appearances, and often unsupported by fact. The term 'reputed owner' is frequently employed in this sense. 2 Steph. Comm. 206." Prior to 1889 all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife was presumed to be community property; but in that year section 164 of the Civil Code was amended by adding the provision that, "whenever property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property." These presumptions are, however, only rules of evidence, which can be met and overcome by proofs, except where a right to property is involved which became vested in a third party before the amendment, in which case the presumption is said to be a rule of property as well as of evidence. Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 529, 23 Pac. 695; Jordan v. Fay, 98 Cal. 264, 33 Pac. 95.

Here it appears, as before stated, that the lot was acquired by Mrs. Lyons after her marriage, and hence the fact that she had the record title was not at all conclusive. It might, nevertheless, have been considered or supposed to be community property. And when Mr. Lyons signed the contract as the owner of it, and stated, as the court below must have believed he did, that it was community property, and was owned by himself and wife together, it would naturally be supposed that he was such owner. We conclude, therefore, that the court was justified by the evidence in finding that, for all the purposes of this case, he was the reputed owner of the lot.

Other questions are very elaborately discussed by counsel, but, in view of the conclusion reached on the first point, they need not be considered. We find no material error in the rulings of the court, and advise that the decree and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the decree and order appealed from are affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. SOUTHERN CAL. RY. CO. et al. (No. 19,500.)[1]

EMINENT DOMAIN—RAILROAD COMPANY—RIGHT TO APPROPRIATE RAILROAD PROPERTY.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, providing that property appropriated for a public use shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has already been appropriated, plaintiff railroad company had the right to appropriate part of a street which was purchased by defendant railroad company, subject to the right of the public for highway purposes, and on which it had laid its tracks; such appropriation being necessary for the construction of plaintiff's road, but not materially curtailing defendant's right to operate its road.

2. Defendant's construction of an unnecessary spur track across the line located by plaintiff for its right of way, after the location was made, did not affect plaintiff's right of appropriation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against the Southern California Railway Company and another to obtain a decree condemning a certain strip of land for the purpose of constructing a railroad. From the judgment rendered, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. Hunsaker, for appellants. Harris & Gregg, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to obtain a decree condemning a strip of land 26 feet wide, in and through Park avenue, Lugonia park, city of Redlands, county of San Bernardino, state of California, for the use of plaintiff as a right of way for a railroad from Redlands Junction to Crafton, all in said county of San Bernardino. Plaintiff had judgment, from which judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal. The findings of fact by the court below may be epitomized as follows: Plaintiff is a railroad corporation engaged in building, constructing, and operating lines of railroad in the state of California and adjacent states and territories, and owns and operates a main line of railroad extending from San Francisco, in the state of California, to El Paso, in the state of Texas, which passes for many miles through the county of San Bernardino. That it intends to build, and has partially built, a branch or spur railroad from its main line at Redlands Junction, in said county, running in a northeasterly direction a distance, in all, of 7½ miles, passing through the city of Redlands, and terminating at Crafton, in said county, for the purpose of conveying freight and passengers, and for the purpose of conducting a general railroad business upon and over said spur or branch railroad. Park avenue is, and since 1887 has been, a public street or highway in the city of Redlands, and in the building and construction by plaintiff of its said branch railroad a right of way therefor through said Park avenue, having a uniform width of 13 feet, is necessary to the construction and maintenance of plaintiff's said road. The space condemned is described, and is on the southerly half of said avenue, and will be referred to again. Before the commencement of this action, the board of trustees of the city of Redlands, by ordinance, gave and granted to plaintiff a franchise and privilege to construct, maintain, and operate its said branch railroad on and over the south 30½ feet of said Park avenue, which franchise and privilege is still in force and effect. Defendant, the Southern California Railway Company, is also a railroad corporation, is the owner of the fee of Park avenue, subject to the rights of the public for highway purposes, and is the owner of, and for four years before the commencement of this action had owned, possessed, and had operated, and is still operating, a steam railroad for ordinary railway purposes. The center line of defendant's railroad is substantially identical with the central longitudinal line of Park avenue, which said avenue is 100 feet in width. The road of plaintiff, as laid out, will leave a space of 24 feet on the south side thereof, which the court finds will be sufficient to allow the traveling public to travel with safety. There will also be a space of, say, 21 feet, between the tracks of plaintiff's and defendant's roads, which the court finds will be sufficient for spurs or side tracks for defendant. The space condemned has not been used by the defendant, except as follows: (1) After plaintiff had graded its roadbed, defendant built a spur track thereon, for the purpose of preventing the plaintiff from using the right of way, which spur defendant does not need. (2) Defendant had a small depot building, 16x18 and one story high, on the said condemned right of way, which defendant does not need, and which can readily and without injury to defendant be removed, together with its spur track, from the place where now situate. The court also finds that the use by plaintiff of the land sought to be condemned is a more necessary public use than that to which it has been appropriated by defendant, and that the proposed right of way will furnish to plaintiff the most practicable, safe, and direct route and way for its road, and will be "most compatible with the greatest public benefit and the least private injury," and will not interfere with the successful operation and maintenance of defendant's road, and is not necessary thereto. No question is made as to the damages, and the findings relating thereto need not be noticed. Defendant F. H. Pattee, who is made a party defendant, owns certain lots abutting on Park avenue, and is awarded damages by reason of the construction of the road by plaintiff.

The first point made by the appellants is that the findings are insufficient to sustain the judgment. This contention is based upon the fact that such findings show that the defendant is the owner of the whole of Park avenue, subject only to the rights of the public for highway purposes, that for more than four years prior to suit brought it had maintained a line of railroad upon the center line of said avenue, and had appropriated the same to a public use, and that, as the strip of land in question, to wit, Park avenue, is not in excess of the quantity authorized by law to be taken for railroad purposes, it cannot by condemnation proceedings be taken by plaintiff for the same public use, to wit, for another and parallel railroad. The power of eminent domain is one of the inalienable incidents of sovereignty, which, treated simply as a question of power, may be exercised in favor of public uses over any and all private, and even public, property. In this view, the property and franchises of corporations, as well as of individuals, although dedicated to public uses, may be taken for other public uses. A state may not annul or modify a grant of land, but it may take the land for public use, on making compensation. There is no such thing as extinguishing the right of eminent domain; and any attempt to do so by one legislature has no binding force upon its successors. But this inalienable power, like most others, is to be exercised under and by virtue of the legislative will, as expressed by the lawmaking power. This being so, it is an accepted canon of the law that the right to exercise the power of eminent domain must be found in some statute of the state, and that such right must be expressly given, or arise by necessary implication from powers expressly given. Among the powers conferred upon a railroad corporation by section 465 of the Civil Code is the right "to lay out its road not exceeding nine rods wide, and to construct and maintain the same with a single or double track, and with such appendages and adjuncts as may be necessary for the convenient use of the same." The sixth subdivision of the same section authorizes a railroad corporation "to cross, intersect, join, or unite its railroad with any other railroad, either before or after construction, at any point upon its route, and upon the grounds of such other railroad corporation," etc. Turning to the subject of eminent domain, we find that it may be exercised in favor of a variety of public uses, among which are "steam and horse railroads." Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, subd. 4. Section 1240 of the same Code, in defining the private property which may be taken under the title on eminent domain, enumerates: "Property appropriated to public use; but such property shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has been already appropriated." As early as 1863 the supreme court of this state, in Railroad Co. v. Moss, 23 Cal. 324, held that one railroad company could not locate its line along and upon the previously located line of another company, except at crossings and intersections, and that, as the law then stood, land appropriated by one company for the purposes of a railroad, and necessary thereto, could not subsequently be condemned by another company for a like use. In Boston & M. R. Co. v. Lowell & L. R. Co., 124 Mass. 368, Chief Justice Gray, now a justice of the supreme court of the United States, said, "The general principle is well settled, and has been applied in a great variety of cases, that land already legally appropriated to a public use is not to be afterwards taken for a like use, unless the intention of the legislature that it should be so taken has been manifested in express terms or by necessary implication." The authorities in support of this proposition are numerous, and usually uniform. See Housatonic R. Co. v. Lee & H. R. Co., 118 Mass. 391; Railroad Co. v. North, 103 Ind. 486, 3 N. E. 144; Pittsburgh Junction R. Co.'s Appeal, 122 Pa. St. 511, 6 Atl. 564; St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. City of St. Paul, 30 Minn. 363, 15 N. W. 684; Barre R. Co. v. Montpelier & W. R. R. Co., 61 Vt. 1, 17 Atl. 923; In re City of Buffalo, 68 N. Y., 167.

The foregoing cases, in the main, involve circumstances under which a former and a later public use may not stand together, or, in other words, cases in which the later use must supersede the former,—cases in which, as was said in Re New York, L. & W. Ry. Co., 99 N. Y. 23, 1 N. E. 27, "were the rule otherwise, this evil would result: A corporation, No. 1, having the right of eminent domain, takes land from a similar corporation, No. 2, having the same right. No. 2 thereupon proceeds again to condemn it for its own use, and No. 1 retaliates. And so the absurd process goes on. It is clear the legislature never intended any such result." The question is, does the well-understood rule indicated apply to the facts of the present case? We think the question must be answered in the negative for the reasons: (1) The condemnation proceedings here work no substantial injury to the plaintiff, and produce only such inconvenience as may be covered by damages awarded. The object of the rule which prevents the taking of property devoted to a public use for another and not more necessary public use is, not that there is anything sacred in the property as such, considered independent of the public use, but the protection of the use itself, in which the public as well as the owner is interested, and to save the use from annihilation. Defendant purchased from the abutting owners, subject to the right of the public for highway purposes, Park avenue, a strip of land 100 feet wide, and constructed its railroad on the center thereof. As such purchaser its rights were neither greater nor less than they would have been had it acquired a right thereto for a like purpose under the law of eminent domain. It was the intention to dedicate it to a public use, and the actual appropriation to such use, which consecrated it beyond lands held in private proprietorship. So far as it was not thus appropriated, and as it was not reasonably essential to such use, it stood in the same category with other lands held by individuals or corporations, and was liable to condemnation proceedings for a similar or different public use. It is property appropriated to public use which is, under subdivision 3 of section 1240 of the Code of Civil Procedure, protected from condemnation, except "for a more necessary public use"; and as to lands owned by defendant, but which have not been thus appropriated, and are not likely in the future to be needed for the existing public use, the inhibition does not apply. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co., 17 W. Va., 812; Peoria, P. & J. R. Co. v. Peoria & S. R. Co., 66 Ill. 174. "Nor will the general rule be applied to prevent the taking of a small and immaterial part of some of the appurtenances of the company, when the taking is necessary for the right of way of another company or other imperative use." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 267; Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Chicago & E. R. Co., 112 Ill. 589; New York, H. & N. R. Co. v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., 36 Conn. 196; North Carolina R. Co. v. Carolina Cent. R. Co., 83 N. C. 489; Northern R. Co. v. Concord & C. R. Co., 27 N. H. 183. (2) As before stated, our law permits the taking of "property appropriated to public use, but such property shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has been already appropriated." Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 3.

The question then arises, is the contemplated use by plaintiff of the land in question a more necessary public use than that to which it has been already appropriated by defendant? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. Treated as a mere question of right in the defendant, it must be admitted that it is the owner of a right of way 100 feet in width for the uses of its railroad, the tracks of which are laid thereon; but we are not now called upon to determine the question from that standpoint, but rather to view it in the light of the necessities of its ownership for a public use. As an incident of defendant's right to own and operate a railroad, it has not been used at all, except that portion covered by defendant's flag station and the small station building or depot, which, according to the findings, can be readily moved across defendant's track without inconvenience to the public or to defendant. All these franchises and rights of way are given and granted upon the theory of public necessity, and of the benefits accruing therefrom to the public. The fact that private persons and corporations, the owners of these franchises and rights, are the recipients of profits arising from the ownership and operation of the property, does not militate against the fundamental theory that the prime object is the benefit to the public. The multiplication of railroads, with the conveniences and competition they bring, all redound to the welfare of the people at large. Who shall say that the strip of land, 13 feet in width, condemned by the court below for the use of plaintiff for its railroad track, and to be used for a railroad, is not a more necessary public use than any to which it has been appropriated or used by defendant? It is not a case of taking, destroying, or curtailing defendant's franchise, or any property essential to its full and complete enjoyment. Were this the case, it would be a taking, not for another and more necessary public use, but the taking of one man's property and conferring it upon another for a precisely similar use,—a proceeding not tolerated in law. The fallacy of appellant's argument on this branch of the case is in confounding the incident with the thing itself,—the defendant's railroad, and its right to the full use and enjoyment thereof, with that portion of its right of way which the court expressly finds is not essential or necessary to such enjoyment. A railroad company is authorized to take a given quantity of land for a right of way, not as a reward for constructing a road, but because it is regarded as necessary to the construction and operating its line of railroad, and when a portion of such right of way is not used, and is not necessary for the purposes of its creation and use, either in the present or future, as in this case, then, as to the portion of such right of way not necessary to its operation, the appropriation by another railroad, where necessary to the use of the latter for a roadbed, is an appropriation to a more necessary public use, within the purview of the Code, and may be taken, upon compensation being made. The wisdom of this provision in our law becomes apparent, wherever railroads converge upon cities, towns, mountain passes, etc., and where the right of way of the first appropriator may be in part necessary to subsequently constructed roads, and may be taken by the latter with only such "tolerable interference" as does not materially curtail the rights of the first appropriator, and can be fully compensated in money. I repeat, the appropriation of a portion of the right of way of a railroad, not essential to its enjoyment of its franchise and property, as such, by another railroad, where essential to the construction and existence of the latter, is to and for a more necessary public use, and the fact that some interference may be occasioned thereby, but which does not materially curtail the rights and privileges of the former, does not take the case out of the wholesome rule adopted by our Code. Extended comment is not deemed necessary upon the fact that defendant, after the line of plaintiff's road was located, constructed a spur track across the line of the same, for the reason that the court found that defendant had no use therefor, and constructed the same for the purpose of preventing the plaintiff from having and using such right of way. In such cases, the authorities are to the effect that defendant could gain no advantage thereby. It follows from these views that the findings of the court support the judgment. Appellants further object that "the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court." It must suffice, upon this head, to say that, upon all the points upon which the findings are assailed, there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and were we to analyze and discuss the evidence at length, it would only lead to the inevitable conclusion that under such circumstances we are not authorized to disturb the findings. The errors of law complained of involve the same questions discussed under the head of the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment, and need not be further noticed. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

STANFORD et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,966.)[1]

SURFACE WATER — DAMAGE CAUSED BY PAVING — LIABILITY OF CITY.

Surface water, which, before a street was paved, was absorbed by it, after the paving thereof, without any cesspools or other means to allow it to escape, flowed to the part of the street where the grade was lowest, and, collecting, overflowed the sidewalks and flooded a basement. Held, that the city was liable for the damage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hibbard, Judge.

Action by J. B. Stanford and others, partners as G. W. Clark & Co., against the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harvey T. Creswell, for appellant. Gordon & Young, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiffs were the occupants of the basement of a building, No. 720 Mission street, which extended back to the southerly side of Jessie street, and had stored therein a large quantity of wall paper, and other goods used in their business. In the early part of 1888 the defendant caused a sewer to be laid in Jessie street from the center of Fourth street easterly to its termination, in a cul-de-sac at the westerly line of the Grand Opera House, which extends entirely across Jessie street, just east of the premises occupied by plaintiffs. The westerly end of said sewer connected with a sewer in Fourth street. The sewer in Jessie street had two manholes, with covers; but no cesspools were provided to carry the surface water from the street into the sewer, and none were provided for in the contract under which it was constructed. Shortly after the construction of the sewer the defendant also caused the same portion of Jessie street to be paved with basalt blocks, and granite curbs to be laid, and the sidewalks reconstructed. After the street was paved the southerly side was slightly lower than the northerly side, and the easterly end was about 26 inches lower than it was at Fourth street, the distance being about 600 feet. Prior to the paving the surface of the street was covered with loose planks, and, the street being sandy, the surface water was absorbed. On March 13, 1889, large quantities of water accumulated and collected at said easterly termination of Jessie street, by reason of rains; and the water broke over the curbing, and ran into the basement occupied by plaintiffs, and injured their merchandise, to the amount of $759.81, and this suit is prosecuted to recover damages in said sum. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and findings were filed and judgment entered for the plaintiffs; and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

There is no controversy as to the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs, nor as to the general facts above stated. Appellant, while contending that the findings do not support the judgment, also contends that the latter part of the eighth finding is not justified by the evidence, and quotes that part, as follows: "That said plaintiffs were damaged in said sum of $759.81 by reason of the failure of the said defendant to provide cesspools or any means to carry off any accumulation or collection of water from the aforesaid portion of Jessie street." Its contention, as to this finding, is that it was the paving of the street, and not the construction of the sewer, that caused the accumulation of the water, and the consequent damage. But the findings state all the facts connected with the improvement of the street, and the accumulation of the water thereon, as well as the fact that prior to these improvements the sand absorbed the surface water, and does not find that the construction of the sewer caused the water to accumulate upon the street, but attributes the injury to defendant's failure "to provide cesspools or any means to carry off" the water. The existence of the sewer doubtless suggested that cesspools connected therewith would have been a convenient and practicable mode of carrying away the water; thus preventing its accumulation, which was the necessary result of the paving. The question is, therefore, whether there was any legal obligation resting upon the city to provide means for conducting away surface water, the accumulation of which was the necessary consequence of paving the street. Neither of the contracts for the improvement of the street provided for the construction of cesspools, and the omission to construct them was not the result of the negligent performance of the work under the contracts, and therefore the case does not come within the class of cases where injury results from the neglect of the city to see that the contractor properly executes the plan adopted; the execution of the work according to the plan being a mere ministerial duty, and not the exercise of legislative power. Nor is this case within that numerous class of cases where it is held, with almost entire unanimity, "that a municipality is not bound to protect from surface water those who may be so unfortunate as to own property below the level of the street." Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1042. Here the grade of Jessie street was not changed, nor is there any claim that the premises occupied by plaintiffs were below grade. Here a street which, before it was paved, absorbed the water falling upon it, by the paving is made to retain and collect the same upon its surface, no means being provided for removing or conducting it away. The portion of the street so paved crossed no street or alley by which it could be diverted, and as the easterly end was more than two feet lower than its westerly end, and was absolutely closed at the lower end by a building which crossed it, it was inevitable that the water falling on that portion of the street below Fourth street would be collected and retained until it could escape by flowing over the curb and sidewalk, and into the basement occupied by the plaintiffs. It was not simply the water falling upon the street opposite plaintiffs' premises, but it was the collection of all the water falling upon the street below Fourth street; the work being so done that the accumulated water was raised above the grade of the street, and above the grade of plaintiffs' premises, which were up to the grade of the street.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Counsel for appellant cites section 1039 of Dillon's Municipal Corporations, in support of the proposition that "the law regards surface water as a common enemy which every proprietor may fight or get rid of as best he may." That section, and the two following, are devoted to the subject of "Liability in Respect of Surface Water," and the last of these (section 1041) is devoted to the question of the "omission to provide drains." The learned author says: "It is clear that there is no liability on the part of a municipal corporation for not exercising the discretionary or legislative powers it may possess to improve streets, and, as part of such improvement, to construct gutters or provide other means for draining for surface waters, so as to prevent them from flowing upon the adjoining lots." But in note 2 to said section it is said: "If the necessity for the drainage is caused by the city, the doctrine of the text [section 1041], that it is not bound to supply the drainage, does not apply." Even as applied to property below the level of the street, the same learned author says: "It is possible there may be no middle ground, but we are unable to assent to the doctrine that by reason of their control over streets, and the power to grade and improve them, the corporate authorities have the absolute and unconditional legal right intentionally to divert the water therefrom, as a mode of protecting the streets, and to discharge it by artificial means, in increased quantities, and with collective force and destructiveness, upon the property, perhaps improved and occupied, of the adjoining owner." Section 1042. In a note to this section, in the fourth edition, he says, "The many cases since decided, cited in the notes, have found and defined the 'middle ground,' therein referred to, and adjudged the law to be as stated in the text." In Ashley v. City of Port Huron, 35 Mich. 296, it was held that where a city constructed a sewer in such manner as to throw a large quantity of water upon plaintiff's premises, which otherwise would not have flowed there, it was liable for the damage caused thereby. In the opinion in that case, after referring to a great many authorities, Chief Justice Cooley said: "It is very manifest, from this reference to authorities, that they recognize in municipal corporations no exemption from responsibility where the injury an individual has received is a direct injury accomplished by a corporate act which is in the nature of a trespass upon him. The right of an individual to the occupation and enjoyment of his premises is exclusive, and the public authorities have no more liberty to trespass upon it than has a private individual. If the corporation send people with picks and spades to cut a street through it, without first acquiring the right of way, it is liable for a tort; but it is no more liable under such circumstances than it is when it pours upon his land a flood of water by a public sewer so constructed that the flooding must be a necessary result. The one is no more unjustifiable than the other. Each is a trespass, and in each instance the city exceeds its lawful jurisdiction. A municipal charter never gives, and never could give, authority to appropriate the freehold of a citizen without compensation, whether it be done through an actual taking of its streets or buildings, or by flooding it so as to interfere with the owner's possession. His property right is appropriated in the one case as much as in the other." In Seifert v. City of Brooklyn, 101 N. Y. 136, 142, 4 N. E. 321, it was said: "Municipal corporations have quite invariably been held liable for damages occasioned by acts resulting in the creation of public or private nuisances, or for an unlawful entry upon the premises of another, whereby injury to his property has been occasioned. Baltimore & P. R. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 2 Sup. Ct. 719. This principle has been uniformly applied to the act of such corporations in constructing streets, sewers, drains, and gutters, whereby the surface water of a large territory, which did not naturally flow in that direction, was gathered into a body, and thus precipitated upon the premises of an individual, occasioning damage thereto." See, also, note to Chalkley v. City of Richmond (Va.) 29 Am. St. Rep. 742, 14 S. E. 339, under the head "Surface Water," where a large number of cases from many different states are cited. In Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 470, 37 Pac. 375, the same principle is asserted; and in the later case of De Baker v. Railway Co., 106 Cal. 257, 282, 39 Pac. 610, it was said: "But if the work was inherently, and according to its plan and location, a dangerous obstruction to the river, such as ordinary prudence should have guarded against, not only the author of the plan to obstruct the stream [the city of Los Angeles], but the person placing the obstruction, was severally liable for the entire damage." See, also, Reardon v. City and County of San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, where the city was held liable for an injury to plaintiff's lot caused by work done upon the street, which was the immediate, direct, and necessary effect of the work done. Corcoran v. City of Benicia, 96 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 798, and the other cases cited by appellant on page 5 of his brief, do not conflict with the authorities which we have cited above. Corcoran v. City of Benicia, supra, is to the effect that a municipal corporation is not liable for damages caused by the prevention of the flow of surface water from the lot of a private owner, by raising the street to the grade, where such water does not run in a natural channel across the lot. The distinction between that case and this is obvious, and the other cases cited by appellant rest upon similar facts. It is also true, as stated by appellant, that "there is no duty imposed by law upon the city to construct cesspools in connection with the sewer," if we add the proviso that the improvement of the street by the city does not create the necessity for cesspools.

It is also contended that "the court failed to find any negligence on the part of the city." All the probative facts being found, negligence, if shown thereby, as is the case here, need not be expressly found as an ultimate fact.

It is further contended that "the court erred in admitting evidence that defendant, subsequent to the overflow, put in cesspools." If such evidence is admissible for any purpose, it could only be as a demonstration that the flooding of plaintiffs' premises could have been avoided by that means. But, conceding that the court erred in admitting that fact in evidence, it does not appear that the defendant was, or could have been, prejudiced by it, and it does appear that without that evidence the result must have been the same. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BRITT, C.

HAMMOND, JR., Referee, v. CAILLEAUD.

(No. 15,961.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1896.)

PARTITION — SALE — NONCOMPLIANCE WITH BID — RESALE—LIABILITY FOR SUFFICIENCY—DIFFERENCE IN TERMS OF SALE — CONCLUSIVENESS OF ORDERS.

1. An order confirming a sale under a decree in partition, not having been appealed from by the purchaser, is conclusive against him that he had no valid reasons for refusing to comply with his bid.

2. An order in a partition suit that the property be resold, at the risk of the purchaser at the first sale who refused to comply with his bid, is binding on him, it being recited that he had notice and was represented by counsel. If such recital were untrue, he should have moved to vacate or modify the order, and, on refusal of his motion, have appealed.

3. Where a referee, in partition to sell the property, makes it one of the conditions of the sale that the title shall be good, the purchaser, who refuses to take the property, cannot be held liable for the difference between his bid and the amount for which it is sold on resale; it having been stated at the second sale that there had been one sale, and the purchaser had refused to take the title, and that the purchaser at the second sale would take the title as it was,—even if the referee had no authority to make the condition at the first sale,—unless it be shown that the difference in price at the two sales was not due to such difference in the conditions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Richard P. Hammond, Jr., referee, against Henry Cailleaud. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. Ruef, for appellant. A. C. Freeman, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by plaintiff as referee in the partition suit of Finnerty et al. v. Pennie et al., to recover the sum of $1,750 from the defendant. The action of Finnerty v. Pennie was for a partition of a certain lot situate on the corner of Natoma and Mary streets in the city of San Francisco, in which a decree was entered determining the interests of the several parties, the amount and priority of several liens thereon, and adjudging that said lot was incapable of partition, and ordering a sale thereof by Hammond, the plaintiff herein, who was duly appointed sole referee for that purpose, the sale to be subject to confirmation by the court. The referee offered said property for sale at public auction, and at such sale the defendant herein became the purchaser upon his bid of $7,500, and thereupon deposited with the referee $750, that being 10 per cent. of the amount bid. The purchaser opposed the confirmation of the sale, upon grounds hereinafter stated, but the court confirmed the sale, and the referee executed and tendered a deed in due form, and demanded payment of the remainder of the sum bid, but the defendant refused to pay said balance or accept the deed. These facts were reported to the court, and afterwards an order was made for a resale of the premises, and directing the referee, in case such resale should not realize said sum of $7,500, and the costs and expenses of the resale, to collect from defendant, by some proper proceeding, such deficiency. To these facts, alleged in the complaint, the defendant answered, and also filed a cross complaint and counterclaim. The answer, after denying the allegations of the complaint, alleged that said property was offered for sale at public auction on the following terms and conditions, namely: "The property to be sold to the highest bidder, the purchaser to receive a perfect and valid title, free from imperfections, otherwise there to be no sale; the bidder, upon acceptance of his bid, to deposit with plaintiff 10 per cent. of the sum bid, to secure the bid and sale to him, and the balance of the bid to be paid, if the title should prove perfect and valid, upon conveyance to the bidder of said property, with a valid and perfect title thereto, and after examination of said title by the bidder; and if the title should not prove to be perfect and valid and free from imperfections, nor made so within 30 days after notice by the bidder to plaintiff of defects therein, the said deposit of 10 per cent. to be returned by plaintiff to bidder on demand,"—and that he bid for said property said sum of $7,500, with the express agreement that if the title to said land should prove imperfect, invalid, and not free from all imperfections, there should be no sale, and that said deposit should be returned to him upon demand. He further alleged that the title to said lot was invalid, and not free from imperfections, that he notified plaintiff thereof, that plaintiff refused to make said title perfect, and that he thereupon demanded the return of his deposit. He admitted that said sale was reported to the court for confirmation, but denied that the terms and conditions thereof were reported; that he filed objections thereto, stating the terms under which his purchase was made, and specifying certain defects in the title, but that the court decided that he would not be bound by the decision of the court thereon, nor by such confirmation, and refused to hear or consider his objections thereto. He admitted the tender of the deed, but denied that such tender was in pursuance of the terms of sale, or that it would have conveyed a valid title, and averred his readiness and willingness to comply with the terms of the sale. He further alleged that the terms and conditions under which the property was resold were different from the terms and conditions of the first sale; that at the second sale it was expressly stated that the purchaser should take the title as it stood, without any agreement that it was perfect, or should be made so upon notice of defects; and that by reason of such change in the terms and conditions of sale the selling value of the property was greatly depreciated. At the second sale, one Denigan became the purchaser, at the sum of $5,000. The cross complaint and counterclaim were interposed for the purpose of recovering the deposit of $750. The cause was tried by the court, and findings and judgment were for the plaintiff for said sum of $1,750, with interest, and from said judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals. Appellant's defense to said action is based upon two distinct propositions: (1) That his purchase was conditioned upon his obtaining a good title, and that the title was not good; and (2) that he is not liable for the deficiency or loss, upon resale, because the terms and conditions of the two sales were materially different. To these propositions respondent replies, in effect, (1) that the sale to appellant was confirmed by the court, and, that order not having been appealed from, appellant is concluded as to all questions involved in the confirmation; and (2) as the referee had no power to give or impose any conditions of sale not contained in the decree or authorized by law, and as the rule of caveat emptor applies to judicial sales, and as he is conclusively presumed to know the law, that he therefore purchased under the conditions imposed by the law, and not under different conditions alleged to have been made by the referee without authority, and, if so, the two sales were made under the same conditions.

1. That the order confirming the sale to Cailleaud, the first purchaser, was appealable, and became conclusive upon his failure to appeal, I think is clear. In Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 560, it was held, in a foreclosure case, that the purchaser, by his act of purchase, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court in that suit as to all matters connected with the sale, and was entitled to apply for such relief as the facts of the case might justify, and that, upon his application, the sale could be set aside, and the satisfaction canceled. In Hickson v. Rucker, 77 Va. 135, it was said: "By buying at such sale the purchaser selects his forum, comes into the case, and submits himself to the court as to all questions concerning the sale and his purchase." That in sales under a decree in equity the purchaser becomes a quasi party to the suit, see note to Mount v. Brown, 69 Am. Dec., at p. 368, and cases there cited, and Jones, Mortg. § 1642. The confirmation of a sale often involves rights of vast importance. A purchaser at a judicial sale may thereby be deprived of a purchase of great advantage to him, or have improperly imposed upon him a burden he should not bear. But it is urged by appellant that there is no provision of the statute under which he could have appealed from that order; that the decree in partition was interlocutory, that he was not a party, and could not appeal therefrom But the decree in this case was not interlocutory, but final. It not only determined the several interests of the cotenants, and the amounts and priorities of the several liens, but also adjudged the property incapable of partition, and decreed that it be sold, and directed the distribution of the proceeds, which distribution is to be made by the referee when the decree so directs (section 773, Code Civ. Proc.), so that the sale and confirmation were simply steps to be taken in the execution of the decree, and the order of confirmation was an order made after final judgment. The appeal from an interlocutory judgment in partition, provided for in section 963, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc., is only "from such interlocutory judgment in actions for partition as determines the rights and interests of the respective parties, and directs partition to be made." But if the decree did not become final until the sale was confirmed, it then became final, and the purchaser, being then a party to that which made the decree final, had the right to appeal from that part of the decree as to which he was a "party aggrieved." The defendant was, therefore, concluded by the order of confirmation as to all objections made to the confirmation of the sale, and became legally bound to complete the purchase. There are three modes of proceeding in a court of equity, when a purchaser, after confirmation, fails or refuses to complete his purchase: (1) Set aside the sale, release the purchaser, and order a resale; or (2) decree a specific performance of the contract; or (3) order a resale, holding the purchaser responsible for any deficiency. See Jones, Mortg. § 1642, and cases there cited. The third of the above modes of procedure is the one pursued in this case.

Upon the trial, the defendant, in order to prove that he never became liable as a purchaser, offered in evidence the following written terms and conditions of said sale (omitting the description): "San Francisco, December 14, 1891. We have this day sold to H. Cailleaud, at the price of $7,500, in gold coin, the following described property: seven hundred and fifty dollars, cash in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged; $6,750, payable ten days after date, or upon completion of the examination of title and the other papers connected therewith, as hereinafter specified; ten days (from date hereof) are allowed for the examination of the title. If the title is not found valid, nor made so in thirty days after notice to us of defect therein, the deposit (for which this is a receipt) is to be returned on demand. If the title is found or made valid, within the time herein specified, and the sale is not closed in accordance with the above terms, the sum of $750 (for which this is a receipt) is to be forfeited. The owner hereof binds himself, upon receipt of the purchase money, to deliver to H. Cailleaud a valid title to said property, unincumbered, unless it is specified above that certain liens are assumed. Time is of the essence of this contract. Subject to confirmation by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Richard P. Hammond, Jr., Referee." "I hereby agree to buy the property above described upon the terms and conditions herein above expressed. Henry Cailleaud." An objection to its introduction in evidence for that purpose was properly sustained, the validity of defendant's purchase having been conclusively adjudicated by the order confirming the sale. The defendant afterwards offered to prove that at the second sale it was expressly stated that the purchaser would take the title as it was, that one sale had been confirmed, and the purchaser had refused to take it; and, in that connection, for the purpose of proving that the terms of the two sales were different, also again offered the writing above quoted. We have held that the order confirming the first sale was appealable, and that, having failed to appeal, the purchaser was bound by the order of confirmation, and could not relitigate the questions arising upon the motion to confirm. But, conceding for the moment that his objections to the title were groundless, and that therefore the terms and conditions of his purchase were fully complied with, and that, without cause or excuse, he refused to take the property, and deliberately intended to suffer all the legal consequences of such refusal, the resale could not be either a just or legal mode of ascertaining his liability, unless made upon the same terms and conditions as those under which he purchased. Riggs v. Pursell, 74 N. Y. 370; Shinn v. Roberts, 20 N. J. Law, 435. The court refused to permit the defendant to prove what the terms of the second sale were, as announced by the auctioneer, the court holding that the terms of the second sale were definitely fixed by the order of sale and the published notice, and that the defendant would not be allowed to contradict these; and also refused to permit proof of the terms and conditions of the first sale for the purpose of showing that the conditions of the two sales were different. Conceding that the rule of caveat emptor applies to judicial sales generally, and that the order of sale was silent as to any conditions relating to the validity or invalidity of the title to be acquired by the purchaser thereunder, and further conceding, for the purposes of this opinion, that the referee derived no power from the statute or the order of sale to stipulate with the purchaser that the title should be good and free from imperfections, or the sale be void, it does not follow that the purchaser was bound to accept an imperfect title, if it be true that the referee sold the property under the conditions alleged and offered to be proved by the defendant. If it be true that purchasers are conclusively bound to know the limits of the powers of the officer making the sale, it must follow that, as matter of law, they are not affected or influenced by any representation made by the officer, or by any terms or conditions given or imposed by him, and therefore the sale must, for the purposes of confirmation, as well as for all other purposes, be deemed to have been regular and valid. And not only so; upon that theory, it would be impossible that two sales, made by the same officer, of the same property, under the same order of sale, could be made on different terms; and if so, there could be no foundation for the established rule that, in order to hold the first purchaser liable for the loss upon a resale, the terms and conditions of the two sales must not be different. But that courts do not hold purchasers to such presumptive knowledge, in confirming sales, is well settled. In Woodward v. Bullock, 27 N. J. Eq. 507, bidders were misled as to the amount of the incumbrances to which the sale was made subject, both by the sheriff and the successful bidder. The sale was set aside. In Hayes v. Stiger, 29 N. J. Eq. 196, the court said: "Where surprise or misapprehension is occasioned by the conduct of the purchaser, or the officer making the sale, to the injury of a person interested, the court will interfere." In Black v. Walton, 32 Ark. 321, the syllabus is as follows: "A sale by a guardian of his ward's land, under an order of the probate court, is a judicial sale, and the rule caveat emptor applies; but if the land is purchased upon the representation of the guardian that the purchaser would acquire a good title, which turns out to be untrue, the purchaser will not be held, at law or in equity, although the guardian may not have known the falsity of his representations." In Veeder v. Fonda, 3 Paige, 94, the chancellor said: "As property to a vast extent is sold under the orders and decree of this court, much of which belongs to infants and others who are not able to protect their own rights, it has always been an important object with the court to encourage a fair competition at master's sales. For this purpose, it is necessary that purchasers at such sales should understand that no deception whatever will be permitted to be practiced upon them; that, in a contract between them and the court, they will not be compelled to carry the contract into effect under circumstances where it would not be perfectly just and conscientious in an individual to insist upon the performance of the contract against the purchaser, if the sale had been made by such an individual or his agent. It is, therefore, a principle of the court that the master who sells the property shall not, in the description of the same, add any particular which may unduly enhance the value of the property or mislead the purchaser." These authorities clearly show that for any error, irregularity, or misrepresentation of the officer, whether intentional or otherwise, whereby the purchaser has been misled to his prejudice to such extent as to make it unconscionable that his contract of purchase should be enforced against him, the sale will not be confirmed. But in this case, as here presented, it is not necessary to go further than to hold that if, by the alleged terms and conditions of the sale to appellant, he was led to bid more for the property—to any material extent, at least—than he would if he had been informed, as the purchaser was, at the second sale, that he must take the title as it was, whether defective or not, it is obvious that the resale did not furnish any just measure of damages. No fact or circumstance is disclosed by the record, other than the different conditions under which these sales were made, which tends in any degree to account for the difference between the final bids at these two sales; and, under such circumstances, we must conclude that all above the amount of the second sale which was bid at the first was induced by the condition that the purchaser took no risk as to the title. The owners are estopped from saying that the price obtained upon the second sale was inadequate, since they are not shown to have opposed confirmation upon that ground, and therefore the presumption is strengthened that the higher price obtained at the first sale was secured by the more favorable conditions given to appellant. If the referee had entirely omitted to publish notice of the sale, and had made a private contract for the sale of the property, and the owners (creditors not being affected) had been satisfied with the terms of sale and the price obtained, and, with knowledge of the facts, had obtained its confirmation, the sale so confirmed would have been valid, and they could not thereafter have objected that they were not bound by the acts of the referee, though made without authority. Here the owners were informed, before confirmation, of the terms of the written contract, and should be held to have ratified that contract as to all its terms and provisions. But, whether that be true or not, this action is brought by the referee, who alone is authorized to maintain the action, unless by assignment he confers that right upon another. Mayer v. Wick, 15 Ohio St. 548. In Galpin v. Lamb, 29 Ohio St. 529, 534, it was said: "The contract of purchase is made with the officer, as representing all the interests involved in the suit in which the judgment or decree of sale is rendered. He and the purchaser are the only parties to the contract of purchase; and he alone can maintain an action against the purchaser to recover the purchase money"; and, in commenting upon the case of Mayer v. Wick, supra, it was said: "In that case the sale had been confirmed, and the officer had thus become responsible for the purchase money. He had tendered the deed to the purchaser, and assigned his right of action to the plaintiff in the decree under which the property was sold, and the latter was allowed to maintain the action for the purchase money." See, also, Michenor v. Lloyd, 16 N. J. Eq. 38. If, therefore, the right of the referee to prosecute this action is based upon the contract he made with the purchaser, it would appear to be clear that he should not be permitted to say, "I am not bound by the written contract I made with you, because I had no power to make it, and therefore it did not constitute any part of the terms and conditions of the sale, and you cannot use it for the purpose of showing that the terms of the second sale were different." If, without a resale, the referee had brought suit against the defendant to recover the unpaid purchase money, the action could properly have been sustained, because the order confirming the sale, not having been appealed from, absolutely fixed the defendant's liability as a purchaser; but he was not concluded, by his failure to appeal, from showing the terms of his purchase to have been different from those of the second sale.

As to the order of resale at appellant's risk, made April 7th, I think appellant is bound thereby. It recites that the purchaser had notice and was represented by counsel. If that were untrue, he should have moved to vacate or modify the order, and, upon a denial of his motion, have taken an appeal. No other questions require notice. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PETERSON v. MACHADO. (No. 19,591.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1896.)

DEED—EASEMENT—RIGHTS OF GRANTOR—INJUNCTION.

1. A deed conveying "a road and right of way over and across" land, "to be forever appurtenant to" adjoining land of the grantee, and providing that neither party shall, "nor shall his successors in interest, grant or give to any other person a right of way over said road," conveys only an easement for a right of way, and not a fee-simple title.

2. An injunction to enjoin a grantee of an easement for a right of way from interfering with the grantor's laying pipes beneath the right of way, to connect with a ram placed in a gulch which encroached on the right of way, should be granted, where the grantor offers to widen the right of way by moving his fence, or by changing the location of the ram, and filling up the gulch.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Action by John Peterson against Domingo Machado for an injunction. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Graves & Graves and F. A. Dorn, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land in San Luis Obispo county, which was bounded on its westerly side for a distance of about 2,400 feet by a natural stream of water, known as "Sycamore" or "Los Osos" creek. He resided on this land with his family, his dwelling house being about 1,500 feet distant from the creek, and was engaged in farming the same, and raising stock, consisting of cattle, horses, and hogs. The defendant owned two tracts of land, one adjoining the north side of plaintiff's land, and the other the south side thereof. In October, 1887, plaintiff, by an instrument in writing, granted and conveyed to defendant, and to his heirs and assigns, "a road and right of way for all purposes over and across the aforesaid land of Peterson, and to be forever appurtenant to the aforesaid land now owned by said Machado, which road shall be sixteen (16) feet wide, shall run along the east side of what is known as 'Sycamore' or 'Los Osos' creek, connecting the aforesaid two tracts of land now owned by said Machado, and the easterly line of which road is described as follows: [Setting out courses and distances.]" The instrument was executed by both parties, and contained numerous covenants to be kept and performed by them, and, among others, that within eight months said Machado "shall build and thereafter perpetually maintain one hog-tight fence along the east line of said road, as above described"; and that "said Peterson shall not, nor shall his successors in interest, grant or give to any other person a right of way over said road granted to Machado across the land of Peterson; and said Machado shall not, nor shall his successors in interest, give or grant to any person or persons who may be owners of his said land, or some part thereof, a right of way over said road." Subsequently, and about two years before the commencement of this action, plaintiff placed a water ram in the bed of the creek, where the same borders upon his land, and connected therewith a pipe, through and by means of which he conveyed water from the stream to his house, to be there used for domestic and culinary purposes and for watering his stock. The pipe crossed the roadway, but was there placed under ground, and so as not to interfere with the use of the right of way. Afterwards, in June, 1894, defendant dug up, cut, and removed that part of the pipe which crossed the roadway, and thereby prevented the flow of any water from the said creek to plaintiff's house. This action was thereupon commenced to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant, his agents, servants, and employés, from cutting or in any way interfering with the said pipe. The case was tried, and the court found that the defendant was the owner of an easement or right of way over the strip of land described, and, among other things: "(10) That the said ram was placed by the plaintiff inside of said way, and inside of fourteen feet from the easterly line of said way, and the said plaintiff has placed eleven feet of pipe over and across the said way, under ground; that the defendant's enjoyment of said way has never been, and is not, obstructed by said water ram and pipe. (11) The said stream in which said ram is placed runs through a gulch about six feet deep. Said gulch is along the west side of defendant's said way, and said ram is at the bottom of said gulch. Said gulch encroaches about six feet into said way of defendant at the point where said ram is placed. The road of defendant is on the bank of said gulch, six feet above said ram." Judgment was entered granting the plaintiff the relief prayed for, but providing: "That defendant is permitted to widen his road along said way by filling up or bridging over the gulch described in said findings where the same encroaches upon his way. That plaintiff has no right to use said way in any manner that will prevent defendant from using said way for a convenient road, or to prevent defendant from repairing his road in any manner to fit the same for his convenient use." From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. The first point made for a reversal is that the plaintiff, by the instrument above referred to, granted to the defendant the fee-simple title to the strip of land described therein, and hence had no right to lay his water pipe across the strip. The Civil Code declares that "a fee simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended." Section 1105. But grants are to be interpreted in the same manner as other contracts (section 1066), so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, so far as that intention can be ascertained (section 1636); and, to ascertain that intention, "the whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other" (section 1641). Pellissier v. Corker, 103 Cal. 516, 37 Pac. 465; Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049. Tested by the foregoing rules, does it appear that the instrument in question here was intended to grant to the defendant a fee-simple title? If it was so intended, why did it provide that the "road and right of way" are "to be forever appurtenant to" the land then owned by the grantee? "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way * * * across the land of another." Civ. Code § 662. Again, if it was so intended, why did it provide that the grantor "shall not, nor shall his successors in interest, grant or give to any other person a right of way over said road," and that the grantee "shall not, nor shall his successors in interest, give or grant to any person or persons who may be owners of his said land, or some part thereof, a right of way over said road"? Obviously, if the grantor had no title left in him, he could not grant or give to any other person a right of way over the road, and the provision that he should not was useless; and, if the grantee had a complete title, he could give or grant a right of way over the road notwithstanding the provision that he should not. Looking at the whole instrument, we conclude, therefore, that its object and purpose were to grant a right of way, and nothing more.

2. The next point is that if the instrument conveyed only an easement, and not a fee-simple title, still defendant had a right to dig up and remove the said pipe, because it obstructed and interfered with his right of way. The court below found directly against defendant on this point, and we think there was evidence tending to support the finding. It was proved that the bank of the creek where the ram was placed was from 6 to 10 feet high, and was nearly perpendicular, and that from the fence to the top of the bank was about 12 feet. The road was therefore narrow at that point, and, as stated by defendant, it was difficult, if not impossible, to drive a four-horse team with a loaded header wagon over it. This was because there was quite a sharp bend in the road there, and also because there was a large sycamore tree standing near, which made the passage round the bend more difficult. Defendant testified that he wanted to cut down the tree, but plaintiff objected to his doing so, and "said the tree belonged to him, and not to do it. He says he sold me the right of way, but never sold me the timber." And one of his witnesses testified that "if the tree would be taken down, and you drive four horses, it will give your leaders more room to swing around the road where the bend is." The plaintiff testified: "I am prepared, at any time that defendant wishes to widen his driveway by putting in a bulkhead, to take my ram further over, and would be willing to set my fence further away. I told Machado that, whenever the rams interfered with his road or his business, I would take them out of there; and, if he wishes to widen his road by putting in a bulkhead, I will take them away. The creek is very crooked; so is the road." In accordance with this offer, the judgment, as we have seen, permits the defendant to widen his road by filling up or bridging over the gulch described in the findings, where the same encroaches upon his way, and limits the plaintiff's right to use the way in any manner that will prevent defendant from using the same for a convenient road, or from repairing the same. As thus entered, the judgment promotes justice, and does no wrong to either party. There was no material error in the rulings of the court. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

MURPHY v. CLAYTON. (No. 15,914.)[1]

ADMINISTRATORS — RIGHT TO PROPERTY SOLD BY DECEDENT.

A sale of chattels by decedent, though not accompanied by delivery, having been valid against him and his heirs, and therefore his administrator, recovery thereof by the purchaser from the administrator cannot be defeated, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589, 1590, providing that, when there is a deficiency of assets in the hands of an administrator, he shall sue for, and may recover, for the benefit of creditors, property conveyed by decedent in fraud of creditors; it not appearing that the claims against the estate which have been allowed by the administrator, or are evidenced by judgment, exceed the assets in his hands.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Ann Murphy against Edward W. Clayton. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. W. Lewis (J. H. Campbell, of counsel), for appellant. Kittredge & Craft, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is in claim and delivery, brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the possession of certain horses. The complaint is in the usual form, and was unverified. The defendant, in his answer, first pleaded a general denial, followed by two separate defenses, the first of which alleged that Daniel J. Murphy, in his lifetime, was the owner of, and in the exclusive possession of, and entitled to the possession of, all said property; that he died intestate June 20, 1893; that on July 21, 1893, the defendant was duly appointed administrator of the estate of said decedent; and that the said properties "all and singular were at the date of decedent's death, and ever since have been, and now are, a part of said estate, and defendant then took them, and has ever since held them, as part of said estate, and for the purpose of administration thereof, as administrator aforesaid, and not otherwise." The second special defense alleged the facts above stated concerning the death of Daniel J. Murphy and defendant's appointment as administrator, and further alleged "that said properties all and singular were at the date of decedent's death, and ever since have been, and are now, a part of said estate for the purpose of its administration, and for the payment of the debts of said decedent and of said estate; that defendant, as administrator, and not otherwise, took said properties, and has ever since held and now holds them, as part of said estate, for the purpose of administration thereof as aforesaid; that the value of the personalty of said estate, including said properties, does not exceed $15,000; that the debts of said estate aggregate $90,000, and are wholly unpaid." The action was tried by the court, without a jury. The court found that the plaintiff had acquired certain of the horses from her husband, James Murphy, in his lifetime; and these, together with their offspring, the court found she was entitled to recover, together with certain other of the horses which were purchased by defendant's intestate for the plaintiff with her funds; and that the deceased, Daniel J. Murphy, was at the time of his death the owner of two of said horses, known as "Viva" and "Viva Williams." There is no controversy here as to any of the horses above mentioned. The fifth and sixth findings are as follows: "(5) That on or about the 25th day of May, 1892, said Daniel J.

Murphy, in settlement of his accounts with the plaintiff, sold and transferred to the plaintiff, in consideration of said settlement, certain horses in controversy in this action, namely, Carrie Malone, Danton Moultrie, Governor Pico, Clyde, Chloe Thorne, Alien, and her colt foaled in 1893. (6) That on and before the 25th day of May, 1892, and at the time of said sale and transfer, said Daniel J. Murphy was the sole owner of and in the sole possession and control of all said animals in his own name; that said sale was complete and valid between the parties thereto, but was not accompanied by an immediate or any delivery, or followed by an actual or continued or any change of possession of said animals, or any of them, mentioned in finding 5, but said animals remained in the sole possession of said Murphy continuously to the day of his death; that during the same period all other property of the plaintiff was in his keeping, as her general manager and agent." The court further found that Murphy died June 20, 1893; that defendant was appointed and qualified as administrator July 21, 1893; that notice to creditors had been published, but the time for the presentation of claims would not expire until May 27, 1894; that claims against decedent, aggregating, with interest, about $80,000, had been presented, allowed, and filed, and were unpaid; that the value of said estate is in personalty $14,377.75, and in realty $106,835.17; that plaintiff had brought suit, which is still pending, in which she asserts title in herself to a portion of said realty of the value of $17,500, and had also brought another suit, which is still pending, in which she asserts a life estate of the value of $10,000; that, in addition to said claims allowed and filed, suits are pending for the recovery of judgments against said estate amounting to $6,000; that plaintiff had also brought suit against said administrator to recover personal property aggregating in value $2,869; that the court had awarded to the widow of decedent the sum of $225 per month, from June 20, 1893, and also certain personalty, as exempt, of the aggregate value of $1,000, and also a homestead of the value of $3,000. The court further found "that plaintiff was at the commencement of this suit, and is now, the owner of all the animals mentioned in the complaint, except Viva and Viva Williams"; that she was then, and is now, entitled to the possession of all except Viva and Viva Williams and those named in finding No. 5; and "that she was not then, and is not now, entitled to the possession of said last-named animals." As conclusions of law, the court found that the transfer of the animals mentioned in finding No. 5 was void as to the creditors of the decedent; that the defendant, as administrator, is entitled to retain possession of them "for the purpose of applying the same, if necessary, to the payment of the creditors of said decedent, in due course of administration of said estate." Judgment was entered accordingly, and this appeal is by the plaintiff, upon the judgment roll, from that part of the judgment which awards to the defendant the possession of the animals mentioned in finding 5, "for the purpose of applying the same, if necessary, to the payment of the creditors of said decedent, in due course of administration of said estate of D. J. Murphy, deceased."

Counsel for appellant contends that the findings, so far as they relate to that portion of the judgment involved in this appeal, are outside of the issues; that, as between the plaintiff and her son Daniel J. Murphy, the sale of the horses to her was good and valid; and that in order to avoid the sale, in the interest of creditors, the facts which it is claimed made such sale void as to creditors must be alleged, and could not be proved under an allegation of ownership of the decedent at the time of his death, nor under a general denial of plaintiff's ownership and right of possession. In this contention I think that appellant is clearly right, though respondent asserts that the evidence upon which the findings were based was introduced without objection that it was inadmissible under the pleadings, and that, therefore, the judgment cannot be reversed upon that ground. This controversy between counsel becomes immaterial in view of the conclusion, hereafter reached, that the findings do not support that part of the judgment appealed from. The court found that, as between the plaintiff and her son, the sale was valid, and that she was the owner of the property in question; and therefore, unless other facts existed affecting the transfer or the property transferred, it could not have been part of Daniel J. Murphy's estate. The sale, being valid between the plaintiff and the heirs of the deceased, to whom his estate descended, and therefore valid as against the administrator, gave him no right of possession resulting merely from his appointment and qualification as administrator; nor could he assume the existence of any facts or circumstances which, if shown to exist, might authorize him to acquire the possession by a judicial proceeding. Besides, the possession of the deceased after the sale was as the general agent of the plaintiff, and his possession was her possession. The record contains no statement or bill of exceptions, and the circumstances attending the possession by the deceased, and giving it character, are not before us; and we must therefore accept the finding, and assume for the purposes of the case that the change of possession was not such as the statute requires.

The only authority given executors or administrators to recover, for the benefit of creditors, property conveyed or transferred by the deceased in his lifetime, is found in sections 1589 and 1590 of the Code of Civil Procedure. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 1589. When there is a deficiency of assets in the hands of an executor or administrator, and when the decedent in his lifetime has conveyed any real estate, or any rights and interests therein, with intent to defraud his creditors, or to avoid any right, debt or duty of any person, or has so conveyed such estate that by law the deeds or conveyances are void as against creditors, the executor or administrator must commence and prosecute to final judgment any proper action for the recovery of the same; and may recover for the benefit of the creditor all such real estate so fraudulently conveyed; and may also, for the benefit of the creditors, sue and recover all goods, chattels, rights or credits which have been so conveyed by the decedent in his lifetime, whatever may have been the manner of such fraudulent conveyance.

"Sec. 1590. No executor or administrator is bound to sue for such estate, as mentioned in the preceding section, for the benefit of the creditors, unless on application of the creditors, who must pay such part of the costs and expenses of the suit, or give such security to the executor or administrator therefor as the court, or a judge thereof, shall direct."

Assuming (without deciding) that section 1589, Code Civ. Proc., applies to transfers which are void as against creditors under section 3440 of the Civil Code, as well as to transfers and conveyances made with intent to defraud creditors, specified in sections 3439 and 1227 of the same Code, and that an administrator is one on whom a decedent's estate "devolves in trust for the benefit of others than himself" (sections 3439 and 3440, Civ. Code), the facts found by the court in this case would not have authorized the administrator to have prosecuted an action to recover the property in question, and therefore do not constitute a defense to this action, or sustain the judgment appealed from. In Field v. Andrada, 106 Cal. 107, 110, 39 Pac. 323, it was said: "The obvious intent and meaning of this section is that two things must concur to authorize the administrator to commence an action to set aside a deed of his intestate as void against creditors: (1) There must exist creditors to be paid; and (2) there must be an insufficiency of assets in the hands of the administrator to meet their demands. Both of these facts must coexist to bring the case within the limitations of the statute. Ohm v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 545, 26 Pac. 244. If there are no creditors, or, there being creditors, the administrator has sufficient assets of the estate in his hands to meet their demands, in either case he is without power to maintain the action. * * * It is held in Ohm v. Superior Court, supra, that, to constitute a creditor within the meaning of the statute, 'he must be a creditor whose claim has been allowed by the administrator, or is evidenced by a judgment;' citing Mesmer v. Jenkins, 61 Cal. 153; McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300."

Under these authorities, claims against the estate which have not been accepted or allowed by the administrator, or which have not been reduced to judgment, do not bring the claimants within the category of creditors; and it therefore appears from the findings that there is not a deficiency of assets in the hands of the administrator to meet the demands of creditors, and therefore the circumstances do not exist which would authorize a recovery against the plaintiff by the administrator. The findings therefore do not support the judgment appealed from, but require a judgment for the plaintiff as to all the property except the two horses Viva and Viva Williams. The statement in the eleventh finding "that she [the plaintiff] was not then, and is not now, entitled to the possession of said last-named animals" (the ones here in question), is an erroneous conclusion of law from the facts precedently stated. We therefore advise that that part of the judgment appealed from be reversed, with directions to the superior court to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the animals mentioned in the fifth finding.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment awarding the defendant the possession of the animals mentioned in the fifth finding is reversed, with directions to the superior court to enter judgment upon the finding in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of said animals, or for the value thereof as found by the court in case a delivery thereof to the plaintiff cannot be had.

KILBURN et al. v. LAW, Judge. (S. F. 287.)

REMOVAL OF BANK EXAMINER—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—WRIT OF PROHIBITION—JURISDICTION.

1. An accusation under Pen. Code, § 772, requiring the superior court, on presentation of a sworn statement accusing a public officer of malfeasance or neglect of duty, to cite such officer to appear, and to hear the accusation and evidence, and, if the charge is sustained, to enter decree of removal, and judgment of $500 in favor of the informer, is a criminal, and not a civil, proceeding.

2. Bank examiners cannot be prosecuted under Pen. Code, § 772, providing for the removal of public officers from office for malfeasance or neglect of duty, since, by Id. §§ 888, 889, prosecutions for removal can only be maintained against district, county, municipal, or township officers.

3. The fact that the objection that a complaint does not state a case is in the nature of a demurrer, of which the superior court has jurisdiction, cannot be urged against the jurisdiction of the supreme court to entertain an application for prohibition to stay proceedings in the superior court in a case where no facts could be alleged which would give the lower court jurisdiction.

In bank. Application by Paris Kilburn and others, bank commissioners of the state of California, against J. K. Law, judge of the superior court, for writ of prohibition. Granted.

R. B. Carpenter, for petitioners. Andrew J. Clunie and V. G. Frost, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition against Hon. J. K. Law, judge of the superior court of Merced county, commanding him to desist from any further proceedings against the petitioners as bank commissioners in the matter of the accusation of W. N. Sherman against them. October 8, 1895, said Sherman filed in the superior court of Merced county a verified accusation charging that the bank commissioners had willfully neglected to perform the duties of their office, in that, having the means to do so, they did not, up to September 1, 1895, ascertain that the Merced Bank was insolvent and unable to fulfill its obligations, and that it was unsafe to continue business, and that, having the means to ascertain these facts, they did not report the same to the attorney general of the state of California, as required by law, and that having ascertained on the 12th day of September, 1895, that said bank was insolvent and in an unsafe condition, they did not report, and have not since reported, such facts to the attorney general. The accusation also charged that the Merced Bank was insolvent and unsafe, and that on the 16th day of October, 1894, it suspended payment and closed its doors, and that said suspension has ever since continued, and the bank has paid no part of the sums due its depositors, and that the neglect of duty on the part of the bank commissioners has entailed great loss on the part of depositors in said bank. The petitioners state that neither of them was a citizen of the county of Merced, wherein the accusation was filed, but were then temporarily at Merced when this proceeding was commenced, engaged in the discharge of their official duty. Upon the presentation of said accusation to the superior court of Merced county, it is averred, the court issued a citation, which was served upon the petitioners, requiring them to appear and answer the accusation; and the petitioners charge that notwithstanding said accusation was filed without authority of law, and the proceeding is illegal, respondent will, unless restrained, entertain the same, and will enter judgment removing petitioners from office. The answer admits all the material allegations, except that respondent denies that he will proceed to remove petitioners from office, but avers that he will proceed to hear the accusation, and determine the same, as required by section 772 of the Penal Code.

Petitioners contend that, inasmuch as the bank commissioners are state officers, and not district, county, municipal, or township officers, they cannot be prosecuted and removed from office under section 772 of the Penal Code, and they claim that sections 888 and 889 expressly so provide. In answer to this it is suggested that, although section 772 is in the Penal Code, the proceeding there authorized constitutes a civil case; it is simply a law misplaced. It is even contended that an action upon a statute to recover a fixed penalty was at common law an action of debt,—that is, a civil action,—and the legislature cannot, by providing for such a case in the Penal Code, thereby convert that which is essentially a civil action into a criminal proceeding. That the legislature intended to make it a criminal prosecution is, to my mind, clear. It is a proceeding for the punishment of an offense in its nature criminal. No one denies that willful neglect of official duty is, or may be made by statute, a crime. It has always been so treated. That this section is in the Penal Code is, of itself, sufficient to indicate the legislative intent. But this is not all. Section 682 of the Penal Code provides that every public offense must be prosecuted by information or indictment, except (1) "Where proceedings are had for the removal of civil officers of the state," etc. Section 888, that offenses triable in the superior courts must be prosecuted by indictment or information, except as provided in the next section. Section 889: "When the proceedings are had for the removal of district, county, municipal or township officers, they may be commenced by an accusation or information, in writing, as provided in sections seven hundred and fifty-eight and seven hundred and seventy-two." Here is an express provision for the prosecution of certain officers for public offenses under section 772. This is equivalent to an express declaration by the legislature that the proceeding authorized by section 772 is the prosecution of a public offense. Is there anything in the nature of the proceeding authorized by section 772 which would make it a case at law, rather than a criminal prosecution? There are many civil actions, the result of which may be highly penal, and which partake of the nature of criminal prosecutions. And yet, since the purpose is to redress or prevent a private injury, they cannot be classed as criminal proceedings. But when the object is to punish the defendant for the commission of an act, and the public, and not individuals, as such, are interested in the judgment sought, and where, as here, the act is declared a public offense,—and especially if at common law it was so considered,—the presumption is very strong, if not conclusive, that the proceeding is a criminal prosecution. The features of section 772 which gave it the appearance of providing for a civil action are: (1) The defendant is cited to appear and answer; (2) the court must proceed to hear the evidence in a summary manner, which, it is claimed, means that a jury is not required; (3) the court must enter a decree depriving the accused of his office, and judgment in favor of the informer for $500 and costs; and, (4) as it is claimed, the proceeding is not in the name of the people, as directed by section 684 of the Penal Code. Probably no one would think any one of these provisions sufficient to constitute the proceeding a civil case, in view of the provisions alluded to, which declare that this is a criminal proceeding, but it may be thought that all together plainly indicate a civil case. The first cannot be of consequence. The legislature may provide for the prosecution of a criminal action without the arrest of the defendant. If the fact that it is a criminal proceeding implies the right to a trial by jury, it would follow that, in a prosecution under this section, defendants are entitled to a jury, and the decree and judgment provided would follow a verdict of guilty. The judgment imposing a fine, which, in whole or in part, shall go to the informer, is not such an anomaly in criminal practice as to require discussion. Perhaps a prosecution under this section ought to be in the name of the people. There is nothing indicating a contrary intent in the statute. The cases have been entitled as they were under the act of 1853. This was natural, as that act seemed to make it a proceeding by the informer against the person accused. The matter does not appear to be of much consequence; and it is enough to say that the statute has not provided that the action shall be in the name of the informer, and if section 684 is applicable, as I think it is, it ought to be in the name of the people. It follows that the point that such prosecution cannot be had, under this section, against the bank commissioners, must be sustained. They are not district, county, municipal, or township officers; and, by sections 888 and 889, prosecutions under section 772 can only be maintained against such officers.

It is said that the objection that the complaint does not state a case of which the court has jurisdiction is in the nature of a demurrer, and that the superior court has jurisdiction to consider all such questions, and they cannot be made the ground for a writ of prohibition. This point cuts too deep, and, if sustained so broadly, would deprive this court of all power to issue writs of prohibition in cases where a lower tribunal is exceeding its jurisdiction. It certainly is not good in a case like this, where no facts could be alleged which would give the lower court jurisdiction. Let the writ issue as prayed for.

SILVA v. SPANGLER. (S. F. 104.)

NUISANCE—PLEADING—DEMURRER—WAIVER—WAY—DEDICATION AS HIGHWAY.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, the failure of a complaint, in an action to abate an embankment, to allege any damage to plaintiff different or peculiar from that resulting to the common public, is not a ground of demurrer, though, in a proper case, the objection may be urged, under a demurrer, on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, providing that if objections to a complaint are not taken, either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same (with certain exceptions), the objection that a complaint is ambiguous or uncertain, that being a specific ground of demurrer, is waived, if not raised by demurrer.

3. The fact that a strip of land, over which a private right of way had been granted by the owner to two other landowners, to enable them to reach a highway from their land, is used, without objection, by others, going to and from their own lands, or the places of the two grantees, does not establish a dedication to the public.

4. In an action to abate an embankment, thereby throwing surface water over plaintiff's right of way, where there is no allegation that the right of way was a public one, it is unnecessary to allege any special injury differing from that resulting to the public.

Action by Emanuel P. Silva against Antonio Spangler. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. L. Gill, for appellant. C. L. Witten and Jackson Hatch, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to abate an embankment constructed by defendant, whereby the surface water is alleged to be prevented from flowing from and over a private right of way owned and possessed by him, the said plaintiff, and to enjoin defendant from maintaining such embankment. Plaintiff had a degree as prayed for, and this appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The amended complaint of plaintiff was demurred to, upon two grounds, viz., "that said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action," and upon the further ground "that plaintiff does not allege any damage different or peculiar than that resulting to the common public." The last cause of demurrer assigned is not one for which a demurrer can be properly interposed, under section 430 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The same cause may, however, be urged, in a proper case, under the objection that the "complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The contention of appellant seems to be based upon the theory that the amended complaint contains no allegation that the roadway in question is a private road, and that the complaint does not state in any allegation whether the road in question is a private or public road. In support of the last proposition we are referred to the case of Grimes v. Linscott (not yet officially reported; decided May 24, 1895) 40 Pac. 421. In that case, there was a demurrer interposed, upon the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, which was sustained. By failure to raise this objection by demurrer in the present case, it was, under section 434, waived. We are unable to agree with appellant in his deduction of facts from the amended complaint. Succinctly stated, the amended complaint avers that plaintiff and one J. P. Silva are now, and since October 27, 1884, have been, the owners and in the possession and enjoyment of a private right of way, for road purposes, over and along a tract of land, which is described by courses and distances and by metes and bounds, being 30 feet in width, and which was conveyed to them by Henry Curtner, by deed dated October 27, 1884, etc.; that plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land, containing 53 acres (describing it), used by him for farming purposes, and that his only means of egress and ingress thereto, and the only means of reaching any public highway therefrom, is by said private right of way described in the first paragraph of the complaint. Then follow allegations as to the ownership by defendant of 40 acres of land south of and adjoining the strip of land of plaintiff, 30 feet wide, as aforesaid; that the land on the north of said roadway is higher, etc., and the land of the defendant is lower, than the roadway; and that, down the slope to and over the roadway, and over the land of defendant, the surface water, which in the rainy season is in large volume, has been accustomed to flow, etc.; that defendant constructed an embankment upon said roadway, and upon his own land adjoining, whereby the surface water was prevented from flowing down, and was penned back on the roadway, rendering it unfit for travel, and destroying all connection by roadway from plaintiff's land to any county or public road, etc. The further allegations in relation to injury, etc., need not be stated. In all the complaint, we fail to find any intimation that the strip of land, and the private right of way thereon, is a public highway, or that the public has any easement or right therein or thereto. The complaint states a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

2. It is further objected by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify or support either the first or ninth findings of fact. These findings are to the effect that the strip of land 30 feet in width was a private right of way for road purposes, held, possessed, and enjoyed by the plaintiff and J. P. Silva, as tenants in common, and that the said roadway so obstructed by defendant was at all times, "and is, a private right of way, and is not a public road or highway, and never has been." The evidence tended to show that in October, 1874, one Henry Curtner, owner of a larger parcel of land, conveyed to plaintiff and his brother, J. P. Silva, a parcel thereof, consisting of 113.57 acres, and also a strip of land 30 feet wide as a right of way, for the purposes of a road extending from the land so conveyed to a public road or highway, which strip of land is accurately described by courses and distances. Plaintiff has succeeded by mesne conveyances to the ownership of the 53 acres of land described in his complaint. In 1887, defendant purchased from said Henry Curtner a tract of, say, 40 acres of land, which is described as "commencing at a point in the southerly line of road, known as the 'Silva Road,'" and running thence along the southerly line of said road, etc., and as being bounded "on the north by said Silva road," etc. Henry Curtner, the former owner, testified as to his sale of the right of way to plaintiff and J. P. Silva, and said he had never conveyed this right of way to the county, or to any person other than the Silvas. He added: "It is, in fact, used by whoever chooses to pass over it, as every one does on private roads,—go through them when they wish,—generally pretty neighborly; * * * we let anybody go through that wishes it; it is an open thoroughfare. I don't shut up my place against no neighbors; there are no gates on it." Question: "Been used by the general public for years past?" Answer: "No, not by the general public, but those who have business in there," etc. Various of the witnesses spoke of the road as a public road or public highway, but generally without stating facts in evidence thereof, except that certain gates thereon had been removed; that the road was fenced, and that parties who have purchased land from Curtner bordering on the road have used it, or portions of it, to get to their land. All this was consistent with the idea of a license from plaintiff, and left the question of a dedication of the way to public use open to further inquiry. "No route of travel used by one or more persons over another's land shall hereafter become a public road or highway by use, or until so declared by the board of supervisors, or by dedication by the owner of the land affected." Pol. Code, § 2621. There is no claim that this road was ever declared a highway by the board of supervisors. It only remains, then, to inquire, did the owners thereof dedicate it to the public use? It is said that "if the donor's acts are such as indicate an intention to appropriate the land to the public use, then, upon acceptance by the public, the dedication becomes complete." Elliott, Roads & S. § 92. The question of intent is paramount, and, unless such intent expressly appears, or can be fairly inferred from the acts of the donor, there is no valid dedication. People v. County of Marin, 103 Cal. 224, 37 Pac. 203. Tested by this rule, the court was justified in finding that the way in question never became or was a public highway, and that it was and is a private way. The findings are ample to support the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

RUDOLPH et al. v. SAUNDERS, Constable.

(No. 19,579.)

ATTACHMENT—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE.

A finding of invalidity of an attachment of growing crops, which can be attached only under Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 5, by leaving with the person having such property in his possession, or under his control, a copy of the writ and a notice that the property is attached, will not be disturbed, the return failing to show that the officer served on defendant in attachment, who was in possession of and had the crops under his control, a copy of the attachment or notice that the property was attached, but merely stating that he attached the property "by taking in my custody," and the officer's testimony that a copy of the attachment and a notice, as required by statute, were served, being contradicted by the defendant in attachment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by John Rudolph and another, partners, as J. & J. C. Rudolph, against J. N. Saunders. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Nichols, for appellant. Grant Jackson, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought by the plaintiffs, as copartners, to recover from the defendant, as constable of township 5, county of Santa Barbara, $521.15, and interest, on account of certain beans levied upon by him under and by virtue of execution. Plaintiffs had judgment for $601.60, interests and costs, from which judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

One James S. McBride was indebted to plaintiffs upon a promissory note in the sum of $521.15, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum from the date thereof, viz. from June 8, 1893, and secured by a chattel mortgage executed by said McBride, under date of June 8, 1893, and duly recorded June 12, 1893. On the 10th day of June, 1893, a writ of attachment duly issued out of justice court, in an action therein pending against said mortgagor, James S. McBride, which writ of attachment was placed in the hands of the defendant as constable for service, and was by him, on said 10th day of June, 1893, either levied, or attempted to be levied, upon the same property covered by plaintiffs' chattel mortgage, to wit, upon about 30 acres of growing beans, upon that portion of the Salsipuedes rancho known as the "James Wells Tract," being farmed to beans by said James S. McBride. If the writ of attachment was properly levied, its lien was prior to that of plaintiffs' mortgage, and the judgment should have been for defendant. If not prior to such mortgage, it became the duty of the defendant, as constable, when thereafter an execution was placed in his hands in the same case, and upon levying on the mortgaged property, to pay off plaintiffs' mortgage, as provided in sections 2968 and 2969 of the Civil Code, and, having failed to do so, the judgment is proper.

The return to the writ of attachment was as follows: "I hereby certify that under and by virtue of the within and hereunto annexed writ of attachment by me received on the 10th day of June, 1893, I did on the 10th day of June, 1893, attach the following described personal property in the possession of James McBride: Thirty acres of beans, more or less, now growing on the Salsipuedes rancho, on the land formerly farmed by James Wells, and attached the same by taking into my custody, and not putting a keeper in charge. J. N. Saunders, Constable." Subdivision 5 of section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "debts and credits, and other personal property, not capable of manual delivery, must be attached by leaving with the person owing such debts, or having in his possession or under his control such credits and other personal property, or with his agent, a copy of the writ and a notice that the debts owing by him to the defendant, or the credits and other personal property in his possession or under his control, belonging to the defendant, are attached in pursuance of such writ." In Raventas v. Green, 57 Cal. 254, it was held that a growing crop is personal property not capable of manual delivery, and may be properly attached, when in the possession of the defendant in the attachment proceedings, by compliance with the subdivision of section 542 quoted above. The return of the constable fails to show that he served upon the defendant any notice that the property was attached, or that he served a copy of the attachment upon him. The return is not as full as that in Brusie v. Gates, 80 Cal. 462, 22 Pac. 284, which was held invalid. It is true that was an attachment upon real property, but the requirement of the statute in reference to a service of copy of the writ and notice is in such a case similar to the requirement in attaching personal property not capable of manual delivery; and the reasoning of that case is applicable to, and conclusive of the insufficiency of, the return in the case at bar. See, also, Watt v. Wright, 66 Cal. 202, 5 Pac. 91; Sharp v. Baird, 43 Cal. 579. Proceedings by attachment are statutory and special, and the provisions of the statute must be strictly followed, or no rights will be acquired thereunder. Gow v. Marshall, 90 Cal. 567, 27 Pac. 422, and cases there cited. It is true the return states that defendant attached the property "by taking in my custody"; but the property, being a growing crop, not capable of manual delivery, could only be attached by service of the writ and a notice as provided by subdivision 4, § 542, Code Civ. Proc.

The return of the constable was insufficient to show a valid levy of the attachment. To remedy this defect, and to show, not in contradiction of the return, but that the requisite acts in addition thereto essential to a valid levy were performed, defendant was permitted to testify, and did testify, that a copy of the attachment and a notice as provided by the statute were served upon McBride, the defendant therein. On the other hand, McBride was called as a witness on the part of plaintiffs, and testified pointedly that no notice of attachment whatever was ever served upon him. The finding of the court below is in favor of the plaintiffs, and, in the face of this marked conflict of evidence, we are not at liberty to disturb such finding. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. THOMPSON. (Cr. 72.)[1]

INDICTMENT—CHARGING OFFENSES CONJUNCTIVELY—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Pen. Code, § 218 (St. 1891, p. 283), making it felony for any person to throw out a switch, etc., with intent to derail any train, or board any train with intent to rob it, etc., an indictment charging defendant with throwing a switch with intent to derail a passenger train, "and" boarding a passenger train with intent to rob the same, and not specifically showing that the two acts were directed against the same train, was not bad for duplicity, it being inferable from the indictment that they were directed against the same train, and the case having been tried on that assumption. Beatty, C. J., and Temple, and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

W. H. Thompson was convicted of train wrecking, and appeals. Affirmed.

Ben. Goodrich, D. K. Trask, and Wm. A. Harris, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. A few years past, the legislature enacted what is popularly known as the "Trainwrecking Act." It is entitled, "An act to add a new section to the Penal Code of the state of California," "to be known as section 218, relating to train wrecking and the punishment thereof"; and the act provides: "Every person who shall unlawfully throw out a switch, remove a rail or place any obstruction on any railroad in the state of California, with the intention of derailing any passenger, freight or other train; or who shall unlawfully board any passenger train with the intention of robbing the same; or who shall unlawfully place any dynamite or other explosive material, or any other obstruction, on the track of any railroad in the state of California with the intention of blowing up or derailing any passenger, freight or other train; or who shall unlawfully set fire to any railroad bridge or trestle, over which any passenger, freight or other train must pass, with the intent of wrecking said train, upon conviction shall be adjudged guilty of felony and shall be punished with death or imprisonment in the state prison for life, at the option of the jury trying the case." St. 1891, p. 283. Defendant Thompson was charged and convicted of violating certain provisions of this act, and sentenced to be hanged. He now brings this appeal from the judgment rendered against him. A demurrer to the information was overruled, and the reversal or affirmance of this judgment is dependent upon the legal soundness of the action of the trial court in that behalf. The material part of the information charged: "The said Kid Thompson, on the 15th day of February, A. D. 1894, at the county and state aforesaid, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously throw out a switch, at Roscoe station, on the railroad known as the Southern Pacific Railroad, with intent then and there to derail a passenger train; and did then and there willfully, unlawfully and feloniously board a passenger train on said railroad, at said station, with intent then and there to rob said passenger train." It is now insisted that the information charges two offenses, and that such duplicity compels a reversal of the judgment. The question presented for solution is not an easy one, and we will at the outset enter into a somewhat detailed analysis of the act here involved. The act is not well drawn. Upon the contrary, it is crude,—entirely too crude to leave the hands of a state legislature, especially when we consider the importance of the legislation with which that body was then dealing. We cite a single instance in illustration of these remarks, and then leave the act with the present Code commission, as furnishing ample material for substantial reconstruction. One clause provides that any person is guilty "who shall unlawfully board any passenger train with the intention of robbing the same." The meaning of the phrase "unlawfully board any passenger train," by reason of its indefiniteness and uncertainty, but serves the purpose of giving work to the lawyers and worry to the courts; but the last part of the clause, to wit, "with the intention of robbing the same" (passenger train), is worse than the first. As to what is meant by robbing a passenger train, we will not now indulge in surmise.

This act arose from the necessity of the times, and was created for the purpose of stopping train wrecking and punishing train wreckers. The act so declares its purpose in terms, and, aside from one clause thereof, such purpose is patent upon the most casual inspection of its provisions. It covers four distinct and separate branches of the subject, to wit: (1) Every person who shall unlawfully throw out a switch, remove a rail, or place any obstruction on any railroad in the state of California, with the intention of derailing any passenger, freight, or other train; (2) who shall unlawfully board any passenger train with the intention of robbing the same; (3) who shall unlawfully place any dynamite or other explosive material, or other obstruction, on the track of any railroad in the state of California, with the intention of blowing up or derailing any passenger, freight, or other train; (4) who shall unlawfully set fire to any railroad bridge or trestle over which any passenger, freight, or other train must pass, with the intent of wrecking said train. The whole tenor and purpose of the act is directed against train wrecking, and this is true as to subdivision 2 equally with all other subdivisions. At first glance, that clause would seem to be directed towards the suppression of the crime of robbery, but the offense of robbery is only incidentally involved, and the prevention of the wrecking of the train, and the consequent and natural results following, of injury and death to the passengers, is its prime purpose. Whatever else the clause means, it imports acts of violence upon the train. It imports, to a more or less degree, the subjection of the employés to the robbers, the menace and duress of the employés, a loss of control of the train by them, fright upon their part, and even death. These things being so, the probabilities of destruction to the train and passengers follow merely as necessarily as such probabilities would follow from the misplacing of a switch or the removal of a rail. Hence we say that every part and clause of the act is directed towards the suppression of train wrecking.

Does the information charge two offenses? In other words, may the prosecution charge the defendant with the four distinct acts, to wit, throwing out a switch, with the intention of derailing a passenger train; unlawfully boarding the said passenger train, with the intention of robbing the same; placing dynamite upon the track, with the intention of blowing up the said train; and setting fire to a bridge over which said train must pass, with the intent of wrecking said train. In the present case, the defendant is charged with but two of these acts, and it naturally and ordinarily follows, in statutes similar to this one, that if more than one of the acts may be charged, all or any number less than all may be charged. We think this information is not susceptible to the charge of duplicity, and base our conclusion upon the general principle declared in Bishop's New Criminal Procedure (section 436): "A statute often makes punishable the doing of one thing, or another, or another, sometimes thus specifying a considerable number of things. Then, by proper and ordinary construction, a person who in one transaction does all violates the statute but once, and incurs only one penalty. Yet he violates it equally by doing one of the things. Therefore, the indictment on such a statute may allege in a single count that the defendant did as many of the forbidden things as the pleader chooses, employing the conjunction 'and' where the statute has 'or,' and it will not be double, and it will be established at the trial by proof of any one of them." This principle of law is universally recognized as sound, and the application of it to the facts of this case presents the only point of difficulty. If persons, for the purpose of wrecking a certain passenger train, should (1) throw out a switch, (2) place dynamite upon the track, (3) burn a bridge over which the train must pass, it would not be an open question but that those acts could be properly charged in one information, and the proof of any of them support a judgment of conviction; and the reasons why the legal soundness of such a pleading is so apparent would be because the three acts charged were forbidden by the same provision of law, because they were all directed towards one certain passenger train, and because all were done for the purpose of wrecking that train, and thus done as part of one and the same transaction. But when we come to consider clause No. 2, as to boarding a passenger train with the intention of robbing the same, we meet with more difficulty; for there the intention with which the act of boarding is done is to rob, and not to wreck. Yet, as we have already said, the intention of robbery carries with it the probable result of wrecking, and it was the wrecking and not the robbing that the act was primarily aimed to prevent. If the act had said boarding the train with the intention of wrecking it, instead of boarding it with the intention of robbing it, the entire act would have been in perfect harmony, and clearly the four specific acts could have been joined in the one charge as one offense. And we think that the mere fact that the boarding of the train is done with the specific intent of robbery, a different intent from that accompanying the other acts specified, is not sufficient to take it out of the rule we have quoted from Mr. Bishop. We hold it is not necessary that the acts coupled together should all be required by the statute to be done with the same intent, before they may be joined as one offense. This act is essentially one to prevent train wrecking. The lawmaking power concluded that certain acts, done with certain intents, would result in the wrecking of trains. That body, in effect, created a new crime, known as "train wrecking," and declared it a felony. While in terms it did not give such name to these acts, yet the statute taken altogether fully supports that construction; and if such be its construction, we think but one result can follow, and that is the validity of the information here involved. If the lawmaking power should declare that every person who unlawfully removes a rail from a railroad track, or burns a railroad bridge, or places dynamite upon the track, or turns a switch, or forces the employés of the train to leave their posts of duty, or kills the engineer, or gags and binds the conductor of the train, shall be guilty of a felony known as "train wrecking," we are clear that one or two, or all of these acts, if directed towards the same train and in the same transaction, could be, and if the facts shown justified it, should be, charged in one information as one offense. It should be so charged, for such form of information would thus limit the rascal's opportunity of escape from the clutches of the law to the smallest possible compass. In this illustration we have a series of acts prohibited, without mention by the statute of any specific intent in the doing of any of them; yet, if committed, they would constitute a felony. It is thus observable, from what we have said, that a series of prohibited acts may be joined together and charged as one offense, where the statute fixes the same specific intent in the doing of all of them; and, further, that they may be joined when the statute specifies no specific intent for the doing of any of them. And there is no reason in principle why the rule should be different when some of the acts prohibited by the statute must be done with a certain specific intent, and the others with no specific intent; or where some of the acts must be done with a certain specific intent, and others with a different specific intent. The question of intent with which the prohibited acts are done does not furnish the test by which the charge of duplicity in pleading is determined. We think that the boarding of the train, if done with a different intent than the act of burning the bridge or removing a rail, does not prevent the application of the principle laid down by Mr. Bishop. The specific intent or intention mentioned in the statute is an essential and material part of the felony. It is but a part of the description of the offense. It is just as essential to make out the felony as the doing of the abstract act, and the act and intention must be joined or there is no offense. Hence, it follows that the acts of themselves may be perfectly harmless, or they may constitute other offenses, but they are only enjoined by this statute when coupled with certain specific intents. As illustrative of this matter of intention: In Angel v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 231, defendant was charged under a statute with unlawfully shooting, "with the intention to maim, disfigure, disable and kill," and a conviction was sustained.

As supporting generally the information here under consideration, against the charge of duplicity, we cite Hinkle v. Com., 4 Dana, 518. Defendant was there charged under a statute with having "set up and kept a gaming table, and induced others to bet at it." The court said: "Although the setting up of a gaming table may alone be an indictable offense, the keeping of such table and the inducing of any person to bet upon it, another, when each shall have been committed by different persons or at different times, nevertheless, as they are co-operative acts, constituting altogether one offense when committed by the same person at the same time, an indictment for that combined act in violation of law may properly charge the whole in one count, and but one punishment can be inflicted, as for one offense." In Com. v. Miller, 107 Pa. St. 276, an indictment was sustained charging a forcible entry and detainer. In State v. Murphy, 47 Mo. 274, an indictment was sustained charging "the keeping open a tippling shop and grocery, and selling to divers persons intoxicating liquors on the first day of the week." The court said: "When a statute in one clause forbids several things, or creates several offenses in the alternative, which are not repugnant in their nature or penalty, the clause is treated in pleadings as though it created but one offense; and they may all be united conjunctively in one count, and the count is sustained by proof of one of the offenses charged." In State v. Cooster, 10 Iowa, 454, an indictment was sustained charging the defendant with keeping a gambling house and permitting other persons in a place under the control of defendant to play for money and other things. The court said: "The objection has its origin in the idea that there is such a difference in the essential qualities of these two acts as to make them separate offenses. But is this true? They are found in the disjunctive clause of the same section of the Code, visited with the same penalty, and it is the better opinion that in their essence they are one and the same offense, the guilt of which may be incurred in one or other of these methods." In State v. Nelson, 29 Me. 329, an indictment was sustained charging defendant "with buying, receiving, and aiding in concealing stolen goods, knowing the same to have been stolen." To the same effect is Stevens v. Com., 6 Metc. (Mass.) 241, where the court said: "There is but one count in which the defendant is charged, and there is but one offense with which he is charged. It is made but one offense by the statute, although, according to the language used, it may be committed in one of three modes,—that is, by buying, receiving, or aiding in the concealment of stolen goods. Whether charged to be done in one, two, or all three of the modes mentioned, it is still but one offense, and the general finding of the jury is that the offense was committed as charged." In Wingard v. State, 13 Ga. 396, an indictment was sustained charging that certain defendants "did play and bet with cards for money at a game of poker, whist, faro, seven-up, three-up, and other games played with cards." It will be noticed that in the cases we have cited the various acts are charged in one and the same count of the indictment. The authorities of our own state go to the full length of those cited from sister states. In People v. De La Guerra, 31 Cal. 459, a case involving a statute which declared it a felony for certain county officers to issue, have in their possession with intent to circulate, or put in circulation, certain licenses, it was charged that the defendant had in his possession, with intent to circulate, and did actually put in circulation, one of these licenses. The court upheld the indictment against the charge of duplicity, and reversed the judgment. Here one of the acts was done with a certain specific intent, and the other was done without any specific intent whatever. Various violations of the gaming statute may be charged in one indictment. People v. Gosset, 93 Cal. 641, 29 Pac. 246. It is conceded that under the act declaring who are vagrants, and prescribing the punishment therefor, the entire series of acts there laid down may be charged in one complaint. Ex parte McCarthy, 72 Cal. 384, 14 Pac. 96. This is so though the act mentions no such offense as vagrancy, and it might be suggested that in nearly all of the statutes from which we have quoted like the case at bar the offense is given no technical name. In People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 513, the defendant was charged with falsely making a draft and also with passing the draft knowing it to be forged, and the indictment was sustained. Such an indictment would be good, even though the false making was done upon one day and the passing was done months subsequent thereto, and even though the false making was done with intent to defraud A., and the passing was done with intent to defraud B. People v. Harrold, 84 Cal. 567, 24 Pac. 106.

The information in this case is clumsily drawn in this: that it is not directly and specifically shown that it was the same passenger train towards which the two unlawful acts charged against defendant were directed. But we think such fact fairly inferable from the pleading, and the entire record indicates the case to have been tried upon such assumption. Indeed, appellant's counsel make no point that the information is defective in this respect. The further point is made that there can be no such thing as robbing a passenger train, and that the statute in that regard is meaningless. "Robbing a store," "robbing a safe," and "robbing a train" are every-day, ordinary, and common expressions. Very possibly it is in this sense that the legislature used the verb "rob," and not in connection with the technical meaning of the offense of robbery. But, aside from this, the trial court told the jury what constituted robbing a train, and no complaint is here made that such instruction as to the law was not sound. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; HARRISON, J.

TEMPLE, J. I dissent from the conclusion reached by the court in this case. The charging part of the information is that defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously throw out a switch at Roscoe station * * * with intent then and there to derail a passenger train, and did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously board a passenger train on said railroad at said station, with intent then and there to rob said passenger train." Defendant demurred on several grounds, one of which was that the information charges more than one offense, to wit, (1) throwing out a switch with intent to derail a passenger train, and (2) boarding a passenger train with intent to rob the same. Both these acts are charged in the information, and, except by the use of the words "then and there," it is not shown that the two acts have any reference to each other. It does not appear that any train was derailed, or that if so it was derailed that defendant might board it, nor that he boarded it that he might derail it; nor is it charged that the acts were in pursuance of a common intent, as to wreck the train. In fact, it does not appear that he boarded the same train that he attempted to derail. In no way is it shown that the acts charged were a part of the same transaction. To derail a train may be one mode of wrecking a train, but to board a train for the purpose of robbing it cannot, in the nature of things, be either a mode or the means of wrecking it. Besides, the allegations of an information must be such that, if true, the guilt of the defendant inevitably follows. It must negative the possibility of innocence. That the defendant is guilty of any act which would tend to the wrecking of a train is not shown, for he is charged to have boarded the train for the purpose of robbing it while it was standing at a station, or sidetracked waiting for its right of way, and when no engine was attached to it. If it was intended to charge an act which was liable to cause the wrecking of the train, all such possibilities should be negatived. As long ago as 1865 this court considered the question as to what charges may be joined in an indictment. In People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394, it was said, quoting from Wharton: "Where a statute makes two or more distinct acts connected with the same transaction indictable, each one of which may be considered as representing a stage in the offense, it has in many cases been ruled that they may be coupled in one count." It has been held that where an offense consists of various acts which may be said to constitute different phases or ingredients of an offense, or, as is said in the above quotation, different stages in its commission, the legislature may provide that the commission of any one of these acts shall constitute the offense. In such case they may be joined, and proof of any one act will justify a verdict of guilty. Further than this, in my opinion, the rule relied upon to uphold this information has never been carried in any well-considered case. In considering authorities from other states, it must be borne in mind that our statute expressly provides that the indictment or information shall charge but one offense (Pen. Code, § 954), while elsewhere different offenses may be joined, provided they are charged in different counts and they are of the same general character and the mode of trial the same. Whart. Cr. Pl. § 285. The only authorities from other states, therefore, which will be of value here, are those referring to the joinder of different offenses in the same count. One point made on this appeal by the defendant is that robbing a train means nothing, and therefore the charge is not of an offense. In the leading opinion it is said: "As to what is meant by robbing a passenger train we will not now indulge in surmise." Yet the defendant has been convicted of robbing a passenger train, and sentenced to be hanged. He appeals to this court, as was his right, and makes the point that it is not a public offense. The court below instructed the jury that, "if they believed from the evidence that defendant boarded an express car in a passenger train on the Southern Pacific Railroad at Roscoe station in said county, and by force and violence, or by putting in fear of some injury to the person of the messenger in charge of said car, did rob, steal, and carry away any money of any value then in custody or in the control of said messenger, then the jury should find the defendant guilty." How can this court affirm the judgment on such an appeal, without determining what robbing a passenger train means, and that it means just what the trial court said it did?

HENSHAW, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE. To what he has said it may be added that there is involved in this dissent no doubt of the power of the legislature to pass the statute under review, nor any doubt of the validity of the statute as a penal law. The legislature might by a single enactment provide, for example, that every person who commits a murder, every person who commits treason against the state, every person who bears false witness against another by means of which that other loses his life, upon conviction shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be punished with death. Such a law would violate no rule applicable to the enactment or interpretation of penal statutes. These offenses are all now punishable by death; yet would any one assert that under a system of criminal pleading such as ours, which commands that the indictment shall charge but one offense, these acts or any two of them might be charged in one indictment? With deference to the reasoning of the prevailing opinion, I think, until it became the law of the state, he would have been deemed a rash advocate who would have dared so to argue. And the reason is not far to seek. Such a law, though cast in one enactment, declares against several separate and distinct crimes. Is it less plain that the act under consideration does the same thing? Where a statute makes penal a single act done with one of several unlawful intents,—as the derailing of a train for the purpose of injuring property, or for the purpose of larceny, or for the purpose of killing or maiming its passengers (People v. Milne, 60 Cal. 71),—or where it enumerates a series of acts done with a single unlawful purpose, either of which acts separately, or all of which together constitute but the one offense, as making, altering, uttering, passing, or attempting to pass a forged and counterfeit instrument (People v. Ah Wo, 28 Cal. 205), an indictment charging the single act with the multifarious purposes, or the several acts with the single purpose, is not objectionable. This is as far as the rule goes; and from the illustrations which Mr. Bishop gives to support his text, it is as far as the learned author ever meant to be understood as carrying it. He says, in explanation of his statement quoted in the prevailing opinion: "'Thus, where the statute forbids the unlicensed sale of, for example, rum, brandy, whisky, or gin, the interpretation is that the offense may be committed by selling any one or two of the specified liquors, or all of them; and, whichever is done, in one transaction, there is but one crime. So it is not ill to charge in one count that the defendant did offer to sell and suffer to be sold intoxicating liquor. Under a statute the words of which are 'shall willfully destroy, deface, or injure,' etc., one may be charged with 'destroying, defacing, and injuring' a register. Under a statute to punish one who 'utters or passes, or tenders in payment as true,' any counterfeit money, it may be charged that the defendant 'did utter and pass as true,' etc. A statute made punishable anyone who 'shall sell or offer for sale' any lottery ticket, and it was adjudged not double to charge that the defendant did 'unlawfully offer for sale and did unlawfully sell' a lottery ticket." After having given these examples, the author is careful to point out that "the natures of the offense and of the act should be considered in determining whether or not a charge is double." 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc., § 437, and notes. It is no answer to the contention that boarding a train for the purpose of robbery is a distinct offense from derailing it to say that the unlawful boarding may tend to derail it. Even a man accused of crime is only chargeable with the natural consequences of his act, and the legislature itself may not declare that to be a natural consequence which in fact is not. But, indeed, in this case it is not the legislature, but this court, which has done so. The legislature has said only that for his attempted robbery he is guilty of a felony; this decision in effect says that he must be presumed to have intended that his robbery should result in train wrecking. Yet the defendant might have entered the train for purposes of secret theft. He might have entered undetected, and have escaped in like manner. It might have been furthest from his thoughts to disturb any person upon the train. It might have been his earnest wish and active endeavor to prevent the train from being wrecked or derailed while he was on it, since in that event he must share the common peril of the others. Still, for doing what he did he would have violated this law, and his conviction under it would be justified. Yet, can it be said that his act was "train wrecking," or had anything in common with the other acts and offenses enumerated in the statute? His acts do not import violence. And it is a part of common reading that when acts of violence are committed by robbers who are themselves upon a train, in consideration of their own safety they first bring it to a standstill that it may not be wrecked. Nor can I perceive that it would have relieved the embarrassment which seems to have been felt in interpreting this statute if the legislature had in fact designated the acts as "train wrecking." Plenary are the powers of that body. Its ipse dixit may create a crime, but there is no such magic in a name as will enable even the legislature to make robbery or rape or perjury "train wrecking," merely because it calls them that. If, in the instance above cited, the legislature had said that every person who commits murder, treason, or perjury which costs another his life shall be guilty of the unpardonable crime, and on conviction shall suffer death, a common name would thus have been conferred upon three distinct offenses. Could they for that reason have been charged in one indictment? The suggestion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE that it is incumbent upon this court to define what is meant by "robbing a train" is subsequently treated in the last paragraph of the opinion. But even by it the phrase is given no interpretation. It is suggested merely that "very possibly" the legislature intended to use the word "rob," not as it used it in creating and defining the crime of robbery, but as a mere colloquialism; and it is said that "robbing a store" and "robbing a safe" are every-day, ordinary, and common expressions. But would an indictment charging a man with robbing a store be upheld? And, if so, what is the definition of the offense? This is the precise question which the defendant in this case puts when he argues that there is no such crime known to the law as robbing a train; and if there be, he asks this court to define it and say whether it means burglary or larceny of goods in a train, or the robbery of some person upon the train. It would seem that a defendant situated as is this one, under a sentence of death, and appealing to this court, as is his right, for an interpretation of the law under which he is to be hanged, sentenced under a law which now for the first time is before the court for construction, is entitled to a forthright answer rather than to a mere conjecture as to what may or may not have been in the legislative mind. Nor is it an answer to say that he is foreclosed because he took no exception to the trial court's instruction upon the question. He is here within his right in asking the court of last resort to define the law, and it seems hardly to fill the measure of his just demand to tell him that he did not object in another forum to a definition given by somebody else. Moreover, it was not incumbent upon the defendant to take any formal objection and exception to the instructions. His rights in that regard are fully preserved by section 1176 of the Penal Code, which provides: "When written charges have been presented, given or refused, or when the charges have been taken down by the reporter, the questions presented in such charges need not be excepted to or embodied in a bill of exceptions, but the written charges of the report, with the indorsement showing the action of the court, form part of the record, and any error in the decision of the court thereon may be taken advantage of on appeal, in like manner as if presented in a bill of exceptions." And when a defendant urges upon this court that the offense with which he is charged is not one known to the law, how can it be said that he is not objecting to instructions which purport to define the offense? The prevailing opinion may be taken, as deciding, against defendant's contention, that there is such a crime as "robbing a train," but whether that crime be the one defined by the instructions, or some other, appellant is not told.

To the further defect in the indictment which Mr. Justice TEMPLE points out, namely, that it does not even appear that the attempt to rob and attempt to wreck were directed against the same train, it is answered, not that the pleading does so show, but that it is fairly inferable therefrom, and that the record discloses that the case was tried upon that theory. But this defendant is demurring to the indictment, and an absence of necessary averment is conceded. Is its absence to be supplied by an inference? Then it is not necessary, even against demurrer, to charge that a defendant committed a crime; it is sufficient to plead circumstances from which it may be inferred that he committed a crime. This hearing is on demurrer only. What difference can it make to a logical decision of the question to say that the case was tried upon one or another theory? When the defendant's demurrer was overruled, there was nothing for him to do but to submit to a trial upon any theory which met the views of the prosecution and judge. But if the prevailing opinion looks for support to the trial of the cause, there can be no objection to scanning the record. The state of things there disclosed shows what the trial court believed to be the scope of the indictment, proves that the defendant was in fact tried upon two (if not three or four) distinct and separate offenses, and demonstrates the vice of the ruling which upholds this pleading. With the instructions, as declarations of principles of law, no fault need be found; but as dealing with a single crime they are anomalous in the history of the criminal jurisprudence of this state. The jury is instructed (1) that if defendant threw out a switch with intent to derail a passenger train, he is guilty; (2) if he unlawfully boarded a passenger train with intent to rob said passenger train, he is guilty (it is not charged to be the same train as that he attempted to derail); (3) if he boarded an express train at Roscoe station, and by force and violence, or by putting in fear the messenger, robbed and stole money in his custody, he is guilty; (4) if defendant abetted one Johnson in derailing a train, whereby one Masters was killed, then he is guilty. Here there are instructions touching train wrecking, and an attempt at train wrecking, boarding a train with intent to rob it, robbery of a messenger upon the train, and murder. The indictment, double as it is, charges no more than the throwing of a switch with intent to derail a passenger train, and the unlawful boarding of a passenger train at a station with intent to rob it. These instructions are addressed to evidence admitted under the indictment. But can it be said that they are applicable to a single crime, or to a series of acts having in view a single purpose? I am convinced that it can not.

I concur: BEATTY, C. J.

In re HATHAWAY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 376.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 18, 1896.)

APPEALABLE JUDGMENTS — REVOKING APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM — DISMISSAL OF PETITION FOR REVOCATION OF PROBATE OF WILL.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, authorizing an appeal from a judgment or order revoking "letters" of guardianship, refers to the guardianship of the person or estate of a minor, or of an insane or incompetent person, for which provision is made in part 3, tit. 11, c. 14, and does not apply to an order appointing a guardian ad litem under section 372.

2. Though Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, authorizes an appeal from an order revoking the probate of a will, it does not authorize an appeal from an order denying such revocation, or dismissing a petition for such revocation.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Petition by Charles W. Barrow, guardian ad litem of Harriet Coleman Barrow, an incompetent person, for the revocation of the probate of the will of Anna M. Hathaway, deceased. From a judgment granting a motion to vacate and set aside the order appointing such guardian ad litem, and to strike out and dismiss such petition, the guardian ad litem appeals. Dismissed.

Wm. T. Baggett and Walter H. Linforth, for appellant. E. J. Pringle, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss the appeal. The last will and testament of Anna M. Hathaway was admitted to probate in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco in January, 1895, and thereafter, viz., June 21, 1895, upon his application therefor, Charles W. Barrow was appointed by one of the judges of said court guardian ad litem of Harriet Coleman Barrow, an incompetent person, claiming to be the heir at law of the deceased, and on the same day a petition was filed in said court in her name by her said guardian for the revocation of the probate of said will. Upon notice therefor to said guardian ad litem, a motion was made to said court to vacate and set aside the order appointing him as said guardian ad litem, and to strike out and dismiss the petition filed by him for a revocation of the probate of said will. This motion was heard upon affidavits filed on behalf of the respective parties, and on the 7th of September the court made an order granting the motion. From this order the guardian ad litem appealed to this court, and a motion is now made on behalf of the executor to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the order is not appealable. The provision in section 963, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc., authorizing an appeal "from a judgment or order * * * revoking letters of guardianship," refers to the guardianship of the person or estate of a minor, or of an insane or incompetent person, for which provision is made in chapter 14, tit. 11, pt. 3, Code Civ. Proc., and does not include an order appointing a guardian ad litem to represent the infant or incompetent person, authorized by section 372. No letters of guardianship are issued to a guardian ad litem, but his authority is evidenced by the entry in the minutes of the court appointing him. He is appointed by the court in which the action is pending in each case, and his removal, as well as his appointment, is under the control of the court in which the case is pending. If an appeal could be taken from the order removing him, it could with equal reason be taken from the order appointing him, and the very purpose of the appointment would be frustrated. Neither is that portion of the order striking out and dismissing the petition for the revocation of the probate the subject of an appeal. This court has appellate jurisdiction in such probate matters only as may be provided by law; and while section 963, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes an appeal from an order revoking the probate of a will, it does not authorize an appeal from an order denying the revocation of the probate of a will, or from an order dismissing a petition therefor. Estate of Sbarboro, 70 Cal. 147, 11 Pac. 563. See, also, Estate of Montgomery, 55 Cal. 210; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 Pac. 174; Estate of Ohm, 82 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 927. The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

YOUNGLOVE v. CUNNINGHAM. (S. F. 264.)

Action on Note—Complaint—Frivolous Appeal—Damages.

1. In an action on a note the complaint need not specially aver a consideration.

2. Where an appeal appears to be frivolous, a mere oral assurance in argument, that it was taken in good faith, is insufficient to avoid the imposition of damages, but such assurance must find some support in the record.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by Dwight Younglove against James F. Cunningham on a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Spalsbury & Burke, for appellant. Z. N. Goldsby, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action upon a promissory note. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant appeals therefrom upon the judgment roll. The single point made in support of the appeal is that the lower court erred in overruling a general demurrer to the complaint, the contention being that there is no averment in the complaint of a consideration for the execution of the note, and that hence there is a failure to state a cause of action. There is nothing whatsoever of merit in the point. It is not essential to the statement of a cause of action founded upon a contract in writing to specially aver a consideration. The writing imports a consideration (Civ. Code, § 1614), and the presumption thus arising is one of law, which is not required to be averred (Henke v. Association, 100 Cal. 429, 34 Pac. 1089). Appellant in fact conceded at the oral argument that his contention was untenable, but, in response to the demand made by respondent for damages as for a frivolous appeal, urged that when the appeal was taken it was taken in good faith, and in the honest conviction that the point involved error. This assurance should come from the record, or at least find some semblance of support therein, which the record before us entirely fails to furnish. A party cannot be permitted to avoid the consequences of a wholly groundless appeal by indulging himself in a mere unsubstantial belief that there is merit in his case, when the slightest investigation would have assured him to the contrary. Such excuse, if held good, would require us to recall every penalty ever imposed in a like case. The judgment is affirmed, with $100 damages, to be recovered by respondent as a part of his costs of the appeal.

HUNTER v. HUNTER. (No. 19,555.)

DIVORCE—SUMMONS BY PUBLICATION—EX PARTE PROCEEDING—DECREE—AFFIDAVIT—ESTOPPEL—PRESUMPTION—ALIMONY.

1. A woman was twice married, and, having heard that her first husband was living, began proceedings to obtain a divorce from him. The proceedings were ex parte, defendant having been served with summons by publication, and a decree was entered as prayed. Held, that the proceedings were strictly in rem, and determined only that plaintiff was no longer the wife of defendant, and did not determine that defendant was then living, and that she was his wife at the time of entering the decree.

2. The affidavit of plaintiff in such case, that she was the wife of defendant at the time of her subsequent marriage to another, does not estop her from denying such fact in an action by her second husband to annul the second marriage.

3. In divorce by the second husband it will be presumed that the first husband was dead at the time of the wife's second marriage, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, presuming a person innocent of crime or wrong, and the burden of proof is on the party asserting the negative.

4. The allowance of alimony is an incident to an action for divorce, and the determination as to its allowance is not the trial of an issue in the case.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinleys, Judge.

Action by Jesse Hunter against Jane Elizabeth Hunter or Milam to annul a marriage between the parties. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Knight, Simpson & Harpham, for appellant. S. A. W. Carver, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. The action was brought to annul a marriage between the parties, entered into on the 3d day of July, 1862, upon the ground that defendant had another husband, to wit, Joseph Milam. It is now conceded that defendant was married to Joseph Milam in February, 1858, when defendant was but 15 years of age; that she lived with Milam as his wife for 10 days, when she was taken away by her parents, and went to Salt Lake. It does not appear how long she was absent from San Bernardino, but it could not have been a very long time, for she testified that she lived at San Bernardino, after her marriage to Milam, about 4½ years, when she married plaintiff. Only about that period elapsed between her first and second marriages. She testified that Milam left a few days after her marriage to him, and she had heard nothing of him since. Plaintiff and defendant lived together as husband and wife at Los Angeles for about 22 years, when, as defendant testified, she was told by her nephew, who lived in Arizona, that he had met a brother of Joseph Milam, who said Joseph Milam was living at Walla Walla. This is all she has ever heard in regard to Milam since he left San Bernardino. She then commenced an action against Joseph Milam to secure a divorce. In her verified complaint, filed December 21, 1883, she describes herself as Jane Elizabeth Milam, and states that plaintiff and defendant were married in February, 1858, and ever since have been, and now are, husband and wife, and that defendant resides out of the state of California. On the same day she made and presented to the court her affidavit to procure the publication of summons, in which she stated that defendant resides out of the state, that his last residence within the state was in Pajaro, in Santa Cruz county; that through knowledge derived from his brother she believes he resides at Walla Walla, in Washington territory. Such proceedings were had in the action that on the 29th day of March, 1894, a decree was entered dissolving the marriage between Joseph Milam and the defendant, plaintiff in that action. Certain findings were also filed, and purport to constitute part of the judgment roll, but, as there were no issues to try, and judgment was entered on default, express findings were unauthorized, and add nothing to the necessary adjudication. Subsequently defendant commenced an action against the plaintiff to have her marriage with him declared void on the same ground on which plaintiff now seeks relief, to wit, that at the time of her marriage with him her first husband, Joseph Milam, was living, and she had not been divorced from him. The complaint in that suit was also verified. The action was finally dismissed by her before it came to judgment. Two of plaintiff's brothers testified that at the time the parties to this action were married they heard travelers say the man defendant married was still living there (San Bernardino). It is, however, pretty certain that he was not then living at San Bernardino. This is all the evidence contained in the record upon this subject.

It is contended, first, that the judgment in the divorce suit is conclusive upon defendant that she was divorced from Milam; that is, that Milam was then alive, and that until the decree was entered she was his wife. But this adjudication as such did not bind Milam. He was not served with summons, and was without the state, and the action was therefore strictly in rem. "No sovereignty," says Story, Confl. Laws, § 539, "can extend its process beyond its own territorial limits to subject either persons or property to its judicial decisions." The res before the court was the status of the plaintiff in the divorce suit. No service of summons being had, it was not an action inter partes, but a proceeding affecting only the status of the wife. "It did not establish, but recognized and presupposed, the relation of husband and wife as previously existing." Burlen v. Shannon, 3 Gray, 387. It was conclusive against all the world that the plaintiff in that suit was no longer the wife of Joseph Milam, and it was an adjudication of nothing else. No one would claim that Milam would be estopped by the decree to deny that he had ever been married to defendant, or, had he remarried and had children, that the decree would be evidence of their bastardy. Milam may have been previously divorced, and in such case there would be two valid decrees, which, on the theory that they constituted an adjudication of marriage at the time of the divorce, conclusive against the world, would contradict each other, and yet both be binding on all the world. See, on this point, Gill v. Read, 5 R. I. 343; Gouraud v. Gouraud, 3 Redf. Sur. 262; Freem. Judgm. 154. But since the court had jurisdiction to declare the status of Mrs. Milam as affected by an assumed marriage with Joseph Milam, and did adjudge that she was no longer the wife of Joseph Milam, it would follow that he could no longer be her husband. He was thus affected by the judgment as he would have been by the death of his wife, and this resulted simply from the fact that the status of his wife was changed. So far, and no further, the judgment bound him and all the world. That being so, it must follow that as an adjudication it bound her no further. Had she borne children to Hunter, the judgment would have estopped neither such children nor her to deny that she was the wife of Milam when she married Hunter.

It is further contended that her affidavits are conclusive evidence against her. Three times she stated under oath that she was the wife of Milam when she was married to Hunter. This is very strong testimony against her, but is only strong evidence. It is not an estoppel. She went upon the stand as a witness for herself, and explained that she made those affidavits upon the strength of a rumor she heard. This was all she had heard. The court found in her favor, and must have believed her statement. The statements made by plaintiff's brother do not show that Milam had been heard from, and if defendant's testimony was true, such statements must have been unfounded. The court could well find that there was no authentic information to the effect that Milam was alive.

But it is said the marriage of the parties to this suit took place only about 4½ years after the marriage to Milam, and it will be presumed that Milam was alive, in the absence of proof to the contrary. There was no proof tending to show that Milam was dead, or that his chance for life was below the average; therefore it is contended the court should have found that he was alive. This presumption of the continuation of life is, however, overcome by another. It is presumed that a person is innocent of crime or wrong. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. There is also a presumption, and a very strong one, in favor of the legality of a marriage regularly solemnized. Rather than hold a second marriage invalid, and that the parties have committed a crime or been guilty of immorality, the courts have often indulged in the presumption of death in less than seven years; or, where the absent party was shown to be alive, have allowed a presumption that the absent party has procured a divorce. A more correct statement perhaps would be that the burden is cast upon the party asserting guilt or immorality to prove the negative,—that the first marriage had not ended before the second marriage. A few cases will best illustrate the rule. Rex v. Inhabitants of Twyning, 2 Barn. & Ald. 386, was a question as to a settlement, which depended upon the validity of a second marriage of Mary Burns. She was a pauper, and married about 12 months after her husband had enlisted as a soldier in foreign service. The second marriage was held good. The court said: "The law presumes the continuation of life, but it also presumes against the commission of crimes, and that even in civil cases, until the contrary is proved." This was the question in Rex v. Inhabitants of Harborne, 2 Adol. & E. 540. It was said that there was no absolute presumption, but that it was a question for the jury to determine under the circumstances of the case, and a verdict convicting a defendant of bigamy was upheld on proof that the husband was alive 25 days before the second marriage. See, also, Reg. v. Lumley, L. R. 1 C. C. 196. Murray v. Murray, 6 Or. 1, involved the legitimacy of the children of a second marriage. It was held that the presumption of innocence should be preferred, but the presumption was not absolute, and the question would depend upon the special circumstances of the case. In Lockhart v. White, 18 Tex. 102, Mrs. Waggoner had been separated from her husband about five years. One witness had heard of him since the separation. The court said: "There is no evidence that Waggoner had been heard of within twelve months (though that exact time is not necessary to raise a favorable presumption) prior to the marriage with Allsbrooks, and under the rule established in the above case the continuance of the life of Waggoner will not be presumed. The second marriage was consequently lawful and valid." It was also said that the presumption of the continuance of life was weaker, and must yield to the presumption of innocence. Sharp v. Johnson, 22 Ark. 79, was a case involving a question of heirship depending upon legitimacy. This depended upon the validity of a marriage. The court refused an instruction to the effect that the former wife, if alive within five years before the last marriage, was presumed to be still alive. The ruling was affirmed, and the court quoted from Mathews on Presumptive Evidence: "A charge of an act of immorality, or of disobedience of a positive law, will not be received unless supported by direct evidence. Circumstances showing probability merely are not enough; the fact averred must be conclusively proved." Klein v. Laudman, 29 Mo. 259, was an action of slander, and a similar ruling was made. Spears v. Burton, 31 Miss. 547, involved the question of legitimacy, and it was held that the presumption of continuance of life would not establish a crime, even in a civil case. To the same effect is Town of Greensborough v. Town of Underhill, 12 Vt. 604. The question in that case was as to settlement. Schmisseur v. Beatrie, 147 Ill. 210, 35 N. E. 525, was a case involving the question of legitimacy. It was proven that an absent husband was alive at the time of the marriage, and the court held that in favor of this second marriage it would presume that the absent party had obtained a divorce, and that the burden of proving that such divorce had not been obtained was on the party alleging the invalidity of the second. It is said that a contrary doctrine is established in People v. Stokes, 71 Cal. 263, 12 Pac. 71. This precise point was not there discussed, although it was raised. The court contented itself with asserting the general proposition, which no one disputes, that the presumption of life continues for seven years. The fact that there were conflicting presumptions must have escaped the attention of the court, otherwise the case is in conflict with all the cases upon the subject and with all the text-books. We cannot hold that this long line of decisions, in which there is no break, has been overruled by a case in which the point was not discussed.

The court found for the defendant upon all points, notwithstanding the fact that owing to her former statements under oath her testimony was justly subject to grave suspicion. If her explanation of the former affidavits was true, I think it sufficient. We cannot reverse the judgment for insufficiency of the evidence.

As the appeal from the judgment was taken too late, we cannot consider the objections to the allowance of alimony. A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial. The allowance of alimony is an incident to an action for a divorce, and, although the determination as to its allowance may involve a controversy as to facts, such determination is not the trial of an issue in the case. It may be before or after trial. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

LORBEER v. HUTCHINSON et al.

CERTIORARI—REMOVAL AND APPOINTMENT OF OFFICER.

Certiorari does not lie to review the action of the board of trustees of a city declaring vacant the office of city marshal, and appointing a person to fill the same.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Certiorari by J. W. Lorbeer against E. H. Hutchinson and others to set aside and annul the action of the board of trustees of the city of Pomona declaring vacant the office of city marshal, and in appointing to the vacancy Thomas B. Atkinson. From the judgment rendered, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Edwin A. Meserve and C. E. Sumner, for appellants. Tonner & Fleming and A. W. Hutton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county in a proceeding by certiorari to set aside and annul the action of the board of trustees of the city of Pomona declaring vacant the office of city marshal on the 18th day of June, 1895, and in electing and appointing to the vacancy Thomas B. Atkinson. The writ may be issued when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board or officer (section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.); and the review cannot be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board, or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board, or officer (section 1074, Id.). The appointment of a city marshal by the council of Pomona was not a judicial act, and cannot be reviewed by certiorari. People v. Bush, 40 Cal. 344. If Lorbeer was lawfully in office, the trustees could not, by declaring the office vacant, deprive him of his office. They have no power to remove from office or by any judicial inquiry to declare a vacancy. If Lorbeer failed to qualify, the office was vacant; and the trustees, on being informed of the fact, could appoint some one to fill the office. They got such information just as the governor and other executive officers obtain similar information. The failure to qualify—if he did so fail—ipso facto created a vacancy. People v. Shorb, 100 Cal. 537, 35 Pac. 163. In such case the board could fill the vacancy without declaring a vacancy. So declaring was a part of the order appointing, and does not indicate a judicial inquiry and determination. The superior court, therefore, erroneously issued the writ, and its judgment vacating and setting aside the order of the trustees of Pomona was without jurisdiction and void. The judgment is reversed, and the court directed to dismiss the proceeding.

MECHANICS' LIENS—FORECLOSURE—EVIDENCE OF COMPLETION — MEMORANDUM OF CONTRACT — SUFFICIENCY—WITNESS—COMPETENCY.

1. In an action to foreclose subcontractors' liens, the architect, the defendant, and her daughter testified that the building was completed as early as October 10th. One of such contractors testified that he did not know whether it was completed before October 14th or not. The other completed his contract October 3d. There was evidence that, on the 12th, repairs were made on one of the closets; that at that time there was a door knob not on in the upper story, and a rim to a bath on the lower story had not been put on; and that the contractor removed his tools, etc., on the 12th or 14th. It appeared that the building was occupied by the owner and by a tenant before the 11th. Held, that a finding that the building was not completed until the 14th was not supported by the evidence.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, relating to mechanics' liens, provides that all contracts shall be in writing when the amount exceeds $1,000, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto, and such contract, or a memorandum thereof, shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the county recorder's office, etc. Held, that such memorandum need not be signed or subscribed by the parties.

3. Under such statute, where the memorandum does not disclose that there were any plans or specifications, such memorandum cannot be held insufficient. because plans and specifications are not filed therewith.

4. A memorandum of a building contract, filed in the recorder's office, recited that the general character of the work to be done was raising, and making alterations, additions, and repairs to, a two-story frame building, to be used for two tenements, etc. Held, that such memorandum sufficiently showed the general character of the work to be done.

5. Where an action to foreclose subcontractors' liens, on death of the owner, is revived against his administratrix, plaintiffs are competent witnesses.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by F. Joost and B. Joost, copartners as Joost Bros., W. E. Byron, and G. W. Bayreuther, against Eugene Sullivan and Kate Sullivan, his wife, to foreclose subcontractors' liens. Pending the action, Eugene Sullivan died, and Kate Sullivan, as administratrix of his estate, was substituted in his stead. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John Heenan, for respondents.
Stafford & Stafford, for appellants.

HAYNES, C. Action to foreclose subcontractors' liens. Pending the litigation the claim of Joost Bros. was paid, and the only defendants served were Eugene and Kate Sullivan. The claims of Byron and Bayreuther were sustained by the court; and from the judgment enforcing their liens, and from an order denying a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted. Eugene Sullivan was the owner, and his wife, Kate Sullivan, was made a party; the complaint alleging that she claimed some interest in the property. Eugene Sullivan died before the trial, and Kate Sullivan, having been duly appointed administratrix of his estate, was substituted as such administratrix, in his stead, and as such, and as an individual, has taken this appeal.

A contract was made by Eugene Sullivan with one Westcott to raise, and make alterations, additions, and repairs to, a two-story frame building upon a lot situate at No. 625 Natoma street, city of San Francisco. Plaintiffs alleged that neither said contract nor any memorandum thereof was ever filed in the recorder's office, "that said building was completed on or about the 14th day of October, 1891, and further alleged the filing of their respective liens before the expiration of 30 days from and after the completion of the building." The answer denied each of these allegations, and alleged that the building was completed on October 10, 1891. Bayreuther's notice of lien was filed November 11, 1891, and Byron's on November 12th; and therefore, if the building was completed on October 10th, both claims were filed too late. The court found that neither the contract nor any memorandum thereof was filed, and that the building was completed on October 14th; and appellant contends that these findings are not justified by the evidence.

Byron's subcontract was for the brick work, for which he was to receive $235, and his work was finished September 24, 1891. He testified that he was at the house (the building in question) on October 14th; that it was then completed; that he did not know how long before that it had been completed; that he could not say when, prior to October 14th, was the last time he had been there; and that he did not know whether it was completed before October 14th or not. Mr. Bayreuther testified: That he furnished the material for four closets, two bath tubs, the kitchen sinks, etc. That he furnished the materials and completed the work, which included all the plumbing in the building, according to the specifications, and did some extra work, which consisted of tinning in gutters and one extra gas fitting in the two lower flats, and that he completed his work on October 3d. That he saw the building on October 11th and 14th. That the contractor took his tools away on the 14th. That he was called there on Sunday morning, October 11th, by Miss Sullivan, because one of the closets in the building made a rattling noise, and he sent a man there on the 12th to repair it. That he went the next day to see if everything was all right, and saw the contractor moving his tools away. That "the building was completed that day. The alterations consisted of raising an old house, making three flats of it,—two upper and one lower flat. The defendants were living at that time in the upper flat." He further testified that, when he called there, Sunday morning, October 11th, there was a door knob not on in the upper flat, and a rim to a bath on the lower flat had not been put on, and did not observe anything else unfinished; that putting on the door knob and rim of the bath tub was not his work; that the closet was not broken, but made a noise; that he had an agreement that, in case anything was wrong with the closets, he would repair them, and make them in good order; and that he formed the conclusion that the building was completed on the 14th from what others told him, and from seeing the contractor moving his tools away. Mr. Westcott, the contractor, was not subpœnaed by the plaintiffs, and was not at the trial. M. J. Welch, the architect in charge of the work, was called by plaintiff, and testified as to other matters, but was not examined as to the date of the completion of the work; and plaintiffs thereupon rested. Mr. Welch was then called for defendants, and testified that the building was completed on the 8th or 9th of October. Upon cross-examination, he testified that he was sure it was the 8th or 9th, because it took him several days to straighten out the business affairs before he issued the certificate for the payment which was to be made upon completion of the work; that he delayed because there was a doubt about the contractor paying his bills; that he wished to find out how his bills stood, and see that things were straightened out before the certificate was issued; that he was fully a week going to the bondsmen and seeing the creditors; and that it was fully a week after the building was completed before he issued the certificate, and the certificate was dated and issued October 15, 1891. He further testified that the building was partly occupied by the defendant and his family the first week of October, 1891. Miss Ella Sullivan testified that she was living with her parents in the house when she sent for Mr. Bayreuther on October 11th; that Westcott was there when Bayreuther called; that the house was then completed, and the men had all gone away, except Westcott; that they were then living on the upper floor; that the locks mentioned were on the old work, and not on the new; and that Westcott did not take his tools away until the 14th, because he was waiting for some one to lend him a horse and wagon for that purpose. Mrs. Kate Sullivan, one of the defendants, testified that the house was completed before Bayreuther was called to fix the closet, and she was then occupying the upper floor, and the ground floor was also rented and occupied. Upon cross-examination, she testified that it was completed a week before Bayreuther called, but afterwards changed the time to a week, or maybe more, before she paid the third payment, which was on October 15th.

The foregoing is the substance of all the evidence relating to the date at which the building was completed. The finding that the date of completion was October 14th is not justified by the evidence. Byron testified that he did not know whether it was completed before that date or not. Bayreuther completed his contract on October 3d, and there is no evidence that any work was done on the building after that date, except fixing a closet which "made a noise," and which was, confessedly, the "repair" of his completed work. Under these circumstances, the testimony of the plaintiffs could only be regarded as showing that the building was in a completed state or condition on the 14th, and not that the work ended on that day, and therefore does not conflict with the positive testimony of the architect, and of Mrs. Sullivan and her daughter, that it was completed at least as early as the 10th. Besides, the putting on of a door knob which appears to have been mislaid, and of the rim of a bath tub, were in themselves, "trivial imperfections," which would not have invalidated plaintiffs' liens if they had filed them on Monday, the 12th. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. 686. Not only so, but the building was actually occupied by the owner and by a tenant before the 11th, and this was evidence of the completion of the work under Westcott's contract, and its acceptance by the owner, which is conclusive upon the plaintiffs, when not explained, and would also, under the like condition, have been conclusive upon the owner, if necessary to sustain the plaintiffs' liens filed upon the strength of such occupancy. Giant Powder Co. v. San Diego Flume Co., 78 Cal., at page 196, 20 Pac. 419. If it be conceded that the contract between the owner and Westcott was void, because not recorded, it would, nevertheless, furnish a test of completion. Barker v. Doherty, 97 Cal. 10, 12, 31 Pac. 1117. If, however, it had been shown that, notwithstanding the trivial character of the uncompleted work described by Bayreuther, work actually continued thereon, and was completed on the 14th, the finding would have been sustained.

Appellants also contend that the third finding, to the effect that neither the contract between the owner and contractor, nor a memorandum of it containing the matters required to be stated therein, was ever filed. A memorandum of the contract was filed, and the only question is as to its sufficiency. The memorandum having been put in evidence, the finding should have set it out, leaving its sufficiency to be found as a conclusion of law. It is contended by respondents that it is insufficient, in that it was not signed; that neither plans nor specifications, nor their equivalent, were filed; and that it does not show the general character of the work. So much of the memorandum as is material to the objections made is as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that a contract has been entered into for raising, making alterations, additions, and repairs to, the two-story frame house building, to be used for tenements, situate, etc. [describing the lot]. That the names of all parties to said contract are as follows: Eugene Sullivan and C. W. Westcott. That the following is a statement of the general character of the work to be done under said contract, to wit: raising, and making alterations, additions, and repairs to, a two-story frame building, to be used for two tenements, situated as above stated, and prosecuted under the direction of M. J. Welch, architect." Then follows a perfect statement of the total amount to be paid, the amount of each of the partial payments, and when they are to be made, and attached thereto was a bond, executed by two sureties, that Westcott would perform his contract. That part of section 1183, Code Civ. Proc., necessary to be considered is as follows: "All such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds one thousand dollars, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto, and the said contract, or a memorandum thereof, setting forth the names of all the parties to the contract, a description of the property to be affected thereby, together with a statement of the general character of the work to be done, the total amount to be paid thereunder, and the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable, shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder of," etc. It was not necessary that the memorandum should have been signed or subscribed by the parties. The statute requires that the contract "shall be subscribed by the parties thereto," but only requires that the memorandum shall "set forth the names of all the parties to the contract." The names of the parties are stated, and it is further stated that they are all the parties to the contract. This follows the statute, and is sufficient in that respect.

It is said, however, that neither plans nor specifications were filed. The memorandum does not disclose that there were any, and therefore this case is distinguishable from the cases where the memorandum was held insufficient, because plans and specifications were referred to as part of the statement of the general character of the work to be done, and yet were not filed with the memorandum in which the reference was made. This was the case in Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manufacturing Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 235, 236, 29 Pac. 629, and in Butterworth v. Levy, 104 Cal. 509, 38 Pac. 897, and in Wood v. Transit Co., 107 Cal. 503, 40 Pac. 806. The question, therefore, is whether the memorandum states "the general character of the work to be done." If the statute had omitted the words last above quoted, and had simply said that the contract, or a memorandum of it, should be filed, it would have been understood that the word "memorandum," ex vi termini, implied that it need not contain a full and particular statement of the contract. Webster defines it thus: "(Law.) A brief note, in writing, of some transaction, or an outline of some intended instrument; an instrument drawn up in brief and compendious form." Before the amendment of 1887 the statute imperatively required that the "contract be filed"; and, as the plans and specifications—whenever referred to, at least—were part of the contract, it was properly held that the plans and specifications must also be filed. It is apparent that the design of the amendment was to require less than was required before; how much less must be determined from the language used, construed in the light of the purpose to be effected by the filing of anything giving information of the contract between the owner and the original contractor. The words "general character" do not mean a special, particular, minute, or detailed description of the work to be done. The adjective "general," as defined in Webster's Dictionary, means: "(1) Relating to a genus or kind; pertaining to a whole class or order; belonging to a whole rather than to a part. * * * (3) Not restrained or limited to a precise or detailed import; not specific; lax in signification." And, of the noun "character," he gives, as applicable here: "(9) Account; description." The definition given of the word "general" in Black's Law Dictionary, so far as pertinent, is: "Universal, not particularized; as opposed to special." The same author defines the word "character," only as applied to individuals, but it is nevertheless pertinent here: "The aggregate of the moral qualities which belong to and distinguish an individual person; the general result of one's distinguishing attributes."

Other cases are cited, by respondent, where the memorandum was held insufficient because it did not state for what purpose the building was intended, or did not state the kind of building, as "frame," or "brick," or "stone." Here the size of the lot, 25x75 feet, is given, and it is stated that a frame building already thereon is to be raised, repaired, and additions made thereto, and converted into flats for the purpose of being used as tenements. This is quite sufficient, as a statement of "the general character of the work to be done." It is not claimed that the memorandum was fraudulently made, or that plaintiffs, as subcontractors, were misled or deceived or injured because of any imperfection in it. It must therefore be assumed that the owner intended, in good faith, to comply with the statute, and believed that he had done so. The statute, imposing as it does a liability upon the owner beyond the price he contracted to pay, in favor of a subcontractor with whom he has no contract relations, is penal as well as remedial, and therefore, while it must have such construction as will reasonably effectuate its remedial purposes, must be strictly confined to such purpose. No merely technical construction can be indulged, for the purpose of visiting a penalty upon the owner, unless there has been a substantial failure to comply with the law, such as, if continued, would defeat the remedial purposes of the statute; but, if there be a reasonable doubt as to the construction of the statute, or as to whether the defendants complied with it, they should have the benefit of it. Suth. St. Const. p. 444; Chase v. Railway, 26 N. Y. 523, 525; Shanklin v. Gray, 43 Pac. 399. The memorandum in this case was a substantial and sufficient compliance with the statute.

As the case must be remanded, one or two other questions should be noticed. Appellant claims that there was no evidence of the reasonable value of the work done by the plaintiffs. As the memorandum of the contract between Westcott and the owner is sufficient, the contracts between the contractor and the subcontractors are conclusive, both as to their principal contracts, and as to contracts for extra work, so far as they fixed the value. Where the value was not fixed by contract, other proof of value must be made. To prevent misapprehension, it may be added that, if the memorandum filed was not compliance with the statute, the contract price agreed by the contractor to be paid to the subcontractors is evidence of value; but such evidence may be rebutted. See Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 36, 23 Pac. 200, and 25 Pac. 1101.

Plaintiffs were competent witnesses, notwithstanding the death of Sullivan. Booth v. Pendola, supra. No other questions discussed by counsel need be noticed. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BRITT, C.

ROGERS v. SCHULENBURG et al.

JOINT DEMURRER — NONNEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS —GUARANTOR.

1. A joint demurrer by defendants is properly overruled if the complaint is good against any of them.

2. A third person writing his name on the back of a nonnegotiable note, either before or after delivery, becomes a guarantor.

3. Statements by defendant in the absence of plaintiff are inadmissible in his own behalf.

Action by W. R. Rogers against A. R. Schulenburg and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. W. Britt and Works & Works, for appellants. Jas. E. Wadham, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action upon a nonnegotiable promissory note for $340 made by the defendants Schulenburg and Chadwick to one Thompson, and by him assigned to the plaintiff before maturity. The complaint avers the making, delivery, and assignment of the note, in the usual form, but the only averment connecting the defendant Daley therewith is "that thereafter, and before the maturity of said note, the said defendant T. J. Daley duly indorsed said promissory note by writing on the back thereof as follows, to wit: 'Protest waived. T. J. Daley.'" Defendant Chadwick suffered his default to be entered. Defendants Schulenburg and Daley filed a joint demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled. They then answered, setting up, in substance, that, prior to the assignment of the note to the plaintiff, Thompson, the payee, had offered to accept from them, in full satisfaction and payment thereof, the sum of $125; that after such offer, and with notice thereof, plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement whereby he was to advance and pay to Thompson, for the said note, the sum of $125, and take an assignment thereof to himself, and they were to repay him therefor the sum so advanced, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the time of his payment to Thompson, and the further sum of $15 as a bonus to him for taking up the note in the manner agreed upon; that accordingly the plaintiff paid to Thompson the sum of $125, and no more, for the note, and received the transfer thereof; and that the assignment of the note to plaintiff was accomplished and made in virtue of and pursuant to the said agreement, and not otherwise. To this answer a demurrer was interposed by the plaintiff, and overruled. The case was then tried, and upon all the issues raised the court found against the defendants, and rendered judgment against them as prayed for in the complaint. From this judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial the defendants Schulenburg and Daley have appealed.

1. Appellants contend that as against Daley the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and hence that the court erred in overruling their demurrer. This contention is rested upon the fact that it does not appear when Daley indorsed the note,—whether before or after delivery,—and that no consideration for the indorsement is expressed in writing. There are two sufficient answers to the contention: (1) It is not claimed that the complaint was not sufficient as against the makers of the note. Conceding, therefore, that it was not sufficient as against Daley, still, as only a joint demurrer was filed, it was properly overruled. "A joint demurrer by all of the defendants to an action is properly overruled if the complaint is good as against either of them." Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 34 Pac. 777; Work, Prac. § 531; Pom. Rem. § 577. (2) When Daley wrote his name on the back of the note, whether it was before or after its delivery, he became a guarantor for its payment. Bank v. Babcock, 94 Cal. 96, 29 Pac. 415. And it was not necessary that the consideration be expressed in writing. Civ. Code, § 2793. "A written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration," and "the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it." Id. §§ 1614, 1615. Crooks v. Tully, 50 Cal. 254, cited by appellants, is not in point. That case arose before the adoption of the Codes, when the statute required that a contract to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another should express the consideration. That requirement is not now found in the Codes. Civ. Code, § 1624, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973.

2. It is further contended that the findings were not justified by the evidence. The evidence is brief, and may be epitomized as follows: Schulenburg testified that he made the contract with the plaintiff as alleged in the answer, and he detailed the conversations that took place between them. Daley testified to certain conversations which he had with the plaintiff, and then, on cross-examination, was asked, "Was there ever any contract made between you and Rogers relative to your paying him $125 and the $15 bonus on his taking up the note?" And he answered, "No, sir." Rogers testified that he had some conversation with Schulenburg about the note; that he went to him, and inquired whether there were any set-offs against it, and was told that there were none, and that it would soon be adjusted. He was then asked, "Was there any agreement between you and Schulenburg that you would take less than the face of the note in payment thereof at the time the note was purchased?" and he answered, "No." The above is, in substance, all the evidence, and we think it shows a substantial conflict as to whether the agreement relied upon was made between the parties or not. The findings and judgment cannot therefore, be disturbed on this ground.

3. While giving his testimony, Daley stated that Schulenburg had informed him of the terms of the arrangement he made with the plaintiff about the purchase of the note. Schulenburg was afterwards recalled, and was asked by his counsel, "What did you tell Mr. Daley as to the arrangement you had made with Mr. Rogers relative to Rogers' taking up the note?" The question was objected to by counsel for plaintiff upon the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and the communication was not shown to have been made in the presence of, or communicated to, the plaintiff. The objection was sustained, and the ruling is assigned as error. We think the ruling was clearly right. The statements of a party, made without the hearing or knowledge of his adversary, are never competent evidence in his own behalf to prove the facts stated. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BENDIT. (Cr. 46.)

FORGERY—WHAT CONSTITUTES SIGNATURE AS AGENT.

When one without authority executes a receipt for money, purporting on its face to be executed by him as agent for the person whose name he signs, he is not guilty of forgery at common law, or under Pen. Code, § 470, which enumerates the kinds of writing which may be the subject of forgery.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Simon Bendit was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Reversed.

Walter S. Hinkle, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was convicted of forgery, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. The information charges that appellant on July 30, 1894, did unlawfully, feloniously, falsely, etc., and with intent to defraud, "make and forge a certain instrument in writing, in words and figures following, to wit:

"San Francisco, July 30, 1894. G. W. Hume & Co.—WilliamCluff Company, wholesale grocers and provision dealers, 18 to 22 Front St., corner Pine. Telephone 1819.

To balance
July 23. To bill rendered	$15 50

"Wm. Cluff & Co., A. B."

It further charges, in brief, that on said July 30th he willfully, fraudulently, etc., passed the said instrument, "as true and genuine," to one J. Deming, with intent to defraud G. W. Hume and J. Deming, doing business under the firm name of G. W. Hume & Co. The instrument is admitted by appellant to be a receipt for money, although there is nothing on its face which acknowledges such receipt.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the points made by appellant that the information is insufficient, and that material errors were committed by the court in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, for in our opinion there was no evidence sufficient to establish the crime of forgery. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether appellant was the person who did the acts testified to by the witnesses for the prosecution; but, assuming that appellant was identified as the person who did those acts, the acts themselves do not constitute the crime charged. The facts testified to were, in brief, these: The writing alleged to have been forged was sent by William Cluff & Co. to Hume & Co. the day before July 30, 1894, so that the latter might examine it, and be ready to pay when the collector of the former should call for payment. It was then simply an unreceipted account, with no name signed to it. On July 30th, according to the people's testimony, appellant went to the business place of Hume & Co., and asked J. Deming, one of the partners, for the payment of this account. Deming asked him the amount, and, as he did not give the correct amount, Deming refused to pay. Appellant said there must be some mistake, and that he would see about it, and went out. Deming testified, "I naturally thought he was a collector for them." Deming afterwards went out himself, leaving Fannie A. Berry as acting cashier. Afterwards appellant returned, and Miss Berry paid him the amount of the account, and appellant receipted it, by writing, in the presence of Miss Berry, "Wm. Cluff & Co., A. B." She testified: "I saw him sign, 'William Cluff & Company, per A. B.' I understood him to be the collector in the employ of the William Cluff Company, who came there to collect, and was authorized to collect, the bill." It is quite clear that the facts above stated do not constitute forgery. When the crime is charged to be the false making of a writing, there must be the making of a writing which falsely purports to be the writing of another. The falsity must be in the writing itself,—in the manuscript. A false statement of fact in the body of the instrument, or a false assertion of authority to write another's name, or to sign his name as agent, by which a person is deceived and defrauded, is not forgery. There must be a design to pass as the genuine writing of another person that which is not the writing of such other person. The instrument must fraudulently purport to be what it is not. And there was nothing of the kind in the case at bar. There was no pretense that "Wm. Cluff & Co." was the genuine signature of that firm. It was written by appellant himself, in the presence of the party who paid the money. He added the initials "A. B." to it, and he was understood to be acting as the agent of the firm, and to have written the name "Cluff & Co." by himself as such agent. By these acts he may have committed some other crime, but he did not commit forgery. We have been referred to no authorities to the point that the signing of another's name as his agent is forgery, while there is a multitude of authorities to the contrary in text-books and adjudicated cases. "If a man accept or indorse a bill of exchange in the name of another, without his authority, it is a forgery. But if he sign it with his own name, per procuration of the party whom he intends to represent, it is no forgery; it is no false making of the instrument, but merely a false assumption of authority." 2 Archb. Cr. Prac. p. 819. The doctrine is fully discussed, and the views hereinbefore stated declared, in Reg. v. White, 2 Car. & K. 404. In that case the defendant brought a bill to a banker as from Tomlinson. The bill was not indorsed, but the defendant said he would indorse it. The banker wrote, "per procuration Tomlinson," beneath which the defendant signed his own name. It was held that this false assumption of authority was not forgery, as there was no false making. It has frequently been held that "the false instrument should carry on the face of it the semblance of that for which it is counterfeited," although it is not necessary that the semblance should be exact. 2 Archb. Cr. Prac. 866. This rule illustrates the nature of forgery. How, in the case at bar, could there be any question about "semblance"?

The American authorities are as pronounced on the subject as the English. In Re Heilbonn, 1 Parker, Cr. R. 434, the court, after having referred to other cases, say: "It might not be necessary to refer to these authorities, for it is the essence of forgery that one signs the name of another to pass it off as the signature or counterfeit of that other. This cannot be when the party openly, and on the face of the paper, declares that he signs for that other. There he does not counterfeit the name of the other, nor attempt to pass the signature as the signature of that other. The offense belongs to an entirely different class of crimes." In Mann v. People, 15 Hun, 155, the court, in an elaborate opinion, in which the authorities and the arguments for an opposite view are fully reviewed and discussed, holds that, "where one executes and issues an instrument purporting on its face to be executed by him as the agent of a principal therein named, he is not guilty of forgery, either at common law, or under the statutes of this state, even though he has in fact no authority for such principal to execute the same." (We quote from the syllabus, which is a correct condensation of the opinion.) In Com. v. Baldwin, 11 Gray, 199, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts say: "It is not, says Sergeant Hawkins, the bare writing of an instrument in another's name without the privity, but the giving it a false appearance of having been executed by him, which makes a man guilty of forgery. If the defendant had written upon the note, 'William Schouler, by his agent, Henry W. Baldwin,' the act, plainly, would not have been forgery. The party taking the note knows it is not the personal act of Schouler. He does not rely upon the signature. He is not deceived by the semblance of his signature. He relies solely upon the averred agency and authority of the defendant to bind Schouler. So, in the case before us, the note was executed in the presence of the promisee. He knew it was not Schouler's signature." In Com. v. Foster, 114 Mass. 311, the court say: "The falsity of the instrument consists in its purporting to be the note of some party other than the one actually making the signature. The falsity of the act consists in the intent that it shall pass as the note of some other party." In State v. Young, 46 N. H. 266, the supreme court of that state say: "To forge or counterfeit is to falsely make; and an alteration of a writing must be falsely made, to make it forgery at common law, or by our statute. The term 'falsely,' as applied to making or altering a writing in order to make it forgery, has reference, not to the contents or tenor of the writing, or to the fact stated in the writing, because a writing containing a true statement may be forged or counterfeited as well as any other, but it implies that the paper or writing is false, not genuine, fictitious, not a true writing, without regard to the truth or falsehood of the statement it contains,—a writing which is the counterfeit of something which is or has been a genuine writing, or one which purports to be a genuine writing or instrument when it is not." In State v. Willson, 28 Minn. 52, 9 N. W. 28, the court, referring approvingly to Mann v. People, supra, say: "The court decided that this did not constitute forgery, and held, in substance, that, when one executes and issues an instrument purporting on its face to be executed by him as agent of a principal therein named, he is not guilty of forgery, although he has in fact no authority from such principal to execute or issue the same. In fact, we found no authority to the contrary, and the text writers uniformly lay down or approve of the same rule." There are numerous other authorities to the same point, but further citation is unnecessary. Of course, the averment in the information that the appellant uttered and passed the said instrument "as true and genuine" is also, under the above views, unsupported by the evidence.

It is contended that the definition of "forgery" in section 470 of the Penal Code makes the crime different from forgery at common law, but, with respect to the question here under discussion, there is no such difference. At common law there were frequent embarrassing questions as to what kinds of writings were the subjects of forgery, while our Code, to avoid those questions, enumerates a very large number of writings as subjects of forgery. But, as to what constitutes forgery of instruments which are subjects of forgery, the definitions at common law and by our Code are the same. "Forgery, at common law, is the false making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability." 2 Bish. Cr. Law (8th Ed.) § 523. In the notes to the section of Bishop just quoted, many other definitions are given, and it will be noticed that the leading descriptive words are "false making," or altering. In our Code the words are, "every person who with intent to defraud another, falsely makes, alters," etc., any of the written instruments enumerated. The definition is therefore essentially the same in both instances, and it is the same in the statutes of all the other states to which our attention has been called. But the meaning of the words "false making," when applied to forgery, is that hereinbefore stated. The broad and well-established distinction above set forth cannot be ignored by courts or jurors, even when, in their opinion, a more severe punishment should be imposed on a defendant than the one which the law prescribes for the offense of which he is guilty. As was said in Mann v. People, supra, "whatever his misdeeds, he must not suffer for a crime which he has not committed." Forgery is a grave and exceedingly dangerous crime. A very large part of the business of civilized countries is done by means of negotiable instruments. These are rarely presented by the makers, but are paid to others on the faith that the signatures and the bodies of the instruments are genuine. The business of a bank would come to a standstill, if the paying teller would not pay any check until he could communicate with the drawer. Hence, if there were many successful forgeries, there would be the utmost confusion in business circles. Consequently forgery, no matter how small the amount involved, is made a felony. But obtaining money or other property by false pretenses, where the party defrauded gives credit, not to the genuineness of a writing, but to the person who deceives him, is made a misdemeanor, or felony, according to the amount of money obtained by the false representation. For the foregoing reasons the judgment must be reversed, and, of course, another trial upon the theory on which the first trial was conducted would be useless. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

CALIFORNIA LOAN & TRUST CO. v. HAMMELL. (L. A. 5.)[1]

APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT PRESENTED TO TRIAL COURT.

Where questions, the determination of which is essential to the full adjustment of the equities between the parties, were not presented to the trial court for determination, and the findings of that court upon the issues submitted are supported by the evidence, its judgment, warranted by such findings, will not be reversed on appeal.

Action by the California Loan & Trust Company against James Hammell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter Bordwell, for appellant. Guthrie & Guthrie, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Appeal from judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial.

One Wilkins owned land at Azusa; Goldsberry, a tract at Clearwater. They agreed to exchange lands. Goldsberry was to convey his tract clear of incumbrance, and give $2,000 difference,—the $2,000 to be secured by a mortgage on the Azusa property which he was to get from Wilkins. It was found that his land was mortgaged to one Tring for $830; and Goldsberry, to pay this, agreed to mortgage the Azusa tract for $830 more, and Wilkins assented to the change. Wilkins owed plaintiff about $3,500, which was secured on the Azusa tract. Plaintiff consented to take, in lieu of this security, whatever Wilkins received in exchange. Accordingly, when the trade was consummated, Wilkins assigned the notes and mortgage which he received from Goldsberry to plaintiff, as collateral security, and also had the Clearwater tract conveyed to a trustee, also as security for his indebtedness to plaintiff. Subsequently Goldsberry paid both of his notes, and they were credited upon Wilkins' indebtedness. It appears incidentally—although neither party seems to think the circumstance of any importance—that plaintiff had assigned Wilkins' note with the security, and guarantied its payment. Afterwards plaintiff purchased the Tring mortgage, and brought this action to foreclose it.

It is contended by the defendant that, at the time of the execution of the $830 note to Wilkins, plaintiff agreed to take the note, and, in consideration of it, to pay the debt secured by the Tring mortgage; in other words, that the $830 note was not assigned to plaintiff as security for the payment of Wilkins' debt to it, but in consideration of its promise to pay the Tring debt. So far as it concerned the amount of Wilkins' debts, or the incumbrance upon the mortgaged premises, it did not matter upon which debt the $830 was credited; for Wilkins had assumed the Tring mortgage, and both constituted liens upon the same property. Upon whichever it was paid, therefore, Wilkins would get the benefit of it, and the premises would be relieved of the incumbrances upon it to just that amount. And the same is true as to defendant, who purchased the mortgaged premises from Wilkins. As both debts constituted incumbrances upon his land, upon whichever the $830 was paid, he was relieved to the same extent. The only possible difference it could make to either Wilkins or defendant would be that, if the Tring debt became due first, by paying that off the time of payment would be extended, and there would be but one mortgage on his land, instead of two. It would be quite natural, therefore, for the parties to agree that plaintiff would take care of the Tring mortgage, and see that it was not foreclosed. The court found—and the finding is sustained by the evidence—that plaintiff did agree to pay the Tring debt with the $830 received from Goldsberry. Instead of doing this, plaintiff assigned the Wilkins note, and passed to the assignee the $830 note as collateral security, and, when paid, the money was credited on the Wilkins debt. This mistake did not harm Wilkins or defendant, unless he is called upon to pay the Tring debt before the Wilkins debt is due. The mere fact that money received by the mortgagee was credited upon the wrong note will not deprive the creditor of his lien. If the notes were still owned by plaintiff, the error could now be corrected, and the result would be that the Tring mortgage would be canceled, and the plaintiff would be permitted to collect the money upon its second mortgage. And if the Wilkins debt has been fully paid, and the $830 was used in its payment, I see no reason why plaintiff should not be permitted to foreclose the mortgage in question here. It can make no difference to defendant on which mortgage he pays the money, which, in any event, is justly a burden upon his land. But the record does not show the facts which would entitle the plaintiff to that relief. Since no issue was made upon the question in the court below, and there is no finding, we are not permitted to conclude that plaintiff did guaranty to its assignee the payment of the Wilkins debt; and we do not know whether the Wilkins debt is due, or has been paid. Upon the facts found, plaintiff is not entitled to a foreclosure of his mortgage. The findings are sustained by evidence; and although I may feel that justice has, somehow, miscarried, I do not see how, under the circumstances, it can be prevented in this case. The judgment and order are affirmed.

McCARTHY v. MT. TECARTE LAND & WATER CO. (L. A. 85.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 21, 1896.)

ACCOUNT STATED — JUDGMENT — CORPORATIONS— SERVICES BY DIRECTOR — COMPENSATION — IMPLIED CONTRACT—LIMITATIONS.

1. In an action based on a stated account the judgment cannot exceed the balance due on the face of the account in favor of the prevailing party.

2. In an action by a director of a corporation for compensation for services rendered by him to the corporation under an implied contract, evidence is admissible on the part of defendant corporation to show to what extent plaintiff was interested as stockholder, usage of defendant as to compensation paid to directors, and an agreement between the original incorporators that no salaries should be paid to officers.

3. A resolution of a board of directors of a corporation appointing one of their number superintendent, but containing no provision as to his compensation, which depended on the "understanding and expectation" that there should be a reasonable compensation, is not a contract in writing, within Code Civ. Proc. § 337, and an action for services rendered thereunder is within section 339, subd. 1, and barred by limitation after two years.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by D. O. McCarthy against the Mt. Tecarte Land & Water Company on an account stated and for alleged services. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. E. Wadham and F. W. Stearns, for appellant. McDonald & McDonald and Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant, a corporation, appeals. There are two counts in the complaint. In the first it is averred that on September 11, 1891, there was an account stated between the parties for moneys before that time expended by plaintiff for the use of defendant, that the balance on said account stated was on said day $10,050.07, and that defendant agreed and promised to pay said balance. The alleged cause of action in this first count is purely an account stated. The second count is for $23,000, alleged services by plaintiff as general manager of defendant.

1. The court found, on the first count, that on September 11, 1891, defendant was indebted to plaintiff for moneys expended for defendant's use in the sum of $10,050.07, "and that on the said 11th day of September, 1891, the plaintiff stated his account for such moneys to the defendant in the said sum of ten thousand and fifty and seven one-hundredths ($10,050.07) dollars, and that defendant accepted the account as stated, and agreed in writing to pay the same." It is further found that defendant afterwards paid plaintiff $2,000, and that at the commencement of the action there was due thereon $8,050.07, with interest from said September 11th at 7 per cent. per annum, for which amount judgment was rendered. Appellant contends that the finding of an account stated on September 11th for $10,050.07 is not supported by the evidence, and is against law; and the contention must be sustained. As to the question whether there was any stated account at all on September 11th,—that is, whether the appellant then agreed to any account presented by respondent as a final settlement,—the evidence is conflicting. But, if we assume that there was an account stated on that day, it is clear that it was not for $10,050.07, but for only $3,550.07. The contract found is not the one proved. The statement on motion for a new trial contains the following: "Said account was headed, 'Mt. Tecarte Land and Water Company in account with D. O. McCarthy,' and consisted of a large number of items of debit against the defendant running from May 15, 1888, to September 2, 1889, and aggregating the sum of $10,050.07, with a credit under date of July 2, 1891, of $6,500 and showing a net balance of $3,550.07; the aggregate of the account, the credit thereon, and the balance after deducting the credit, being as follows:

July 2, 1891, Cr. by issue to D. O. McCarthy of 65,000 shares of stock at ten cents per share....	6,500 00
Balance due	$3,550 07"

—And immediately following was an indorsement as follows: "Approved and ordered paid at a meeting of the board of directors held September 11, 1891. E. M. Dean, Secretary, by B. F. Moore, Ass't Sec'ty." (The respondent withdrew from his offer of the account the indorsement of the secretary, Dean. Appellant objected to this withdrawal, because then only a part of the account was offered, and his objection was overruled. If that indorsement be not considered, then there is little evidence tending to show that any account was agreed to by appellant; but that is not important here, because we are now assuming that there was some kind of a stated account on September 11th.) There is no evidence showing or tending to show any account stated on September 11th, other than the one described in the part of the transcript above quoted; and that account clearly showed a balance of only $3,550.07, and for the latter sum alone could the appellant be held liable upon the contract which is created by a stated account, which is a new and independent contract. See Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 556, 37 Pac. 504, and cases there cited. The finding was no doubt based upon some occurrences which took place long after the alleged stating of the account on September 11th, and which, keeping in view the nature of a stated account, should not have been considered. The $6,500 worth of stock of the corporation defendant, with which respondent credited appellant in the alleged stated account of September 11th, had been purchased by respondent on July 2, 1891, and had not been paid for; and it appears that afterwards, on November 26, 1891, the board of directors of the appellant, —a new board having been elected about that time,—by resolution allowed respondent to surrender the certificates for said stock, and cancel said sale, and to be released of said credit, and it was resolved "that said D. O. McCarthy be, and he is hereby, requested and allowed to present his account against the company, together with the account of J. Harvey McCarthy against the company, to this board for examination and allowance, within the period of sixty days next ensuing from and after this date." There is a conflict of evidence on the question whether respondent ever did afterwards present another account; but this is immaterial here, because the transactions of November 26th did not change the liability of appellant upon the contract evidenced by the alleged stated account of September 11th,—unless, indeed, they showed that said alleged account was not intended to be a final stated account, or unless they worked a rescission of that contract. In this action respondent must rely upon the alleged stated account of September 11th, as it stood stated on that day. If it was afterwards opened up, it cannot stand as a cause of action. A judgment for $10,150.07 upon a stated account which shows a balance of only $3,550.07 cannot be sustained. If the account of September 11th was a stated account, the appellant is in the same position, except in some particulars, not important here, as it would have been if it had given its promissory note for the said balance of $3,555.07; and in an action based on the stated account a judgment for more than the balance due on the face of the account would be as erroneous as a judgment on a promissory note for more than the face of the note.

It is also averred in the complaint that the account was restated on or about the 24th of November, 1891; but, as the averment was denied, and the court made no finding on the subject, it must be disregarded.

2. In the second count it is averred that on or about February 1, 1888, the defendant employed plaintiff as its general manager, and agreed to pay him for his services as such a fair and reasonable compensation; that he accepted such employment, and remained its general manager continuously from about February 1, 1888, to about November 24, 1891; and that his services during that period were reasonably worth $23,000, no part of which had been paid. In the answer all these averments are denied, and it is averred that the cause of action, if it ever existed, is barred by subdivision 1 of section 339, and by section 337, Code Civ. Proc. During all the time mentioned in the complaint the respondent was a large stockholder and a director of the corporation defendant. The court found that on June 6, 1888, the defendant, by a resolution of its board of directors, appointed the plaintiff its superintendent, and that he then entered upon the duties of "said office," and discharged them until November 24, 1891; that during that time he assumed and discharged the duties of general manager with the knowledge and consent of the directors, but without any express appointment, until September 2, 1891; and that on said September 2, 1891, he was, by resolution of the board, appointed "superintendent and general manager." It was further found "that no order was ever made by the board of directors of the defendant, nor any contract or agreement by any of its officers, fixing the compensation of plaintiff for his services, or the time of payment thereof; but that it was nevertheless the understanding and expectation of the plaintiff and the board of directors of the defendant, at the time of plaintiff's said appointment, and during the entire period of his services, that he was to receive reasonable compensation for such services." It was also found that the value of his services during said period was $150 per month; also that no part of this cause of action was barred by subdivision 1 of section 339, Code Civ. Proc.; but that his right to recover for services rendered prior to January 11, 1889,—four years before the commencement of the action,—was barred by section 337, Id. Judgment on this count was ordered and rendered for $5,175. Counsel for appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that "it was nevertheless the understanding and expectation of the plaintiff and the board of directors" that respondent was to receive compensation; but that, on the contrary, the evidence shows that the company was in poor financial circumstances, and that it was understood that none of the directors were to receive compensation for what they should do in the interest of all the projectors of the water scheme which they had in view. The preponderance of the evidence certainly seems against any understanding or expectation that respondent was to be paid; but, under our views of the case on other points, it is unnecessary to decide whether there was any material evidence sufficient to justify said finding. In the first place, we think that the court erred in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence offered on that point. As the respondent was a stockholder and director of the corporation, he was not entitled to compensation for services rendered by him for it, no matter under what name or official position, unless there was some kind of a contract for such compensation. Now, there is no pretense that there was any express contract for compensation; consequently, if there was any such contract, it must have been an implied contract arising out of and inferable from the situation and relation of the parties; and any fact which could reasonably throw light upon that relation, or tend to show the intention of the parties, was relevant and admissible. Barstow v. Railroad Co., 42 Cal. 465. And we think that the court erred in sustaining objections to evidence offered by appellant for that purpose. For instance, appellant asked the respondent when on the witness stand: "To what extent were you interested as a stockholder in the Mt. Tecarte Land and Water Company in the year 1888?" and he was asked the same question as to the years 1889, 1890, and 1891. Objections to these questions were sustained, and we think erroneously. The questions tended to show the relations of the parties, and the interest which respondent himself had in the property, and to throw light on the question whether or not it was intended that he should have compensation, or, if so, how much; and "the situation of the parties at the time—the relation, if any, in which they stood, of a business character or otherwise—is important to be known and considered in order to arrive at a correct solution of the ultimate question involved." Barstow v. Railroad Co., supra. Other questions of a similar character, not necessary to be here specially mentioned, were incorrectly ruled out; and it was particularly erroneous and prejudicial to sustain objections to the following question, asked by appellant of one of its witnesses, who was an original incorporator and director: "Was it not a usage of the defendant corporation that no compensation should be paid to the directors or its officers?" and to strike out the following statement of another of its witnesses: "It was agreed upon between the original incorporators that no officers should receive salaries for their services." The court found that there was an "understanding" by the appellant that there was to be compensation to respondent; and, as bearing on that question, the said testimony sought to be introduced by appellant was relevant and competent. Whether there was such a usage was a fact, and not a mere conclusion of the witness. Upon this point the case at bar is not distinguishable from Fraylor v. Mining Co., 17 Cal. 594. In that case the plaintiff was a stockholder in the corporation defendant, and had been appointed its secretary, and he sought to recover the value of services rendered as such secretary. The defendant "offered to show that by the usage and custom of the corporation no compensation was chargeable for services of this nature." Objection was sustained, and this court on appeal reversed the judgment. The court, in its opinion, quotes from Ang. & A. Corp. as follows: "The officers of a corporation who are to receive any compensation are usually provided for by regular salaries. If there is no salary, and no particular contract, much must depend, as in other cases, upon the custom with regard to compensation for the particular services, and the expectations of the parties growing out of it." The court then say: "The rule thus laid down covers the principle involved in the offer made by the defendant, and we think there was a violation of this rule in the rejection of that offer. * * * We have no doubt of the admissibility of the evidence; and, if the plaintiff was informed of the existence of the usage and custom referred to, the inference would naturally be that he accepted the office and performed its duties without any expectation of being compensated for his services. If any such usage in fact existed, his position as a member and officer of the corporation is sufficient prima facie to charge him with a knowledge of its existence." In the case at bar we gather from the evidence that the project of the corporation was to acquire and create water and ditch property with means to be obtained by the sale of its stock; and, while the record does not show affirmatively that the project was a failure, it does appear in the evidence that all the money it ever received and expended on its works did not exceed $10,000. Under these circumstances it might well have been the usage, custom, and understanding that the directors should not receive compensation for their efforts in helping along the enterprise in which all were interested; and the said testimony offered by appellant and excluded by the court was not only admissible but highly important.

There is another point in the case which demands notice. The court found that no part of respondent's cause of action for services was barred by subdivision 1 of section 339, Code Civ. Proc., but that the part of the cause of action which accrued more than four years before the commencement of the action was barred by section 337. The court, therefore, must have found that the action is upon a "contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing." We think that the court erred in thus holding. It is contended by respondent that the resolution of the directors of appellant appointing him superintendent or general manager is the instrument in writing upon which this action is brought. (It may be observed that, even under this view, there was no resolution appointing him "general manager" until September 2, 1891, which was only a couple of months before his alleged services ended, and that the complaint is for services only as general manager. The resolution of June 6, 1888, was for his appointment only as superintendent, and there usually is a great difference between the two positions. But, as appellant does not make this point, it may be assumed, we suppose, that the resolution of June, 1888, appointed him to the place for services in which he sues.) But a cause of action is not upon a contract founded upon an instrument in writing, within the meaning of the Code, merely because it is in some way remotely or indirectly connected with such an instrument, or because the instrument would be a link in the chain of evidence establishing the cause of action. In order to be founded upon an instrument in writing, the instrument must itself contain a contract to do the thing for the nonperformance of which the action is brought. In Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 132, it was held that an action by one joint maker of a promissory note against the others for contribution was not upon the note as "an instrument in writing," within the meaning of the statute, and was barred in two years. In that case Justice Field, delivering the opinion for the court, said: "Our conclusion is that it is not thus founded; that the statute, by the language in question, refers to contracts, obligations, or liabilities resting in or growing out of written instruments, not remotely or ultimately, but immediately." He further says: "The construction would be the same if the word 'founded' were omitted, and the statute read 'upon any contract, obligation, or liability, upon an instrument in writing.'" In the case at bar the contract—if any such there be—of the appellant to pay respondent for services is not the direct and immediate consequence of the resolution appointing him superintendent. Respondent, being a director of appellant, was not entitled to compensation for services rendered the corporation, unless the circumstances were such as to raise an implied assumpsit to pay what they were reasonably worth. But that assumpsit did not arise out of the mere fact of his appointment as superintendent, as might have been the case, perhaps, if he had been a stranger. In Smith v. Railroad Co., 102 N. Y. 192, 6 N. E. 397, where it was held that the employment by a corporation of a stranger as secretary raised an implied obligation to make compensation for services, the court put it on the express grounds that "he was neither stockholder nor director of the defendant, and stood in no relation to the company which entitled it to his gratuitous service, or which made it his interest to serve the company without compensation." And the court say further: "The rule that directors or trustees cannot recover for services rendered for the corporation upon an implied promise is an application of the general rule applicable to trustees. But we perceive no reason of policy or justice which should prevent a person appointed as secretary, and who is neither a director nor stockholder, from receiving a reasonable compensation for his services." See Tayl. Priv. Corp. §§ 646, 647, and cases cited; Brown v. Silver Mines, 17 Colo. 421, 30 Pac. 66. In most of the cases cited by respondent the officer or employé was a stranger having no relation to the corporation. In Rosborough v. Canal Co., 22 Cal. 557, the decision was upon the ground that there was a written order that the compensation of the plaintiff "be established at fifty dollars per month"; and what the court said in its opinion on the subject here involved was dictum, and was not clear, because it speaks of an "understanding and expectation" which "removes all presumptions that the services were performed gratuitously." The opinion refers to Fraylor v. Mining Co. (heretofore cited), in which the court say that "the right of the plaintiff to recover rests alone upon the fact of the rendition of the services." In the case at bar, therefore, respondent's cause of action is not upon a "written instrument," to wit, the resolution appointing him superintendent or general manager. Appellant could not have been precluded from showing affirmatively that no compensation was intended or expected, upon the ground that it would have been an attempt to contradict a written instrument. If respondent have any cause of action, it is upon an understanding of appellant and the expectation of respondent that he would be compensated, which may be implied, if the evidence be sufficient, from all of the circumstances of the case, and not upon any written instrument. Indeed, the finding of the court is, not that there was a contract in writing to pay compensation, but that there was "nevertheless the understanding and expectation" of the respondent and the board that there should be reasonable compensation. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the cause of action set up in the second count is not upon an instrument in writing, within the meaning of said section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, as to all services rendered more than two years before the commencement of the suit, the cause of action is barred by subdivision 1, § 339, of said Code. The judgment and order denying appellant's motion for a new trial appealed from are reversed, and a new trial is granted.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. BRODERICK. (S. F. 20.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—LIMITATION OF ELECTION EXPENSES—SUBDIVISION OF GENERAL FUND—AUDITOR.

1. Under Consolidation Act, § 71 (as amended St. 1865–66, p. 436), requiring the board of supervisors of San Francisco city and county, when making the levy of taxes for a fiscal year, to apportion and divide the taxes to certain specific funds, the board is limited to the funds therein named, and is not authorized to subdivide the general fund and limit the subdivisions to the objects indicated.

2. Under such section (subdivision 3), election expenses are payable from the general fund; and where the expenses incurred by the election commissioners exceed and have exhausted the amount estimated for elections by the board of supervisors in making the tax levy, the holder of an unpaid claim arising from an election is not restricted thereby, but may have it audited, and paid from the general fund, if there is money enough there to meet it.

3. If a demand on the county and city treasury has been approved and ordered paid by the proper board or officer, and presented to the county and city auditor in proper form, and he is satisfied that the demand is legally due and unpaid, and its payment is authorized by law, he is bound to audit it. and cannot be restricted in the exercise of his office by a city ordinance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against William Broderick to restrain him from auditing warrants made out by the board of election commissioners. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Graves, for appellant. Thornton & Merzbach, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. At the time of levying the annual tax for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco fixed the sum of $150,000 as its estimate of the registration and election expenses for the general election to be held in November, 1894, and set apart and appropriated out of the general fund that amount of money for that purpose. Subsequently they adopted an ordinance purporting to limit the expenditures for this object to this amount, and directed the auditor not to audit, and the treasurer not to pay, any demand in excess thereof. In holding and conducting said election, however, the board of election commissioners and the registrar of elections incurred liabilities and charges against the city and county in a sum of upward of $40,000 in excess of the amount thus set apart, and made out and delivered warrants therefor, on the general fund, to the parties claiming to be entitled to the same. After warrants amounting to $150,000 had been paid, the plaintiff herein commenced the present action against the defendant, who is the auditor of said city and county, to restrain him from auditing and allowing or approving any warrant or warrants made out by said board of election commissioners, or by said registrar of elections, in excess of said sum of $150,000, upon the ground that after that sum had been set apart for this purpose, and while there was other money in the treasury to the credit of the general fund, exclusive of said sum of $150,000, it had, upon the faith of said moneys in excess of said sum, entered into contracts with divers persons for necessary and lawful supplies for its use, and, if the aforesaid warrants in excess of $150,000 were paid, the general fund would be so depleted that there would be no funds with which to pay the claim of said contractors; that said contractors had protested against the payment of said warrants, and had threatened to sue the plaintiff upon their contracts, and would vex and harass the plaintiff with a multiplicity of suits if said warrants were allowed and paid. To this complaint the defendant demurred, and, his demurrer having been sustained, judgment was rendered in his favor, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

Section 1 of the act of March 18, 1878 (St. 1878, p. 299), declares: "The conduct, management and control of elections, and matters pertaining to elections in the city and county of San Francisco, is hereby taken from the board of supervisors, and vested in a board of five commissioners * * * which board is hereby invested with all the powers and charged with all the duties, as to matters pertaining to elections, now vested in said board of supervisors." Other sections of the act point out the duties of this board of election commissioners and of the registrar, making it incumbent upon them to select rooms or places for registration, and polling places; to designate the officers of election, and, in certain instances, fix their compensation therefor, "to be paid out of the treasury of said city and county, in the manner now provided by law for the payment of such services"; to provide books, blanks, and stationery, and other matters requisite for the performance of their duties. And by section 1216 of the Political Code they are to exercise all the powers and duties which by that Code are conferred upon county clerks and other officers in relation to matters of election and polling places. Section 33 of the act of 1878 declares: "All provisions for carrying out the registration and election laws in said city and county of San Francisco shall be made by the board of election commissioners, and demands on the treasury authorized or allowed by them for such purposes shall have the same force and effect as if authorized or allowed by the board of supervisors."

It is not claimed by the appellant that the board of election commissioners had incurred any unnecessary expenses, or allowed any demands upon the treasury that were not proper claims for expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties under the statutes by virtue of which they acted, but it contends that the estimate and appropriation of $150,000 by the board of supervisors is a limitation upon the amount that may be expended for that purpose. The transfer to the board of election commissioners of the conduct, management, and control of elections in San Francisco gives to this board the same power and authority to incur expenses in reference thereto, and to make the same a charge against the city, as was previously held by the board of supervisors; and the provision in section 33, that "demands on the treasury authorized or allowed by them for such purposes shall have the same force and effect as if authorized or allowed by the board of supervisors," gives to their demands the same validity, and right to immediate payment from the funds of the city, as if their payment had been directed by the board of supervisors. The provision in section 71 of the consolidation act, requiring the board of supervisors, when making the levy of taxes, to apportion and divide the taxes to be collected to certain specific funds, "according to the estimate of said board of the necessities of said funds," is limited to an apportionment of the taxes to those funds which are therein designated, viz. "corporation debt fund, general fund, school fund, street light fund, and street department fund," and does not confer authority to subdivide those funds, or either of them, and restrict the several subdivisions to the objects for which they may be indicated. The third subdivision of the section, which declares that "the general fund shall be applied and used for the payment of all sums authorized by law to be paid out of the general fund, and not otherwise provided for in this act," implies that the whole of the general fund shall be so applied and used, and that the holder of any claim against the city which is payable out of the general fund is entitled to have his claim audited, and also to have it paid, if, at the time of presentation for payment, there is sufficient money therefor in the general fund. Section 76 of the consolidation act declares that "the general fund consists of all moneys in the treasury not designated and set apart by law to a specified use, and of the overplus of any special fund remaining after the satisfaction of all demands upon it"; and in section 83 it is declared that "the term 'law' or 'laws,' as used in this act, is never to be understood as applicable to any regulation of the board of education, or of the board of supervisors, but only applicable to the constitution, and the laws made or adopted by the legislature in pursuance thereof." The estimate which the board of supervisors is directed to make of the necessities of the several funds, as the basis of the tax which they will levy, is not a conclusive determination of the amount that may be expended for these several necessities; and, although the failure to levy a tax which shall raise a sufficient amount of money for these needs will prevent the expenditures, yet, if the money has been collected and is in the treasury, applicable thereto, its expenditure or disbursement is not limited by the amount of the estimate. In the present case the board of supervisors were required to estimate the expenses that would be incurred at the general election for the year 1894, and, in the exercise of their judgment, they deemed it necessary to provide the sum of $150,000 therefor. As the incurring of these expenses was not under their control, it would not be competent for that body to determine the amount that should be expended, and their estimate would be, at most, only an approximate opinion of the amount of the expense. Nor does the fact that their estimate was too low deprive the holders of claims for the excess above this estimate of the right to payment, so long as there is money in the treasury applicable thereto. See Cashin v. Dunn, 58 Cal. 582; Welch v. Strother, 74 Cal. 415, 16 Pac. 22.

The duties of the defendant are defined in the consolidation act and other statutes, and it is not competent for the board of supervisors, by any ordinance or resolution, to restrict him in the exercise of his office, or to absolve him from the performance of these duties. If a demand upon the treasury has been approved and ordered paid by the proper board or officer, and is presented to him in proper form, and he has satisfied himself that the money is legally due and remains unpaid, and that payment thereof from the treasury is authorized by law, it becomes his duty to audit the demand, and the holder of the demand has a right to the enforcement of this duty. He is not justified in showing any favoritism by auditing the claim of one person in preference to that of another, upon the theory that there may not be sufficient money in the treasury to meet all demands upon it; and, as the appellant herein can, in law, have no choice as to which of its creditors shall first be paid, it cannot restrain the defendant from auditing demands against it which have been properly allowed and ordered paid. The judgment is affirmed.

HAVENS v. DONAHUE. (S. F. 16.)

CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE—ARCHITECTS.

1. Under a contract with an architect to furnish the necessary drawings, specifications, and details for the construction of a building for a certain percentage on the total cost of the construction of the building, the architect, after furnishing the drawings, etc., is not limited, in case his employment is terminated before the construction of the building is completed, to a recovery of the percentage on the cost of the building in so far as it was at the time completed.

2. An architect employed to furnish plans for the erection of a building on a site on which there is another building, occupied by tenants, is not liable to the owner by disclosure of the intended erection of the new building—the architect having neither contracted nor been requested to keep such fact a secret—for the loss of rent caused by the vacation of the building by the tenants.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Charles I. Havens against Annie Donahue. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley, Hayes, McEnerney & Bradley, for appellant. Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover for the services of an architect. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying her motion for a new trial. Plaintiff's contract was to furnish all necessary general drawings, specifications, and details for the construction of a building, upon a commission of 2½ per cent. upon the total cost. He was paid $3,750 under the contract, and seeks to recover the balance.

Defendant's first claim is that under such contract, plaintiff was only entitled to recover his commissions upon the cost of construction as far as the building had proceeded at the time his employment was terminated. This contention cannot be sustained. Plaintiff had nothing to do with the construction of the building. His contract was simply to furnish the plans, drawings, and specifications, and this he did. The actual construction and cost of construction are only material to him as fixing the amount of defendant's liability for the services rendered. Again, the complaint also charged upon a quantum meruit, and the court found the value of the plaintiff's services at the amount fixed by the judgment. This would seem to dispose of any question upon such contention.

The defendant, by her pleading, set up a counterclaim to the amount of $500. This counterclaim is based upon allegations to the effect that she (defendant) employed plaintiff, as an architect, to furnish the plans, etc., for the erection of a certain building upon a site where a building of hers was then standing, which was occupied by tenants; that plaintiff improperly notified a reporter of the San Francisco Chronicle of her intention to erect a building upon such site, and also furnished the paper a drawing of said building. And it is alleged that these things were published in that paper as a matter of public news, and thus came to the knowledge of defendant's tenants. It is charged that, by reason of these facts coming to their notice, some of them removed from her building; thus depriving her of future prospective rents and profits, and damaging her to the extent of such prospective rents. We attach but little importance to this contention. Aside from the remoteness of the damages sought to be recovered, and their contingent and speculative character,—matters which we will not discuss,—there is no cause for relief stated. There is no allegation that plaintiff agreed not to make disclosure of defendant's intentions to erect the building, nor was he requested not so to do. Neither did the law cast upon him any duty to keep his knowledge as to these matters to himself. It necessarily follows that no cause of action is stated. The relations arising between the plaintiff and defendant came solely from the contract, and we cannot see that they were in any sense confidential. Section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure treats of confidential relations existing between certain parties, but the facts of the present case do not bring it within the provisions of that section. We do not think the disclosures here made were any more confidential than if the dealer furnishing the lumber, or the contractor who was to do the work, had given notice to the public that the building was to be erected.

It would appear that the principal controversy in this case centers around the location of a certain stack of chimneys, and damages are claimed from plaintiff for an alleged mislocation of these chimneys upon the plans. The building was to be seven stories in height. The six upper floors were arranged for offices, and each was a duplicate of the other. During the progress of construction the seventh floor was changed to a photographic gallery. The chimneys were located according to the original plan, which contemplated this floor to be devoted to offices, and were not located in the proper place for a gallery, and this fact was the occasion of the controversy arising between these parties. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff upon the charge of negligence, and as the evidence is conflicting the judgment will not be disturbed upon this ground. The claim of defendant at the trial of the case was that plaintiff furnished a gallery plan for the seventh floor, locating the chimneys in the partition wall, and that when actually located they came through the floor at a distance of five feet therefrom. But this unfortunate condition was not attributable to the architect, and the court has so found. It arose from the delay practiced by the defendant in arriving at a determination to change the seventh floor from an office floor to that of a gallery; for, at the time this change was determined upon, the chimneys had been erected by the contractors according to the original plans. This fact is undisputed. When the gallery plan was adopted the chimneys were already there. The mischief was done, and there was no remedy for it. It may be assumed, for present purposes, that, prior to this time, plaintiff had furnished a gallery plan, showing the location of the chimneys to be in the partition wall; but at that time the chimneys had not been built, the contract for their building had not been let, and then they could have been placed according to such plan. A witness (Sullivan) was sworn, and placed upon the stand, when counsel for defendant said: "I want to prove that Mr. Sullivan got this sketch from Mr. Havens between the 18th and 20th of July, 1892. (Counsel referred to a lithographic sketch of the gallery, which was sent East to various photographers for the purpose of securing a tenant, but was not, and did not purport to be a copy of defendant's Exhibits D and E.)" An objection was sustained to the offer. Appellant's attorney stated at the time that he offered this evidence for what it was worth. The trial court concluded that as evidence it was worth nothing, and we think the conclusion right. The offer to prove this sketch was too general to be of any service. If the evidence had been introduced as offered, it would have been entirely too vague and indefinite to have given the court any light upon the issue then under consideration. And under any circumstances, in view of all the other evidence in the case, it is a matter of too slight importance to demand a reversal of the judgment. We find nothing further in the record demanding our consideration. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

ROSENBERGER v. PACIFIC COAST RY. CO. (L. A. 86.)[1]

MASTER AND SERVANT—TERM OF EMPLOYMENT—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 2010, providing that "a servant is presumed to have been hired for such length of time as the parties adopt for the estimation of wages, a hiring at a yearly rate is presumed to be for one year," an employment at a stated yearly salary, without other agreement as to the time, constitutes a contract for one year, and this will not be changed by the fact of the monthly payment of salary, nor by the custom of the employer, a railroad company, or of all railroad companies, to employ only by the month.

2. In an action by an employé wrongfully discharged to recover wages, he is not required, as a condition of recovery, to show whether or not he has endeavored to secure other employment, and, if so, with what result, such facts being matters of defense, as to which the burden of both pleading and proof rests on defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by E. B. Rosenberger against the Pacific Coast Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. Graves & Graves, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause was tried by the court and a jury, the plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial. The plaintiff claimed that he was employed by the defendant as an accountant for the period of one year, commencing November 24, 1893, at a salary of $1,800 per annum, payable in monthly installments of $150, and that he was discharged without cause March 24, 1894. This action was commenced, July 17, 1894, to recover three months' salary, from March 24 to June 24, 1893, amouting to $450, and for that sum he recovered judgment. The defense was that the employment was not for any definite time, and that his discharge was justifiable, because of his failure to give bond for the faithful discharge of his duties.

Prior to the employment in question, plaintiff was employed in a similar capacity in the offices of the Union Pacific Railway at Omaha, and had made an application for employment to the auditor of the Oregon Improvement Company, with which company defendant is connected. C. O. Johnson, defendant's superintendent, wrote plaintiff, November 4, 1893, to know whether he was still an applicant, and for information as to experience, salary required, etc. To this letter plaintiff replied, saying, as to salary, that it should be worth $1,800 or $2,000 a year. To this Johnson replied by telegraph, saying: "Yours ninth. Salary eighteen hundred. Change immediate if possible. Could probably arrange transportation. Wire earliest date." Plaintiff arrived at San Luis Obispo the night of November 24th, and on the morning of the 25th talked with Mr. Johnson an hour and a half, but plaintiff was unable to state with any particularity what was said, but, as he expressed it: "As near as I can give it, we arrived at an understanding to furnish me one year's employment upon satisfactory performance of my duties which I had undertaken. * * * I say that, as near as I can recollect, we arrived at that understanding." Mr. Johnson testified that, in this conversation, nothing was said as to salary, or the term for which he was employed, but that it related wholly to the duties he was to perform. Though plaintiff was paid monthly, up to the time of his discharge, at the rate of $150 per month, the correspondence constituted a hiring for a year. Section 2010 of the Civil Code provides: "A servant is presumed to have been hired for such length of time as the parties adopt for the estimation of wages. A hiring at a yearly rate is presumed to be for one year; a hiring at a daily rate, for one day; a hiring by piece work, for no specified time." The payment by the month, at the monthly proportion of the yearly rate, would not, of itself, be sufficient to change the contract to a hiring by the month; nor would the custom of the defendant, or of all railroad companies, to hire by the month convert the contract, created by the correspondence between the parties, which, under the Code, constituted a contract for a year, into a contract by the month. If the correspondence had not fixed the term for which the plaintiff was hired, section 2011 of the Civil Code, as well as the custom, would have made a hiring by the month. Upon this point, the instruction to the jury was right, and the verdict justified by the evidence.

The second defense, viz. the failure of the plaintiff to give a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, was not established at the trial. This was an affirmative defense, alleged by the defendant in its answer, and, unless established by evidence, would not prevent a recovery by the plaintiff. The appellant does not claim that the giving of a bond was originally made a condition of the employment, or that any reference thereto was made in the correspondence between the parties prior to the hiring, or until after the plaintiff had entered upon the discharge of his duties, but alleged, in its answer, that there was a general usage among railroad companies to require bonds from those of their employés whose duties required the handling of money, and that the plaintiff was aware of this usage, and contends from this that it entered into and formed a part of the contract of employment. To establish this defense, it was, therefore, necessary for the defendant to show, not only the existence of the usage, but also that the plaintiff was aware of its existence at the time of the hiring. The record, however, fails to show that any evidence of this nature was presented to the jury. Mr. Johnson, who was the only witness on the part of the defendant at the trial, testified that the plaintiff was discharged for the reason that he failed to furnish such a bond, but no question was asked him on behalf of the appellant respecting the usage of railroad companies in requiring bonds to be given, or the knowledge of the plaintiff of such usage. Upon his cross-examination, after he had stated that there was no other contract with the plaintiff with reference to the employment than the correspondence which was in evidence, he was asked what right he had to require him to give a bond, to which he replied: "Because he, in his letter, showed that he was sufficiently familiar with railroad usage to know the necessity of a bond in connection with his duties." This is the only evidence in the case with reference either to the usage or the knowledge of the plaintiff, and falls far short of establishing either. The letter referred to is entirely silent upon this subject, and gives no ground for inferring either the existence of the usage or the knowledge of the plaintiff. The request of the plaintiff that he give a bond, which was made by the defendant after he had entered upon his duties, did not make it one of the terms of the employment, nor were those terms varied by the fact that, in pursuance of that request, he filled out the blank application which was handed him.

The court properly refused the instruction asked by the defendant. While it is the duty of an employé who has been wrongfully discharged to seek other employment, and thus diminish the damages sustained by him, he is not required, as a condition of recovery, to show that he has made such endeavor and failed. The burden is on the defendant to show that he could, by diligence, have obtained employment elsewhere. Whatever compensation may have been received in such employment is also to be shown by the defendant in mitigation of damages; otherwise, the damages will be measured by the salary or wages agreed to be paid. Suth. Dam. § 693; Costigan v. Railroad Co., 2 Denio, 609; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362; Utter v. Chapman, 43 Cal. 279. The judgment and order are affirmed.

THOMAS et al. v. SAN DIEGO COLLEGE CO. et al. (No. 19,560.)

JUDGMENT — RIGHT TO CONTROL EXECUTION — PRACTICE—SUSPENDING SALE UNDER DECREE OF FORECLOSURE.

1. Trustees to whom a mortgage securing bonds is made payable, and who have foreclosed such mortgage, have not such absolute control over the decree as will preclude the court from ordering a sale of the property thereunder, over their objection, on motion of one of the bondholders, though he is also owner of the equity of redemption in the property.

2. An error in granting an order on a motion of which no notice was given the adverse party is without prejudice, where a motion to set aside the order is afterwards made and heard.

3. The depreciation of property owing to general business depression is not a sufficient reason to justify a court in ordering a suspension of the sale of mortgaged premises under a decree of foreclosure, and a plaintiff is not entitled to such an order, against the objection of other parties in interest, where the conditions have not changed since he took his decree and had an order of sale issue, under which no sale was made because of an irregularity.

Action by R. A. Thomas, William Collier, and J. E. Fishburn, trustees, against the San Diego College Company, George Hannahs, assignee, and O. J. Stough. Plaintiffs appeal from two orders after decree. Affirmed.

Trippet, Boone & Neale, for appellants. Conklin & Hughes, for respondents.

HAYES, C. This appeal is by the plaintiffs from two orders, made after judgment; the first directing the immediate issuance and execution of an order of sale, made upon the ex parte application of defendant Stough, and the second an order denying plaintiffs' motion asking that the order of sale be recalled, or that its execution be postponed.

The San Diego College Company issued 298 bonds, for the sum of $100 each, together with interest coupons thereto attached, and executed to the plaintiffs, as trustees, a mortgage upon several parcels of real estate to secure the same, the most valuable of which is known as the "College Campus," upon which there was a large building. The above-entitled action was brought to foreclose said mortgage, and a decree of foreclosure was entered therein December 22, 1893. The findings set out the names of the holders and owners of said bonds, and the number held by each, from which it appeared that defendant O. J. Stough was the holder of 157 of said bonds, 132 of which he owned, and the remaining 25 he held as collateral security, the college company being the owner, subject to the pledge thereof. Defendant Hannahs is the assignee of the college company, an insolvent debtor. Prior to the commencement of the foreclosure proceedings, and also prior to the insolvency of the college company, defendant Stough became the owner of the mortgaged property, but took it subject to said mortgage, and was, therefore, a necessary party to the foreclosure suit. The decree directed certain parcels of the mortgaged property to be first sold, and, on March 13, 1894, an order of sale was issued, and under it the sheriff sold all the property except that known as the "College Campus." But this sale, made on May 21, 1894, did not realize enough to pay the interest due on the bonds, and the condition upon which the remainder of the property could be sold was thereby fixed, and the "College Campus" property was afterwards advertised to be sold on July 2, 1894, but by direction of plaintiffs' attorneys it was readvertised, and was offered for sale on August 1, 1894, and on that day L. L. Boone and O. A. Trippet (two of plaintiffs' attorneys), "on their own responsibility and not for their clients," bid therefor $3,000, but refused to complete the purchase, because, as they claimed, the sale was made without legal notice. On August 28, 1894, the first of said orders was entered in said cause upon motion of Conklin & Hughes, attorneys for defendant Stough, but without notice to counsel for plaintiffs. The order recited that it appeared "to the satisfaction of the court that O. J. Stough, named as defendant in said cause, is the person most largely interested in the enforcement of said decree." A writ was accordingly issued that day, and counsel for plaintiff moved, upon notice to counsel for defendant Stough, to recall said writ, and postpone the sale until the further order of the court, upon the grounds (1) that said writ was issued without their request, knowledge, or consent; (2) "that it is against the interests of plaintiffs' cestuis que trustent to have a sale made of the mortgaged premises at the present time;" and (3) "that equity and justice to the bondholders named in the judgment herein demands that the sale of said premises be postponed." This motion was denied, and plaintiffs appeal from the order denying it, and from the ex parte order directing the writ to issue. The facts appear in a bill of exceptions.

In support of the second and third grounds of said motion, an affidavit made by L. L. Boone was read, to the effect that, as he was informed and believed, the improvements on the "College Campus" property cost $40,000; that the buildings thereon were designed for college purposes; that their chief value depends upon the use to which they might be put; that it is the opinion of real-estate agents that a purchaser could be found at the price of $12,000, but that, owing to the present depressed financial condition of the country it would take some time to find a purchaser at that price, say six months; that, since the last attempted sale, the attorneys for the bondholders, other than Stough, have been making efforts among themselves to raise sufficient money to enable them to bid $6,000; but, as the principal bondholder, Mr. Groh, lives in Nebraska, it would take some time to complete arrangements, in which event affiant believed a bid of $6,000 would be made; but that, if a sale were forced immediately, not more than $3,000 would be obtained.

Appellants contend that a writ for the enforcement of the judgment could not properly issue without their request or consent. There is no doubt about the general proposition laid down in Freeman on Executions (section 21), that, "as the judgment is the property of the plaintiff, he alone, while the property remains his, is entitled to exercise dominion over it," and "to allow another to control the writ is to turn the dominion of the property over to some one who is not entitled to it." But, it will be observed that the learned author is speaking of cases where the plaintiff "is the only one entitled to the fruits of the judgment," and in the same section he further says: "A stranger may acquire an equitable right to the benefit of the execution, or to the property upon which it is levied; and such equitable right may, in most cases, given him authority to sue out and conduct the process." So that it is the ownership of or interest in the judgment, or in the fruits of the execution, or in the property upon which it is levied, which authorizes a party to cause it to be issued. In Cortez v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 274, 24 Pac. 1011, it was held that a commissioner in partition who is allowed a fee for his services, the amount of which is fixed by the court and made a charge upon the land, is a "party in whose favor judgment is given," within the meaning of the word "party" as used in section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Kelly v. Israel, 11 Paige, 147, cited by respondent, there were several mortgages, in favor of different parties, and a decree of foreclosure had been entered in each, and the property ordered sold by a master under one of the decrees, but for the benefit of all. The master, having advertised the sale, postponed it at the request of the complainant's solicitor. One De Launy, the assignee of a junior mortgage for $20,000, but who was not made a party because his assignment had not been recorded, but who came in and stipulated to be bound by the decree, thereupon tendered to the complainant the full amount of the three decrees, with interest and costs, upon condition that he would assign the decrees to him; which offer was declined. Thereupon Rogers and Sagory, De Launy's assignors (who had assigned the mortgage as security only), and De Launy, petitioned the chancellor, praying that the complainant might be required to proceed and sell the premises, or that he should assign the decree to De Launy upon payment of the amount due. An order was thereupon made permitting such payment, and authorizing the party paying the same to proceed to sell the property. Upon appeal from this order, made by the vice chancellor, the court, among other things, said: "If the complainant neglects to proceed to a sale with due diligence, the court, upon the application of any other party interested in the execution of the decree, will commit the prosecution thereof to him; or, if the decree has already been placed in the hands of a master to be executed, will direct him to proceed to a sale without delay, notwithstanding any directions he may receive to the contrary from the complainant or his solicitor. Indeed, it is the duty of the master, without any special order of the court for that purpose, to proceed to a sale of the property with all reasonable diligence, if requested to do so by any party to the suit who must necessarily be injured by the delay if the sale is stayed without a sufficient cause."

In that case, the circumstances requiring the action of the court were stronger than here, and the action of the court was invoked by petition; but the principle involved there and in the case at bar is the same. The case here was also equitable. The decree required the sale of the property, and, as no provision was made in the decree for delaying the sale, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to proceed without unreasonable delay to have the decree executed; and, upon their failure to do so, it became the duty of the court, upon the complaint of any party to the suit interested in its execution, to direct that its execution be proceeded with. It would be a vain thing to bestow upon a court of equity the power to make a decree which it had no power to enforce, and yet such would be the case if its execution depended upon the pleasure or convenience of the plaintiffs. It is quite true, as urged by appellants, that the trustees were the proper plaintiffs in the action, and that the duty of prosecuting it rested upon them; but it does not follow that they had such absolute control of the action, or of proceedings under it, as is necessarily accorded to those who litigate in their own right, and not for the benefit of another. If, for example, they had refused to bring the action to foreclose the mortgage, it appearing that the circumstances made it their duty to do so, such refusal would not have tied the hands of the court or of the bondholders, and thereby prevented a foreclosure. They had no personal interest in prosecuting the suit or enforcing the decree, and were only instruments in the hands of the court, after they brought themselves within its jurisdiction, for the enforcement of the trust created for the benefit of others, and were therefore peculiarly within the power and control of the court. The respondent O. J. Stough owned 132 of said bonds, and held 25 more as collateral security for a debt of the college company, and was found by the court to be the person most largely interested. But it is contended that his interest was adverse to that of the other bondholders, inasmuch as he was the owner of the mortgaged property, subject to the mortgage, and therefore interested in having the property sold for a small sum, in order that he might redeem at a small cost. But the fact that defendant Stough was the owner of the mortgaged property is an additional reason in support of his right to make the application, as it shows that he was not only interested as a bondholder, but was interested in the property to be sold, and the question was, therefore, not one affecting his right to apply for the issuance of the order of sale, but one to be considered by the court as a ground for granting or refusing his motion.

But it is contended that the first order was granted upon the ex parte application of defendant Stough, and that plaintiffs have not consented to or ratified the order. Whether the court erred in granting the order without notice need not be considered, as plaintiffs were heard upon the motion to recall the order, or to stay its execution; and, if their motion was properly denied, they were not prejudiced by the first order. The interest of Mr. Stough was known from the beginning. He was made a party because he held the legal title to the mortgaged premises. Nor does there appear to have been any change in the condition of the property, or in the financial condition of the country between March 13, 1894, on which date an order of sale was issued at plaintiffs' request, and October 5, 1894, when the motion to recall the order was denied; and, between those dates, and after the sale of the other property, the "College Campus" was twice advertised for sale under plaintiffs' instructions, first for July 2d, and then for August 1st, and on the last-mentioned day the property was struck off to Boone and Trippet, who afterwards refused to complete their purchase because of some alleged irregularity or defect in the notice of sale. If July or August were a proper time to sell said property, it is difficult to understand why it might not properly be sold in September or October. In McGown v. Sanford, 9 Paige, 290, it was held that the fact that property was depressed in consequence of the general derangement of the finances, affidavits of the defendants and others of their belief that the politics and finances of the country would be settled at an extra session of congress, so as to greatly increase the value of property, were insufficient to justify the court in ordering a suspension of the sale of mortgaged premises under a decree of foreclosure; and in Astor v. Romayne, 1 Johns. Ch. 310, it was decided that the actual existence of war (1814), where there was no immediate danger of an invasion of the place where property was advertised to be sold, formed no sufficient ground for suspending the sale of mortgaged premises under a decree.

Of course, what has been said does not conflict with the well-established power of a court to refuse to confirm or to set aside a sale where special circumstances have prevented competition, and assurance is given that, upon a resale, a better price can be obtained, sufficient to justify the delay and additional expense. The uncertainty of any agreement or combination of the stockholders being effected, as suggested, is too great to justify a postponement of the sale. The condition of the country affecting the value of the property was well known long before, and ample time had elapsed after the decree was entered to consummate the arrangements, if such consummation were practicable. The orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the orders appealed from are affirmed.

SMITH v. LUNING CO. (No. 15,940.)[1]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — OPENING OF STREETS —LAYING OF SEWERS—CONTRACTS.

1. In an action on a contract whereby plaintiff undertook to lay a sewer in front of defendant's premises, it appeared that the city ordinances required for such work the consent of the superintendent, and that, before the superintendent could issue a permit for street work under a private contract, such contract must be for work on the entire length of a block, and be signed by the owners of three-fourths of the frontage; that the contract between the parties was for work in front of defendant's premises only, which occupied but one-fourth of the frontage. Held, that it was implied that plaintiff should procure the necessary signatures of other property holders, and a permit from the superintendent, and that, in the absence of such acts, he acquired no rights under the contract.

2. In such case, in the absence of evidence that plaintiff had a contract with the owners of the necessary frontage, he had no authority to do the work, and could confer none on another.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by plaintiff, Smith, against the Luning Company, to foreclose a lien acquired under an alleged contract for the construction of a sewer in front of defendant's premises. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. P. Langhorne, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement June 7, 1893, by which the plaintiff was to construct an ironstone pipe sewer in front of the property of the defendant on Leavenworth street, between Greenwich and Lombard streets, in San Francisco, to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and highways of said city and county. There was at this time an ordinance in force in the city and county making it a misdemeanor, punishable with fine or imprisonment, for any person to break up or disturb any public street, without the permission of the superintendent of streets and highways, and providing that that officer should not issue a permit for the doing of any street work under a private contract, unless said contract provided for doing the work on the entire length of the block, and was signed by the owners of three-fourths of the frontage of the property in said block. The defendant was the owner of one-fourth of the frontage on Leavenworth street between Greenwich and Lombard, and prior to this date, viz. April 11, 1893, one Daniel O'Connor had entered into a contract with the owners of the other three-fourths of the frontage on said street for building a sewer therein, and had obtained a permit from the superintendent of streets for constructing said sewer, which he afterwards completed, and on the 10th of August received from the superintendent of streets a certificate of his acceptance of said work. The plaintiff never received a permit from the superintendent of streets to do any work on this portion of Leavenworth street, and did not do any of the work in constructing the sewer. The plaintiff brought the present action to foreclose a lien upon the land of the defendant by virtue of its agreement with him for the construction of the sewer. Judgment was rendered in his favor, and the defendant has appealed.

As the construction of the sewer in front of the defendant's lot, without obtaining a permit therefor from the superintendent of streets, would have been in violation of the city ordinance, and have constituted a misdemeanor, any agreement between the plaintiff and defendant to construct it without obtaining such permit would have been unlawful, and could not form the basis of a civil action. Parties to an agreement are, however, deemed to have intended a lawful, rather than an unlawful, act; and their agreement is to be construed, if possible, as intending something for which they had the power to contract. As the obtaining a permit from the superintendent of streets was essential to rendering the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant valid, and as the instrument in question is silent upon that subject, the obtaining of such permit must be implied as a condition of the agreement between them, and the instrument signed by them as merely an inchoate agreement, which would become effective and binding only in case such permit should be issued. This construction is corroborated by the terms employed by the parties to the instrument. It purports to be made between the plaintiff, as party of the first part, "and certain owners of property, lots, and lands fronting on Leavenworth street, whose names are hereunto subscribed, each contracting severally, parties of the second part"; and in the body of the agreement the plaintiff agrees to and with the said "parties" of the second part, and they, "each for himself, and not one for the other," agree to pay "for the work done in front of his or her own property, respectively, and not in front of others, according to the ratio that his frontage bears to the whole frontage here represented." In view of the requirement of the ordinance that the owners of three-fourths of the frontage on the block should sign the contract before a permit could be granted, it is evident that in signing the instrument there was implied a condition that, before the defendant was to be bound thereby, the plaintiff was to procure other parties thereto sufficient to entitle him to obtain the permit. If the plaintiff had refused to obtain such permit, and the defendant had attempted to enforce the agreement in the form in which it is found, or to recover damages from the plaintiff for its breach, it would have been a sufficient answer for the plaintiff to say that the ordinance forbade him from doing the work.

The plaintiff, moreover, failed to show that he had performed the contract on his part. He testified that he "had not himself performed any of said work, but all of said work had been performed by one Daniel O'Connor"; and O'Connor also testified to the same effect. The plaintiff offered in evidence "a written instrument, signed by him," by which he purported to appoint Daniel O'Connor "my true and lawful attorney, for me, and in my name, place, and stead, to do and perform the work of constructing an ironstone pipe sewer in front of the property of the owners of lots and lands on Leavenworth street, under a certain written contract, heretofore entered into between the owners of lots and lands fronting on said Leavenworth street, between Greenwich and Lombard streets, and myself." The record does not show that this instrument was ever delivered to O'Connor, or that he accepted the appointment, or acted under its terms, or did any work for the plaintiff. But, irrespective of this, the plaintiff acquired no rights against the defendant by reason of this power of attorney, or any act of O'Connor in the performance of the work. At the time this instrument was signed, O'Connor had already entered into a contract for constructing the sewer throughout the entire block; and whatever work was performed by him in the construction of the sewer was done under the obligation assumed by him in this contract, and not by virtue of any authority derived from the plaintiff. The finding "that said O'Connor, under authority from plaintiff, performed for plaintiff the work described in plaintiff's said contract," is without any evidence to support it. The finding that the plaintiff and O'Connor "had a contract with all the owners of the 550 feet frontage of the lots and lands fronting the proposed work, except the frontage of defendant's property, for similar work to that mentioned in the contract between plaintiff and defendant," is also unsupported by the evidence. There is no evidence that the plaintiff was a party to any contract with the owner of any frontage on the work, excepting the frontage of the defendant; and, as the contract with the defendant gave him no authority to do the work of building the sewer, he could not, by virtue of that contract, confer any authority upon O'Connor to build the sewer. The defendant's liability to the plaintiff does not depend upon the construction of the sewer, but upon its construction by the plaintiff, and it was not sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the sewer had been constructed. He was also required to show that it had been constructed by him. The judgment and order are reversed.

WITTER v. McCARTHY CO. (L. A. 67.)

TRUSTS—RATIFICATION BY BENEFICIARIES—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—PRINCIPAL CHARGEABLE WITH KNOWLEDGE OF AGENT.

1. In an action to quiet title to an undivided interest in land, it appeared that defendant's grantor, as owner of a tract of land, after contracting to convey undivided interests in it to several persons, of whom plaintiff was one, and receiving part of the purchase price, by agreement with them dated March 1, 1888, conveyed the land to a trustee, a party to the agreement, with plenary power to sell and convey; that this agreement required the trustee to distribute the proceeds among the respective grantees in proportion to the interests held by each, deducting from the share of each the amount due from him on the purchase price, and pay the same to the grantor, less the amount of a mortgage which he had agreed to pay; that the trustee never sold the land, but, November 1, 1892, conveyed to each of the beneficiaries his undivided interest; that an interest of $^{25}/_{40}$ was conveyed to the grantor, who recorded the deed thereof; that the grantor subsequently acquired an $^{8}/_{40}$ interest conveyed to others by the trustee at the same time, and January 30, 1893, conveyed his entire interest ($^{33}/_{40}$) to defendant. There was no evidence that any of the parties to the agreement objected to the conveyances by the trustee, or that defendant did till filing its answer in this action, November 12, 1894. Held, that a finding that all the beneficiaries to the trust consented to and acquiesced in the conveyances by the trustee was warranted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by W. E. Witter against the McCarthy Company to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McKeeby & Appel, for appellant. Wicks & McDonald, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet the alleged title of plaintiff to an undivided $^{2}/_{40}$ parts of a tract of land containing about 130 acres, situate in the county of Los Angeles. The defendant, for want of information or belief, denied plaintiff's alleged title, and asserted title adverse to that claimed by plaintiff. The court below, without the intervention of a jury, found the facts and law in favor of plaintiff, and rendered its judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The facts relative to the question of title are substantially as follows: Prior to March 1, 1888, Edward McCarthy was sole owner of said tract of land, subject to a mortgage for $15,000, but prior to that day had contracted to sell to each of a number of persons undivided portions thereof, and had received from them portions of the purchase money. The plaintiff was one of such contractors, to whom, on February 15, 1888, Edward McCarthy had contracted to sell $^{2}/_{40}$ of said tract for the price of $6,000, of which $1,500 was paid at the date of the contract, and the remainder was to be paid, $1,125 in 3 months, $1,125 in 6 months, $1,125 in 9 months, and $1,125 in 12 months, from date of the contract. All parties interested desiring that the whole tract of 130 acres be subdivided and sold in lots to suit purchasers, and that the proceeds in money be distributed in proportion to the undivided interests of the parties, it was agreed that Edward McCarthy should convey the whole tract to J. I. Weed in trust to make such sales and conveyances and to distribute the proceeds thereof according to the agreement. This agreement was reduced to writing and executed by the three parties thereto, on March 1, 1888, to wit, Edward McCarthy, of the first part; W. E. Witter, G. P. Lyman, L. A. Thompson, and eight others (contractors for undivided interests), of the second part; and J. I. Weed, of the third part. The agreement confers upon the trustee plenary power "to grant, bargain, sell, and convey all or any portion of said land for such price and upon such terms as he shall deem best," and, as to his duties, contains the following: "It is further agreed that the trustee aforesaid shall receive and collect all moneys for sales of the land aforesaid, and pay all taxes, commissions, expenses of sale, of all kinds, and improvements authorized by the parties of the second part, and shall on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1888, declare a dividend in favor of the second parties of any and all moneys in his hands, in proportion to the interests of the respective parties therein, as shown by the contracts with Edward McCarthy aforesaid, and shall, out of said dividends, pay to Edward McCarthy the amounts due or to become due to him from second parties on said contracts, and the balance, if any there be, to the respective parties entitled thereto; and, in case the dividend shall not equal the installment due on said contract, second parties shall pay the balance of said installments at the times provided therein, and said trustee shall declare dividends, and apply the proceeds in the same manner every three months thereafter until all the installments on said contracts have been paid, and all of said property shall have been disposed of. It is further understood and agreed that whereas there is now a mortgage on said property to the amount of $15,000, with interest at 10% from March 1, 1888, of which Edward McCarthy has assumed the payment, that in case it becomes necessary or expedient to change or renew said mortgage the trustee shall, and he is thereby authorized to, execute such mortgage in his own name, and the amounts received by said trustee from said second parties, or in their behalf applicable to the installments due to Edward McCarthy, shall be applied to the liquidation of said mortgage, and shall be credited on the contracts of Edward McCarthy to second parties in the proportions to which they are respectively entitled thereto. It is further understood and agreed that in case of the failure or refusal of second parties, or any of them, to make the payments to Edward McCarthy provided for in said contracts, so as to thereby forfeit their rights to the interest in said land as provided in said contracts, the said trustee shall pay to Edward McCarthy all the proceeds of the sales of said lands to which the holder of said contract would otherwise be entitled to receive, and second parties agree to hold said trustee harmless in carrying out this provision." Contemporaneously with the execution of this tripartite agreement, Edward McCarthy conveyed the legal title of said tract of land to J. I. Weed by deed absolute upon its face, the trust being expressed only in said agreement. Weed never sold any part of said tract of land as contemplated by the trust agreement, but on November 1, 1892, four years and eight months after having accepted the trust, he conveyed to each of the beneficiaries an undivided part thereof equal to his beneficial interest in the whole. To plaintiff he thus conveyed $^{2}/_{40}$, that being the interest which plaintiff had contracted to purchase from Edward McCarthy as aforesaid, and for which he had fully paid according to the terms of his said contract with Edward McCarthy, and had also settled his proportion of the expenses of the trust to the satisfaction of the trustee. To Edward McCarthy the trustee conveyed on the same day (November 1, 1892) $^{25}/_{40}$ of the land. Afterwards Edward McCarthy acquired from other parties to the tripartite agreement $^{8}/_{40}$ which had been conveyed to them by the trustee on November 1, 1892, as aforesaid. On January 30, 1893, Edward McCarthy, Charles McCarthy, Emeline McCarthy, and Mrs. L. E. Hensler executed a deed purporting to convey to the defendant corporation the land in question and other property, this being the only evidence of defendant's legal title to the land. Yet defendant objected to this deed as being irrelevant, and claims nothing under it. It was relevant, however, as tending to prove that Edward McCarthy consented to and acquiesced in the aforesaid conveyances by the trustee to the beneficiaries, and for this purpose it was, presumably, introduced by plaintiff.

The only grounds upon which appellant claims a reversal of the judgment are that the conveyances of the land by the trustee to the beneficiaries on November 1, 1892, were void for the alleged reason that they were made without the consent of all the beneficiaries, and that the finding by the court that all the beneficiaries of the trust did consent to and acquiescence in those conveyances is not justified by the evidence. The finding of the court is that "said J. I. Weed, at the request of Edward McCarthy, grantor of defendant, and with the consent of the other parties in interest, conveyed the entire property to the respective parties in interest, and that such conveyances were accepted by the various parties, and were acquiesced in by the grantor of this defendant and all other parties to said agreement [tripartite agreement] set out in defendant's answer." The evidence tending to prove this finding as applied to Edward McCarthy, grantor of defendant, is (1) that he accepted and recorder a deed from Weed for $^{25}/_{40}$ of the land on the same day (November 1, 1892) that deeds were made to all the other beneficiaries; (2) that he subsequently purchased the interests conveyed by Weed on the same day to two other beneficiaries, amounting to $^{8}/_{40}$ of the land; (3) that thereafter, on January 30, 1893 (three months after the said conveyances by Weed), he conveyed all his interest in the land in question, then amounting to $^{33}/_{40}$, to the defendant corporation; and (4) there is no evidence or pretense that Edward McCarthy, or any one of the parties of the second part to the tripartite agreement, ever objected to any one of said conveyances by Weed of November 1, 1892, nor that the defendant corporation ever objected thereto before it filed its answer herein, on November 12, 1894,—over 2 years after said conveyances were executed, and 21 months after it had accepted a conveyance of $^{33}/_{40}$ of the land from Edward McCarthy, who claimed title under said Weed conveyances alone. I think this evidence, though merely circumstantial, is sufficient to justify the finding in question. Besides, it would not be consistent for the defendant to claim title to $^{33}/_{40}$ of the land under or through the Weed conveyances, and at the same time to deny the title of plaintiff and others who claim the other $^{7}/_{40}$, from the same source. But, as before remarked, defendant professes to claim nothing in this action under the conveyance from Edward McCarthy of January 30, 1893, and therefore claims no title at all unless it was acquired from some other source, or in some other manner. There is no evidence, however, of any other title, legal or equitable, in the defendant, except an instrument purporting to be an assignment by Charles McCarthy, Minnie A. Austin, and Mrs. L. E. Hensler, by their attorney in fact, James P. McCarthy, to the defendant, of all moneys and property to which they (assignors) "may be entitled from the proceeds of the sales of the land described" in the tripartite agreement, and in the deed from Edward McCarthy to J. I. Weed, "which property was deeded to said J. I. Weed in trust for certain purposes in said agreement mentioned." Yet even this assignment bears no date, and there is nothing in the record indicating when it was executed. Edward McCarthy is named in the body of the instrument as one of the assignors, but he does not appear to have signed it. Nor is there anything in the record indicating when the defendant was organized as a corporation. It is stipulated that, during all the transactions involved in this action, James P. McCarthy was the general attorney in fact for Edward McCarthy, Charles McCarthy, Mrs. L. E. Hensler, and Minnie A. Austin, and that he was president of the defendant corporation from its organization until the trial of this action. It is further stipulated that he expressly approved of the conveyances by Weed (of November 1, 1892) to plaintiffs Lyman and Thompson of the $^{7}/_{40}$ not conveyed to Edward McCarthy. Therefore at the time he executed said assignment for Charles McCarthy, Minnie A. Austin, and Mrs. Hensler, he had actual notice of the conveyances by Weed to plaintiffs Lyman and Thompson of $^{7}/_{40}$ of the land; and such notice to him was notice to said assignors for whom he acted as attorney in fact, and also notice to the defendant corporation (the assignee), of which he was then the president. It thus appears that at the time James P. McCarthy executed the assignment he was the agent of both parties thereto, and consequently both parties are chargeable with notice of all facts affecting or relating to the assignment then known to him, and, among them, the facts that, with his written approval, Weed had conveyed $^{7}/_{40}$ of the land to plaintiffs Lyman and Thompson who had paid the stipulated purchase money therefor to Edward McCarthy, defendant's grantor, of all his interest in the land, which could have been only $^{33}/_{40}$. Moreover, the assignment does not purport to be an assignment of any interest in the land, nor of any specific interest in the tripartite agreement. It is merely a quitclaim of all right to moneys which the assignors "may be entitled to" from sales of the land, both parties to the assignment then knowing that $^{7}/_{40}$ of the land had been conveyed to plaintiffs Lyman and Thompson, provided that the aforesaid conveyances by Weed were valid. Thus we are brought back to the questions first above stated and answered. It is unquestionable that the conveyances by Weed to the beneficiaries of the trust are valid if all the beneficiaries consented thereto at the time they were made, and thereafter acquiesced therein until the commencement of this action; and from the conclusion above arrived at, that the finding of such consent and acquiescence by the lower court is justified by the evidence, it necessarily follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

HUMBOLDT SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. BURNHAM et al. (S. F. 190.)[1]

MORTGAGE—DECEASED MORTGAGOR—FORECLOSURE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY—AMOUNT OF JUDGMENT—ACTION ON NOTE—COMPLAINT.

1. A complaint for foreclosure of a mortgage, alleging that plaintiff, within the proper time, presented its claim, duly verified, for the amount of the mortgage, against the estate of a deceased mortgagor, and that the same was duly approved, allowed, and filed, sufficiently alleges a presentation of the claim, as against a general demurrer, where the claim was not attached to nor set out in the complaint.

2. A complaint which alleged that a note counted on was given by Joel S. J. and Georgia C. J., in words and figures as therein set out, and set out a note signed "J. S. J." and "G. C. J.," sufficiently identified Joel S. J. and Georgia C. J. as signers of the note, respectively, as "J. S. J." and "G. C. J."

3. Taxes and insurance paid by a mortgagee under authority of the mortgage, and which are secured by it after his claim against the estate of the deceased mortgagor has been presented and allowed, are properly included in judgment of foreclosure without presentation of a claim therefor against the estate.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by the Humboldt Savings & Loan Society against Georgia C. Burnham and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, Georgia C. Burnham and another appeal. Affirmed.

J. D. Boyer, for appellants. A. H. Loughborough, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage. Defendants, other than Georgia C. Burnham and James D. Boyer, made default. The two latter demurred to the complaint. Their demurrer was overruled, and, upon failure to answer, judgment was entered against all the defendants, foreclosing the mortgage. From the judgment the two named defendants appeal upon the judgment roll, the only questions made being as to the sufficiency of the complaint.

1. The contention that the complaint does not state a cause of action, for want of a sufficient averment of presentation of the mortgage claim to the estate of Joel S. Josselyn, deceased, is ill founded. The particular objection is that the complaint does not allege, in terms, either that the claim contained a description of the mortgage, with a reference to the date, volume, and page of its record, or that it was accompanied with a copy thereof. The averment was that the plaintiff did, within the proper time, "present to said executrix its claim against the estate of Joel S. Josselyn, deceased, for the amount due and to become due on the said note and mortgage, and that the said claim was duly verified in all respects according to law, and was duly allowed and approved by said executrix and by the judge of said court, and that the same was duly filed on the 20th day of March, 1890, in the office of the clerk of said court, in the matter of the estate of said deceased." The claim was not set out, or attached to the complaint. We deem this a sufficient averment of the ultimate fact of presentation, as against a general demurrer; and the demurrer here was no less a general one because it undertook to specify the particulars wherein the complaint failed to state a cause of action. Whether the claim, as presented, was sufficient in form, or properly presented, was a matter of evidence, of which the general allegation made was sufficient to authorize proof. In Bank v. Charles, 86 Cal. 322, 24 Pac. 1019, relied on by appellant, the claim was set out in full in the complaint, and it appeared affirmatively therefrom that the presentation counted upon was insufficient; and the ruling there made that the demurrer should have been sustained was upon that ground, the court saying, "The complaint shows upon its face that the only presentation of the claim was as above stated, and makes the presentation a part of the complaint, as an exhibit." It was not a case, therefore, as it may be conceded is the case here, of a mere defective averment of the essential fact of presentation, but an averment from which it appeared that no proper presentation was ever had. The other cases relied upon by appellants we do not regard as affecting the question under consideration.

2. The further objection that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain is equally untenable. This objection is based upon the fact that the complaint alleges the note counted upon to have been given by Joel S. Josselyn and Georgia C. Josselyn, while the note, which is set out in full, appears to have been signed "J. S. Josselyn" and "G. C. Josselyn;" and it is said that there is nothing to show that the last-named persons are the same two parties alleged to have executed the note, and that, for all that appears, they may be entirely different individuals. But it is alleged that "Joel S. Josselyn and said defendant Georgia C. Burnham, then the wife of the said Joel S. Josselyn, * * * then and there made, signed, and delivered to said plaintiff, the payee therein named, their certain promissory note in writing, which said promissory note is in words and figures following, to wit," and then follows the note. This was quite sufficient to identify the parties signing the note as Joel S. and Georgia C. Josselyn.

3. Nor was it improper to include in the decree the items paid out by plaintiff for taxes and insurance on the mortgaged property. These expenditures were covered and secured by the mortgage, and were paid under the authority therein given. Having been paid subsequent to the presentation of the claim, for the protection of the property, they were properly allowed, on foreclosure, without demand or presentation. Society v. Hutchinson, 68 Cal. 52, 8 Pac. 627. The judgment is affirmed.

WEAVER v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 16,017.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—JUDGMENTS AGAINST—CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO—INDEBTEDNESS PAYABLE FROM SURPLUS REVENUE—EXHAUSTION OF FUNDS.

1. Under the provisions of the constitution (article 11, § 18) and of the San Francisco city and county charter (sections 95–98), the board of supervisors are permitted to make expenditures, for purposes other than those enumerated, only from the surplus revenue of the year in which such indebtedness is incurred, and one who becomes a creditor for such purposes must take notice of the limitation, and of the fact that, should the revenues for the current year become exhausted, though by the payment of claims arising after his own, he has no means of obtaining payment.

2. The fact that the only fund from which a claim against a municipal corporation can be paid is exhausted constitutes no defense to an action thereon, but the proper form of judgment to be entered is one specifying the fund from which it is payable, in that, as in all cases of recovery for indebtedness incurred by a municipality, the constitution (article 11, § 18) having limited their liability therefor to the revenues for the fiscal year in which contracted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by one Weaver against the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. H. T. Creswell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, in the months of November and December, 1892, performed certain labor in plumbing, gasfitting and tinning upon certain engine houses of the defendant, under an employment by the officers in charge of the fire department of the city, amounting in value to the sum of $4,517.17. Itemized demands therefor, duly verified, were presented to the officers of the defendant, and approved by the standing committee on the fire department of the board of supervisors, but the auditing committee of said board refused to allow the claims, and they were never audited or allowed. The present action was brought to recover judgment against the defendant for the amount of these demands. The complaint was filed May 9, 1893, and the answer upon which the case was tried was filed February 21, 1894. In its answer the defendant sets forth facts showing the sources and amount of the income and revenue of the city and county for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and the different modes in which this income and revenue had been disposed of and expended; that not only had this entire revenue and income been exhausted, but that, for debts and liabilities incurred during that fiscal year, there had been allowed and audited by the proper officers of the city demands against the city amounting to upward of $200,000 in excess of the amount of this income, and that this deficiency was represented by allowed, audited, and registered demands for the payment of which no money had been provided; that, in addition to this deficiency, there were outstanding demands against the general fund amounting to the further sum of upward of $100,000, which had never been audited, and that the demands of the plaintiff were payable only out of this general fund, and had never been allowed, audited, or registered; that, at the time this action was commenced, viz. May 9, 1893, the audited and registered demands against the city, payable out of the general fund, together with the preferred claims for salaries during the remainder of the fiscal year, far exceeded in amount the income and revenue of the fiscal year then remaining in said general fund; and that, on said 9th day of May, 1893, there was not, and had not since been, any money in the treasury of the defendant, or in any of the funds thereof, which could be applied to the payment of the plaintiff's demands. The cause was tried by the court, who made findings in accordance with these averments of the answer, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed directly from the judgment upon the findings contained in the judgment roll.

The principles governing the decision of this case, as well as the provisions of law applicable thereto in support of the judgment of the superior court, have been so frequently pointed out by this court that it is only necessary to cite a few of the cases in which they are found: Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641; Shaw v. Statler, 74 Cal. 258, 15 Pac. 833; Schwartz v. Wilson, 75 Cal. 502, 17 Pac. 449; Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 Pac. 1128; McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 177, 40 Pac. 231; Smith v. Broderick, 107 Cal. 644, 40 Pac. 1033. In addition to the provisions in the constitution (article 11, § 18) referred to in the foregoing cases, the consolidation act, or charter of the city and county of San Francisco, contains provisions applicable to the present case. By section 71 of that act, the board of supervisors is directed, when making the levy of taxes for the fiscal year, to apportion and divide the taxes so levied and to be collected and applied to the several funds therein named, one of which is the general fund, and, at the close of each fiscal year, "the said board shall direct the treasurer to transfer all surplus moneys of all funds excepting the school fund, after liquidating or providing for all outstanding demands upon said funds, to the general fund." Section 76 declares: "The general fund consists of all moneys in the treasury not designated and set apart by law to a specified use, and of the overplus of any special fund remaining after the satisfaction of all demands upon it." A surplus fund is also provided for, which is defined, in section 76, to "consist of any moneys belonging to the general fund, remaining in the treasury after the satisfaction of all demands due and payable which are specified in the first fourteen subdivisions in section 95." This surplus fund is further defined in the fifteenth subdivision of section 95 to be the surplus of money that shall remain in the treasury "at the end of each fiscal year, and after every lawful demand on the treasury then due and payable, or to accrue for that year, shall have been actually paid, taken up and cancelled, and record thereof made in the proper books, or cash in the treasury have been set apart and reserved equal to the amount of said demands that may then be outstanding, or to accrue for that year." It is further provided, in this subdivision of section 95, that payments of demands on the treasury of said city and county may be made for "expenditures previously authorized by the board of supervisors in the lawful exercise of their powers for objects other than those specified in the preceding fourteen subdivisions of this section, out of this surplus fund as specified in sections ninety-seven and ninety-eight, but not otherwise." The claim of the plaintiff is not included within the preceding 14 subdivisions of this section. Section 97 declares that the powers of the board of supervisors enumerated in this act, so far as the exercise thereof may involve the expenditure of money otherwise than for the objects enumerated in the first 14 subdivisions of section 95, "shall be deemed to extend only to authorizing the appropriation and application of any surplus moneys remaining in the treasury during any one fiscal year, to the objects specified in such enumeration of powers, after the demands mentioned in the first fourteen subdivisions of section ninety-five, due and payable during such fiscal year, shall have been paid." And section 98 provides: "If any expenditures not authorized by this act be incurred, they can never be paid out of the treasury, nor shall they be deemed to constitute or lay the foundation of any claim, demand or liability, legal, equitable or otherwise, against the said city and county. If expenditures be incurred which are authorized by this act to be paid out of the surplus funds in the treasury, but not for the preferred objects specified in section ninety-six (those enumerated in the first fourteen subdivisions of section ninety-five), such expenditures can only be paid out of such surplus funds and revenues strictly appertaining to the fiscal year in which such expenditures have been ordered, or the contracts therefor entered into, and cannot be carried forward and paid out of any revenues accruing and receivable into the treasury for any subsequent year."

The court finds that the board of supervisors, at the time of levying the tax to provide for the expenses of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, estimated the expenses of the general election to be held November 8, 1892, to be $140,000, and provided that sum and no more for that purpose; but that claims and demands for the expenses of said election, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $293,998.23, had been allowed and paid by the treasurer out of the general fund. This excess of the expenses of the election over the estimate therefor, and its payment out of the general fund, however much it may have depleted the fund out of which the plaintiff would have been entitled to receive payment for his labor, does not give him a right to receive such payment out of the income and revenues of the city for any other year, subsequent to that in which his claim accrued. Whether the expenses thus incurred were proper or not cannot be investigated in this action, since those by whom they were incurred, or to whom they were payable, are not parties hereto. The court finds that these claims and demands were allowed by the board of election commissioners "under the authority vested in it," and it must therefore be assumed that all of these expenses were necessary, and were properly incurred, and, consequently, that their payment was a legitimate disbursement of the revenues of the city. The expense of this election was one of the items which the board of supervisors was called upon to consider when determining the amount of tax to be levied for that fiscal year; and, if the estimate which they made of the amount which would be expended was inadequate, the payment of the expenses incurred was not thereby limited to the amount of the estimate, any more than would be the payment of any other expense which is payable out of the general fund, where the actual expense proved to be greater than was estimated as the basis of the tax to be levied. Whoever deals with a municipality does so with notice of the limitation of its powers, and with notice, also, that he can receive compensation for his labor or materials only from the revenues and income previously provided for the fiscal year during which his labor and materials are furnished, and with the knowledge, too, that all other persons dealing with the municipality have the same rights to compensation, and are subject to the same limitations, as he is. Even though, at the time of making his contract, there are funds in the treasury sufficient to meet the amount of his claim, he is charged with notice that these funds are liable to be paid out for municipal expenditures before his contract can mature into a claim against the city, and if others, whose claims have accrued subsequent to his, are able to intercept these funds, he is in the same condition as any creditor who has dealt with one whose assets are exhausted before he presents his claim. He acquires no claim in the nature of a lien upon these funds for the amount of his demand, nor is there any legal obligation upon the municipality, any more than upon any other debtor, to pay the claims against it in the order in which they are incurred, unless they are presented in that order, and in such condition and with such formalities as entitle the claimant to immediate payment. In dealing with the municipality, he must rely upon the integrity of its officers that they will not incur any liabilities during the year in excess of the income and revenues provided for that year, and, as a prudent man, he will ascertain, not only the amount of that income, but also the amount of the claims already existing, and of those that are likely to be incurred.

The court finds that, of the amount of the plaintiff's claim, $2,290.48 was furnished between the 22d of November and the 1st of December, 1892, and the sum of $2,226.69 between the 13th and 29th days of December. By the act of March 26, 1878 (St. 1878, p. 556), the amount which the board of supervisors may appropriate for the expenses of the fire department, which include the claim of the plaintiff, is $80,000 in each year. By section 1 of the act of February 25, 1878, p. 111, commonly known as the "One-Twelfth Act," it is made unlawful "to contract for, or render payable in the present or future, in any one month, any demand or demands against the treasury" in excess of one-twelfth of this amount. Section 2 declares: "All contracts, authorizations, allowances, payments and liabilities to pay, made or attempted to be made in violation of section one of this act, shall be absolutely void, and shall never be the foundation or basis of a claim against the treasury of said city and county." The court finds that, during the month of November, 1892, and prior to the 22d day thereof, the board of supervisors had allowed and ordered paid demands against said fund of $80,000, amounting to the sum of $10,645.49. It follows that the plaintiff has no right of action for the labor and materials furnished during the month of November. The court does not, however, find that any part of the appropriation applicable to the month of December had been allowed or ordered paid, and it must be assumed that at the time the plaintiff was employed to render the services in December, there was an unexpended portion of this appropriation with which to meet his claim. The contract between him and the city was therefore valid in its inception, and, upon its completion, he had a valid right of action against the city, which he was authorized to have established by the judgment of a court of record. The depletion of the treasury, or the application of the funds therein to other claims before the trial of the action, was not a satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, nor did it constitute a defense to his action. He was still entitled to a judgment, with the direction therein that it should be satisfied only out of the income or revenue provided by the city for the fiscal year in which the liability in his favor was incurred. This, indeed, would be the appropriate form at all times in which to render a judgment against a municipality, whenever, in an action brought against it for any liability or indebtedness incurred by it, the court shall determine that judgment should be given against it. As the constitution limits the obligation of the municipality, upon any indebtedness or liability that it may incur, to the income and revenue provided by it for that year in which such indebtedness or liability is incurred, the means for satisfying a judgment which establishes that obligation is equally limited, and it is eminently suitable that the mode of satisfaction should be made a part of the judgment. See Smith v. Broderick, 107 Cal. 644, 40 Pac. 1033. Whether the income for that year has been exhausted or not is immaterial. The rights of the parties are measured by the terms of the constitution, and not by this fact. In the present case it appears, from the findings of the court, that the whole amount of the tax that was levied for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, has not been collected, and it may be that, in the future, there will be received into the treasury, from this tax, a sufficient amount of money from which the plaintiff's claim may be satisfied. At all events, he has the right to a judgment against the city for the amount of his claim, with the limitation that it shall be satisfied out of the income and revenue provided for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, after the payment of such other demands against such income as are properly payable in preference to his own.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the sum of $2,226.69, and directing that the same be satisfied out of the income and revenues of the defendant provided for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

MARSH v. HANLEY et al., Supervisors. (L. A. 180.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—ELECTIONS.

St. 1895, p. 207, regulating the holding of primary elections, which is made applicable only to counties which cast a certain number of votes at the last election, which makes it applicable to only two counties, is unconstitutional as special legislation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Suit by one Marsh against one Hanley and others, supervisors of Los Angeles county. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. A. Donnell, for appellants. M. W. Conkling, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a suit by a taxpayer to enjoin the defendants from appropriating public funds of the county for the purchase of ballot boxes and the payment of other expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of the act of March 27, 1895, commonly known as the "Primary Election Law" (St. 1895, p. 207). The claim of the plaintiff is that the act is local and special, and therefore unconstitutional and void. This contention was sustained by the superior court of Los Angeles, and the injunction granted. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

There can be no question that the act is local and special, since, by its terms, it is to "apply to, take effect in and be in force only in counties of the first and second classes"; that is to say, in San Francisco and Los Angeles. Section 26, p. 218. The constitution allows the classification of counties according to population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of county officers in proportion to their duties (article 11, § 5), and for that purpose a classification has been established under which San Francisco falls into the first class and Los Angeles falls into the second class. But the fact that these and the other counties of the state have been classified for a purpose which the constitution recognizes as a proper and necessary one does not relieve a law relating to other and distinct matters from the objection that it is local and special if by its terms it is limited in its application or operation to one or more classes of counties less than the whole. Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 620, 28 Pac. 834, and 29 Pac. 1092; Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66; City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604; Bloss v. Lewis (Cal.) 41 Pac. 1081; Turner v. Siskiyou Co. (Cal.) 42 Pac. 434; Darcy v. City of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500; Denman v. Broderick, 11 Cal. 48, 43 Pac. 516. This act, therefore, not being a regulation of the compensation of county officers, is local and special, notwithstanding it embraces two counties, each of which constitutes one of the classes defined by the county government act; and the only question to be determined is whether or not the subject of the act is one of those as to which special and local legislation is inhibited by the constitution. The act is intended to regulate primary elections, i. e. the election of delegates to nominating conventions, and not only in its general scope and nature, but by various specific provisions, is made an essential part of the general election law of the state. By section 21, for example, it is provided that no candidate can have his name printed upon any ballot as a candidate for public office at any general election in this state unless he shall have been nominated by a convention composed of delegates chosen as in the act provided, or nominated by a certain percentage of electors as in the Political Code prescribed. The entire act presents an elaborate scheme for the conduct of the primary elections by sworn officers whose certificates of election will constitute the credentials of the delegates to the various political conventions,—state, district, and local. Not only is it a general law, which should have a uniform operation (Const. art. 1, § 11), and not only is the case to which it applies one in which "a general law can be made applicable" (Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 33), but from an inspection of its terms it clearly appears that it was designed originally to apply uniformly throughout the state. This is shown by various expressions scattered throughout its first 24 sections, in which the original scheme of the law is embodied. Section 25, which is in some respects incongruous with other portions of the act, seems to have been a later addition. It provides for the election in presidential years of delegates to a state convention to choose delegates to a national convention, and, by a proviso, is made obligatory only in counties which cast 9,000 votes and upward at the last preceding general election. But by section 26 this proviso is superseded by the provision limiting the application and operation of the act to counties of the first and second classes. But for these two sections we should have a law complete and full, capable of applying, and intended to apply, in every part of the state. It is not a matter for argument or speculation, therefore, whether this is a case in which a general law could be made applicable. This act, by its terms, shows that such is the case; and, if it did not, it is apparent that a law regulating the election of public officers by prescribing the exclusive means by which candidates of the great political parties can secure a place on the official ballot is necessarily a law of a general nature and capable of uniform operation. The act is therefore unconstitutional by reason of its conflict with section 11 of article 1, and subdivision 33 of section 25 of article 4, of the constitution above cited. It is also in conflict with the more specific provisions of subdivision 11 of section 25 of article 4, prohibiting local or special laws for conducting elections.

Counsel for appellants have made no answer to these objections to the validity of the act, and we know of none which can be made. An amicus curiæ makes an urgent appeal in behalf of the law on the ground that it is a good law, designed to prevent, and capable of preventing, evils of great and increasing magnitude, but he does not deny that section 26 makes it unconstitutional if it is allowed to stand. He suggests, however, that we should hold that section void (he would have to include section 25 also) and the act valid throughout the state. If we should do so, we would be imposing upon the whole state a law which it is clear the legislature intended to apply in only two counties, and which would not otherwise have passed. This we cannot do, as it would be nothing short of legislation.

If the act is as beneficient as is claimed, it is to be regretted that it cannot stand; but, as we have more than once been compelled to remind the defenders of special and local laws, we cannot have the advantage of such legislation when it happens to be good without changing a constitution which absolutely prohibits it upon the assumption that it is generally bad.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

ALBERT v. HOBLER. (No. 19,589.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1896.)

State Lands—Right to Purchase—What Land is "Suitable for Cultivation"—Question of Fact.

1. Whether land is "suitable for cultivation" within Const. art. 17, § 3, allowing state lands suitable for cultivation to be granted to actual settlers only, is a question of fact.

2. The fact that land does not produce "ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities" does not render it unsuitable for cultivation, within Const. art. 17, § 3, impliedly allowing lands of such character to be granted to persons not actual settlers, but expressly providing that state lands "suitable for cultivation" can be granted only to actual settlers.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Albert against Charles J. Hobler. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Haunch, for appellant. E. T. Casper, and J. W. Wiley, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is prosecuted to determine the conflicting claims of plaintiff and defendant as to their respective rights to purchase from the state of California certain school lands, viz. the N. E. ¼ of section 8, township 25 S., range 26 E., M. D. B. and M., and arises upon a contest initiated in the office of the surveyor-general of said state, and by him referred to the superior court of Kern county for trial. Findings and judgment went in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Both parties applied to purchase the land in question, and both applications were regular and sufficient in form; and the question as to which party is entitled to purchase it depends upon the character of the land. The defendant's application was first in point of time, and if the land "is not suitable for cultivation," as he alleged in his application, he was entitled to purchase without being an actual settler thereon; but, if said land "is suitable for cultivation," as plaintiff alleged in his application, he, having settled upon and occupied it, is entitled to purchase it. But two questions are discussed in appellant's brief: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the land in question "is suitable for cultivation"; and (2) that the township plat put in evidence by the plaintiff did not prove that said land had been sectionized and selected by the state more than three months before his application to purchase, as alleged in the complaint.

1. Whether said land "is suitable for cultivation" is a question of fact. Dillon v. Saloude, 68 Cal. 271, 9 Pac. 162; Fulton v. Brannan, 88 Cal. 456, 26 Pac. 506. Several witnesses called by the plaintiff testified that it was, while witnesses called for defendant testified that it had been cultivated for seven successive years, and that it would not, by the ordinary processes of tillage, produce ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities. That the land in question is suitable for cultivation is therefore clearly proved, unless the production of ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities by the ordinary processes of tillage is the test by which it is to be determined. That is the test prescribed in section 3495 of the Political Code; but in Fulton v. Brannan, supra, after quoting sections 2 and 3 of article 17 of the constitution of this state, and declaring the general policy to be that lands should be held in small tracts, and constitute homes for its owners, it was said:

"No narrow construction of the only words in the section [article 17, § 3] open to construction—'suitable for cultivation'—should limit this policy. The effort should be rather to extend than to restrict, for the policy is plainly that the section should include all, so far as possible. The constitution classifies all lands as suitable or not suitable for cultivation. For the purposes of this section neither the legislature nor the courts can classify them otherwise, and it must follow that whether a particular tract belongs to the one class or the other must always be a question of fact." In Manley v. Cunningham, 72 Cal. 236, 13 Pac. 622, it was said: "The phrase, 'suitable for cultivation,' includes all lands ready for occupation, and which, by ordinary farming processes, are fit for agricultural purposes." But the precise question here made was decided in Jacobs v. Walker, 90 Cal. 43, 48, 27 Pac. 48. It was there said: "Nor did the fact that it would not, when cleared, produce ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities, render it so. To make an average, some lands must necessarily produce less than the average, while others produce more; and it would seem absurd to say that all lands producing less than the average must for that reason be held unsuitable for cultivation." In view of these decisions, it is not necessary to comment upon the inference which might be drawn from the actual cultivation of the land for seven consecutive years, and which included five seasons before and two seasons after defendant's application to purchase.

As to appellant's second point, it could only be material for the plaintiff to state in his application to purchase, or to allege in his complaint, or prove upon the trial, that the township in which the land in controversy is situated had been sectionized more than 60 days before his application was made, where there was an "adverse occupant" at the time of his application to purchase; and, as there was no adverse "occupant," the statement that the township had been sectionized and the plat filed more than 60 days before his application was wholly immaterial, and the allegation of that fact in his complaint, and proof thereof upon the trial, was unnecessary. However, that allegation in the complaint was expressly admitted in the answer. The evidence that plaintiff was entitled to purchase and that the defendant was not is satisfactory, and the general findings of the court, as well as the special findings, noticed by appellant, are therefore justified by the evidence; nor do we find any errors in rulings upon the trial of which appellant could complain. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

BABCOCK v. CHASE et al. (S. F. 8.)

CANCELLATION OF VOLUNTARY DEED—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE.

An assignee in insolvency has no standing to maintain an action to set aside an absolute deed, made without consideration, by the insolvent, at a time when he had no creditors, there being no allegations of fraud, nor any upon which to found an express or implied trust.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Henry C. Babcock, assignee in insolvency of William I. Wilson, against James P. Chase and another, to set aside certain deeds to real property. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wells Whitmore, for appellant. Henry Miller, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff, as the assignee of one William I. Wilson, an insolvent debtor, brings this action to set aside two certain deeds of real property, and to have it adjudged that said real property is the property of said insolvent. As shown by the complaint, some five years prior to the adjudication that Wilson was an insolvent debtor, and at a time when he had no creditors, as far as the pleading indicates, he made and delivered a deed absolute in form to one Priscilla Burtch of the aforesaid real estate, this deed expressing a consideration therein of five dollars. It is further alleged that subsequently thereto said Priscilla Burtch, by a deed absolute on its face, and for an expressed consideration of five dollars, deeded all of said property to the defendants Martenstein and Chase. The complaint also alleges that both of these deeds were made without consideration, and that neither Priscilla Burtch nor her vendees, Chase and Martenstein, acquired any title, either equitable or legal, to the lands included therein; but that said deeds were given at the request of said insolvent, Wilson, and that said property might be held for said Wilson. This, in its substantials, is the complaint upon which relief is asked. Judgment went against the plaintiff, and this appeal is brought to this court.

Without considering other questions raised upon this record, we are prepared to say the case must fall by reason of a failure to state a cause of action. The assignee of the insolvent, in a case like the present one, stands in no better or different position than the insolvent debtor himself. He can do nothing as assignee that the insolvent could not do if plaintiff, and is entitled to no relief that the insolvent would not be entitled to if prosecuting this action individually and for himself alone. Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. 180, 29 Pac. 495. Upon the allegations of this complaint these deeds cannot be successfully attacked by the grantor, Wilson, or his assignee in insolvency. No express trust is charged, and there is nothing recited in the pleading that would authorize the introduction of evidence to establish a trust in parol. It was said in Jackson v. Cleveland, 15 Mich. 102: "A voluntary deed, which purports to be for the beneficial use of the grantee, and which was made deliberately and without mistake or contrivance, does not differ from any other deed binding on the grantor, and can only be attacked by those having superior equities, which the grantor had no right to cut off, as creditors and the like." There is no actual fraud charged. Neither is there any claim of constructive fraud arising from fiduciary relations existing between the parties. As directly in line, and fully supporting the principles of law which are absolutely fatal to plaintiff's alleged cause of action, we cite Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 471, 18 Pac. 429, and Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 Pac. 984. No express trust is declared upon by the pleading, and neither is any implied trust indicated by its allegations. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

McGEE et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO & N. P. RY. CO. (S. F. 231.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

A verdict based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by Charles McGee and others, by their guardian, James W. Collins, and another against the San Francisco & North Pacific Railway Company, a corporation. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney V. Smith, for appellant. Shadburne & Herrin, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying its motion for a new trial, and by the record the sole question presents itself, was the evidence sufficient to support the verdict of the jury? The action is brought by the guardian of certain minor children. The father of these minors was a passenger upon a train belonging to defendant, and, it is claimed by defendant, acted in a disorderly and boisterous manner while traveling upon said train. Defendant's servant, a brakeman, attempted to quiet this passenger, and, it is now claimed, used unnecessary force and violence in so doing. As a result of the difficulty arising at that time, the passenger received injuries from which he died within a few days. There were many eyewitnesses at the scene of trouble, who testified at the trial as to all the circumstances, showing the cause and manner of the passenger's injury. Counsel for appellant, by his brief, admits that such testimony was hopelessly contradictory, but insists that the evidence of certain physicians who professionally waited upon the deceased after the injury was received and prior to his death, and who also conducted the autopsy upon the body, plainly shows that the deceased could not have been injured as testified to by the witnesses introduced at the trial upon the part of the plaintiffs. While the evidence of the physicians may be strong in support of defendant's theory as to the manner in which the injury was received, still we cannot hold it conclusive, for there was direct and positive evidence from the lips of eyewitnesses to the contrary. Thus a substantial and material conflict upon the evidence was created, and this material and substantial conflict was a matter which it was peculiarly and essentially within the province of the jury to solve and determine. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CORPORATION MORTGAGE—AUTHORITY TO EXECUTE—PAROL PROOF—SUFFICIENCY OF RESOLUTION—RATIFICATION—PLEADING.

1. Where it appeared that the directors of a corporation adopted a resolution authorizing the president "to make arrangements for paying off a debt by giving a mortgage or any other means," and that at a subsequent meeting the directors ratified the action of its officers in executing such mortgage, but no entry of either resolution was made in the record book of the corporation, though minutes of the proceedings were made on slips of paper which were afterwards lost, parol evidence is admissible, in an action against the corporation to foreclose the mortgage, to show the proceedings of the board authorizing and ratifying the execution of said mortgage, and it was not limited to showing merely the contents of the lost memoranda.

2. The resolution purporting to authorize the execution of said mortgage was sufficient in form; but, if not, the subsequent ratification was equivalent to precedent authority.

3. It was not necessary to specially plead such ratification.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by Boggs and others against the Lakeport Agricultural Park Association and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment against defendants, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant park association appeals. Appeal from the judgment dismissed. Order affirmed.

Hudson & Sayre, for appellant. F. E. Johnson and T. J. Sheridan, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by the defendant Lakeport Agricultural Park Association from a judgment against it and an order denying its motion for a new trial in an action to foreclose a mortgage on real property. The appeal from the judgment was taken more than one year from its entry, and is therefore ineffectual, and must be dismissed.

Upon the appeal from the order but one point is made,—that the note and mortgage in suit were not made or authorized by the appellant corporation. The question really presented, however, is as to the propriety of the ruling of the court below upon the admissibility of the evidence offered to prove the authority of the officers of the corporation to execute the instruments in question; since, if properly admitted, it was amply sufficient to sustain the finding that the appellant both authorized and ratified their execution. Appellant was indebted to the party from whom it had purchased certain real estate for a portion of the purchase price thereof, which it was called upon to pay immediately to avoid suit to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the same. A meeting of the directors of the corporation was held to devise means to meet said obligation, and a resolution was thereat adopted providing "that the president make all necessary arrangements for paying off the debt by giving a mortgage, or any other means." In pursuance of this authority the president negotiated a loan of the necessary amount to satisfy the debt referred to, and as security for such loan the president and secretary executed the note and mortgage in suit to the plaintiffs. The mortgage was not under seal, the corporation having adopted none. At a subsequent meeting of the directors of the corporation the action of its officers in giving the note and mortgage was reported to the board, and thereupon a resolution was adopted fully ratifying their action in the premises. It does not clearly appear whether either of these meetings of the board of directors was regularly called, but it was shown that at both meetings all the members of the board were present. There was evidence tending to show that at each meeting a rough minute of the proceedings of the board was kept on slips of paper, but in neither instance, from some neglect or oversight, was any record of the action of the board made or entered in the regular minute or record book of the corporation, and the rough minutes could not be found, and were not produced at the trial. Upon this showing the court below permitted plaintiffs to show the proceedings of the board of directors by parol, and in this we think it committed no error. One of the objections was that, although no regular record was kept, the rough minutes of the meeting were not sufficiently accounted for to admit of the introduction of parol proof; and that, if admitted, it should have been confined to a showing of what was contained in those rough notes or minutes. We think the showing was quite sufficient to admit of parol proof, and that plaintiffs were properly permitted to show what in fact took place at the meetings, without reference to what may have been the contents of the lost memorandums. It is the duly-authenticated record in the books of the corporation which is the best evidence, and, in the absence of such, any competent secondary evidence may be admitted to show what the act of the board was. The rough notes of the meetings were as much secondary evidence as the testimony of the witnesses, and, if produced, would only have been admissible, like any other secondary fact, as tending to show what took place. "While the records of the corporation are usually regarded as the best evidence of the action of the board, yet, upon an issue whether a resolution was passed authorizing a given contract or conveyance, the fact may be proved by parol. Again, it will happen in some cases that the resolution may be passed, but not noted of record, in which case the fact may be proved by witnesses who can testify to it, as in other cases." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 1016. And see Bank v. Weaver (Cal.) 31 Pac. 160; Wat. Corp. § 295.

The objection that the resolution purporting to authorize the execution of the note and mortgage is not sufficient in form to justify the acts of the officers of the corporation under it is untenable; but, if otherwise, the subsequent ratification of the action of the president and secretary was equivalent to precedent authority. It was not necessary to specially plead such ratification. It was involved in the issue of whether the instruments were executed by the corporation.

The other grounds of objection do not require special notice. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order is affirmed.

FLADUNG v. DAWSON et al. (S. F. 289.)

ACTION ON CONTRACT—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where a complaint in an action to recover for work and materials alleges that they were furnished under a contract, which fact is not denied by defendant, the only issue made being as to the contract price, it is error to admit evidence of reasonable value.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by one Fladung against Dawson and others and J. G. Adams. From a judgment for plaintiff against him, defendant Adams appeals. Reversed.

Smith & Murasky, for appellant. C. S. Hemphill, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant Adams for certain labor and materials furnished by him, and to have the same declared a lien upon a certain building belonging to the defendant Dawson. The plaintiff, as a subcontractor, had furnished the materials and labor to Adams, who had contracted with Dawson for the construction of the building, and the materials and labor were furnished and used in such construction. At the trial it was shown that the building had been completed more than 30 days prior to the plaintiff's filing of his claim of lien, and he was denied a lien against the building, and judgment was rendered in favor of Dawson. The plaintiff, however, recovered judgment against Adams for the sum of $1,015, from which, and an order denying a new trial, Adams has appealed.

The finding of the court that no special contract was made and entered into between the plaintiff and the appellant as to the amount that the appellant should pay plaintiff for his work and material is not only not sustained by the evidence, but is in direct opposition to all the evidence on the subject. The real issue which was contested at the trial was the price that had been agreed upon between them for the work, and not that there was no contract with reference to the amount to be paid therefor. The plaintiff testified: "We met, and went into the saloon, and he told me that he would give me $3,335 to do the brickwork and the stonework and set the ironwork." "I gave Mr. Adams one written bid on this building, and I don't know now where it is. The amount was $3,535." And, in explanation of the averment in the complaint that the sum of $3,200 was agreed upon between them as the price of the work, he said: "It was at the suggestion of Mr. Adams that I charged $3,200 for the work that I did. He told me that I had to take off a little. My written bid was $3,535, and by an agreement with Mr. Adams it was changed to $3,200." There was no testimony in the case that the work was to be done for what it might be worth, or that the plaintiff agreed to do the work without any agreement as to its price. On the contrary, the appellant offered in evidence a written bid for doing the work, with the plaintiff's name signed thereto, which he testified was received by him from the plaintiff, and had been written by the plaintiff upon one of his business cards, and signed by him, wherein he offered to do the work for $2,226. The entire evidence on this point was that the price at which the work was to be done was fixed by the bid of the plaintiff, and the court should have determined the amount of this bid, even though the testimony of the parties thereto was diametrically opposed. See Leviston v. Ryan, 75 Cal. 293, 17 Pac. 239. Instead of so doing, the court admitted evidence, against the objection of the appellant, of the value of the labor and material furnished by the plaintiff, and found that this value was $3,160, of which the plaintiff had been paid a portion, and made this value the basis of its judgment. This finding was also outside of the issues made by the pleadings. The plaintiff had alleged in his complaint that he had entered into a contract with Adams to do certain work upon the building, "for which defendant Adams was to pay and agreed to pay to plaintiff the sum of $3,200." The appellant did not deny the agreement, except as to the amount, which he alleged was the sum of $2,226. The only issue before the court in this respect was, therefore, the amount which the appellant had agreed to pay for the work, and the court erred in admitting evidence of the value of the work done by the plaintiff, and in rendering its judgment in accordance with the value found upon this testimony. The judgment and order are reversed.

HEARNE v. DE YOUNG et al. (L. A. 59.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES—BURDEN OF PROOF—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS TO PLACE OF TRIAL—STIPULATIONS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. Where the action is one which is entitled to be tried in the county in which defendants or some of them reside, and the complaint fails to show their residence, a defendant who seeks a change of venue must show that neither he nor his codefendants reside in the county in which suit was brought.

2. A party may waive, expressly or by implication, the right to have a cause tried in a particular county.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 283, providing that an attorney can only bind his client in an action by an agreement filed with the clerk or entered on the minutes of the court, and not otherwise, does not apply to an agreement which is admitted on the hearing.

4. A fact admitted on the hearing, and acted on by the court, cannot thereafter be denied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by J. C. Hearne against M. H. De Young and another for libel. From an order denying a motion by defendant De Young for a change of venue, said defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood and W. J. Hunsaker, for appellant. Works & Works, E. W. Hendrick, and W. J. Murphy, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of San Diego denying a motion by defendant De Young to change the place of trial to the city and county of his residence, viz. the city and county of San Francisco. The action is brought in the county of San Diego, to recover from the defendants M. H. De Young and J. F. Blunt, and each of them, the sum of $100,000 as damages sustained by plaintiff, by reason of an alleged libel published by said defendants of and concerning plaintiff in the San Francisco Chronicle. The complaint avers that, during all the times therein mentioned, M. H. De Young was the proprietor, and the defendant Blunt was the San Diego correspondent, of a certain daily newspaper known as the "San Francisco Chronicle," which said newspaper had, and still has, a large circulation in the city of San Diego, state of California; that on the 27th day of August, 1894, the said defendants, and each of them, did maliciously and falsely print and publish in said San Francisco Chronicle, and did maliciously, willfully, and falsely cause to be printed, published, and circulated in said paper, in said county of San Diego, a certain false and defamatory article of and concerning the plaintiff, a copy of which article is made a part of the complaint. The complaint contains no allegations, other than as above, in reference to the place of publication of said newspaper, or of said article, or as to the relations existing between said defendants, or in reference to the residence of either of them. Defendant De Young alone moved in due time and form for a change of the place of trial, as aforesaid, showing that during all the times mentioned in the complaint he was, and still is, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, and a nonresident of the county of San Diego; that he had a meritorious defense, etc. Defendant Blunt consented in writing that the place of trial be changed as prayed by his codefendant. It was admitted at the argument of the motion that defendant Blunt was, at the commencement of the action, a resident of the county of San Diego, Cal. The motion was denied, and defendant De Young alone appeals.

This action is one which, under section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff had a right to have tried in the county in which the defendants or some of them resided at the commencement of the action. If, therefore, J. F. Blunt, one of the defendants, at the time of the commencement of the action, was a resident of the county of San Diego, the court below was correct in refusing to change the place of trial, although M. H. De Young, his codefendant, was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. The right to have a cause tried in a particular county is one which a party may waive either expressly or by implication. Pearkes v. Freer, 9 Cal. 642; Jones v. Frost, 28 Cal. 246; Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72; Code Civ. Proc. § 396. If a complaint in an action which defendant has a right to have tried in the county of his residence fails to show the residence of the defendant, the onus probandi is cast upon such defendant to show the county of his residence, if he would secure a change of the venue. And, by parity of reasoning, if there are several defendants in a like case, he who would procure a change of the place of trial must show that none of them are residents of the county in which the action is brought. This the record failed to show.

Again, it was admitted at the hearing, as appears by the record, "that the defendant Blunt was at the commencement of the action a resident of the county of San Diego, in this state." Appellant contends that this admission is not binding, for the reason that it does not appear that the agreement was filed with the clerk or entered upon the minutes of the court, and is therefore not within the purview of section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[1] Where the stipulation or admission of an attorney for and on behalf of his client, and being as yet executory, is denied, the only proof of its validity rests upon a compliance with the Code provision, and no other proof can be received. But where the stipulation, agreement, or admission is admitted, as in this case, there is no occasion to resort to other proof. For the purposes of the motion, the residence of defendant Blunt was an admitted fact, avoiding the necessity of other proof, and, having been acted upon by the court, cannot now be traversed. Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529; Himmelmann v. Sullivan, 40 Cal. 125; Hawes v. Clark, 84 Cal. 272, 24 Pac. 116; Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. 36; Reese v. Mahoney, 21 Cal. 306.

For these reasons, we are of opinion the court did not err in refusing to change the place of trial, and the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

WAREHOUSEMEN—RECEIPTS—PLEDGE.

Where produce is left with a weigher, who stores it without charge, a receipt given by the weigher merely reciting that the produce had been weighed, and stating its weight, is not a "warehouse receipt," the transfer of which as security constitutes a delivery of the produce, rendering the pledge valid as against attaching creditors of the pledgor.

Replevin by B. Sinsheimer and others against Thomas Whitely and others. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

[1] Code Civ. Proc. § 283, provides that an attorney may bind his client in an action by his agreement, filed with the clerk or entered on the minutes of the court, "and not otherwise."

[2] Rehearing denied.

BRITT, C. Replevin for 217 sacks of beans. Defendant Whitely is constable of a certain township in San Luis Obispo county, and, as such, levied on the beans as the property of one Costa, in virtue of a writ of attachment to him issued out of the justice's court of said township, at the suit of one Lial against said Costa. At the time of the levy the beans were stored in a warehouse at Pismo, in said county, owned by the Jordan Bituminous Rock & Paving Company, a corporation, which is joined with the constable as a defendant in this action. In November, 1893, said Costa, who was then the owner of the beans, caused them to be weighed at said warehouse, and deposited therein; receiving from said paving company at that time five certain instruments, which plaintiffs style "warehouse receipts," and which defendants call "weighing tags." These were in the following form, varying as to the number of sacks specified: "Jordan Bit. Rock and Pav. Co.'s Scales. Pismo, Cal., 11-2, 1893. Weighed for F. J. Silva. Gross, 5,080. Tare, 1,570. 40 sks. beans. Net wt., 3,510. Marked, F. J. S. A. Klatt, Weigher." They were issued at Costa's request in the name of one F. J. Silva, with consent of the latter, but were delivered to Costa. Silva never had possession of them, and had no interest in the beans. A Mr. Stevens, agent of said company, and who had charge of the warehouse, testified at the trial: "The tags in evidence were issued by our company at Pismo, and are the only kind issued by our company; the only receipts given. They are given by the weigher. The tags, or whatever you call them, are given by the weigher at the scales when the beans were weighed and were placed in the warehouse;" also, that the company took the beans as a warehouseman, but had no charge against them; that it does not charge storage. On December 6, 1893, Costa delivered said instruments, though without indorsement, to plaintiffs, as security for a debt then owed by him to them. He also gave them a written order for the beans, addressed to "Agent Pismo Wharf Warehouse." December 11th, following, the constable seized the beans pursuant to said writ in Lial's suit against Costa. Lial obtained judgment in that action, and an execution issued thereon, under which the constable was about to sell the beans when plaintiffs, for the first time, notified him and also the paving company of their claim to the property in virtue of the transfer to them of said alleged warehouse receipts. Their demand for release of the property being refused, they brought this action.

A warehouse receipt has been defined to be a written contract between the owner of the goods and the warehouseman, the latter to store the goods, and the former to pay for that service. Hale v. Dock Co., 29 Wis. 488. Perhaps some of the terms of this contract may be implied. See forms of such receipts construed in Lowrie v. Salz, 75 Cal. 349, 17 Pac. 232, and Bishop v. Fulkerth, 68 Cal. 607, 10 Pac. 122. But surely there ought to be something on the face of the instrument to indicate that a contract of storage has been entered into. Our statute on the subject requires that much,—act in relation to warehouse receipts, etc. (St. 1877-78, p. 949, § 5). The language in the documents here, "Weighed for F. J. Silva forty sacks beans," no more signifies that the paving company received or held the beans as a warehouseman than that it bought or sold the same, or shipped them to a distant port. On their face, the papers plainly are not warehouse receipts. Cathcart v. Snow, 64 Iowa, 584, 21 N. W. 94; Robson v. Swart, 14 Minn. 371 (Gil. 287). But it is said that the tickets were the only vouchers issued by the defendant company, and hence must be treated as warehouse receipts. Rather, it seems to us, that circumstance tends to show that said company was not a "warehouseman" at all in the sense which the law attributes to that term,—an inference strongly corroborated by the fact that it makes no charge for storage. It is only persons who pursue the calling of warehousemen—that is, receive and store goods in a warehouse as a business for profit—that have power to issue a technical warehouse receipt, the transfer of which is a good delivery of the goods represented by it. Shepardson v. Cary, 29 Wis. 42; Bucher v. Com., 103 Pa. St. 534; Edw. Bailm. § 332. Since there was nothing equivalent to delivery of the beans in the transaction between Costa and plaintiffs, the rights of the attaching officer are not affected by the attempted transfer.

The court found that the constable made no valid levy of the writ; and some slight effort is made here to justify the finding. It seems to us a mere conclusion of law; but, admitting it to be a finding of ultimate fact, it is not sustained by the evidence. It appears from the constable's return and certain parol evidence, which was admissible in aid of the return (Brusie v. Gates, 80 Cal. 462, 22 Pac. 284), that he took actual possession of the beans in the warehouse, and placed said Stevens in charge thereof as keeper. There were some further proceedings by him to charge both Silva and the paving company as garnishees, but the sufficiency of these need not be looked to. His possession by his keeper was a compliance with the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 3).

The judgment and order denying defendants' motion for new trial should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying defendants' motion for new trial are reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1896.)

ATTACHMENT—INTERVENTION—LIEN—WHAT CONSTITUTES—PRIORITY—GARNISHMENT—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS WAIVED.

1. A subsequent attachment creditor has such interest in the matter in litigation in a prior attachment of the same property as entitles him to intervene, under Code Civ. Proc. § 387. Horn v. Water Co., 13 Cal. 62, distinguished.

2. Where, in an attachment, a person who has in his possession property or money of defendant is garnished, such garnishment constitutes an attachment lien on such property or money.

3. Where plaintiff in a bill of interpleader deposits the money or property in dispute with the clerk, without any order of the court permitting him to do so, such money and property are not in the custody of the law, so as to render unavailable a subsequent garnishment of plaintiff by the party entitled thereto.

4. Where an insolvent stockholder of an insolvent corporation is indebted on his subscription for stock to an amount in excess of a sum due him on a note of the corporation, an attachment lien procured by him in an action on his note against the corporation will be postponed in equity to a subsequent attachment lien of other creditors of the corporation.

5. Where a material fact found is merely defectively pleaded, objection that the finding is not supported by the pleadings is not available on appeal, in the absence of objection to the pleading by demurrer or objection to evidence.

C. A. Miller, for appellant. Carver & Preston, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The action was brought by the plaintiff upon a promissory note to recover from defendant $1,500 and interest. Plaintiff issued an attachment, which was levied upon certain property and moneys of defendant in the hands of the Los Angeles National Bank. Defendant made default, and no question was made as to plaintiff's right to a judgment against defendant. William Deering & Co. (a corporation) also brought an action against the same defendant (a corporation) to recover money due it from said defendant; issued a writ of attachment, which was subsequently levied upon the same property and money previously levied upon by plaintiff. William Deering & Co. took judgment against defendant for $1,372.69. After levying its attachment, William Deering & Co. intervened in this action, and set up facts claiming to show that the lien of plaintiff's attachment should be postponed and held subordinate to the lien of its subsequent attachment. The cause was tried by the court, written findings filed, and judgment rendered, adjudging the lien of intervener's attachment superior to that of the attachment lien of plaintiff, and adjudging the former to be first paid out of the attached property. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and the cause comes up without a bill of exceptions or statement, upon so much of the judgment roll as by the stipulation of the parties is deemed sufficient to illustrate the questions in dispute. The points made by appellant in favor of reversal are: (1) That the findings do not support the decree. (2) That finding 11 is not supported by the pleadings.

It would be more satisfactory to set out the findings in full, but their great length precludes our doing so, The following is believed to be a fair synopsis of them, and to lead to an understanding of the questions involved: (1) That William Deering & Co. is, and for more than five years past has been, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois. (2) The Richardson-Kimball Company is, and since 1887 has been, a corporation under the laws of California. (3) The plaintiff, George H. Kimball, is, and has been, secretary, treasurer, and a stockholder of said Richardson-Kimball Company since 1887. (4) Intervener, William Deering & Co., has been since 1888 a creditor of the Richardson-Kimball Company (hereinafter called "defendant"); and on the 6th day of September, 1888, defendant had certain moneys of William Deering Company (hereinafter called "intervener") which it held for intervener's use, viz. $2,507.43, which it acknowledged in writing, but which it failed to turn over to intervener, and there is due intervener on account thereof $1,416.74. (5) That since 1889 defendant has been, and still is, insolvent, which was well known to plaintiff and defendant. (6) The attached property, money, etc., was on the 9th of May, 1891, in the hands of the Los Angeles National Bank, subject to its certain liens thereon, which was known to plaintiff and defendant. (7) On said May 9th, defendant made the note in suit to plaintiff, which was not made to defraud intervener or other creditors, but was for a consideration of $1,500, and was made without fraud or collusion. (8) On the 18th of August, 1891, plaintiff brought this action, and attached all the property and money of defendant in the hands of said bank. (9) On the 5th day of September, 1891, intervener brought suit against the defendant, and attached the same property. (10) The property so attached by plaintiff and intervener was, and now is, the only property and assets of the defendant. (11) Upon the incorporation of defendant, in 1887, plaintiff subscribed $22,400 to its capital stock, upon which he has not paid more than $2,400, and he still owes on account thereof $20,000. No calls or assessments have ever been made by defendant on account of the sum due and owing by plaintiff on account of his subscription to the capital stock. Since May 1, 1891, plaintiff has been at all times insolvent. (12) After intervener filed its complaint of intervention herein, viz. on the 3d day of November, 1891, the attachment in its suit against defendant was discharged by order of the court, and thereafter, and on the 7th day of November, 1891, intervener sued out a second writ of attachment in the same cause, which on the 9th and 11th days of November, 1891, was served upon the said Los Angeles National Bank, in the usual form, with notice, etc., attaching all the property, money, etc., of defendant in its hands. This attachment was also served in like manner upon T. H. Ward, as bailee of said bank, and the sheriff has since that time held the money and property so by him attached. Intervener obtained judgment in its action against defendant on the 16th day of January, 1892, for $1,372.69, and the property and money is held by the sheriff for the satisfaction thereof. On the 21st day of September, 1891, the Los Angeles National Bank commenced an action against F. A. Carter and others, including all the parties to this action, in a complaint of interpleader, requiring them to litigate their claims, etc., and at the same time deposited with T. H. Ward, the clerk of the superior court, all the property and money of defendant in its hands subject to the determination of the action of interpleader. Such deposit was made without order of the court, and without the knowledge or consent of defendant or intervener herein, and such action of interpleader is still pending and undetermined. On the 16th of January, 1892, intervener filed a supplemental complaint in intervention, setting out the order dissolving its attachment and the issuing and service of the writ of attachment of November 7, 1891, etc. This last fact is admitted in the record. It also appears that plaintiff interposed a general demurrer to intervener's complaint in intervention, which was overruled by the court.

The theory of appellant is that the findings do not support the decree for the reasons:

(a) That intervener, as an attachment creditor in another suit against defendant, has no such "interest in the matter in litigation" as entitles him, under section 387, Code Civ. Proc., to intervene. In support of this first contention, he cites Horn v. Water Co., 13 Cal. 62. The interveners in that case were general creditors of the defendant, without any lien, either general or specific, on the property involved in the action. In speaking to this point, the court said: "To authorize an intervention, therefore, the interest must be that created by a claim to the demand, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to or lien upon the property, or some part thereof, which is the subject of litigation. No such claim or lien is asserted in the petition of Rawle, and his right to intervene must, in consequence, fail." The court further held that certain other parties who were judgment creditors were proper parties. That case clearly intimates that a creditor having a lien upon the property there sought to be foreclosed under mortgages was entitled to intervene. That, under our Code, an attachment or execution creditor has a right to intervene, and upon a proper showing defeat the lien of a prior attaching creditor, we regard as too well settled to need further discussion. Davis v. Eppinger, 18 Cal. 378; Speyer v. Ihmels, 21 Cal. 280; Coghill v. Marks, 29 Cal. 673; Coffey v. Greenfield, 55 Cal. 382.

(b) It is further contended that, if a lien by direct attachment were sufficient to give intervener a standing in court, he claimed no such lien, but only to have a garnishment, which creates no lien on the property. Garnishment under our law is but another name for the service of a writ of attachment upon personal property in the possession of persons other than the defendant in the writ, and also to secure debts, credits, etc., in the hands of such third persons. By the service in the manner provided by statute, whether it be termed "garnishment" or "service of the attachment," while the possession is not necessarily disturbed, "a lien is obtained on defendant's title to the property in the hands of the garnishee." Wade, Attachm. § 338.

(c) It is further urged that intervener had no lien, for the reason that his attachment was dissolved, and, before the second writ of attachment issued, the bank had commenced a suit in interpleader, and had deposited the money and property with T. H. Ward, clerk of the superior court, and that the money, being in the custody of the law, was not subject to attachment. The first clause of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a defendant against whom an action is pending, upon a contract or for specific personal property, may at any time before answer, upon making the showing therein provided for, and upon notice to the parties, apply to the court for an order substituting the third party who makes claim to the property as a defendant in his place, and he may be discharged from liability to either party, "on his depositing in court the amount claimed on the contract, or delivering the property or its value to such person as the court may direct; and the court may, in its discretion, make the order." The Los Angeles National Bank was not the defendant in any pending action, and hence was not within the purview of the first clause of section 386, supra, but instituted on its own account an action to compel the parties to interplead under the latter clause of the same section, with a view to being discharged from liability to any or all of the conflicting claimants. This clause makes no provision for an order permitting the plaintiff in the action of interpleader to pay into court or deliver the property claimed. We may suppose the court possesses the power to make the order permitting a party in a proper case to do so, but in the present case no such order was made or asked for, and, until it was obtained, the bank could not, on its own volition, relieve itself from responsibility, by voluntarily placing the property and money in the hands of the clerk; and, when so placed, it was in no proper sense in the custody of the law. Where property is lawfully taken, by virtue of legal process, it is in the custody of the law, and not otherwise. Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 334. Money deposited by a defendant with the sheriff for the release of an attachment is in the custody of the law. Hathaway v. Brady, 26 Cal. 581. But this is because it is a symbol of, and stands in place of, the attached property. Other cases might be mentioned of like import. It is sufficient to say that the property in question was not in the custody of the law, and, whether in the hands of the bank or of Ward, it was subject to attachment. We are of opinion, therefore, that intervener acquired a valid lien by his second attachment.

(d) The only remaining question relates to the sufficiency of the finding to warrant the postponement of plaintiff's lien to that of intervener. The proceeding on the part of intervener is an equitable one to prevent the sole assets of the corporation, which is insolvent, from going to the plaintiff, who is also insolvent, who is a large owner of stock in the corporation, and whose liabilities to the corporation are in excess of $20,000. It may be true that plaintiff is not in a legal sense indebted to the corporation, for the reason that no assessment has been levied or call made on account of his subscription. It is, nevertheless, a liability which a court of equity, for the purpose of meeting the obligations of the corporation, could enforce, either by the direct levy of an assessment, or by requiring the directors of the corporation to do so. This course would be of no avail as against the insolvent plaintiff. It would be in the highest sense inequitable to permit one thus situated to avoid his liability by reason of his insolvency, and at the same time swallow up the entire assets of the concern, to the exclusion of creditors who have an equitable right to have the entire property and assets of the company appropriated to the satisfaction of their demands. Plaintiff's liability is an asset, which, but for his insolvency would go to swell the property of the corporation pro tanto. His share or interest in the corporation is his proportion, measured by his stock, in the residuum, after the payment of all demands due and owing by the company. "After actual insolvency, however, unpaid capital becomes a trust fund, to reach which creditors are not required first to reduce their claims to judgment." Spell. Corp. § 821, and cases there cited. Some of the cases go to the extent of holding that a stockholder of an insolvent corporation cannot offset an individual claim against the corporation in proceedings to enforce his liability for unpaid subscription for stock, but that he must pay in full and receive his pro rata share with other creditors on his demand. Id. § 818. However this may be in a proceeding to wind up the affairs of a corporation, we are of opinion that in an action like the present, where both the corporation and the stockholder are insolvent, and the latter is liable upon his subscription for stock of the company in an amount greatly in excess of all the claims in question, he cannot, upon any equitable principle, be permitted to enforce an individual claim against the corporation, to the exclusion of other creditors, and that his prior attachment lien should be postponed to that of subsequent attaching creditors where necessary to their payment, and in cases where, without such postponement, they must inevitably lose their demands, and the entire assets of the corporation go to satisfy the individual debt of the stockholder thus insolvent and thus liable on account of his subscription. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205; Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448. The fact that this is a proceeding of intervention is no reason why the equitable rights of the parties should not be adjusted on the same principle as the court would do in a direct action for that purpose, and the fact that intervener might have brought an action and obtained relief therein is no argument against his right here. Coffey v. Greenfield, 55 Cal. 382.

The order of the court, ex parte, allowing an intervention was proper. Spanagel v. Reay, 47 Cal. 608.

As the complaint in intervention is not set out in the record, we must presume the demurrer thereto was properly overruled.

The only other objection necessary to be noticed is that finding 11 is not supported by the pleadings. So much of the complaint in intervention as related directly to finding 11 is set out in the record, and is to the effect that defendant was not indebted to plaintiff in any amount, but that, on the contrary, plaintiff is, and since May, 1891, has been at all times, indebted to defendant in the sum of more than $2,500, and that he (the said plaintiff) has been at all times since May 1, 1891, and now is, insolvent. These allegations are contained in an amendment to intervener's complaint. No objection was made thereto by way of demurrer or to the introduction of evidence thereunder in the court below. We cannot see how appellant can successfully urge his objection here for the first time. There was an attempt to plead the substance of the finding, and plaintiff having gone to trial thereon, and evidence having been introduced without objection in support of the finding, it is too late to object here. Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 645; Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 141; Crowley v. Railroad

Co., 60 Cal. 630. It is a case of defective pleading, which may be waived, and not an entire omission to plead a material fact, which is fatal. Richards v. Insurance Co., 80 Cal. 505, 22 Pac. 939; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 24 Pac. 114; Greiss v. Insurance Co., 98 Cal. 241, 33 Pac. 195; City and County of San Francisco v. Pennie, 93 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 66; Lee v. Figg, 37 Cal. 328.

Upon the whole record as presented, we are of opinion the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and so recommend.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WEBSTER. (Cr. 104.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT RAPE—AGE OF CONSENT—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, the intent with which the assault was committed is a question for the jury.

2. On the trial of a defendant for assault with intent to commit rape, it is error for the court to assume, in its rulings or instructions, that the prosecutrix was under the age of consent.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Warren Webster was convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals. Reversed.

A. Ruef, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Appellant was convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. It is first insisted that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict; but we cannot agree with this contention. The question as to the specific intent with which appellant did the acts proven against him was a matter entirely for the jury to pass upon, under the evidence; and by that evidence the jury were fully justified in finding the intent as charged in the information.

2. The prosecutrix in this case took the stand, and testified that she was only 12 years of age, and then related the occurrences which took place between her and the appellant upon which this information is based. Upon cross-examination, she was asked if she did not consent to all that was done by appellant; and an objection was sustained to the question, upon the ground that her consent was immaterial, the trial court at the time stating: "I shall instruct the jury she cannot consent, and, that being so, it is of no legal consequence." When the time arrived to charge the jury as to the law of the case, the court made good its previous statement by giving that body this instruction: "By the statute of this state, rape is an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances: '(1) Where the female is under the age of fourteen years.' Under the evidence, it is not necessary to mention the other circumstances here. * * * And this offense, if proved at all, comes within the section of the statute I have just read." In the case of People v. Verdegreen, 106 Cal. 212, 39 Pac. 607, this court held that a female under the age of 14 years cannot even consent to an assault with intent to commit rape, the identical offense here charged. The evidence in this case may well be said to be conflicting upon the fact as to whether or not this prosecutrix consented, although probably greatly preponderating to that effect. Hence, her age was a vital question in the case. It may be said to have been the fact upon which the whole case rested. Indeed, as we have seen, the trial judge so construed it. And we think it was clearly wrong upon his part to instruct the jury, in effect, that this girl was under 14 years of age. This is exactly what he said he would do, and is substantially what he did do. The court in so instructing passed upon a question of fact. The girl's age, as we have suggested, was a prominent fact in the case, and essentially one for the jury to pass upon. The court had no more right to tell the jury that, under the evidence, the girl was under 14 years of age, than it had to tell the jury that, under the evidence, the offense charged had been proven. The court appears to have assumed that, the prosecutrix having testified that she was but 12 years of age, and no contradictory evidence having been offered, the fact was conclusively established as a matter of law, and therefore it was justified in so telling the jury. But such principle is wholly unsound. If the girl had testified to a state of facts showing that the offense here charged had been committed, and no contradictory evidence thereof had been offered, certainly the court would have had no right to tell the jury appellant's guilt was established. Yet it could lawfully have done this if it was justified in instructing them as to the age of the prosecutrix. A jury in a criminal case is not bound to believe the uncontradicted statement of a witness as to a fact. This court in People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 34, 24 Pac. 802, said: "The jury were not bound to take the testimony of any witness as true. From the manner of the prosecuting witness, and the nature of his whole testimony, the jury might have disbelieved him if the defendant had not introduced any evidence at all. This whole matter was for the jury, and not for the court." Again, this court said in People v. Casey, 65 Cal. 261, 3 Pac. 874, that the trial court had no right even to tell the jury what the evidence

"shows." The province of the jury in passing upon the facts of a case is a broad one. It is practically unlimited. It is a constitutional right given to the jurors. It is a constitutional duty imposed upon them. They were not bound to take this witness' statement of her age as true. They had the right to disbelieve it, and were not beholden to any court for dereliction of duty in not believing it. It would be a matter between them and their consciences alone. It is for the jury to say when truth and when falsehood come from the mouth of the witness. The conduct of this witness when upon the stand may have shown her to have been lying. Her appearance may have shown her to have been of mature years. The inherent improbabilities of her testimony may have placed it beyond the pale of belief. Would such uncontradicted testimony be conclusive if the witness by her appearance was shown to be wrinkled and gray with age? These were matters for the jury to sift and weigh and measure, and matters with which the court had no right to deal, and, above all things, an examination upon which by the jury the court had no right to foreclose. The trial court, in assuming the testimony of the prosecutrix in this regard to have been true, committed an error which compels a reversal of the judgment and a new trial of the case. The court should have declared the law as laid down in the Verdegreen Case, and also have submitted to the jurors the question of fact as to whether or not the prosecutrix was under the age of 14 years at the time the assault is claimed to have been committed.

3. Counsel for appellant insists that the court committed an error in its instructions to the jury, wherein the jurors were told that, in order to convict, "you are not bound to be absolutely sure that the defendant is guilty." A new trial being necessary for the reasons already given, we will simply say the language here used is a departure from the common and usual instruction upon reasonable doubt. Such departures are always dangerous, and, being dangerous, resort should not be had to them. Mistrials often result thereby. There is no good reason for using untried and dangerous paths when safe and well-traveled roads are equally at hand.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VAN FLEET, J.; HARRISON, J.

DAVIS v. PHOENIX INS. CO. (L. A. 65.)

INSURANCE — CONTRACT — INSURABLE INTEREST — AMOUNT OF INTEREST.

1. Where a policy of insurance is based on the condition that the assured is the owner in fee simple, but makes the application a part of the policy, and the insurer accepts a risk, though the application shows that the assured is not the owner in fee, the insurer cannot set up a want of such title to defeat an action on the policy.

2. One who is in the full possession of property under a contract on which he has in part paid the purchase price, and which on his volition and completion of the contract will entitle him to a conveyance of the legal title, has an insurable interest equal to the amount of payments he has made.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by J. D. Davis against the Phœnix Insurance Company on a policy of fire insurance. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

E. J. Ensign and Rippey & Nutt, for appellant. F. P. Willard, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover upon a policy insuring against loss by fire. Plaintiff had judgment for $1,200, from which judgment defendant appeals. The cause comes up on the judgment roll, and is not supported by a statement or bill of exceptions. It appears from the pleadings and findings that the defendant is, and was at all the times mentioned in the case, a duly organized and acting fire insurance corporation; that the plaintiff, on the 26th day of February, 1894, and at all the times mentioned in the complaint, was in the actual, peaceable, and undisturbed possession of 80 acres of land, known as the "W. W. Borden Farm," fully described in the pleadings, findings, and policy of insurance hereinafter mentioned, and was in like possession of a "one-story frame dwelling house situate thereon, and described in said policy, under and by virtue of a partially executed contract and agreement to purchase said land and premises, and a written option thereon (upon which had been paid the sum of one hundred [$100] dollars), made and delivered to him by W. W. Borden and Millie L. Borden, in whom was vested the fee and legal title thereto." On the 14th day of June, 1894, and within the time limited by his contract, plaintiff received a deed of conveyance of the premises, whereby the entire legal title thereto vested in him. Prior to June 14, 1894. the fee and legal title of the land and premises in question was in W. W. Borden and Minnie L. Borden. On the 26th day of February, 1894, plaintiff made an application to defendant for a policy of insurance upon said dwelling house for $800, and upon certain personal property therein for various sums aggregating $400, but which need not be further mentioned, as appellant admits the validity of the judgment to the extent of the $400 insurance on such personal property. In his application plaintiff "fully and explicitly informed defendant and set forth his interest in and title to said premises and property." The application "was written out by and delivered to A. H. Beach, the duly-authorized agent of defendant, and is referred to and made a part of the policy." On the 26th day of February, 1894, in consideration of a premium of $44.40, defendant made and delivered to plaintiff and the latter accepted its policy No. 11,116, which is made a part of the findings, whereby defendant agreed to indemnify plaintiff against loss or damage by fire upon receipt of the proofs of loss, etc., not exceeding the actual cash value thereof, in the sum of $800 on said dwelling house. On the 10th day of April, 1894, the dwelling house and all the personal property were wholly destroyed by fire. The actual cash value of the dwelling house exceeded the amount of insurance thereon, viz. $800. Due proof of loss was made, and the court finds that plaintiff has complied with and duly performed all the conditions required of him by said policy. The court found that plaintiff had, prior to the issue of the policy, paid to his grantors in all on account of the purchase of said premises $450, viz. $100 in cash paid on the option to purchase, and $350 by a sale of personal property to be applied on such purchase.

Upon the pleadings and findings of the court two questions arise: (1) Had the plaintiff an insurable interest in the dwelling house covered by the policy upon which he can recover? (2) If the first question is answered in the affirmative, what was the extent of that interest?

Section 2587 of the Civil Code is as follows: "A policy of insurance must specify: (1) The parties between whom the contract is made; (2) the rate of premium; (3) the property or life insured; (4) the interest of the insured in property insured, if he is not the absolute owner thereof; (5) the risk insured against; and (6) the period during which the insurance is to continue." The contention of appellant is that, as the policy, which is made a part of the findings, describes plaintiff as the absolute owner of the property, and contains a condition that, "if the assured shall not be the sole and unconditional owner in fee of said property, * * * this policy shall be null and void," and that, as the findings show that plaintiff only had an option to purchase the property, and was not vested with any title therein, there can be no recovery. Were this the entire showing of the record, we should concur in the views of the appellant; but when we review the whole record other factors appear, which affect the problem. Plaintiff, in his complaint, avers (to state it in brief) that in his application for a policy he fully and explicitly informed defendant of the nature of his title, etc., and delivered said application to defendant; that it is now in the possession of defendant, who is better informed as to its contents than plaintiff, and he therefore refers to it as though fully set forth, and makes it a part of his complaint as though it appeared therein. Plaintiff also makes the policy a part of his complaint. Turning to the policy, and we find that it recites that: "This indemnity contract is based upon the valuations and representations contained in the assured's application and diagram of even number herewith, which the assured has signed, and permitted to be submitted to the company, and which are hereby made a warranty, and a part hereof." The court finds in consonance with the allegations of the complaint. If, then, the application of plaintiff stated fully the nature of his title, and if that application is a part of the policy, it is a sufficient compliance with section 2587 of the Civil Code in specifying the interest of the insured in the property.

But suppose we are not to treat the application as a part of the policy,—and there are respectable authorities to the effect that it will not usually be so treated,—and still the fact remains that defendant was fully informed as to plaintiff's title, and with full knowledge that such title did not amount to an ownership of the property (for it so affirms in its answer) deliberately described plaintiff in its policy as the owner, and a proviso that, "if the assured shall not be the sole and unconditional owner in fee of said property, * * * this policy shall be null and void." Where, as in the present case, a policy of insurance is based upon the condition that the insured is the owner in fee simple, but containing a provision that the application of the insured is to be considered a part of the policy, such application clearly showing that the insured is not the owner in fee simple, the insurer, by thus accepting the risk, waives the condition in the policy as to the title, and cannot set up the want of such fee-simple title to defeat an action on the policy. Beach, Ins. § 409; Lamb v. Insurance Co., 70 Iowa, 238, 30 N. W. 497; Insurance Co. v. Ende, 65 Tex. 118; Insurance Co. v. Camp, 71 Tex. 503, 9 S. W. 473; Van Schoick v. Insurance Co., 68 N. Y. 434; Insurance Co. v. Hick, 125 Ill. 361, 17 N. E. 792; Smith v. Insurance Co., 91 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 738. Either the insertion by the defendant of the statement in its policy that plaintiff was the owner of the property was a mistake on its part or a deliberate fraud upon the plaintiff. There is no imputation of fraud, and we shall not assume any such intention on the part of the defendant. Treated as a mistake of defendant, and the latter is not in a position to take advantage of it.

Holding, then, as we do, that there is nothing in the policy to prevent a recovery, provided it appears that plaintiff had an insurable interest, we address ourselves to that branch of the inquiry. It is said by law writers on the subject of insurance that "it is difficult to define accurately in what an insurable interest consists." Bid. Ins. § 156. It is admitted on all hands that it is not necessary that the insurer have a legal interest, but that an equitable interest is sufficient. The title, whether legal or equitable, may be defective, or even bad, provided the insurer has possession and use; even a valid equitable title is not requisite. It is held sufficient that the insured has a direct pecuniary interest in the preservation of the property, and that he will suffer a pecuniary loss as an immediate and proximate result of its destruction. Bid. Ins. supra; Merrett v. Insurance Co., 42 Iowa, 11; Herkimer v. Rice, 27 N. Y. 173; Riggs v. Insurance Co., 125 N. Y. 7, 25 N. E. 1058. In common parlance we speak of a house as being insured, but, strictly speaking, it is not the house, but the interest of the owner therein, that is insured; and whether that interest is founded upon a legal title, an equitable title, a lien, or such other lawful interest therein as will produce a direct and certain pecuniary loss to the insurer by its destruction, he has an insurable interest therein. Tyler v. Insurance Co., 12 Wend. 507. Actual possession by consent of the owner, with the beneficial use of the property, has been held an insurable interest. Horsch v. Insurance Co., 77 Wis. 4, 6, 7, 45 N. W. 945. In the present case the plaintiff was in the full possession and enjoyment of the property under a contract upon which he had in part paid the purchase price, and which upon his volition and completion of the contract would entitle him to a conveyance of the legal title. This enjoyment and expenditure gave him an insurable interest in the property.

2. What is the extent of plaintiff's insurable interest? Insurance is a contract whereby one, for a consideration, undertakes to compensate another if he shall suffer loss. It is a contract of indemnity. "This principle underlies the contract, and it can never, without violence to its essence and spirit, be made by the assured a source of profit, its sole purpose being to guaranty against loss or damage." May, Ins. § 2. It is a contract with a party to secure him against apprehended loss on account of his interest in a particular subject-matter, and not at all incidental to or transferable with the subject-matter. Carpenter v. Insurance Co., 16 Pet. 495. It does not, in the absence of special contract, run with the title or possession of the subject-matter. Under such a contract reparation must be made to the insured for the loss which he has suffered through his interest in the subject-matter, and to the extent of that interest, not exceeding the limit fixed by the policy. If his interest extends to the whole of the subject-matter of the property, its value up to the sum named in the policy is the measure of his right to recover. If his interest falls short of the whole, his right is limited, not by the value of the property, but by the value of his interest. The very meaning of the term "indemnity" excludes all idea of profit to the insured. Plaintiff's insurable interest then is to be measured by the advances he had made upon his contract of purchase, viz. $450. Had he entered into an ordinary contract to purchase the property, binding himself to pay the whole purchase price, his position would have been very different. But his contract was an option, upon which he had paid $450, and which he was at liberty to abandon at any time. To the extent of his payments he had an insurable interest in the property; beyond that he was not bound. If he could insure for the full value of the property, and, in case of loss, recover such value, he could thereupon decline to purchase under his option, and thus speculate and make a profit on the transaction in violation of a fundamental law of insurance. To permit such a recovery would greatly tend to the destruction of like property under like circumstances, and open the door and tempt men to enter therein for fraudulent purposes. As the plaintiff, by his judgment, recovered $800 on account of the loss of the house, where his interest therein was shown by the findings to be but $450, the cause should be remanded, and the court below directed to amend the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $350, and, as thus amended, the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, and the court below directed to amend the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $350, and, as thus amended, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

REDFIELD v. OAKLAND CONSOL. ST. RY. CO. (S. F. 106.)[1]

NEGLIGENCE — OPINION EVIDENCE — INJURY TO WIFE—DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS—RECORD.

1. A question asking a witness, in an action based on the contention that defendant was negligent in operating an electric car with but one person in charge, to state from his experience what the general custom was among electric roads, as to the number of men found necessary to manage a car under similar circumstances, does not call for the opinion of witness as an expert, but practically for the opinion of others as inferred from their conduct.

2. Where the question is whether an electric railway company was negligent in operating a car with but one man in charge, it being necessary for him to get off, at the top of a grade, to change the trolley to another wire, and all the circumstances are established by unconflicting evidence, opinion evidence is not admissible.

3. The overruling of an objection to an irrelevant and immaterial question will not be held prejudicial, it not appearing what answer was given

4. In an action by a husband for loss of his wife's services, there being evidence that before the injury she had cared for their children, refusal of an instruction that the jury could not consider the loss of service or of protection which plaintiff's children suffered by reason of the injury is not error; it being misleading, and instructions having been given clearly limiting recovery to damages suffered by plaintiff.

Oakland Consolidated Street-Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, R. M. Fitzgerald, and Carl H. Abbott, for appellant. Hall & Earl, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Upon the trial of this cause, plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was brought by plaintiff, the husband of Adeline B. Redfield, to recover for the loss of the service of his wife from May 6 to June 29, 1893, and for necessary medical and surgical attendance during said period, resulting from an injury to the wife alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for $1,700, and judgment was entered for that sum. The errors relied upon by appellant relate to the admission and exclusion of evidence, and the refusal of the court to give to the jury an instruction requested by the defendant. A brief statement of facts is necessary.

The plaintiff and his wife had two children. The wife and children visited Mountain View Cemetery on May 6, 1893, and took one of defendant's cars to return to the city of Oakland. The road upon which this car ran was a branch of defendant's main line, and the cars thereon were operated by one man, and had been for about a year, the electric motor being on the front platform, where there was also a brake. The platforms were separated from the body of the car by glass partitions extending across the car, as did also the seats, and the only way to pass from one end of the car to the other was by a step extending from one end to the other along the side of the car. For a considerable distance from the cemetery, the road consisted of a single track, and the grade was comparatively level; but, near the southerly end of the single track, there was an up grade, and at the top a switch, from which point there was a double track extending to the city. At or near the top of the grade, and before reaching the switch, the motorman shut off the power, the car having sufficient momentum to carry it past the switch, and jumped off the front platform, and got upon the rear platform, to change the trolley to the proper wire when passing the switch; and from that point there was a down grade for about half a mile to Booth street, where the track turned to the west. After adjusting the trolley at the switch, the motorman attempted to return to the front platform, but fell to the ground, and, when he got up, he was unable to catch the car, which ran with great speed down the grade to the turn at Booth street, at which point it left the track, and ran into a field, and Mrs. Redfield was thrown off, and received injuries from which she died on June 29, 1893.

Plaintiff's principal contention was that defendant was negligent in operating said car with but one man in charge. To rebut this charge of negligence, the defendant called one Leland, whose qualifications as an expert were not disputed, and put to him the following question: "If it appeared that the grade where the accident in question occurred was about a three per cent. grade, and upon that same line, can you state what experience has shown electric street-railway companies as to the number of men requisite in handling such a car in such a place and under such conditions?" The defendant also called Mr. Grim, who was familiar with the road and car in question, and had long experience in operating electric roads, and put the following question: "From that experience, are you now able to state to this jury what the general custom is among electric roads as to the number of men found requisite and necessary to manage such a car upon such a track as this, and under the conditions under which this car was operated?" Objections to these questions were sustained. These questions called for testimony as to the experience and custom of electric street-railway companies as to whether one man was sufficient to operate such cars upon such roads. If these witnesses were regarded as experts, and their individual opinions were required, the questions were too general, and did not embrace particulars which should have been stated; and so, if custom could be shown, it must appear that the cars used, the switch to be passed, and the grade of the road at the place where the motorman was required to leave his post to change the switch, were similar. But, aside from these criticisms upon the interrogatories, customs may originate in motives of economy, or the stress of pecuniary affairs, or in recklessness, and not from considerations based upon the proper discharge of their duty towards others using their cars. These witnesses could speak only from their observation of the fact that certain roads did operate certain cars with but one man in charge, and not as to the reason or motive for doing so. But, conceding that many roads did so because they believed one man sufficient, it would still be but the testimony of the witness that the several companies indulging in the custom were of the opinion that it was not negligent to do so. These questions did not call for the opinions of these witnesses as experts, but practically called for the opinions of others as inferred from their conduct; while, if those others were called and examined, they might admit that, while indulging in the custom, they knew it was dangerous. But it was not a case where opinions were admissible as evidence. All the circumstances from which the ultimate fact of negligence upon the one hand, or due care upon the other, must be found, were established by unconflicting evidence, and such ultimate fact was a matter to be inferred by the jury from the evidence. In Shafter v. Evans, 53 Cal. 32, it was said: "The ultimate fact of negligence in such a case is not one to be established by the mere opinions of witnesses called to testify. The evidence of experts is not admissible." In that case this court quoted from the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw in Glass Co. v. Lovell, 7 Cush. 321, as follows: "In applying circumstantial evidence which does not go directly to the fact in issue, but to facts from which the fact in issue is to be inferred, the jury have two distinct duties to perform: First, to ascertain the truth of the fact to which the evidence goes, and thence to infer the truth of the fact in issue. This inference depends upon experience. When this experience is of such a nature that it may be presumed to be within the common experience of all men of common education moving in the ordinary walks of life, there is no room for the evidence of opinion; it is for the jury to draw the inference." In Sappenfield v. Railroad Co., 91 Cal. 49, 59, 27 Pac. 590, a witness was asked: "From your experience in driving those cars and using those pins would you say that was a safe pin,—the straight pin?" The pin was used on a horse car. An objection that it was not a proper subject for expert testimony was overruled, and the ruling was held erroneous. The court said: "When the inquiry relates to a subject whose nature is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify one to understand it, or when all the facts upon which the opinion is founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury, the opinion of the witness is not to be received in evidence. If the relation between the facts and their probable results can be determined without any special skill or training, the facts themselves must be given in evidence and the conclusions or inferences must be drawn by the jury. If the circumstances out of which the negligence is said to arise have been established by proof, or can be shown, the ultimate fact of negligence is an inference to be drawn by the jury, and is not to be established by the opinions of others." See, also, the cases there cited, and Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 280, par. 4, 29 Pac. 481. It is true this car had been operated by one man without accident for about a year prior to the injury to Mrs. Redfield; but as was said by Mr. Justice McFarland in Monaghan v. Mill Co., 81 Cal. 193, 22 Pac. 590, where a chain suspended from a hook fell upon the plaintiff: "It is argued that it had hung suspended there for some years without accident; but that circumstance is only a matter of wonderment, and is an instance of how good luck will sometimes protect carelessness for long periods." The case of Railway Co. v. Novak, 9 C. C. A. 629, 61 Fed. 573, cited by appellant, is distinguishable from this case. The case there was whether one brakeman was sufficient to check or control the speed of a train by means of hand brakes. That question could only be answered correctly by one who had experience; but it would hardly require more than ordinary intelligence and observation to determine whether a railroad company would be guilty of negligence to passengers upon its road if it should impose upon the engineer the performance of a duty which would compel him to leave his engine while the train was in motion. These experts were, however, permitted, without objection, to testify that, in their opinion, one man could operate the car in question, at the place in question, with a requisite degree of safety to the passengers; and it is not perceived that evidence as to the custom of electric roads would have added to the weight of this testimony, if it were competent.

One of defendant's witnesses was asked upon cross-examination the following: "Don't you know that there are more women visit that cemetery than men?" An objection thereto by the defendant that it was immaterial and irrelevant was overruled, and an exception taken. The witness answered, "Yes, sir." The objection should have been sustained. Not only is it immaterial whether more women than men ride upon the cars of the defendant upon that part of its road, but the question was not restricted to those who used defendant's cars in visiting the cemetery, but was so general as to include all modes or means of going there. It is not every error, in ruling upon questions of evidence, however, that will justify a reversal of the judgment. If it were otherwise, affirmances upon appeal would be comparatively rare. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc., provides that: "The court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." The question involved was the alleged negligence of the defendant in operating its cars with only one man in charge. All the circumstances connected with the accident were shown by the evidence, and were such as to show conclusively that it was liable to occur at any time. Whether the passengers were all men or all women could not avoid or affect the necessity of the motorman leaving his post, and going to the other end of the car, to adjust the trolley in passing the switch. If the question had not been put to the witness, or if defendant's objection had been sustained, the result could not have been different. It is not argued that the amount of damages awarded was or could have been affected by the answer of the witness, nor that the damages are excessive; but the argument is that it could not legitimately affect the question of negligence. We are convinced that not only could it not legitimately affect the question of negligence, but that it did not affect it, and that defendant was not prejudiced by the error complained of.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction to the jury, as requested by the defendant: "In this action you are hereby instructed that you cannot consider the loss of service or of protection which the plaintiff's children suffered by reason of the injury to Mrs. Redfield." This contention is based upon the fact that the plaintiff testified that his wife was manager of his household, and did all the housework, cared for the children, made their clothing and hats, kept them clean, neat, and tidy, gave them piano lessons, and, to some extent, vocal lessons and lessons in drawing and painting, all which she was competent to do, attended to their moral training and habits, corrected them for their faults, taught them their prayers, and assisted them to some extent in their studies. It is true that no injury sustained by the children could be compensated or considered in this action; but as the duty of caring for and educating his children would devolve upon the plaintiff during her disability, and for which he was at all times responsible, it was competent for him to show, in estimating the value of the wife's services to him, the character of his household, the fact that he had children, and the character of her services to and for them; just as it would have been competent for the defendant to show that plaintiff kept servants who attended to all housekeeping affairs, a competent governess who attended to the training and care of the children, and a seamstress to do all the family sewing, and that the wife's position was merely ornamental. It is not contended that the evidence above stated was incompetent, or that it did not tend to show the value of the wife's services to the plaintiff, and therefore it cannot be assumed that the jury considered it for any other purpose. Besides, in regard to this element of the plaintiff's injury, the court instructed the jury that, if they found the wife had been injured through the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff "is entitled to recover such damages, and such damages only, as he may have suffered, if any, through the loss of the services of his wife, if any, resulting from such injuries, as well as such reasonable costs and expenses, etc. * * * You are permitted to determine what pecuniary loss the plaintiff suffered by the illness of the deceased from the 6th day of May to the 29th day of June, and to find in that amount, and in no greater amount. * * * You are to find the actual pecuniary damage sustained by him, and no more." If there was anything in the evidence which might have misled the jury,—and I think there was not,—these instructions specifically confined their estimate of damages to such as the husband sustained, and rendered the instruction requested to be given wholly unnecessary. But the instruction as requested would have been misleading. The jury might readily have inferred from it that all the evidence relating to the wife's services to the children was not to be considered for any purpose. If the instruction had been that they could not consider any injury or damage suffered by the children resulting from the loss of service to them, but that such loss of service could only be considered so far as it affected the value of her services to the plaintiff, it would have been unobjectionable, though unnecessary in view of the instructions given.

No other questions are made by counsel for appellant. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

EAMES v. HAVER. (L. A. 50.)[1]

NEW TRIAL—REMITTITUR IN APPELLATE COURT—CONTRACT—TENDER OF PERFORMANCE.

1. A new trial should not be ordered for an error in an instruction as to the measure of damages, by the omission of a credit admitted by the pleadings, where the successful party offers to remit the amount of the credit from the recovery, though such offer is made for the first time in the appellate court.

2. Under a contract for the exchange of stocks on the demand of one party, his demand and offer to produce the stocks on his part—his ability to do so being shown—is a sufficient tender of performance, where the other party refuses the exchange and denies the contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by A. W. Eames against S. C. Haver. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Frank A. Prescott, for appellant. C. C. Bennett, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The complaint in this action may be stated substantially as follows: In May, 1893, the defendant purchased from plaintiff 20 acres of land with orange grove thereon, for which he was to pay $8,000 in cash, and assign and deliver to plaintiff 100 shares of the capital stock of a corporation named Bear Valley & Alessandro Development Company. As a part of the transaction, however, it was agreed that on demand of the plaintiff the defendant would exchange for said stock an equal number of shares of the stock of a corporation named Bear Valley Irrigation Company; the expense of such exchange, not exceeding 5 per cent. of the value of the last-mentioned stock, to be paid by plaintiff to defendant as brokerage. At the time the land was conveyed by plaintiff (May 6, 1893), defendant paid the $8,000, and also assigned and delivered to plaintiff 100 shares of the stock of the Bear Valley & Alessandro Development Company, which will hereinafter be called the "Development Company." Defendant's promise to exchange stock as aforesaid was a part of the consideration for the conveyance of the land by the plaintiff. Thereafter, within a reasonable time, on or about June 9, 1893, plaintiff demanded of defendant an exchange of stock according to the agreement; tendering to defendant said 100 shares of development company stock, and 5 per cent. on the value of 100 shares of the irrigation stock. But defendant refused to make the exchange, denying the alleged agreement to make such exchange. That at the time of said tender and demand 100 shares of the stock of the irrigation company were of the value of $10,000, and the stock of the development company was of no value whatever. That since said demand and refusal both the irrigation company and the development company have become insolvent, and the stock of neither has any market value. Plaintiff alleged that he was damaged by defendant's breach of the agreement to exchange stocks in a sum equal to the difference of value of said stocks, to wit, the sum of $7,910, at the time of said demand and refusal, and prays judgment for that sum. In his answer, defendant denies the alleged agreement to exchange stocks; denies the alleged tender and demand by plaintiff; also, denies that one hundred shares of the irrigation stock was of greater value than $4,000 at the time of the alleged demand and tender by plaintiff; and further denies that 100 shares of the stock of the development company was then "of less value than $4,000."

The cause was tried by a jury, whose verdict was in favor of plaintiff, assessing the damages at $4,850, for which sum judgment was rendered against the defendant. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted by the following order: "The motion for new trial heretofore made in this case upon the part of defendant will be granted, upon the following grounds, to wit: The court erred in giving instructions Nos. 3, 4, and 6, at the request of the plaintiff, as each of said instructions ignored the 5 per cent. commission which defendant was entitled to under the testimony and plaintiff's own pleadings. (2) Upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, in this: that the weight of the evidence does not support the verdict as to the difference in value of the stock of the Bear Valley & Alessandro Development Company and the stock of the Bear Valley Irrigation Company."

1. The instructions "Nos. 3, 4, and 6," referred to in the order as being erroneous, related to the measure of damages, and were to the effect that, if the market value of the irrigation stock exceeded that of the development stock at the time of the demand of plaintiff for an exchange of stocks, the difference of such values would be the measure of the damages suffered by plaintiff, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages a sum equal to such difference. It is admitted that a brokerage, not exceeding 5 per cent. of the value of the irrigation stock, should have been deducted from the excess of the value of that stock over that of the development stock, and therefore that the measure of damages, as stated in the instruction, is too large, by the amount of such brokerage. Appellant contends that this error can be corrected by a modification of the judgment, without any necessity for a new trial, and offers here, for the first time, to remit from the judgment a sum equal to 5 per cent. on the greatest possible value attributed to 100 shares of the irrigation stock by the complaint, or by any part of the evidence. In the complaint the value of 100 shares of the irrigation stock, at the time of plaintiff's demand for the exchange, is alleged to have been $10,000, and the answer of the defendant denies that it was then of any greater value than $4,000. The highest estimate of the value of that stock (100 shares) at any time, by defendant's witnesses, was $10,500, and appellant offers to remit from the judgment a sum equal to 5 per cent. of this valuation, which would be $525; and I think such remittance would fully compensate the respondent for all possible injury resulting from the alleged erroneous instructions, except his costs of this appeal. Considering all the circumstances, I think the offer of appellant to remit $525 from the judgment, which is equal to 5 per cent. of the value of the irrigation stock, is quite liberal, and that respondent should be required to accept it on the condition that appellant pay all costs of the appeal. Atherton v. Fowler, 46 Cal. 320; Bank v. Chester, 55 Cal. 49; Woods v. Merrill, 57 Cal. 435. See, also, Davis v. Pacific Co., 98 Cal. 18, 32 Pac. 708. Perhaps the condition that appellant pay all costs of the appeal would not be just, if he had offered to remit the $525 in the lower court before a new trial was ordered.

2. Nor do I think the second ground upon which the new trial was granted can be sustained, namely, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict as to the difference in value of the stock of the development company, and that of the irrigation company. The court evidently overlooked the effect of the pleadings upon the value of the development stock. The complaint alleges that at the time the exchange of stocks was demanded 100 shares of the development stock was of no value. The answer denies that 100 shares of the development stock was then, or ever, of less value than $4,000. Thus, the defendant failed to deny the allegation of the complaint as to the value of the development stock, except to the extent of $4,000, and, by statutory implication, admits the truth of the allegation in the complaint, except to that extent. Besides, there is no evidence tending to prove that the market value of the development stock ever exceeded $40 per share. The defendant who was a broker dealing in stocks, and who testified at greater length than any other witness on either side, said nothing as to the market value of the development stock, except that he had never represented to plaintiff that it had any market value. The only other witnesses on the part of the defendant —Mr. Waters and Mr. Sterling—each testified that he did not know that the development stock ever had any market value, though Mr. Waters said he had heard of one private sale at $105 per share at some time between March and September, 1893, whereas plaintiff's demand for the exchange of stocks was on June 9, 1893. On the part of the plaintiff, Mr. Granger testified that he was a stockbroker, and knew the market value of the stocks in question in May and June, 1893, and that on and about the 9th day of June, 1893, the market value of the irrigation company stock ranged from $105 to $120 per share, and at the same time the development stock had no market value, "because there was no chance to sell any of it. * * * It could be bought for almost any price"; that it had been offered to him at 40 cents per share. There was no evidence tending to prove that either its market value or its intrinsic value was as much as $40 per share at any time. It follows that neither upon the pleadings nor by the evidence could it have been found or presumed that 100 shares of the development company stock was of greater real or market value than $4,000 at any time during May and June, 1893. As to the market value of 100 shares of the stock of the irrigation company at the time of plaintiff's demand for the exchange of stock, only two witnesses—Mr. Granger, for plaintiff, and Mr. Waters, for defendant, both stockbrokers—testified. Mr. Granger testified that such value of 100 shares was $10,000 to $12,000, and Mr. Waters that it was $9,500 to $10,500. The difference between this lowest estimate ($9,500) and the highest estimate that could have been made of the value of 100 shares of the development stock ($4,000) is $5,500, which is $650 more than the verdict of the jury. So it is not improbable that the jury did deduct the brokerage commission from the difference in values of the stocks of the two corporations, notwithstanding the omission of the court to instruct them so to do; but, however this may have been, the proffered remission of $525 from the judgment, and payment of costs of appeal, by plaintiff, will surely compensate defendant for all detriment suffered by him in consequence of the alleged error in the instructions for which the new trial was granted.

3. It is contended, however, that the order granting a new trial was justified on another ground than those stated by the court, to wit, that the court erred in giving the twelfth instruction at request of plaintiff, as follows: "(12) The fact that the stock of plaintiff was pledged as security in the hands of others has no bearing upon the case, and if the jury find that the plaintiff was able and willing to furnish his part of the exchange, and offered to do so, and the defendant refused to make such exchange, then plaintiff was excused from making an absolute proffer of the actual stock." It appeared from the evidence that the identical 100 shares of development stock delivered to plaintiff had been pledged by him to secure a debt, with the understanding that it was to be exchanged for irrigation stock, as per agreement. Mr. Granger, who demanded the exchange as agent for plaintiff, testified that the pledgee was willing and anxious to have the exchange made, and offered to permit it to be made, and that when he demanded the exchange he knew he could get the pledged stock and deliver it to defendant, but that when he demanded the exchange, and offered to deliver the development stock, the defendant denied any agreement or obligation on his part to make the exchange, and positively refused to exchange, so that there was no occasion or necessity for producing and exhibiting to the view of the plaintiff the certificate of the development stock, and that defendant made no objection to his offer to deliver the stock on the ground that it was not actually produced at the time it was offered and the exchange demanded. In connection with the instruction in question, the court also instructed the jury that, if they found the facts testified to by Mr. Granger to be true, the conduct of the defendant waived or excused the actual production of the stock, and that the offer to produce it, with the ability to do so, was a sufficient tender. Under these circumstances, I think the instruction was not erroneous, to the prejudice of the defendant; and if the word "and," which I have underscored, in the third line of the instruction, be omitted, as I think it should be in the reading, all obscurity would thereby be removed, and, so read, the instruction is clearly correct. Hanson v. Slaven, 98 Cal. 383, 33 Pac. 266. I think the order granting a new trial should be reversed, on the conditions that within 10 days after the filing of the remittitur in the court below the appellant remit from the judgment the sum of $525, and pay all costs of this appeal; but, if these conditions are not performed by appellant, said order should stand affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from will be reversed, on the conditions that, within 10 days after the filing of the remittitur in the court below, the appellant remit from the judgment herein against the respondent the sum of $525, and pay all costs of this appeal; but, if these conditions are not fully performed by the appellant within the period above named, then said order shall stand affirmed.

GETT v. SUPERVISORS OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY. (S. F. 381.)

COUNTIES — CLASSIFICATION — PRIMARY ELECTION LAW.

The classification of counties referred to in the act of March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 207), relating to primary elections, and which is made to apply only to counties of the first and second classes, is not that contained in section 4006 of the Political Code as originally enacted, but that made by the act of March 14, 1883 (St. 1883, p. 299), which revised the entire law on the subject of county government, and for the most part superseded the old law.

In bank. Proceeding by W. A. Gett for writ of mandate to the supervisors of Sacramento county. Denied.

D. E. Alexander and W. A. Gett, Jr., for petitioner. F. D. Ryan and J. Charles Jones, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding in which the petitioner asks a writ of mandate to the supervisors of Sacramento county, commanding them to perform the duties imposed upon election commissioners and boards of supervisors by the act of March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 207), relating to primary elections. The act, by its express terms, is restricted to counties of the first and second classes (section 26, p. 218), and consequently has no application to Sacramento county or any other, except the city and county of San Francisco and the county of Los Angeles, unless the contention of petitioner can be sustained that the classes referred to in said section 26 are those defined in section 4006 of the Political Code as originally enacted, which reads as follows: "Sec. 4006. For purposes other than roads and highways the counties of this state are classified as follows: (1) Those containing twenty thousand inhabitants or over constitute the first class; (2) those containing eight thousand and under twenty thousand inhabitants constitute the second class; and, (3) those containing less than eight thousand inhabitants constitute the third class." This section was a part of title 2 of part 4 of the Political Code, relating to the government of counties as the same was regulated prior to the adoption of the present constitution. By the act of March 14, 1883, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township government" (St. 1883, p. 299), the whole law upon this subject was revised, and the old law in most respects superseded. This being so, it is extremely doubtful whether the classification established by section 4006, supra, is continued in force for any purpose whatever; but, conceding that it may be in force with respect to some matters regulated by statutes passed prior to the new classification contained in the act of 1883, we have no doubt that the reference in the primary election law is to the classes defined in the latest county government act, and not to the classes established by section 4006 of the Political Code. It follows, therefore, that neither this petitioner nor the respondents have any interest in the determination of the question which they have attempted to submit, i. e. the constitutionality of the act of March 27, 1895, and that it ought not to be decided upon such attempted submission. Writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

SOUTHERN CAL. RY. CO. v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. et al. (No. 19,553.)

DEED—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCE—INJUNCTION—EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. After a conveyance in fee of a strip of land known as a certain avenue, subject only to an easement in the public for road purposes, the grantor has no interest therein which he can convey to a subsequent grantee.

2. An ordinance granting a railroad company the right to enter upon and construct a track through a public street does not operate to justify wrongful acts of such company as trespassers prior to the passage of such ordinance.

3. Where defendant railroad corporation has been perpetually enjoined from entering upon and constructing its road over private lands, such injunction must be modified so far as it prohibits the exercise of rights subsequently acquired by defendant under right of eminent domain.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by the Southern California Railway Company, a corporation, against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Pacific Improvement Company, corporations, and others, to restrain the construction or maintenance of a railroad track. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harris & Gregg, for appellants. W. J. Hunsaker, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to restrain the defendants from constructing or maintaining a railroad track, and to compel them to remove all tracks and lines of track from a certain strip of land 100 feet in width, and commonly known as "Park Avenue," situate and being in the county of San Bernardino, and owned, possessed, and appropriated by the plaintiff for the purposes of a railroad; also, to recover from defendants $1,000 damages for injuries to said strip of land. The plaintiff had a decree in its favor, whereby it was adjudged that it was the owner of the land described in the complaint; that neither of the defendants had any right, title, or interest therein or thereto, and perpetually restraining them and each of them from entering upon said land and premises, and from constructing, maintaining, or operating any line or lines of railroad, etc., thereon, and requiring them to remove therefrom, within 10 days, all roads, tracks, ties, rails, switches, etc., and awarding plaintiff damages in the sum of one dollar, and denying to defendants the relief sought in their answer and cross complaint. Defendants appeal from the decree, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

A very few facts will serve to illustrate the only important questions involved in this case. Plaintiff and defendant the Southern Pacific Railroad Company are both railroad corporations, and the defendant the Pacific Improvement Company is a corporation, and, as a contractor, was performing for the other corporation defendant the grading, track-laying, etc., spoken of hereafter. The city of Redlands is a municipal corporation in the county of San Bernardino, and the strip of land described in the complaint, and known as "Park Avenue," is a public street in said city. In 1886 one W. F. Summers was the owner in fee of the tract of land described as "Lugonia Park," including Park avenue aforesaid. In December, 1886, Summers contracted to sell all the land described in the complaint to George L. Cook and A. L. Park within eight months. Cook and Clark, on the 28th day of November, 1887, conveyed the strip of land, 100 feet wide, known as "Park Avenue," to the Central Railway Company, reserving from the conveyance "the right to use all of the above land not used by the railroad track for a public road or drive." The Central Railway Company constructed a railroad longitudinally through the center of said Park avenue, and the present plaintiff, by consolidation, has succeeded to all the rights and property of the former owner. Summers consummated his agreement to convey to Cook and Park by a deed of conveyance. The railroad of plaintiff is an ordinary steam railroad, constructed and operated for the transportation of freight and carriage of passengers. Subsequent to the purchase of the fee in said avenue by the grantor of plaintiff, and subsequent to the construction of its railroad, the defendant railroad corporation projected and located a like railroad, for like purposes through and over said Park avenue.

The basis of defendants' claim to a right in Park avenue is: (1) A conveyance to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by deed of September 18, 1891, by W. F. Summers, of a strip of land 30½ feet wide on the south side of said Park avenue, reserving all of the above-described land not occupied by the railroad track for a public road or drive. (2) An ordinance of the board of trustees of the city of Redlands passed March 2, 1892, authorizing the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to lay down, maintain, and use a railroad track upon and along the southerly 30½ feet of Park avenue. This action was commenced December 31, 1891, and on the 23d day of November, 1892, defendants, by a supplemental answer and supplemental cross complaint, set up the passage of the ordinance above mentioned. The allegations of the complaint and findings of the court are sufficient to warrant the judgment if defendants were not entitled to enter upon and interfere with the track, right of way, and property of plaintiff thereon. The deed to plaintiff's predecessor being prior in time to that to the railroad defendant, and conveying in fee the whole of Park avenue, subject only to an easement in the public for road purposes, the defendants acquired no right thereto by the subsequent conveyance; and hence, at the date of their intrusion upon the property and rights of plaintiff, defendants were trespassers.

Whatever rights were conferred upon defendants by the ordinance granting to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company the right to construct its road through Park avenue, it could not operate to justify or extenuate the wrongful acts of the defendants perpetrated many months prior to the passage of such ordinance. So, too, it is probable that defendants could not by and under such an ordinance so far justify their active interference with the plant of plaintiff, and thereby prevent the issuing of a perpetual injunction against them. We deem this question of little importance here, for these reasons: Subsequent to the rendition of the decree and perpetual injunction in this case, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company commenced an action against the plaintiff herein, under the right of eminent domain, to condemn a right of way for its railroad over the southerly side of this same Park avenue, and such proceedings were had therein that a right of way was condemned to the plaintiff therein for its said railroad through said avenue; and upon an appeal to this court the judgment of condemnation was affirmed, on the 31st day of January, 1896. See case No. 19,500, 43 Pac. 602. By virtue of the title acquired by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in said condemnation proceedings, it will become the duty of the superior court in and for the county of San Bernardino, upon application, to so modify its perpetual injunction herein that it shall not apply to or prohibit the exercise of the rights obtained under the judgment in condemnation.

It follows that except as to the matter of one dollar damages awarded to plaintiff, and as to costs, this cause is and has become mainly a moot case, not calling for extended discussion. We think the evidence justified the findings and the latter support the decree. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

Action by the Southern California Railway Company and another against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Pacific Improvement Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harris & Gregg, for appellants. W. J. Hunsaker, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action is precisely the same as No. 19,553, between the same parties, this day decided (43 Pac. 1123), except that in this action, which was commenced after No. 19,553, one F. H. Pattee, who is shown to have become an abutting landowner on Park avenue after the other suit was brought, is made a party plaintiff. Defendants, in addition to a like answer and cross complaint as in the other case, pleaded the pendency of that action in abatement of this. The finding was against the defendants on this plea, and in all other respects the findings and judgment are the same in this cause as in that. For the reasons given in said cause No. 19,553, between all of the same parties except said Pattee, the judgment and order appealed from herein are affirmed.

BUCKMAN v. LANDERS et al. (S. F. 240.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—ACTIONS TO ENFORCE—EVIDENCE—DEFENSE.

1. Under St. 1889, p. 168 (Street Law, § 12), making the warrant, assessment, certificate and diagram, with affidavit of demand and nonpayment of a street assessment, prima facie evidence of plaintiff's right to recover in an action on the assessment, a finding of demand publicly made on the lot is warranted by the affidavit alone.

2. Error in omitting from a street assessment one of the lots fronting on the street cannot be urged as a defense in an action on the assessment, since the remedy was by appeal from the assessment.

3. Prima facie evidence afforded by the assessment itself warrants a finding that the contractor performed the work to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, notwithstanding the certificate of the city engineer to the contrary.

4. An extension granted for performance of a contract for street work need not be indorsed on the contract before the expiration of the time originally fixed therein for completion of the work.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by one Buckman against Landers and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Smith & Murasky, for appellants. Wm. H. Chapman and E. G. Knapp, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action upon a street assessment in San Francisco. The finding of the court that Army street, upon which the work in question was done, is a public street, is not specified in the statement as unsupported by the evidence, and the finding must therefore be accepted as correct.

Section 12 of the street law (St. 1889, p. 168) declares: "The warrant, assessment, certificate and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and non-payment, shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment, and of the prior proceedings and acts of the superintendent of streets and city council upon which said warrant, assessment and diagram are based, and like evidence of the right of the plaintiff to recover in the action." In the absence of any other evidence, the prima facie character of this evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the agent of the plaintiff went upon the lot assessed, and, while there, publicly demanded payment of the assessment. Himmelmann v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 213; Dyer v. Brogan, 57 Cal. 234. The testimony that no personal demand was made upon the defendants did not impair the statement in the affidavit that demand was made upon the lot.

An appeal from the assessment that had been originally made for the work by the superintendent of streets was sustained by the board of supervisors, and the assessment set aside; and the assessment upon which the present action is brought was thereafter made by the superintendent, in accordance with the directions of the board of supervisors. It is now contended by the appellants that this assessment is invalid, for the reason that certain lots which should bear a portion of the expense of the work are not included therein. The appellants herein could, however, have appealed from this assessment, and could have had the error, if it was such, corrected upon such appeal by the board of supervisors. People v. O'Neil, 51 Cal. 91. Their failure to so appeal deprives them of the right to assign such error in an action to enforce the assessment. The mere omission from the assessment of one of the lots fronting upon the street does not of itself render the assessment void upon its face. McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Dowling v. Conniff, 103 Cal. 75, 36 Pac. 1034; Warren v. Riddell, 106 Cal. 352, 39 Pac. 781. The assessment was prima facie evidence that the contractor had fulfilled his contract to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, and, in the absence of any other evidence, the court was authorized to find in accordance therewith. The prima facie character of this evidence was not overcome by the certificate of the engineer. Williams v. Society, 97 Cal. 122, 31 Pac. 908.

The record shows that the work was completed within the time fixed for its completion by the superintendent of streets and the subsequent extensions thereof authorized by the board of supervisors. It does not appear at what time the superintendent indorsed these extensions upon the contract, and the prima facie character of the documentary evidence introduced includes the "regularity and correctness" of his acts. It was not requisite that he should indorse an extension upon the contract before the expiration of the time originally fixed therein. McVerry v. Boyd, 89 Cal. 304, 26 Pac. 885; Ede v. Knight, 93 Cal. 159, 28 Pac. 860. The judgment and order are affirmed.

CORPORATIONS—ASSIGNMENT OF STOCK AFTER INSOLVENCY—INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.

1. A stockholder of a corporation to whom had been assigned all of its assets in consideration of her agreement to pay its debts, and who knows that the corporation is insolvent, cannot relieve herself of a personal liability for the corporate indebtedness by assigning her stock to an insolvent person for that purpose.

2. A judgment in favor of the assignee for a subsequent conversion by the corporation of the stock assigned does not operate as an estoppel to relieve the assignor of her liability.

3. A stockholder may show that the corporate indebtedness which is sought to be enforced against her was incurred through fraud and collusion with the directors, if such is the fact.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by the National Carriage Manufacturing Company against the Story & Isham Commercial Company, and Adella B. Story. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Haines & Ward and Works & Works, for appellant. McDonald & McDonald, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action brought to recover from respondent Adella B. Story the unpaid subscription upon stock held by her in the corporate defendant, or so much of such subscription as is necessary to pay the judgment of plaintiff against said corporation. Respondent became the owner of 2,498 shares of such stock on the 16th day of January, 1888, by transfer from H. L. Story. The shares were of the par value of $100, and only $10 per share had been paid thereon. The complaint shows that plaintiff recovered a judgment against the corporate defendant on the 28th day of February, 1894, for $1,464.52, and it is averred that respondent continued to be the owner of said stock, and that there was due on the same the sum of $224,820. Plaintiff asks that respondent be compelled to pay into court upon her subscription a sum sufficient to pay its judgment and costs. Respondent, in her answer, denied most of the material allegations of the complaint, and particularly that since the 26th day of February, 1891, she had owned or held any of the stock of the corporate defendant. For a second defense she avers an assignment of her stock on the date last named to one Walter E. Williams, and that said Williams presented the certificate and the transfer to the officers of the defendant corporation, and demanded a transfer thereof to him on the books of said corporation; that the corporation refused to allow such transfer to be made, but retained the certificate of stock, and refused to return the same to said Williams, thus converting the same to its own use; and that on the 28th day of February, 1891, said Williams commenced an action against said corporation for the recovery of the value of said stock, and such proceedings were thereafter had that on the 26th day of May, 1891, said Williams recovered a judgment against said corporation for the sum of $12,210, as the value of said stock, which judgment has never been appealed from or set aside or modified. For a third defense she denies that at the time plaintiff commenced its said action against said corporation on which it recovered the above-mentioned judgment, the corporation was indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatever. She then avers that "during all the time aforesaid this defendant was the only solvent stockholder of said Story & Isham Commercial Company." Further, that the corporation was wholly insolvent, which fact was well known to plaintiff; and that the board of directors of the defendant corporation, for the purpose of injuring and defrauding defendant, knowingly and willfully permitted plaintiff to take and recover said judgment.

At the trial it was stipulated that plaintiff had recovered the judgment as averred, and that execution had been issued and returned nulla bona before this suit was commenced; also that respondent had, as alleged in her answer, assigned her stock to Williams, and that Williams had presented the certificate and demanded a transfer as alleged, and had recovered the judgment for conversion against the corporation as charged in her answer. Plaintiff in said stipulation reserved the right to attack the bona fides of the assignment.

Williams, the supposed assignee of Mrs. Story, testified at the trial. He stated that Mr. Bates, who it is admitted was the agent of appellant, called upon him, and wanted to know if he would accept the gift of the stock. He stated that the corporation was indebted in the amount of $90,000, and that Mrs. Story had agreed to pay something like $60,000, and, in order to stop any increase of liability, "she wanted to dispose of that stock to some one who was not in a condition that would render them liable for,—not liable, but whose financial standing was such that there would be no element of strength or credit to the concern. And at that time I was insolvent. I had just taken out insolvency proceedings, and the fact that I was insolvent made it so that my being a stockholder would prevent the company from getting any further credit, and she would be out of it; and me being friendly to her, I accepted the gift of the stock in that way." Under instructions, and at the request of Mrs. Story's attorneys, he took the stock to the office of the company, and demanded a transfer on the books. He then went to her attorneys, and notified them of what he had done. He had nothing to do with the bringing of the suit in his name for the conversion of the stock. He did not employ attorneys or pay costs. He had no hand in it except to testify. After the judgment had been recovered, he assigned it to Mrs.

Story. He had no agreement or conversation about the assignment. They presented the paper, and he signed it without reading it, just because he was asked to. There was no agreement that he should hold the stock for Mrs. Story. He did not think he could be compelled to assign the judgment to her. He then testified as follows: "Q. In this whole transaction, did you understand that you were acting in your own interest in the matter, or that you were acting purely as a matter of friendship for Mrs. Story? A. I was acting as a matter of friendship for Mrs. Story. Q. You took the assignment of this stock because Mr. Bates requested you to accommodate her? A. Yes, sir. Q. And held it in the same way? A. Yes, sir. Q. And when somebody came to ask you to transfer the judgment to her you transferred it in the same way? A. Yes, sir. Q. Purely as an act of friendship throughout? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, when you speak about understanding you were the absolute owner of the stock, you simply mean you understood you were the legal owner of it? A. Yes, sir. Q. But that morally you felt like you should account to Mrs. Story for anything, if anything grew out of it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you held it with that understanding? A. In my own mind. There was no agreement to that effect. I was at liberty to have done with it just what I pleased."

At the trial it was admitted at the request of Mrs. Story's attorneys that certain witnesses would testify, and were considered as having testified, that before the gift of the stock to Williams Mrs. Story had assumed and agreed to pay all the debts of the corporation, and the company had executed to her an instrument which she construed as conveying to her all the assets of the corporation, but that difference had arisen between herself and the officers of the corporation, and she believed that they would use every means in their power to injure her financially, and that, to secure immunity as a stockholder from any indebtedness that might be created by the company in litigation with her or otherwise, she desired to make such transfer of the stock to Williams, and that after the transfer to Williams she paid on the indebtedness of the corporation between ninety and one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars. It will be seen, therefore, that both the assignor and assignee knew at the time of the transfer of the stock by Mrs. Story that the corporation was utterly insolvent, and that all its assets had been assigned to Mrs. Story herself, in consideration of her agreement to pay its debts. Further, it expressly appears that Mrs. Story understood that she was not transferring any property, but was merely getting rid of a liability, and she so represented to Williams at the time, and Williams accepted it as a favor to Mrs. Story, not for the purpose of acquiring any property himself; and in the whole matter was actuated not with the motive of gain, but out of pure friendship to Mrs. Story. Accordingly, he acted in the matter all through under the advice of her attorneys. She caused suit to be commenced in his name against the corporation for conversion, without consulting him, and when judgment had been obtained she presented to him an assignment thereof to herself without first consulting him about it, and he executed it without reading, just because she wished it.

It was also said by the witness that there was no understanding that he should hold for Mrs. Story, or would reconvey to her. But what was there to hold? All the assets had been assigned to Mrs. Story, and both knew that they were insufficient to pay the debts. The corporation could not have been a "going concern," and, since all its property rights had passed from it, there was no possibility of a surplus or of possible value in the stock. In transferring the stock Mrs. Story transferred nothing, and did not think she passed anything of value to Williams. It was as though the payor of a promissory note could assign his liability to pay. Still this apparent anomaly, this right to transfer a liability from one point of view, usually attaches to the interest of shareholders in a corporation. It has been said to be a special partnership, in which the shareholders conduct business and own property in a fictitious name, and in which there is no delectus personæ, and, therefore, in which the partners may sell, and by so doing be relieved from all liability save such as the statute or the charter may provide shall continue. And this includes the liability for unpaid subscription for stock. So long as the corporation is solvent, there is ordinarily no restriction upon the right to transfer, but the American doctrine is that, after the corporation has become insolvent, and the stockholder knows this, and especially if the corporation has ceased to do business, a shareholder cannot transfer his stock to an insolvent or to an irresponsible person, so as to relieve himself from liability. And I do not find from the cases that it is necessary to find, in addition to the above facts, that there was an actual intent to defraud. Such a transaction would necessarily have that effect, and the stockholder, having had the chance of gain, cannot, when the enterprise has proven unprofitable, escape the liability. It would be a fraud upon his fellow shareholders as well as upon the creditors, for it would deprive them of the right to enforce contribution. Upon this point the decisions and the text writers in this country are as one. Morawetz (Priv. Corp. § 858) states the law as above, and cites numerous authorities. This author also states that the transfer must be a sale for a valuable consideration,—what the English cases call an "out-and-out sale." Cook, in his work on Stock and Stockholders (sections 263–265), says: "In the United States a transfer of shares in a failing concern, made by a transferror with the intention and for the purpose of escaping liability as a stockholder to a person who, for any cause, is incapable of responding in respect to such liability, is void, both as to creditors of the company and as to other shareholders; and that, too, although, as between the transferror and transferee, the transaction may have been absolute, and no secret trust involved." This author states, however, that it would be otherwise if the transferror did not know of the insolvency of the corporation, and the transfer was bona fide. In such case the transferror would be released, although the corporation proved to be insolvent. This author also cites many cases. See, also, Beach, Priv. Corp. § 127; Spell. Priv. Corp. § 817; Thomp. Liab. Stockh. § 210 et seq. The last author states the substance of the cases in this country and in England at considerable length. This author concludes that the American rule results from the trust-fund doctrine, and says courts of equity will not allow this portion of the fund to be frittered away by transfer to an insolvent for the purpose of escaping liability. He says, also, the intent, which is material, is the intent to escape liability. In this case that intent is avowed as the motive of the transfer by both the parties to it. Defendant claims, however, that there was an intent to escape the payment of liabilities then existing, yet in this case she is endeavoring thereby to escape such liability. If the judgment was procured against the corporation by plaintiff through collusion or fraud, she could have proved that as a defense in this case. She made no attempt to prove anything of the kind. It would make no difference that the judgment was for damages. The question is not whether there was an intent to defraud plaintiff. The transfer was not in good faith if made after insolvency, simply with a view of escaping liability, and when there was no real sale of the stock. Such a transfer is colorable only. The judgment of conversion is not an estoppel. A corporation after insolvency cannot by converting the stock of its shareholders relieve them of liability upon their stock, and it matters not what the motive may be which induced the act of conversion. There is no conflict in the evidence. It does not support the findings, and therefore the order and judgment are reversed and a new trial ordered.

DEACON v. BLODGET. (L. A. 28.)

CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

Defendant gave plaintiff a written contract whereby he agreed to pay him $835 not later than one year from date. The contract further provided that the money should be paid sooner if realized from the sale of certain lands which were placed in the hands of plaintiff, and on the sale of which he was to receive a certain commission, and required plaintiff to use diligent effort to sell the land for the best price. Held, that the stipulation requiring plaintiff to use diligent effort to sell the land was not a condition precedent to defendant's duty to pay the money at the expiration of the year, in case the land was not sold.

Action by George H. Deacon against H. A. Blodget. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. W. Lockhart and C. E. Arnold, for appellant. J. W. Wiley and C. C. Cowgill, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $835 and legal interest thereon from November 23, 1893, found by the court to be due to him from defendant upon the following written instrument: "I hereby promise to pay George H. Deacon, not later than one year after date, the sum of eight hundred and thirty-five dollars. Said sum to be sooner paid if realized from the sale of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section six, township thirty-one S., range twenty-nine east, which said tract of land I hereby place in the hands of said Deacon exclusively for the said term of one year, for sale at a minimum price of forty-five dollars per acre. Said Deacon to receive a commission on said sale of five per cent. Said Deacon to use diligent effort to obtain the best price possible in excess of said price of forty-five dollars per acre. H. A. Blodget. Nov. 23, 1892." The complaint (filed March 21, 1894) set out a copy of said instrument, and alleged its execution by defendant, and that no part of said sum of $835 has been paid, but contained no averment that plaintiff had sold or endeavored to sell the land therein described. Defendant contends that the pleading was insufficient; that the contract imposed on plaintiff the obligation to use diligent effort to sell the land before the expiration of one year, at $45 per acre or more; and that he should have alleged such effort in the complaint. This is so if such endeavor on the part of plaintiff is a condition precedent to the duty of defendant to pay said sum of $835; but we think it clearly is not such a condition. Stipulations in a contract are not construed as conditions precedent, unless that construction is made necessary by the terms of the contract. Railroad Co. v. Butler, 50 Cal. 577. The instrument sued on contains two engagements on the part of defendant,—one to pay plaintiff the sum of $835 not later than one year from date; the other authorizing plaintiff to sell the land described,—and the only connection or dependence between them is that the accomplishment of a sale in virtue of the latter would entitle the plaintiff to earlier performance of the former. Plaintiff's obligation to use diligence relates entirely to the second contract, and not to the first.

Defendant filed a cross complaint in which he averred that the instrument sued on does not truly represent the contract which the parties intended to express therein; that he (the defendant) prepared such instrument, and by mistake omitted therefrom a provision that said sum of $835 should be paid only out of the proceeds of sale of the land described, and that such sale must be made within the period of one year, which was the real agreement of the parties, as plaintiff well knew when the written contract was executed. The circumstances of the alleged mistake were set out with particularity, and defendant prayed thereon a reformation of the instrument. From the evidence at the trial, the court found, in effect, that defendant was justly indebted to plaintiff to the amount of $835 at and prior to the time of the execution of said written contract; that his obligation to pay the same was not contingent upon the sale of said tract of land by plaintiff; and that said instrument does express the agreement of the parties. Defendant assails the findings, but his argument is hardly more than that they are contrary to the weight of the evidence. There was certainly direct conflict in the material parts of this, and quite sufficient appears to sustain the findings. One or two other points are made, but they are unimportant. We find no error in the record available to appellant. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

BARNHART v. EDWARDS et al. (Sac. 150.)

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — DECREE — APPEAL — PARTIES — SERVICE OF NOTICE ON ADVERSE PARTY.

1. In an action against the administrator of a deceased mortgagor to foreclose the mortgage after the rejection of a claim against the estate for the amount thereof, a grantee of the mortgaged property was made a defendant, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff for about one-fourth the amount presented in his claim against the estate. Held, that on appeal from such judgment by defendant grantee the administrator was an adverse party (Code Civ. Proc. § 940), on whom notice of appeal must be served.

2. In an action against the administrator of a deceased mortgagor and a grantee of the mortgaged premises to foreclose the mortgage, judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants joined in a notice of intention to move for a new trial on the same grounds. An appeal from the order denying a new trial was perfected by defendant grantee only, and the record failed to show that the interests of such defendants were adverse to each other on the motion for new trial, and also failed to show that any statement of the case was prepared or settled on behalf of the administrator. Held, that the administrator was not a necessary party to the appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by one Barnhart against Edwards and Davis to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant Davis appeals. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal from such order for want of service of notice of appeal on defendant Edwards. Appeal from judgment dismissed, and motion to dismiss appeal from order denied.

P. J. Hazen and Nicol & Orr, for appellant. Jas. A. Louttit, Minor & Ashley, and Paul Morf, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. A motion is made to dismiss the appeal herein upon the ground that the notice of appeal was not served upon a codefendant of the appellant. The motion is resisted by the appellant upon the ground that his codefendant is not an adverse party, within the meaning of section 940, Code Civ. Proc. The action was brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage given to the plaintiff by one E. C. Vancil in the form of an absolute deed, but by way of security for the payment of certain claims and advances by the plaintiff. Prior to the commencement of the action, Vancil died, and the defendant Edwards was appointed administrator of his estate. The plaintiff presented to the administrator a claim against the estate for the amount of money then due and unpaid for which the security had been given, which was rejected by the administrator, and thereupon the present action was brought to establish the amount of the claim, and for a sale of the mortgaged lands. Subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, Vancil conveyed the mortgaged premises to the appellant, and for that reason he was made a party defendant. Issue was made upon the various allegations of the complaint, and the court found in favor of the plaintiff, and rendered its judgment directing a sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy the plaintiff's claim against the estate of Vancil, and providing that, if there should be any deficiency, it should be paid out of the estate in due course of administration. Both of the defendants gave notice of an intention to move for a new trial, but the statement of the case on which it was to be heard, and the assignment of errors therein, appear to have been prepared by the appellant alone, and the minute entry of the order thereon states that the motion of the "defendant" herein for a new trial was this day denied. The appeal from the judgment and from the order is by the defendant Davis alone. No service of the notice of appeal was made upon the administrator of Vancil's estate.

By the judgment appealed from the amount of the plaintiff's claim against the estate of Vancil has been determined to be $7,668. The amount for which the plaintiff presented his claim against the estate, and which he claims in his complaint, is $30,477. If the present judgment should be reversed, and upon another trial the plaintiff should establish the full amount of his claim, the estate of Vancil might be injuriously affected. If the mortgaged premises should sell for enough to satisfy the present judgment, the estate would not be called upon to pay any money to the plaintiff; whereas, if by another judgment the amount of the plaintiff's claim should be increased, the estate, by reason of its obligation to pay the deficiency of such judgment after the sale of the property, would be injuriously affected to whatever extent such deficiency might be increased by the increased amount found due to the plaintiff. It is evident, therefore, that the administrator of the estate should be notified of the appeal before this court would have any jurisdiction to determine whether the judgment should be reversed. Insurance Co. v. Fisher, 106 Cal. 224, 39 Pac. 758.

As both of the defendants joined in the notice of intention to move for a new trial, stating therein the same grounds for their motion, it does not appear from the record that their interests upon that motion were adverse to each other. The record, however, fails to show that any statement of the case was prepared or settled on behalf of the administrator, and, as the order denying a new trial is by its terms limited to the motion therefor on behalf of the "defendant," we must assume that it was the defendant by whom the statement of the case found in the transcript was prepared, and that the motion on behalf of the administrator is still undetermined. Upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial, only the parties to the motion upon which the order was made are necessary parties to the appeal (In re Ryer's Estate [Cal.] 42 Pac. 1082), and, as only the plaintiff and the appellant are parties to the order appealed from herein, there was no occasion for the appellant to serve his codefendant with the notice of appeal from that order. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial is denied

EXECUTOR—TIME FOR FILING CLAIMS—DETERMINING VALUE OF ESTATE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1490, 1491, requiring an executor or administrator at once on his appointment to publish a notice to creditors to file their claims within a designated time thereafter, which shall be ten months when the value of the estate exceeds $10,000, and four months where it is of less value, the rights of creditors as to the time within which they may file claims is governed by the value of the estate, and not by the determination of it by the executor; and, in the absence of a decree finding its value, it may be determined in an action by a creditor against the executor, and, if found to exceed $10,000, the plaintiff is within the time if his claim was filed within ten months of the publication of the notice, regardless of the time stated in the notice.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Green, Judge.

Action by Edward M. Paterson against Albert Schmidt, as executor of the will of F. A. Moore, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Marsh and Stephen G. Nye, for appellant. Chas. F. Craddock, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Schmidt, as executor of the last will and testament of Francis A. Moore, deceased, published a notice to creditors, requiring them to present their claims against the estate within four months after the first publication. Some time thereafter an inventory and appraisement was returned, showing the value of the estate to be $6,485.95. Two months after the time for presenting claims, as prescribed in the notice to creditors, had expired, this plaintiff presented a claim to the executor against the estate for services, which claim was rejected, upon the ground (presumably) that it was not presented in time. Action was brought upon this rejected claim, and at the trial it was shown by oral evidence that the estate of the deceased at the time of the first publication of notice to creditors was of a value in excess of $10,000, and the court made a finding of fact to that effect. The court also held that the creditors had ten months within which to present their claims against the estate, and that this claim was presented in time, and rendered judgment for plaintiff.

Section 1490 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that every executor or administrator must, immediately after his appointment, cause to be published a notice to creditors; and section 1491, following, provides that the time expressed in the notice must be ten months after its first publication when the estate exceeds in value the sum of $10,000, and four months when it does not. Section 1443 of the same Code provides that every executor or administrator must make and return to the court, within three months after his appointment, a true inventory and appraisement, etc. From the fact that the notice to creditors must be published immediately after the executor or administrator is appointed, and that the executor or administrator after his appointment has three months within which to return the inventory and appraisement, it is plainly observable that the law does not contemplate that the executor or administrator shall obtain information from the appraisement for the purpose of fixing the time specified in the notice in which creditors may present their claims. It would seem, therefore, that the executor or administrator must for himself, and at his own risk, investigate and determine the value of the estate for the purpose of determining the time in which creditors may appear and present their claims; and a wrong determination of that fact by him may often result in serious consequences, for his decision of the fact is in no sense judicial, and therefore not binding and conclusive upon creditors. The law, in effect, says that, when the estate is of greater value than $10,000 the creditors are entitled to ten months' notice. It does not say that, when the executor or administrator determines its value to be greater than $10,000, the notice shall be for ten months; but it is the fact, and not the executor's or administrator's determination of the fact, that is controlling. The law gives the creditors certain rights as to the time within which they may present their claims, and no executor or administrator, by giving a four-months notice, where he should have given a ten-months notice, can in any way deprive creditors of those rights.

In this case the trial court found the estate to be of greater value than $10,000, and further found that the claim was presented within ten months after the first publication of notice to creditors. Under that state of facts, the executor should have allowed the claim as a valid and binding claim against the estate. If there had been a decree of due publication of notice to creditors, entered by the probate court prior to the presentation of this claim to the executor, possibly such decree would have been a bar to any investigation in this case by the superior court as to the value of the estate when the first publication was made; for such matter may have been concluded by the decree declaring a sufficient publication. In this case the record discloses no such decree, and there never was at any time in the probate court a judicial determination, either directly or indirectly, as to the value of the estate, or the sufficiency of the notice to creditors; but that question is not here involved.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

ATKINSON v. LORBEER. (L. A. 90.)

ELECTION—CANVASS OF VOTES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—COMPLIANCE.

Pol. Code, § 1252, provides that the canvass of votes cast at an election must be public, in the presence of bystanders. The action of the election board in removing from the polling place all but two bystanders, and keeping the doors locked for one-half hour, did not invalidate the votes cast, where the fact that no fraud was committed during that time was shown.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Election contest between Thomas B. Atkinson and John W. Lorbeer to determine the right of the respective parties to the office of marshal of the city of Pomona. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and C. E. Sumner, for appellant. Tanner & Fleming and A. W. Hutton, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an election contest brought under sections 1111–1127, Code Civ. Proc., and presents the right to the office of marshal of the city of Pomona. Judgment was in favor of defendant, Lorbeer, who had been declared elected by the board of trustees. Plaintiff, Atkinson, appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll, which includes findings. There is no statement or bill of exceptions. The question presented is whether or not the entire vote of the Second ward of said city at the election involved here should be rejected. At that ward respondent received a majority of 51 votes; and, if the entire vote at that ward be rejected, the appellant would have a majority in the city. The court below refused to reject the vote of said ward.

It is contended by appellant that the entire vote of the Second ward should be rejected on account of "malconduct on the part of the board of judges" of the election, under subdivision 1 of section 1111; and the main facts relied on to support this contention are, briefly, these: Immediately upon the closing of the polls, the board of election removed all the bystanders except two from the room which constituted the polling place, and for one-half hour kept the door of said room locked, and kept the public, except said two bystanders, out of said room; and during said half hour one of the judges of said election was absent. During that half hour some of the members of the board took the ballots from the ballot box, and counted them, and, finding that there was one more ballot in the box than there were voters as shown by the poll lists, destroyed one of said ballots. The board also, while the room was in that condition, sealed up in envelopes all the unused ballots, and did other things necessary to a preparation for tallying, but did not proceed to the tallying of the votes. At the expiration of the half hour the door was opened, and other bystanders went in, the absent judge returned, and the tallying commenced. At the trial three of the members of the board who were in the room during said half hour were examined as witnesses, and testified as to what was done during that time; and the court found that everything was done in good faith, and that no fraud was committed.

Election contests arising out of irregularities of election officers frequently present to courts the alternative of either setting aside in the case in hand the honest and clear expression of the will of the majority of the voters, or of so construing the election laws as to open the door to future frauds, which it is the purpose of those laws to prevent. Of course, neither the voters nor those voted for have any control over election officers; and to set aside the vote of a precinct, when there was clearly no fraud, or any mistake affecting the result, for mere irregularities occasioned by the ignorance or carelessness of election boards, would in many cases be a patent injustice. Moreover, a construction requiring an exceedingly strict compliance with all statutory provisions might tempt to irregularities contrived for the very purpose of vitiating the vote at a certain polling place, and, as was said in Whipley v. McKune, 12 Cal. 361, "might lead to more fraud than it would prevent." On the other hand, statutory provisions which are clearly mandatory must be substantially complied with; and even directory provisions cannot be so grossly departed from as to make it impossible or extremely difficult to determine whether fraud had been committed or anything done which would affect the result. The provision of the statute which appellant contends was violated by the acts of the board as above stated is in section 1252 of the Political Code, and is as follows: "As soon as the polls are finally closed the judges must immediately proceed to canvass the votes given at such election. The canvass must be public, in the presence of bystanders." This provision, according to the current of authorities, is merely directory. Provisions concerning the time and place of holding the election, and officers holding the same, the legal qualifications of voters, and other matters of that character, are of substance and mandatory. "As a general rule, however, the regulations prescribed by law for conducting an election are directory merely, and will not be literally enforced where their nonobservance has occasioned no injury." Notes to section 1253, Deering's Pol. Code, and cases there cited; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 197, and notes; Brightly, Elect. Cas. p. 448 et seq.; Whipley v. McKune, 12 Cal. 352; Sprague v. Norway, 31 Cal. 174; Keller v. Chapman, 34 Cal. 640. Section 1252 is not one of the new features of that part of the present election laws which is called the "Australian System," and which is in many respects mandatory. It has always been a part of the election laws, and so, also, has the provision of section 1112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows: "No irregularity or improper conduct in the proceedings of the judges, or any of them, is such malconduct as avoids an election, unless the irregularity or improper conduct is such as to procure the person whose right to the office is contested to be declared elected when he had not received the highest number of legal votes." See Whipley v. McKune, supra. But provisions which come under the category of "directory" may be so grossly violated as to give rise to a suspicion of fraud or unfairness, and the circumstances may be such that a court will not enter upon the task of inquiry whether or not this suspicion can be removed, because, in the nature of things, no evidence upon the point could be satisfactory. Tebbe v. Smith (Cal.) 41 Pac. 454. When, however, it may be easily shown that the departure from a strict compliance with directory provisions was not accompanied with fraud or any act affecting the result, and such showing is made, then the vote will not be rejected. Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 70, 23 Pac. 183. In the latter case the subject is somewhat fully discussed in the opinion of the court delivered by Chief Justice Beatty. There the alleged misconduct was the failure of the election officers to comply with sections 1225, 1226, Pol. Code, which provide that the name and registry number of the voter, and in cities also the number of the street where he lives, etc., must be called out in an audible tone of voice by the officer receiving the vote, and the residence must be recorded by the poll clerk. The court, having stated the general rule as to directory provisions, say also that the neglect of such provisions designed to prevent fraud "is ground for rejecting the entire vote of a precinct if there is no means of purging the poll." And the court, in speaking of the omission of the officers in that case, further say: "It casts suspicion upon their integrity, and is sufficient, prima facie, to make out a case of fraud. No doubt, such omission is susceptible of explanation, and we are very willing to believe that the officers of these precincts erred through ignorance of the law, and were not actually guilty of fraudulent intent. But as the case is presented we cannot indulge that presumption. The officers were not called as witnesses, as they should have been, to prove that they acted as they did through ignorance, and not through fraudulent intent; and, in the absence of any rebutting proof on this point, we feel constrained to hold that the contestant made out a case of malconduct on the part of the election board." The rule to be deduced from these views is that, where the failure of an election board to comply with a directory provision is of such a character that it can be readily shown by competent proof that no fraud was committed and no harm done by such failure, and such proof is made, then the vote will not be rejected. And such was the character of the alleged misconduct in the case at bar. The provision of section 1252, Pol. Code, was not entirely ignored, for there were some bystanders present during the short time when others were excluded. The election officers no doubt thought, innocently, though erroneously, that it was proper to clear the room of all except two bystanders while they were making preparations for tallying. But the fact that no fraud was committed and no wrong done during the half hour was susceptible of easy proof, and such proof was made to the satisfaction of the trial court. The officers of the election were called as witnesses, "as they should have been" (Russell v. McDowell, supra); and upon their testimony, uncontradicted, the court made its finding. We think, therefore, that the refusal to reject the vote of the Second ward was correct. There is nothing in this conclusion inconsistent with Tebbe v. Smith, supra. The part of the opinion in that case invoked related to the conduct of the election officers of Lake precinct. In the first place, taking the ballot box away from the polling place during the day, leaving the ballots and all other materials at the polling room, was such a gross violation of the statute, and presented such opportunities for fraud, that a court might well decline to inquire whether actual fraud had been committed. But, in the second place, the decision was not based solely upon the removal of the ballot box, nor was it expressly said that such misconduct would itself warrant the rejection of the vote. That fact was mentioned in connection with the other and exceedingly important fact that the polls were not opened until 10 o'clock; and the cases cited in the opinion—Knowles v. Yates, 31 Cal. 82, and People v. Seale, 52 Cal. 72—were cases where the polls were not opened at the proper place, or at the proper time. When the polls are not opened until several hours after the time fixed by law, it is practically impossible to show satisfactorily that no voter was prevented from casting his vote. Moreover, provisions as to time and place of holding the election are mandatory. There are no other points made by appellant which are not covered by the above views. The judgment is affirmed.

WHITE v. CLARKE. (S. F. 224.)

Agreed Case—Requisites of—Affidavit.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1138, providing that parties to a question which might be the subject of a civil action may agree upon a case, and submit the same to any court, which would have jurisdiction of such action, an agreed case which shows that the right of action of one party depends on his right to enter certain lands under the homestead laws of the United States presents a question which cannot be the subject of an action in the state courts, and cannot be entertained.

2. An affidavit to an agreed case which states that the "statement" is a real controversy, and that the "contention" is in good faith, does not comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 1138, which requires it to state that the controversy is real, and the proceedings in good faith.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Proceeding on an agreed case between James White and J. F. Clarke. White appeals. Dismissed.

M. J. McGrath, for appellant. David Barry, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This proceeding purports to have been instituted in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, under section 1138, Code Civ. Proc., for the purpose of obtaining a judgment of the court upon an agreed case. The document upon which the judgment was sought is prefaced by the statement: "The plaintiff and the defendant agree to submit this controversy without action, and present the following facts;" and, after setting forth certain facts, concludes: "Wherefore the plaintiff, as well as the defendant, agrees to submit this controversy, without action, upon the foregoing statement. Judgment of the court is respectfully prayed." It is stated in the "agreed case" that the defendant has acquired title to certain lands in San Francisco which are not within the boundaries of the patent issued to the city by the United States under a patent issued by the governor of the state, January 24, 1881, and, as impairing the effect of this fact and the sufficiency of the title thus acquired, is the statement: "That on January 12, 1895, the plaintiff being qualified to claim a homestead under section 2289, Rev. St. U. S., duly claimed said land as a homestead," together with a statement in the form of an argument on behalf of the plaintiff, in which are given various reasons why the patent issued to the defendant is invalid, many of which are based upon the existence of facts which are not set forth in the agreed case. The document also contains a stipulation that, if the patent is valid, the title of the defendant shall be sustained, whereas, if it is void, the plaintiff's claim to "enter the land as a homestead" is "proper." Following the foregoing "agreed case" are certain stipulations of other facts signed by persons purporting to be attorneys for the respective parties to the controversy; and at the end thereof is the following affidavit:

"Now comes James White, the plaintiff, and J. F. Clarke, the defendant, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that the above and the foregoing statement of the case containing the facts above stated is a real controversy, and the contention is in good faith to determine the rights of the parties. James White. J. F. Clarke.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 12th day of January, 1895. G. W. F. Cook, Justice of the Peace," etc.

The transcript does not contain any copy of the judgment, and only from certain recitals can it be ascertained whether any judgment has been given or entered. The only recital of the character of the judgment is the following statement, injected into the body of the agreed case, immediately preceding the aforesaid affidavit: "On June 21, 1895, judgment was given for defendant, and the same was duly entered August 8, 1895." But this was evidently no part of the original submission, as it relates to dates subsequent to the date of the affidavit.

From the foregoing statement it is apparent that the proceeding in the superior court was not of a character to entitle it to be entertained. Section 1138, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "Parties to a question in difference which might be the subject of a civil action may, without action, agree upon a case containing the facts upon which the controversy depends, and present a submission of the same to any court which would have had jurisdiction if an action had been brought; but it must appear by affidavit that the controversy is real, and the proceedings in good faith, to determine the rights of the parties." The document, purporting to be an agreed case, fails to show any question in difference between the parties which might be the subject of a civil action. It does not show that either of the parties is in the possession of the land described therein, or is seeking to gain or to withhold from the other the right of possession; nor is any fact stated tending to show that the plaintiff has any right to question the title claimed by the defendant. The statement that the plaintiff "duly claimed said land as a homestead" falls far short of conferring upon him any interest in the land, or right to question the defendant's title; and whether the plaintiff would have the right to enter the land as a homestead under section 2289 of the United States Revised Statutes if the patent under which the defendant claims title is void cannot be the subject of a civil action in the courts of this state. The affidavit annexed to the agreed case is also insufficient to authorize the court to entertain the proceeding. Instead of showing that the controversy is real, its language is that the "statement of the case" is a "real controversy"; and, instead of stating that the proceedings are in good faith, it states that the "contention" is in good faith. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the superior court, with directions to that court to enter an order dismissing the proceeding.

In re GRABER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 138.)

EXECUTORS—REVOCATION OF LETTERS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1450, providing that the probate "court may upon notice" revoke letters testamentary of administration if an executor or administrator fails to file an inventory within three months, as required by section 1443, or within such further time, not exceeding two months, as the court shall, for reasonable cause, allow, is directory merely, and the question of revocation is within the discretion of the court on the facts in each case.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by a legatee against executors for revocation of letters testamentary of defendants. From an order denying the petition, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Ben. B. Haskell, for appellant. Andrews & Frank, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is prosecuted from an order denying the petition and motion of appellant, a legatee, to revoke the letters testamentary of the respondents for failure to file an inventory within the time prescribed by law. The sections of the Code bearing upon this question are as follows:

"Sec. 1443. Every executor or administrator must make and return to the court, within three months after his appointment, a true inventory and appraisement of all the estate of the decedent," etc.

"Sec. 1450. If an executor or administrator neglects or refuses to return the inventory within the time prescribed, or within such further time, not exceeding two months, which the court or judge shall for reasonable cause allow, the court may, upon notice, revoke the letters testamentary or of administration," etc.

It is now claimed by appellant that, if the executor or administrator does not file his inventory and appraisement within the time allowed by the statute, his letters must be revoked when that fact is brought to the attention of the court, and that the court has no judicial discretion in the matter. We do not think such to be the construction placed upon the statute by the profession; neither do we think it justified by the language used. While section 1450 is a most salutary one, yet all the purposes which could possibly have actuated the legislative mind in enacting it may be fully served by holding its provisions directory, rather than mandatory. To revoke or forfeit letters testamentary or of administration, ipso facto, by a statute, is most rigorous treatment, and we would not be inclined to so construe the law, unless the intention of the lawmaking power to that effect was plainly manifest. Here no such intention is apparent; but upon the contrary, by the language itself, a discretion is vested in the lower court. The statute says the court may, upon notice, revoke the letters testamentary or of administration. The fact that such revocation can only take place after notice is a clear indication that the executor or administrator is to be given an opportunity to come before the court and show cause why his letters should not be revoked. Whether the cause shown be good or bad is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court; and, when that court has investigated the question and adjudicated upon it, it will only be where a gross abuse of discretion has occurred that this court will interfere. We see no such abuse of discretion in this case, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL—REVIEW.

An order granting a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction will not be reviewed except for manifest abuse of discretion, though the evidence was wholly that of the prosecution, and sufficient if believed to prove all the material facts.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Christian Knutte was convicted of obtaining money and property by false pretenses, and from an order setting aside the verdict, and granting a new trial, the state appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. F. A. Hornblower, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Respondent was tried for the offense of obtaining money and property by false pretenses. At the conclusion of the evidence in chief for the prosecution, the court advised the jury to acquit, for the reason that, in the judgment of the court, the case had not been established; and the case was then submitted to the jury upon the instructions of the court, without evidence on behalf of defendant or argument of counsel. The jury, notwithstanding the advice of the court, found the defendant guilty, and thereupon the court, of its own motion, made an order setting aside the verdict, and granting the defendant a new trial. From this order the people prosecute this appeal, the sole point made being that the action of the court was an abuse of its discretion.

The case is argued here by both parties upon the assumption that the new trial was granted upon the ground that the evidence was deemed insufficient to sustain the verdict; and, while no specific ground is stated in the order of the court, it may be safely taken, from the court's action in advising the jury to acquit, that this assumption of counsel is correct. It has been so repeatedly held here as to become axiomatic that where a new trial is granted upon this ground, or where it is one of various grounds upon which the trial court may have based the order, its action will not be disturbed, except in a case showing a manifest and unmistakable abuse of discretion. This discretion is, of course, not arbitrary, but, like any other judicial function, is to be exercised under the sanction of the judicial oath; and, the strong presumption being always that it was so exercised, it will require in any case a very clear showing to the contrary to overcome such presumption, and enable us to say that the power of the court in that respect was abused. While it is the exclusive province of the jury to find the facts, it is, nevertheless, one of the most important requirements of the trial judge to see to it that this function of the jury is intelligently and justly exercised. In this respect, while he cannot competently interfere with or control the jury in passing upon the evidence, he, nevertheless, exercises a very salutary supervisory power over their verdict. In the exercise of that power, he should always satisfy himself that the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain the verdict found; and if, in his sound judgment, it does not, he should unhesitatingly say so, and set the verdict aside. People v. Lum Yit, 83 Cal. 130, 23 Pac. 228. It can, of course, make no difference, in the exercise of this power by the court, that the evidence in the case was wholly that of the prosecution, and stands, in the sense at least that it is not controverted by evidence on behalf of defendant, without conflict. The same duty rests upon the judge in such a case as where the evidence is conflicting, to satisfy himself that guilt has been established; and, notwithstanding the evidence may be all one way, he is not required to believe it. "A court may reject the most positive testimony though the witness be not discredited by direct testimony impeaching him or contradicting his statement. The inherent improbability of a statement may deny it all claims to belief." Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 638, 645. The judge has the witnesses before him, and, as suggested in People v. Lum Yit, supra, "an equal opportunity with the jury to observe the manner of the witnesses, the character of their testimony, and to judge of their credibility, and to discover their motives. He, too, ought to be satisfied that the evidence as a whole was sufficient to sustain the verdict. If he was not, it was not only the proper exercise of a legal discretion, but his duty, to grant a new trial. People v. Baker [39 Cal. 686], supra; People v. Ashnauer, 47 Cal. 98; People v. Hotz, 73 Cal. 241, 14 Pac. 856." Nor does it affect the question that the evidence in the case may have a legal tendency to prove all the material facts. Guilt is to be established beyond a reasonable doubt; and, while there may be some evidence to support each fact, this does not signify that it is necessarily such as to satisfy the conscience of the judge that a case is made which warrants conviction. Applying these principles to the record before us, we cannot say that the learned judge of the court below improperly exercised his discretion in the premises. In this view it is neither pertinent nor proper for us to review or comment upon the evidence, since another trial must be had. Nor, for the same reason, is it proper at this time to indicate our views upon the point urged by defendant, that the evidence is insufficient in law to warrant a conviction. That point should not be anticipated, since upon another trial the evidence may be so essentially different that it may not arise. The order is affirmed.

BEATON et al. v. REID et al. (S. F. 281.)[1]

HOMESTEAD—SALE ON JUDGMENT OF JUSTICE.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1240, 1241, providing that the homestead shall be exempt from forced sale except on judgments recovered before the declaration of homestead is filed, and which constitute liens upon the premises, a homestead is not subject to forced sale under an execution issued on a justice's judgment which has not been recorded, so as to create a lien on the land, though the declaration of homestead was not filed until after the levy of the execution.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George N. Buck, Judge.

Action by one Beaton and others against one Reid and others. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Reed, for appellants. J. C. Bates, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Execution based upon a judgment recovered by the appellant Reid in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco against the respondent Elizabeth Beaton, and which had been docketed in the superior court judgment docket of said city and county, was issued by the clerk thereof to the sheriff of San Mateo county, and by the latter levied upon the premises in dispute, situate in the latter county, on October 18, 1894, and notice of sale under said execution given. Subsequent to said levy, but before the sale, on October 26, 1894, the judgment debtor declared a homestead on the premises in due and proper form, and subsequently thereto brought this action to enjoin the sale. The sole question presented is whether the levy of the execution and the lien created thereby prevented the premises from being impressed with the character of a homestead to an extent to defeat such sale,—it being conceded that the judgment itself did not constitute a lien thereon. The instances and extent in which and to which a homestead is liable to be subjected to the demands of creditors of the homestead claimant are clearly and explicitly provided in the Civil Code: "The homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale, except as in this title provided." Section 1240. "The homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained: (1) Before the declaration of homestead was filed for record, and which constitute liens upon the premises." Section 1241. These provisions would seem to exclude by their terms the right to enforce the judgment in question against the homestead, unless the levy of the execution had the effect, as contended by appellant, to constitute the judgment, which was not otherwise such, a lien upon the premises. But it had not such effect. The lien of the execution is not that of the judgment; the execution neither creates a judgment lien nor extends a judgment lien once created. Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 122; Rogers v. Druffel, 46 Cal. 654; Eby v. Foster, 61 Cal. 282. There is but one mode of constituting a justice's judgment a lien upon the lands of the judgment debtor, and that is the filing of an abstract thereof in the office of the recorder of the county in which the land is situated. Code Civ. Proc. § 900. But it is claimed that the levy of the execution vested appellant with a right to its satisfaction out of the land which was not subject to be defeated by a subsequently-acquired homestead therein. We see no distinction in principle, as to the mere effect in this regard, between an execution lien and the lien of an attachment. They both subserve a like purpose,—the one to hold the property until judgment, and the other until the sale; and it has been repeatedly held that an attachment lien is defeated by the intervention of a homestead right subsequently acquired. Wilson v. Madison, 58 Cal. 1; McCracken v. Harris, 54 Cal. 81; Sullivan v. Hendrickson, Id. 258. These cases proceed upon the principle that the statute providing for and protecting the homestead right is to be construed strongly in favor of its protection; that the statute has provided the instances in which the homestead may be taken on forced sale, and the right to so take it will be strictly limited to those instances. And this would seem to accord with the purpose and intention of the legislature, as it winds up the title of the Code upon the subject by declaring that "in no case shall it be held liable for the debts of the owner, except as provided in this title." Section 1265. In Sullivan v. Hendrickson, supra, after a review of the authorities, it is said: "The constitution seems to empower the legislature to authorize a declaration of homestead to be made at any time before sale." And this, we think, is what the legislature has done. The subject of homesteads is one wholly committed by the constitution to the legislature, with simply the general mandate that the latter shall protect it by law from forced sale. Const. art. 17. The extent of the right, therefore, and the mode of its protection, with the limitation of the rights of creditors therein, are purely matters of legislative prescription, and something with which we have nothing to do but construe and apply. As aptly suggested in Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 483, 14 Pac. 198: "With the policy of the law, or the abstract morality of a particular transaction, we have nothing to do.

The doctrine bearing upon conveyances made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors has no application to the creation of a homestead. If any doubt remained as to the intention of the legislature, it ought to be set at rest by the language of sections 1240 and 1241 of the Civil Code, which, after declaring generally that the homestead is exempt, enumerates as an exception that it is subject to sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained before the declaration of homestead was filed, 'and which constitute liens upon the premises.'" From these considerations we are satisfied that the levy of the execution in question did not have the effect to prevent the premises from being impressed with the homestead character at any time before the sale; and that, the lien of the execution not being one of those specified in the Civil Code for which the homestead can be taken, the judgment of the court below enjoining the sale and the execution of a deed thereunder was right, and should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

CITY STORE v. COFER. (S. F. 116.)

HOMESTEAD AND EXEMPTIONS—FILING OF DECLARATION—SUBSEQUENT DIVORCE.

A married woman's declaration of homestead, filed on lands on which she resided, and which were her separate property, is not so affected by subsequent divorce proceedings, in which no reference is made to the homestead property, as to render it liable to the payment of a debt not within the exceptions recited in Civ. Code, § 1265, exempting a homestead so declared from forced sale for any liability of the owner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by the City Store (a corporation) against Susan Cofer, to subject a declared homestead to the satisfaction of a judgment debt. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Yoell and D. L. Thornton, for appellant. J. A. Fairchild, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was a married woman residing upon certain real estate, her separate property. She filed a declaration of homestead thereon for the joint benefit of herself and husband. The homestead declaration contained all the statements and recitals demanded by the statute. Subsequently she obtained a decree of divorce from her husband. Neither by the pleadings in that action, nor by the decree of the court, was the matter of the homestead property adverted to. After the filing of the declaration, and prior to the divorce decree, plaintiff obtained a money judgment against defendant. Subsequent to the decree of divorce, plaintiff attempted to enforce its judgment by a levy and sale of the homestead property. It became the purchaser at such sale, and, basing its claims upon the title thus obtained, brings this action for possession of the realty.

Plaintiff's judgment was one which could not be enforced by a seizure and sale of the homestead property, and consequently no title was vested in the purchaser at such sale. Section 1265 of the Civil Code provides: "From and after the time the declaration is filed for record, the premises therein described constitute a homestead. * * * But in no case shall it be held liable for the debts of the owner, only except as provided in this title." The judgment held by plaintiff was not one of the debts provided for by that title of the Code, and necessarily the homestead was entirely exempt from its effect and operation. The case, in principle, appears to be similar to Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 134, 24 Pac. 853, where this court said: "Under the plain language of the statute just quoted, it would appear that, when the homestead was once declared, it remained as such, always exempt from forced sale as against any liability of the owner, only except as provided in the provisions of the title of which it was a part. And, as the debt here was not one for which, under that title, the property was liable, it must follow that the attempt to sell the property was forbidden by law, and a sale could vest no title in the purchaser." For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

Defendant, who had borrowed money from plaintiff at 8 per cent. per annum, compounded monthly, applied for a renewal of the loan at 6 per cent.; and, in rejecting such application, plaintiff notified defendant that the existing loan would be "allowed to run at 6 per cent." Held, that such notification modified the original contract as to the rate of interest only, leaving in force the clause pertaining to the compounding of interest.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against Henry Wackenreuder and another to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellants. A. Tobin and Thos. F. Barry, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying appellants' motion for a new trial, in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The main point involved relates to the manner in which interest should be computed upon the principal of the note. It was computed by the court, in fixing the amount of the judgment, at 6 per cent. per annum, compounded monthly, and it is now claimed by appellants that only simple interest should have been allowed. The construction of the contract between the parties determines the question involved. The contract as to the original loan called for interest at the rate of 8 per cent., compounded monthly. Proceedings of foreclosure were begun upon such contract, whereupon the mortgagor made a written proposition to plaintiff, whereby he proposed "to pay enough on the existing mortgage to reduce it to $8,000, and to then give a mortgage for the sum of $8,000, to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum." Plaintiff answered the mortgagor's proposition by the following resolution of its board of directors: "Application No. 11, V. Wackenreuder, for a renewal of his loan of June 29, 1881, at 6 per cent. Renewal declined, but present loan allowed to run at 6 per cent., and the attorney requested to grant a stay of 60 days." It will be observed that the foregoing proposition of the mortgagor was rejected, and it would seem, for that reason, that the case now stands exactly as though no such proposition had ever been made to the bank; but, after the rejection of that proposition, the bank, of its own motion, and without consideration, notified the mortgagor that it had reduced the rate of interest upon the loan to 6 per cent., and such reduction, being greatly to the benefit of the mortgagor, in the absence of anything to the contrary, we must assume was accepted by him. We think the only fair construction to be placed upon the bank's agreement or proposition to reduce the interest to 6 per cent. is the one placed upon it by the trial court. Before this time the note was drawing interest at the rate of 8 per cent., compounded monthly. The statement of the bank to the mortgagor only proposed to modify a single term of the note, and that was the annual rate of interest. No modification of the clause of the note pertaining to the compounding of the interest was mentioned in the bank's proposition, and we are bound to conclude that no modification as to that clause was contemplated, and that the original contract in that regard remained in statu quo. Some months intervened between the time when the judgment was ordered and the time when the findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed. Complaint is now made that interest for this period of time is computed in the judgment at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Appellants have not been hurt by such computation, even conceding the soundness of their contention; for, if the computation be wrong, then respondent is entitled to 6 per cent. interest, compounded monthly, in accordance with the terms of the note, and, so compounded, the present judgment would be increased rather than diminished. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

MATTHEWS v. CHABOYA. (S. F. 63.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES.

1. Under Insolvent Act, § 55, rendering invalid transfers by a debtor made within a month of the filing of a creditors' petition in insolvency, and in contemplation of insolvency, and with intent to give a preference to the transferee, provided the transferee had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and that the transfer was made with a view of violating the insolvent act, a transfer so made is invalid, as fraudulent in law, without regard to the existence of actual fraud on the part of the transferee.

2. That a transfer was made within a month of the filing of the petition of insolvency, and out of the usual and ordinary course of business, does not show conclusively that it was fraudulent.

3. The failure of a creditor, taking the mercantile business of his debtor in payment of his claim, to investigate the financial status of the debtor, does not necessarily render the transfer fraudulent as to other creditors.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Action by John L. Mathews, assignee of H. J. Hall, an insolvent debtor, against Fannie M. Chaboya. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Alexander & Dougherty, for appellant. S. F. Geil and J. J. Wyatt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action brought by the assignee of an insolvent debtor to set aside a transfer of certain personal property, to wit, a merchandise business, made within one month prior to the filing of a creditor's petition in insolvency. The appeal is by the assignee from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The defendant was a creditor of the insolvent debtor, and took a transfer of the business in satisfaction of her debt. It is now claimed that that transfer was violative of section 55 of the insolvent act. In order that plaintiff may set aside this transfer, and recover the property transferred, under the provisions of the aforesaid section, he must establish four independent facts, to wit: (1) That the transfer was made within one month of the filing of the creditor's petition in insolvency, and with a view to give a preference to defendant; (2) that the transferror was insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, at the date of the transfer; (3) that the transferee, the defendant, at the time, had reasonable cause to believe that the transferror was insolvent; (4) that the transferee had reasonable cause to believe that the transfer was made with a view of violating or evading one or more provisions of the insolvent act.

It is first claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. A creditor's petition for insolvency was filed within 30 days subsequent to the transfer, and it is beyond question that the transfer was made out of the ordinary and usual course of business. Tapscott v. Lyon, 103 Cal. 297, 37 Pac. 225. The transfer having been made out of the ordinary course of business, that fact was prima facie evidence that it was fraudulent. See last clause of the aforesaid section. And, when coupled with the additional fact that it was made within one month of the filing of the petition in insolvency, a prima facie case for a recovery is made. For this rule of evidence, declared by the section, not only refers to the intent or view with which the acts are done, but assuredly covers the question of the belief of the transferee as to the debtor's insolvency. That a transfer so made gives the transferee reasonable cause to believe the debtor insolvent was held in Ohleyer v. Bunce, 65 Cal. 544, 4 Pac. 549; Godfrey v. Miller, 80 Cal. 420, 22 Pac. 290; Chevalier v. Commins (Cal.) 39 Pac. 929. See, also, Tuttle v. Truax, 1 N. B. R. 601, Fed. Cas. No. 14,277; In re Dean, 2 N. B. R. 89, Fed. Cas. No. 3,700; North v. House, 6 N. B. R. 365, Fed. Cas. No. 10,310. Of course, this prima facie evidence of fraud is simply prima facie, and may be rebutted by any competent evidence. In this case, the defendant took the stand and testified to facts which, if believed by the jury, were sufficient to create a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the practice of any fraud upon the provisions of the insolvent act. The jury evidently believed her statements, and found a verdict accordingly; and we are not disposed to disturb its action upon this ground. As to cases of conflicting evidence in this regard, see Bernheim v. Christal, 76 Cal. 567, 18 Pac. 683; Haas v. Whitter, 97 Cal. 412, 32 Pac. 449; Grunsky v. Parlin (Cal.) 42 Pac. 575. It is further insisted that it was the duty of the defendant, before purchasing, to make an investigation as to the financial status of the insolvent. Cases sometimes arise where a party is put upon inquiry to this point, but the rule is not at all universal, and the true doctrine would appear to be, has the transferee, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, reasonable cause to believe that the debtor is insolvent at the date of the transfer?

Appellant complains of various instructions of the court given to the jury. The court told the jury: "The mere fact that, at the time the defendant purchased the stock of goods mentioned in the complaint from H. J. Hall, the said H. J. Hall was in fact insolvent, and unable to pay his debts, and that a petition in insolvency was filed against him within 30 days from the date of said sale, is not sufficient, alone, to entitle the plaintiff to a judgment. But he must also show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that said Fannie M. Chaboya knew, or had reasonable cause to believe, that said H. J. Hall was insolvent, and she bought said stock of goods for the purpose of defrauding the other creditors of their debts." Aside from the last clause of this instruction, we see nothing objectionable here. Certainly all the facts therein enumerated must be proven. The court does not tell the jury what must be the particular character of evidence necessary to establish them, but that they must be established by some competent evidence cannot be questioned. As we have seen, proof that the transfer was made out of the ordinary course is, prima facie, sufficient to establish its fraudulent character. As a concluding portion of the instruction, the court told the jury that, in order to find for plaintiff, it must appear that the defendant bought the stock of goods for the purpose of defrauding the other creditors of their debts. We think this language is too strong and too broad, and prejudicial to plaintiff. In a case like the present one, there is no element of actual fraud necessarily involved. The defendant may have acted with entire honesty and good faith, as far as she was concerned, and still the transfer be void. Promptness and energy exercised by her in securing her claim may be said to be commendable, rather than fraudulent. It is a legal fraud, rather than fraud in fact, that renders the transfer void. It is fraud upon the insolvent law, rather than actual fraud practiced upon the creditors. It was not necessary for the jury to find, as a fact, that the defendant bought the stock for the purpose of defrauding other creditors, before they were justified in declaring the transfer void by their verdict, and we hold the instruction to be erroneous.

The court further instructed the jury as follows: "If you find, from the evidence, that, at the time the defendant purchased the goods mentioned in the complaint from H. J. Hall, she did not know that said H. J. Hall was insolvent, or have reason to know the same, but, on the contrary, that she was in entire ignorance that said Hall owed more than he could pay, then in that event her act was not fraudulent, and you must find for the defendant." We think it may be fairly said that this instruction omitted the question as to whether or not the transfer was in the ordinary course of business, and such fact was a necessary element in order that the instruction should express a perfect exposition of the law bearing upon the question. The court further told the jury "that if, after considering all the evidence in this case, you find that the conduct of the defendant, Mrs. Chaboya, can be reconciled with fairness and honesty on her part, then you must find a verdict for the defendant." As we have had occasion to remark, this instruction is too broad, and not sound as a principle of law. Honesty and fairness, as those words are ordinarily and commonly used, are not necessarily involved in this character of litigation, and the instruction, by the most liberal view that may be taken of it, at least tended to mislead the minds of the jury. If the provisions of section 55 of the insolvent act are violated, the transfer is void; and this is true, regardless of any question of honesty, fairness, good faith, or actual fraud.

We find no other matters in the record demanding our attention. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CHARNOCK et al. v. HIGUERRA et al.

(L. A. 76.)[1]

RIPARIAN RIGHTS — IRRIGATION — RIGHT TO PUMP WATER FROM STREAM.

1. A riparian owner may pump water from a stream for irrigation purposes, provided he takes no more than his proportionate share, the method of diversion being immaterial.

2. The amount of water which a riparian owner may take for irrigation purposes is not limited to that necessary for land to which the water may be led in ditches by the force of gravity, but extends to the taking, by pumps or otherwise, of water necessary to irrigate lands above the level of the stream.

Action by John J. Charnock and others against Francisco Higuerra and others for an injunction. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. E. Howard, for appellants. R. Dunnigan, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action brought by several riparian proprietors against certain persons above them on the stream, to restrain them from diverting any of the waters of the stream. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are riparian proprietors, and as such entitled to all the waters of the stream; that the defendants are not entitled to use any of the water for any purpose; and that they, by means of certain machinery, artificially and wrongfully raise and divert from the stream a large amount of the waters thereof, for the purpose of irrigating certain lands not of right irrigable from the stream, and which do not so lie as to be irrigated by the waters of said stream "diverted therefrom by any natural means" on said lands. The facts found by the court are, in substance, that both plaintiffs and defendants are riparian proprietors on the stream, the lands of defendants being above those of plaintiffs, and that neither plaintiffs nor defendants have any right to the waters of the stream, except as such riparian owners; that all of the lands of the plaintiffs, and 30 acres of the lands of the defendants, are so situated that the water of the stream can be diverted and conducted thereon solely by natural gravity from dams in the stream, situated within the limits of said lands, respectively, without backing the water upon the lands of the owners next above them, and that no other part of the lands of the defendants can be irrigated in that manner; that the defendants have erected pumping machinery and pumps on their land, and, by means thereof, pump water from the stream onto land belonging to them, bordering on the stream and within its watershed, but which lie too high to be irrigated solely by natural gravity from dams situated within the limits of their lands without backing the water upon the lands of others above them; that all of the lands of both parties are dry, and of little value without irrigation, but are of great value and very productive when irrigated; that defendants have not used, and do not threaten or propose to use, more than their just proportion of the water of the stream. On these findings, judgment was entered in favor of defendants, with leave to any of the parties at any time to "maintain another action to determine the exact proportion of the water of said creek which the respective owners may use." A portion of these findings is attacked as unsupported by the evidence, but we think that the evidence fully justifies them in the particular in which they are so attacked. The only question, then, is whether the findings support the judgment.

1. It is contended by appellants that a riparian proprietor has not, for the purpose of irrigation, the right to raise water by means of pumps. No authorities are cited in support of this contention, and counsel states his inability to find any. So far as we can understand, this argument is based on the meaning of the word "irrigate," which counsel contends is "to convey water by ditches," and on the alleged universal custom in the past to employ only such means in irrigation. As to the meaning of the word "irrigation," counsel cites some doubtful passages from civil law writers; but it is evident that this court, in holding, as it has repeatedly held, that riparian proprietors have the right to use a reasonable proportion of the water of the stream to irrigate their lands, used the term in no such restricted sense. The Latin word from which it is derived means, primarily, to convey water to or upon any thing, and, more generally, to wet or moisten anything; and the ordinary definition in our language is to water lands, whether by channels, by flooding, or simply by sprinkling. The mere method of obtaining the water with which to irrigate has nothing to do with the process of irrigation, or the meaning of the word. There was no proof in this case of any such custom as is claimed by appellants; and, if we can take judicial notice of such a matter at all, we are unable to say that pumping has never been used for such purpose. It may be that, owing to the comparatively greater expense of that method, it has been little used in the past; but, if improvements in machinery have made or shall make that method practicable, we see no reason why riparians proprietors may not, like others, take advantage of such improvements. In fact it has always been considered that the reasonableness or lawfulness of any given diversion of water is in no wise affected by the mere mode of diversion. Thus, in Elliot v. Railroad Co., 10 Cush. 191 (cited with approval in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 402, 404, 10 Pac. 674), Chief Justice Shaw said, "One man may take water from a perennial stream of moderate size, by means of buckets or a pump,—for the mode is not material,—to water his garden." And in such a case, he says, "the water would be used for irrigation" and such "might be regarded as a reasonable use." So this court has repeatedly held that a prior appropriator of water may change, at pleasure, the place or mode of his diversion, so long as others are not injured by such change. And in Earl of Norbury v. Kitchin, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 685, it was held that a riparian proprietor, so long as he took no more than his reasonable share of the water, might take water from the stream by pumping machinery, elevate it into a reservoir, and thence convey it by pipes to other land, not riparian, and there use it; the court holding that neither the mode of diversion nor the use to which the water was actually applied was material,—the only question being whether or not the defendant had taken more than his reasonable share.

2. But appellants claim, as we understand them, that, whether the particular mode is material or not, the mode by which the land of a riparian proprietor can possibly be irrigated is a material factor in ascertaining what portion of the water he may divert for irrigation. They contend that a riparian proprietor cannot be allowed to use any portion of the water of the stream to irrigate land which, though bordering on the stream, lies so far above it that water cannot be conducted thereon solely by natural gravitation from the stream, without the use of any appliances other than ditches originally on such land and dams situated thereon, and which will not back the water on the lands of other persons. In other words, the reasonable proportion of water which any riparian proprietor may withdraw for irrigation is made to depend, primarily, upon the area of his land which can be irrigated in that particular manner. In the first place, that question does not properly arise in this case. The complaint was framed on the theory that the defendants were not riparian proprietors at all, and had no right to divert any water. No issue was tendered as to what amount or proportion of the water of the stream could lawfully be used by the defendants, if they had the right to use any portion. It was denied that they had any rights to the stream, and the complaint furnished no data from which any rights of the parties, as tenants in common of the water, could be determined. Nevertheless, as the question seems to have been treated as an issue, evidence being introduced on the subject, apparently without objection, and as the court below did, to a certain extent, consider it, it calls for consideration at our hands. No authorities whatever are cited by appellants in support of this contention, nor can we find that any such doctrine has ever been even suggested by any court or writer. Appellants do cite some cases to the point that riparian diversion must be "on the bank of the proprietor," but the judgments in those cases do not sustain that doctrine, and we are not prepared to say that any such rule exists. It is, however, not necessary to decide that question, for its determination would shed no light on the subject now under consideration. The only question now is whether the mere altitude of this land can deprive the riparian owner of the right to irrigate it. No rules have ever been laid down by this court for determining the relative and proportional rights of riparian proprietors to the use of water for irrigation, nor has any case come before us in which we could properly determine what are the rules on that subject. But, whatever difficulties may arise in matters of detail, that problem must find its solution in an application of the principles upon which the right to use water for that purpose at all is based. That right, as recognized in the decisions of this court, is founded upon the proposition that in an arid country the use of water for irrigation is of such vital consequence that, of necessity, it must be considered as embraced within the spirit of the category of rights accorded by the common law to riparian proprietors. The common-law rule, as interpreted in this country, is that the right to the waters of the stream, with certain exceptions, not material here, belongs to the riparian proprietors in common and equally, and may be exercised by each as the necessities of the situation may require, only so as not to infringe upon the equal rights of the others. As irrigation is here a necessity of the situation, resulting from climatic conditions, the right to use a just and equal portion of the water for that purpose has been held to be an essential part of the riparian ownership.

Such being the foundation of the right, it is evident that the restriction contended for by appellants is inconsistent with the rule itself. The right to use the water for this purpose results from the need of water upon the land. Assuming this need, in any given case, to exist equally as to all the riparian land, the respective rights of the proprietors to divert water for this purpose must be in proportion to their respective ownerships upon the stream. No other method would conform to the rule of equity. If every riparian proprietor on a given stream owned the same quantity of land, with the same frontage on the stream, and with the same susceptibility to and need of irrigation, each would be entitled to precisely the same quantity of water for that purpose. We do not now decide how far a variation in any one of those factors would affect the question, nor whether all of them are necessarily to be considered in any case. But it must necessarily be true, from the very nature of the right, that in no case can one proprietor be deprived of this just and equal proportion merely because his land, by reason of its altitude or level above the stream, cannot be irrigated by the same method employed on some other land. That the rule contended for by appellants would be utterly inconsistent with the very foundations of the riparian doctrine in this country will readily be seen by observing its results in particular instances. According to appellants' theory, none of the waters of the Colorado river, in the greater part of its course, can ever be used by the riparian owners for irrigation, for none of them can erect a dam high enough to divert any water by gravity on his own land without backing the water upon his neighbor. The same is true of many important streams in the mountainous districts of this state, now extensively used for irrigation. Yet nowhere is irrigation more needed than in such localities. Coming next to the level plains, we find streams with so little fall that diversion by a dam on the very tract of land to be irrigated is only possible on tracts having very considerable frontage on the stream. Suppose six adjoining proprietors on such a stream, neither of whom can divert the water on his own land in the manner required by appellants. According to appellants' contention, they could not, even by agreement among themselves, divert the water on the land of one, and carry it to the land of another, of their number, or pump it onto the land of any of them. They must permit all the water to flow down to the more fortunate proprietor below, whose acres are thousands to their hundreds. And yet, if one of the six should buy the lands of the others, he would then be entitled to divert the water. Such are some of the consequences, suggesting themselves to the mind, of the rule we are asked to declare, and they show clearly that the mode of diversion of the water is a false quantity in the discussion. Whatever be the just proportion of water to which any riparian proprietor is entitled, that proportion cannot be diminished by the fact that, in order to utilize it, he must raise it from the bed of the stream by pumps or other similar appliances. Every diversion of water from a stream is artificial,—a disturbance of the natural order of things. A dam or a ditch is as much an artificial mechanism as a pump,—it may, indeed, be much more so; and the one alters the natural conditions in the same sense that the other does. The right to take the water at all is a right to change the ordinary course of nature; and the methods employed, so long as their use does not infringe the like and equal rights of others, are immaterial. We do not wish to be understood as now deciding how, in any given case, the respective proportions of the different owners upon a stream are to be determined. Whether they are to be ascertained according to the extent of ownership or frontage along the stream, or according to the area of land bordering on the stream, or the amount of land needing or susceptible of irrigation, or the character of the soil, or according to several or all of these circumstances, or other circumstances that may exist, has never been decided, nor has there been, so far as we know, any opportunity for deciding it. We merely hold that the mere mode of diverting the water from the stream, so long as that mode does not deprive others of their equal rights, is not a factor to be considered. We will add, in view of any further effort that the parties may make to obtain a judicial determination of their respective rights in this stream, that a final and satisfactory adjustment can never be had without the presence of every person having any right in the stream, and that all the facts which can possibly bear on the question should be laid before the court. In the present case, as we have suggested, no sufficient data are furnished by the pleadings or evidence for a determination of that question, and the learned judge of the court below would have been justified in no other disposition of the case as presented than the one made. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

STORKE v. STORKE. (S. F. 398.)

APPEAL—VACATION OF JUDGMENT.

A party cannot, after causing a judgment to be vacated, have the same judgment reviewed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by C. A. Storke against Yda Addis Storke for a divorce. Subsequent to an order vacating a decree in favor of plaintiff, on defendant's petition, defendant appeals from the decree so vacated, which appeal plaintiff moves to dismiss. Dismissed.

Grant Jackson, Thos. McNulta, S. E. Crow, and Roger Johnson, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, A. A. Ogelsby, and T. M. Osmont, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by the plaintiff, in the superior court for the county of Santa Barbara, for a divorce between him and the defendant, and the case was tried and findings therein filed January 14, 1895. Judgment was thereupon entered January 18, 1895, dissolving the marriage theretofore existing between them, and directing that the plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of $250 alimony and $200 counsel fees. The money part of the judgment was paid by the plaintiff and received by the defendant, and on the 6th of November, 1895, the defendant filed a petition to vacate and set aside the judgment thus entered, and, the plaintiff having answered the said petition, the matter was heard by the court, and an order made by it, and entered in its minutes January 7, 1896, "that said findings, decision, and decree, and judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant, Yda Addis Storke, filed and entered on the 14th day of January, 1895, and the said decree and judgment in favor of plaintiff, C. A. Storke, and against defendant, Yda Addis Storke, filed and entered January 18, 1895, decreeing a divorce between said plaintiff and said defendant, be, and each of them are hereby, vacated and set aside." January 16, 1896, the defendant appealed to this court from that portion of the aforesaid judgment of January 18, 1895, decreeing a divorce between her and the defendant. The respondent now moves to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that, at the time the appeal was taken, the superior court had made the aforesaid order vacating the said judgment, and that there was no existing judgment from which an appeal could be taken.

The motion must be granted. The defendant cannot, after having had the judgment set aside upon her own motion, treat the same judgment as valid for the purpose of having it reviewed upon an appeal. She does not question the sufficiency of the order vacating the judgment, if, indeed, it would be competent for her to dispute an order made upon her own motion; and her attorneys have filed an affidavit upon this motion, in which they state that "they are of opinion that said order is just, and was properly made," but that this appeal is taken out of abundant caution, so that, if the order vacating the judgment should be reversed, she may still have an opportunity to secure a reversal of the judgment in this court. Upon this motion we cannot, however, consider whether the court erred in making the order setting aside the judgment, any more than we could in a case where the court has granted a new trial, and thereby vacated a judgment previously entered. The record upon this motion contains findings by the court of many facts and circumstances which induced it to make the order, but they are immaterial for the purpose of determining the effect to be given to the order. Only the order itself can be considered on this motion. It is within the jurisdiction of the superior court to vacate a judgment entered by it by other proceedings than a motion for a new trial. If it has committed error in thus vacating the judgment, it can be corrected on a direct appeal; but, on a collateral attack, the order will be deemed to have been properly made. The appeal is dismissed.

DUNCANSON v. WALTON et al. (S. F. 67.)[1]

SALE OF LAND—BREACH OF CONTRACT—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

Plaintiff, having bought land under an agreement that he should make monthly payments, the money to be paid to both the vendors, and to be payable at the office of M., can, as for breach of contract, recover money already paid, on notice from one of the vendors to make no further payments till further notice, and from the other to pay the money to him alone, and on refusal of M. to receive money tendered to him, no further notice having been given before action was brought by plaintiff, seven months thereafter.

Action by one Duncanson against one Walton and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Blake, Williams & Harrison and Benjamin Romaine, for appellants. R. M. Fitzgerald and Carl H. Abbott, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff and his assignors entered into separate agreements with the defendants for the purchase of certain lots of land, by which they were to pay a certain portion of the purchase price at the dates of the agreements, and other installments thereafter monthly, until the whole price should be paid, at which time the defendants were to execute a conveyance of the lands. After several monthly payments had been made, differences appear to have arisen between the defendants in regard to the land, and notices were sent to the plaintiff and to his assignors by the defendant Walton, directing them not to make any more payments on the agreement until further notice; and from the defendant Shelper, not to make payments to any one but to him. In the agreements it had been provided that the money should be paid at the office of McGarvie & Co., in San Francisco, and notices were also sent by McGarvie & Co. not to pay any more money until further notice. McGarvie & Co. also refused to receive the money when it was tendered to them. Thereupon the present action was brought to recover the amount of the payments that had been made by the plaintiff and his assignors. The court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed. upon the ground that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. The complaint is in the form of an action for money had and received, and the findings are to the same effect.

The evidence before the court was ample to justify it in finding that the defendants had violated their agreement, and had sufficiently indicated to the purchasers that they would no longer be bound by its terms. The provision in the agreements that the purchasers should pay the monthly installments to the defendants implied a corresponding agreement on the part of the defendants that they would receive these payments when they should be tendered; and the further provision that the money should be payable at the office of McGarvie & Co. carried with it an agreement on the part of the defendants that the payments might be made to McGarvie & Co. The subsequent direction to the purchasers not to make any more payments until further notice, and the refusal of McGarvie & Co. to receive the money when it was tendered, were evidence from which the court was authorized to find that the defendants had refused any longer to be bound by the agreements, and, as a consequence, that the purchasers were entitled to a return of the money already paid. The direction not to make any more payments until further notice was given in September, 1892, and the present action was not commenced until May, 1893; and it was not shown that any further notice had been given, or that the defendants had made any qualification of the directions given in September. The provision in the agreement that the money should be paid to both of the defendants would authorize a payment to either, and the notice by the defendant Shelper to the purchasers that they should pay the money to him alone was in repudiation of this provision, as well as of that which made it payable at the office of McGarvie & Co. The proposition of the appellants that it does not appear that these notices were sent to the plaintiff and to one of his assignors is without merit. The plaintiff produced the notices to himself and to his assignors at the trial, and the genuineness of the signatures was admitted by the defendants. The judgment is affirmed.

KNOX v. RAINBOW et al. (No. 19,561.)

CERTIORARI—LIQUOR LICENSE—ORDER OF COUNTY SUPERVISORS.

1. An order of the board of county supervisors, denying an application for a license to sell liquor, cannot be reviewed on certiorari.

2. Such order has no mandatory force, and does not estop the applicant from again soliciting a license.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Certiorari by A. L. Knox against J. P. Rainbow, J. Jasper, A. G. Nason, John Judson, and W. Wetzell, board of supervisors of San Diego county, to annul an order denying an application for a license. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

M. L. Ward, for appellants. Copeland & Goodbody, for respondent,

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered by the superior court annulling, on certiorari, the action of the board of supervisors of San Diego county denying an application for a license to sell liquor, at retail, in El Cajon township, in said county.

The parties have mistaken their remedy. If an official or a board refuses to perform a duty specially enjoined by law, it is absurd to declare such refusal void. Setting aside the order will not affect the fact, if it be a fact, that the board has refused to do its duty. An order was not necessary to show such refusal. If it had refused to make any order in the premises, or to consider the application, the effect would be the same. If the board had any discretion in the matter, and it was not a duty imperatively imposed by law, then their abuse, if it was abuse, cannot be so reviewed. Their action in such case would be clearly within their jurisdiction. It is not necessary to consider the question as to whether such action was judicial.

But, waiving all other questions, of what advantage can it be to plaintiff to have the order vacated? There is no mandatory force in such an order. The effect of it, if it had any, would be to place the matter before the board as though no action had been taken. But there is no estoppel in such an order. It does not prevent the applicant from again soliciting a license. It is not therefore an injury to him. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the proceedings.

APPEAL — WAIVER OF SERVICE OF NOTICE —PARTIES.

1. An appellate court does not acquire jurisdiction of a party who has waived service of the notice of appeal, unless, in addition, he has given notice of appearance, either in person or by attorney, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1014.

2. In foreclosure, after judgment and sale, the purchaser and the party against whom a writ of assistance was ordered are the only necessary parties to an appeal from that order.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action in foreclosure by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against Anna A. Lewis, J. D. Boyer, and others. From orders denying a motion to vacate the judgment, and granting a writ of assistance against him, defendant Boyer appeals. Plaintiff moves to dismiss both appeals. Appeal from the order refusing to vacate the judgment dismissed. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order granting a writ of assistance is denied.

J. D. Boyer, in pro. per. Tobin & Tobin, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed to the plaintiff by the defendant Lewis. The Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Company was made a defendant under an allegation that it claimed some interest in the mortgaged lands, and filed an answer setting forth its claim of lien. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of its claim, and also in favor of the pavement company, and directing a sale of the mortgaged premises, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the plaintiff's claim, and the surplus, if any there be, to the payment of the claim of the pavement company. Thereafter J. D. Boyer, claiming to have succeeded to the interest of the mortgagors in the land by conveyance from them subsequent to the commencement of the foreclosure suit, served upon the attorneys for the plaintiff, and for the pavement company, a notice of motion to vacate the judgment. It does not appear whether the mortgagors, or either of them, were served with this notice, or were before the court upon the hearing of the motion. This motion was denied, and from this order Boyer has appealed. The notice of appeal is directed to the attorneys for the plaintiff alone, and was neither directed to nor served upon the pavement company or its attorneys. Prior to giving notice of the aforesaid motion, the mortgaged premises were sold to the plaintiff by virtue of the judgment; and, after the issuance of the sheriff's deed upon said sale, the plaintiff, upon affidavit that the lands were withheld by Boyer, and upon notice to him, applied for a writ of assistance, which was ordered by the court to be issued. From this order, Boyer has also appealed, and has served his notice of appeal upon the plaintiff alone. The plaintiff now moves to dismiss each of the appeals, upon the ground that no notice of the appeal was served upon the pavement company. Subsequent to giving notice of this motion a document was filed in this court, signed by the attorneys for the pavement company, waiving service of the notice of the appeals by the defendant Boyer.

1. The pavement company was an "adverse party" upon the appeal from the order refusing to vacate the judgment, and without its presence this court would have no jurisdiction to reverse that order, and thus impair the rights which the judgment conferred upon it. The principle upon which an appeal is dismissed for failure to serve the adverse party with a copy of the notice of appeal is that, without his presence, the appellate court has no jurisdiction to render a judgment affecting his interests in the matter appealed from. If his interests will not be affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment, the want of such service will not deprive this court of jurisdiction; and, as it is only necessary that such adverse party be before the appellate court in such a manner that he will be bound by its judgment, it is immaterial whether his presence is by a voluntary appearance, or whether he has been brought here by a hostile notice from the appellant. A respondent who is properly before the court, and who claims that another party to the action is an adverse party, who should also be before the court, cannot object to the manner by which the court obtains jurisdiction of such party, whether it be by his voluntary appearance, or upon the service of a notice of the appeal. The pavement company has not, however, appeared in this court, or authorized an appearance here for it. The document waiving the service of the notice of appeal is ineffective, unless followed by some other act equivalent to an appearance, by which it would be bound by the judgment of the court. As the notice of appeal herein is directed to the plaintiff alone, its service upon the pavement company would not have the effect to bring that defendant before the court (Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 166, 41 Pac. 287); and the waiver of such service would be equally ineffective (Investment Co. v. Merrill, 108 Cal. 490, 41 Pac. 487). The notice of appeal, by which the adverse party is brought under the jurisdiction of this court, corresponds to the summons by which he is brought before the superior court, although the service thereof, instead of being personal, may be made upon his attorney. The notice itself, like the issuance of a summons, may be waived. A voluntary appearance will be equivalent to a personal service of the notice, but the mere waiver of the service is insufficient. There must, in addition, be given a notice of appearance, either in person or by an attorney. Code Civ. Proc. § 1014.

2. Upon the appeal from the order granting a writ of assistance, the pavement company is not an adverse party. By the sale of the mortgaged premises and the execution of the sheriff's deed thereunder, the pavement company has ceased to have any interest in the judgment directing the sale of the land, or in the land which is sold. Only the purchaser at that sale, and the party against whom the writ of assistance was ordered, are necessary parties to the appeal from that order.

The appeal from the order refusing to vacate the judgment is dismissed. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order granting a writ of assistance is denied.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

PEOPLE'S DITCH CO. v. '76 LAND & WATER CO. et al. (Sac. 41.)

PARTIES—CORPORATIONS—POWER TO SUE—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 379, 389, providing that one having an interest in the controversy, or whose presence is necessary to a final determination of it, may be brought into an action as defendant, the court may order one who purchased rights in the property in controversy after issue joined on the original complaint to be made defendant by an amended complaint.

2. A de facto corporation may sue and assert its corporate character as against the world, except in a direct proceeding by the attorney general to test its right to its franchise.

3. Where there is a sharp and substantial conflict of evidence, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county.

Action by the People's Ditch Company against the '76 Land & Water Company and the Alta Irrigation District to enjoin a diversion of water. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. S. Goodfellow and C. W. Cross, for appellants. Bradley & Farnsworth and Alfred Daggett, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial in an action by the respondent, as a prior appropriator, to enjoin the defendants from diverting water from Kings river so as to interfere with respondent's appropriation; judgment being in favor of respondent, enjoining such diversion.

1. The demurrer of the defendant Alta Irrigation District to the amended or supplemental complaint making it a defendant, upon the ground that it was improperly joined as a defendant in the action, was properly overruled. That defendant having, subsequently to issue joined on the original complaint, taken a conveyance from the '76 Land & Water Company of all the latter's rights to divert the waters of Kings river, together with its canal and ditches by means of which such diversion was made, and under which conveyance the vendee claimed the right to make diversion of the waters of said river to the like extent claimed by its vendor, it clearly became a necessary party to a complete determination of the controversy; and, that fact being brought to the attention of the court, it was properly ordered that the vendee be brought in as a defendant. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 379, 389; Robinson v. Gleason, 53 Cal. 38.

2. Assuming that the defendants' objection to the introduction in evidence of plaintiff's articles of incorporation, for their want of strict conformity to the requirements of the Civil Code, should have been sustained, the error in admitting the paper is without prejudice. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was at the commencement of the action, and since the year 1872 has been, a corporation duly incorporated under the law, and since said date has been acting in good faith as such corporation, and there was evidence sufficient to support the finding of the court as to the de facto character of the corporation. This being so, it became immaterial whether plaintiff was in fact a corporation de jure or not, since its de facto character entitled it to maintain the action, and assert its corporate character as against all the world, except the state in a direct proceeding by the attorney general to test its right to such franchise. Code Civ. Proc. § 358; People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 530, 8 Pac. 84.

3. The point most seriously contended for is that the evidence does not support the findings in certain material respects; and, by reason of such contention, we have carefully reviewed the evidence contained in a somewhat voluminous record. As a result of such examination, we are constrained to hold that the contention cannot be sustained. While, in one or two particulars, we are inclined to think the evidence preponderates somewhat in favor of the view of the facts as contended for by defendants, we are nevertheless satisfied that in these respects, as in all others, there is a sharp and substantial conflict, which fact precludes us from disturbing the findings of the trial judge. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PETALUMA SAV. BANK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 334.)

RECEIVER IN DIVORCE CASE—EFFECT—ENFORCEMENT OF LIENS—ABUSE OF DISCRETION —MANDAMUS.

1. Civ. Code, § 140, provides that the court may require the husband in a divorce case to give reasonable security for alimony, and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver. Held, that a receiver appointed in such case takes the property of the husband, subject to all prior liens, and that the holders of such liens may take such proceedings elsewhere as the law exacts for preserving and enforcing the liens, according to their priority, without regard to the mere volition of the court or judge making the appointment.

2. Where, in such case, a receiver is appointed, the discretion of the court appointing him to refuse to grant leave, if such leave be necessary, to holders and claimants of prior liens and incumbrances to enforce them in other courts, is not an absolute, but is a regulated, discretion, which cannot be abused.

3. Where the superior court appoints a receiver, and the husband's property consists of lands situated in other counties, it is an abuse of discretion for such court to refuse holders of liens on such lands leave to sue or to enforce such liens in other courts, on the ground that the lien of the judgment rendered by it in favor of the wife is prior to such other incumbrances.

4. Where, in a divorce case, the court appoints a receiver to take charge of the husband's property, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 140, for the purpose of enforcing payments to the wife as decreed by such court, and it afterwards improperly refuses the holder of liens on the husband's lands lying in other counties leave to enforce them in other courts, mandamus will lie to compel such court to make the order granting leave.

5. It was no answer to a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel such court to make the order granting such leave that petitioner's judgments were obtained by fraud, and an action had been commenced to set them aside; that the wife, at the time of the filing of her cross complaint in the divorce suit, filed notice of lis pendens, and afterwards recorded the order or interlocutory decree in her favor in all the counties in which the husband's lands are situated.

6. Nor was it an answer that the wife had a superior lien.

In bank.

Original proceedings by the Petaluma Savings Bank to obtain a writ of mandamus to compel the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and J. C. B. Hebbard, judge thereof, to make an order permitting it to enforce its judgments by sale of certain lands situated in other counties claimed to be in the possession of a receiver appointed by such court in a divorce case. Writ denied.

Edward Lynch, for petitioner. Henry E. Highton, Wm. T. Baggett, and Dunne & McPike, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding by mandamus based upon the following facts: Since the year 1887 there has been pending in the superior court of San Francisco an action for divorce, entitled "George E. White v. Frankie White," in which a judgment was entered on May 15, 1889, granting a divorce to the defendant upon grounds stated in her cross complaint. By said judgment she was awarded the community property and $200 per month, further judgment being deferred until the coming in of the report of a referee appointed to take account of the community property and the separate property of the plaintiff. August 29, 1893, the referee reported that there was no community property, but that the plaintiff, George E. White, had separate property, consisting mainly of land situated in this state, of the value of $206,000 over and above his liabilities, estimated at $138,000. June 29, 1894, this report was confirmed. On June 18, 1894, an order was entered in said action appointing a receiver therein. The receiver first appointed failed to qualify, but, on June 27, 1894, Wilson T. Smith—a subsequent appointee—assumed the office and entered upon the discharge of his duties. He has since claimed to be in possession as receiver of all the real property of said George E. White. On February 9, 1895, another judgment was entered in said action of White v. White in favor of the defendant, Frankie White, for the sum of $100,000, and by said judgment the receiver was continued in office and required to enforce the same by taking possession of all the separate property of said George E. White, including said real estate, and by managing and disposing of said property. All the personal property of said George E. White had been sold under executions prior to June 15, 1894, and his only property subject to execution was and is said real estate. The first or interlocutory judgment of May 15, 1889, was not declared to be a lien upon any property, and did not require said George E. White to give any security for the payments thereby decreed, but provided that, in the event the community property should "be insufficient out of the reasonable income and profits thereof" (sic) the defendant might apply for further judgment awarding to her a suitable maintenance out of the separate property of plaintiff, to be secured by transfer of such property, or a sufficient portion thereof, to a trustee, or in some other suitable manner. On April 3, 1895, the plaintiff herein, the Petaluma Savings Bank, filed in the superior court of San Francisco, and in said action of White v. White, an affidavit, setting forth, in addition to a number of formal allegations, the facts that on May 22 and May 23, 1894, judgments had been duly rendered and entered by the superior court of Mendocino county in favor of said bank, and against said George E. White, in several actions, for an amount aggregating about $45,000, and which remained unsatisfied to an amount exceeding $37,000; that said judgments were, immediately after rendition, enrolled and docketed in the clerk's office; that on and prior to May 26, 1894, transcripts of said dockets were duly recorded in the counties of Trinity, Humboldt, Kern, and Tulare, wherein all of the lands of said George E. White were situated; that said judgments were still in force; that said receiver, Smith, was not in the actual possession of any of said lands, but was claiming to be in possession, and endeavoring to take possession of the same; that said bank intended to apply to the superior court of Mendocino county for an order directing the sheriffs of Mendocino, Trinity, and Humboldt counties to sell said lands in the manner provided by law, but not desiring to bring about any conflict of jurisdiction between the superior courts of San Francisco and Mendocino, or their respective officers, and not desiring to do any act which might be construed as a contempt of the San Francisco court, it had suggested these facts, and, disclaiming any intention to submit itself, or the merits of its several judgments, to the jurisdiction, process, or orders of the said court in the action of White v. White, it thereupon prayed the superior court of San Francisco, and J. C. B. Hebbard, the judge presiding in the department to which the said case of White v. White had been assigned, to make an order therein, directing its receiver not to interfere with the officers of the superior court of Mendocino county in the lawful execution of said judgments in favor of said bank. Upon the filing of this affidavit a rule to show cause why such order should not be made was duly served on Frankie White and the receiver, Smith, but upon the hearing the court refused to make the order prayed, upon the ground that the original judgment of May 15, 1889, in the case of White v. White, was a lien prior in time and in right upon all of the property of said George E. White. Thereupon the Petaluma Savings Bank commenced this proceeding, in which it reaffirms by its complaint all the allegations of its petition to the superior court, and sets forth the other facts above stated. It also alleges that said George E. White is the owner of about 30,000 acres of land, situated in Mendocino, Trinity, and Humboldt counties, all of which is subject to the lien of its said judgments of May 22 and May 23, 1894, and of all of which said receiver claims to be in possession and control; that it is desirous of having its judgments satisfied by the sale of said lands, but is advised and believes that it would be an idle and foolish act to proceed to sell without the order and permission asked of the superior court of San Francisco—the defendant herein—for the reason that such proceeding would be a contempt of court. It is finally alleged that said George E. White is insolvent, has no personal property, and that the plaintiff has no other remedy for the enforcement of its legal rights. Wherefore it prays this court to issue its writ of mandate, or other appropriate writ, commanding the superior court of San Francisco, and the judge thereof, to make an order which will permit it to enforce its judgments by sale of said lands without molestation. The defendant demurs generally to this complaint, and answers, setting up some special matters of defense. The facts above stated are those confessed by the demurrer. The special matters of defense will be considered hereafter.

This proceeding is taken by the plaintiff out of abundant caution, in order not to incur the penalties of a contempt in interfering with property claimed to be in the custody of a receiver, if an execution sale of the property should be deemed an unwarranted interference, and in order that it may make a sale, the validity of which would be unquestionable; and we are cited by petitioner to cases in which the commencement of actions against receivers without previous leave obtained of the court by which they were appointed, or the unauthorized interference with property in their possession, has been held a contempt, and to other cases in which it has been held that the sale under execution of property in the hands of a receiver is void, and passes no title. The plaintiff does not insist that the law of this state is or ought to be such that it would be justly chargeable with a contempt of the superior court of San Francisco if it proceeded in the usual way to enforce the judgments rendered in its favor by the superior court of Mendocino county, or that a sale of the lands subject to the lien of its judgments without leave of the San Francisco court would be invalid (except as against superior liens, if any such there be). But it claims that it has a clear legal right to proceed to sell, and that it should either be told plainly that it is entitled to proceed without leave, if that is the opinion of the court, or if the court should be of the opinion that leave is necessary, the writ of mandate should issue, as prayed, upon the ground that the superior court has no discretion in such case to deny the order requested.

The position of the defendant with reference to these points is not very easy to determine. His counsel, on the oral argument, refused to commit himself to any definite position; but it would seem, from his memorandum of points and authorities, that he now asserts, in effect, that the plaintiff cannot proceed to enforce its judgments by sale of the lands of George E. White without obtaining the order which the defendant has refused to make. He claims, further, that it was within the judicial discretion of the defendant to grant or refuse the order, and that, having refused, its action cannot be controlled by mandamus, but that the sole remedy of the plaintiff, if aggrieved by the denial of its petition, is an appeal from the order. If these several propositions advanced by counsel for defendant are sound law, as applied to this case, the position of holders of valid liens upon the property of married men is not especially secure or enviable, and it is worth while to consider whether our divorce laws involve the consequences which the position of counsel implies. The only authority for the appointment of a receiver in a divorce suit is to be found in section 140 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "The court may require the husband to give reasonable security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under the provisions of this chapter, and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver, or by any other remedy applicable to the case." So far as I am advised, this section has not been the subject of judicial construction, and the powers and duties of a receiver appointed in pursuance of its provisions have not been defined; but it would not seem difficult to determine in what cases and for what purposes he is to be appointed. The whole object of his appointment is to provide security for the payment of such allowance as is made for the maintenance of the divorced wife, and this would be accomplished by investing him with the title and control of some productive property of the husband, out of the income of which he could pay such allowance, or by authorizing the sale of property to create a fund, the income of which would be applied to the same purpose. In either event, and in any case, the receiver would take the property of the husband, or such portion of it as the court might designate, subject to all prior liens and incumbrances; and the right to enforce such liens could not be made to depend upon the mere volition of the court or judge making the appointment. It would necessarily follow, therefore, either that such judge would be invested with authority to determine the validity and priority of all liens upon the property, and that all holders and claimants of such liens must make themselves parties to the divorce suit, and submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court in which it was pending, or that they must have the right, with or without asking leave of such court, to take such proceeding elsewhere as the law exacts for preserving and enforcing their liens according to their priority. Which of these two positions is assumed by respondent is not, as above stated, very clearly indicated by the argument of counsel, and neither is it very clearly to be implied from the order denying plaintiff's application for leave to sell, or the ground upon which it was based, viz. that the interlocutory judgment of May 15, 1889, in the case of White v. White, was a lien prior in time and in right upon the property of George E. White. I shall not, therefore, devote much space to the discussion of a doctrine which is not distinctly asserted, and has nothing to support it. It is enough to say that there is nothing in the law of California to justify the contention—if such is the contention—that, when a wife sues her husband for a divorce, and obtains the appointment of a receiver of his property for her benefit, not only their community property, but his entire separate estate, are as effectually sequestrated in the hands of the court in which the action for divorce is pending as they would be in case of death or insolvency; and that thenceforth all his creditors must come into that court and by motion or petition in that action seek, not the relief to which in the ordinary course of law they would be entitled, but such relief as it may adjudge and be able to afford, in the exercise of a plenary power, to dispose of the impounded estate and distribute its proceeds.

This proposition being disposed of, the alternative above stated alone remains. It must be true that the holders and claimants of prior liens and incumbrances upon the property held or claimed by the receiver, not being proper parties to the divorce suit, or subject to the jurisdiction of the court in which it is pending, have the right to take such proceedings elsewhere as the law exacts for preserving or enforcing their liens according to their priority. If, for instance, real property has been mortgaged, the holder of the mortgage must commence his action to foreclose in the county where the land is situate within a limited time, or his security and claim are lost, just as, in the present case, the plaintiff must sell the lands, subject to the lien of its judgments, within two years, or lose its security. And, if these steps must be taken, what right has the court appointing the receiver to prevent them? What discretion has it to refuse leave to proceed, if leave must be requested? Certainly not an absolute discretion, for that would amount to a power of confiscation of property rights, which are as full, as complete, and as much entitled to protection as any that exist. It must be, then, that such discretion as the court appointing the receiver has to prevent proceedings by adverse claimants to the property in the custody of the receiver is a regulated discretion which cannot be abused.

This proposition I do not understand to be contradicted, but the respondent contends that there has been no abuse of discretion, and that, even if there had been, mandamus will not lie to compel a judge to make an order which he can only make in his judicial capacity, and which, acting in such capacity, he has refused to make. As to whether there has been any abuse of discretion, that depends upon the scope of the inquiry which a court is entitled to make in passing upon such an application as the plaintiff presented to respondent. It is undoubtedly the prevailing doctrine that courts of equity will not permit their receivers to be sued, or property in their possession to be seized or sold, without leave asked and granted; but since the refusal of leave to sue in other tribunals, or to enforce the judgments of other courts, would in many cases destroy or impair rights which the court appointing the receiver has no power to conserve, it is the boast of such courts that they never refuse leave in a proper case. If a claimant of real property under title adverse to that of the parties represented by the receiver asks leave to commence his action of ejectment, no court would hesitate to grant his motion. It would not attempt to try the question of title,—a question appertaining to another forum,—with a view to denying leave to sue, if, in its opinion, the title asserted was not a good one. Upon the same principle, if a receiver of the superior court of San Francisco should be in possession of land situate in some other county, and subject to a mortgage, the application of the mortgagee for leave to make the receiver a defendant would be granted without any attempt to inquire into the validity of the mortgage, or its priority as a lien, for those are precisely the questions to be determined in the action to foreclose, which, by the express mandate of the constitution, must be commenced in the county where the land is situated. Const. art. 6, § 5.

If, in such a case, the court appointing the receiver should require the mortgagee to satisfy it of the validity of the mortgage, or, in other words, to litigate the whole question of the mortgagor's liability, and to establish it on the motion, as a condition precedent to any permission to sue the receiver in the county where the land was situate, it would be as much an abuse of discretion as if it should make its leave to sue conditional upon a waiver by the mortgagee of all claim of priority as against the receiver; for the doctrine to be deduced from the authorities cited in the briefs is that, whenever the case is such that the court appointing the receiver cannot protect an asserted right in the cause before it, the party will be allowed to proceed in the proper forum to establish his right if he can, and to enforce it by the appropriate means. But the plaintiff here is not asking leave to sue the receiver. It merely asks permission to take the step which the statute makes imperative in order that it may preserve such rights as it has, and the fact that its liens may be subsequent and subordinate to the lien claimed by Frankie White does not seem to be a sufficient ground for destroying them altogether. The holder of a second lien is entitled to protect it, and to preserve such rights as it gives him; and the only way this plaintiff can preserve what it has is to sell the land subject to its liens within the two years prescribed by the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 671. If it cannot sell without leave, and no leave is granted, its liens, such as they are, will soon expire, after which it will become a mere general creditor, holding a claim subordinate, not only to the supposed lien of Frankie White, but to all liens of subsequent mortgagees and judgment creditors, if any such there be. What excuse, then, does the assumed priority of Frankie White's lien afford for subjecting the plaintiff to this loss, or risk of loss? If her lien is prior, the sale of the land will not destroy her priority. It will merely preserve and perpetuate such rights as the plaintiff has, and will enable it, after her claims are satisfied, to take what may be left of White's estate in preference to those whose liens are of lower rank, or who have no liens at all. If this view is correct, the reason assigned for refusing plaintiff's application to sell is no reason at all, and the refusal itself—on the assumption that leave to sell is necessary—was clearly an abuse of discretion.

This brings us to the question whether leave to sell was necessary, and, if so, whether mandamus lies to compel the respondent to make the order. To my mind it seems clear that, if the first question were answered in the affirmative, the second must receive the same response; for, if the exercise by plaintiff of its clear legal right to preserve its liens depends upon the permission of the respondent, it cannot deny the exercise of such right for a reason that is absolutely futile and groundless. But I am of the opinion that no leave to sell was required, either to avoid the commission of a contempt, or in order to pass a title strictly corresponding to the actual rank of plaintiff's lien, as to which it is unnecessary to express an opinion. A sale by plaintiff would involve no physical disturbance of such possession as the receiver may have, and, therefore, would be no contempt of court. The rights and relative positions of the parties would not be changed. The title transferred would be good as against subordinate liens, and subject to such as were superior, and the question of title would be the proper subject of litigation in actions, commenced in the counties where the lands are situate, between those claiming under the receiver and those claiming through the execution sales, as was the case in Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. 52. That case is cited by both parties to the proposition that an execution sale without leave, of property in the possession of a receiver, will pass no title. But it does not sustain the proposition in a general sense. The demanded premises in that action had belonged to Ticknor, who had conveyed them, in fraud of creditors, to Day prior to December, 1840. At that date plaintiff's lessor recovered a money judgment against Ticknor, execution upon which was returned nulla bona. In 1842 another creditor recovered judgment against Ticknor, and thereafter commenced a suit in equity to set aside the conveyance to Day. He succeeded in his action, and, after the conveyance to Day was set aside, a receiver of the property was appointed. While the receiver was in possession, plaintiff's lessor, without leave asked or granted, sold it under an alias execution issued upon his judgment of 1840. The defendant in the ejectment suit claimed under the receiver, and it was held, in his favor, that the execution sale passed no title. The reason for so holding is obvious. By the conveyance to Day the land had been put beyond the reach of creditors, and had been made subject to their claims solely by means of the action in equity to set that conveyance aside. The fund, in other words, was the creation of the court appointing the receiver, and was necessarily subject to its disposition, to be applied to the satisfaction of the claims of such creditors only as could show a right to come in and share in the distribution. To hold, in such a case, that the execution sale passed a title superior to that of the receiver —a title relating back to the date of the first judgment—would have been to hold that a creditor, by prior judgment, may stand by while a junior creditor, at his sole expense and risk, uncovers assets of the debtor, and then step in and reap the entire benefit, which is neither equity nor law. The decision in that case, therefore, lends no support to the claim asserted here, and the general expressions in the opinion of the court which may seem to countenance it must be limited in their effect by reference to the facts of the case under consideration. As to the passage cited from the text of Freeman on Judgments (volume 1, § 207), it seems to be based entirely upon the case of Wiswall v. Sampson, and is not to be construed in a different sense. In that case the court comments particularly upon the argument advanced in behalf of the plaintiff therein to the effect that, since the execution sale involved no physical disturbance of the possession of the receiver, it was therefore no contempt, and hence that the sale should be upheld; but they say, conceding (and implicitly deciding) that there was no contempt, this does not meet the objection. The question is, not whether there was a contempt, but whether the title passed; and no title passed, for the reason that the fund belonged to the court that had created it, for the benefit of the creditor who had by his suit removed the impediments preventing the levy of any execution. It is scarcely necessary to point out the radical difference between that case and this, but it may be observed that neither Frankie White nor the respondent can claim the merit of having created any part of the fund in controversy here, or of having rendered it available for the payment of George E. White's debts. The rights of his creditors, including that asserted by the plaintiff, are conferred by the laws of the state and are not subject to be divested by the refusal of leave to take the steps which the law requires for their preservation; and, since such leave cannot be denied, there is no reason for requiring that it should be asked.

This conclusion, of course, disposes of the case, and it becomes unnecessary to notice specifically the facts alleged in the answer of defendant, who charges, in effect, that the judgments of plaintiff were obtained by fraud, and that an action has been commenced to set them aside; that Frankie White, at the time of the filing of her cross complaint in the divorce suit, filed notice of lis pendens, and afterwards recorded the interlocutory decree of May 15, 1889, in all the counties in which the lands of George E. White are situated. None of these allegations, conceding them to be true, affords a reason for holding that the Petaluma Bank should not be allowed to sell. If its judgments are fraudulent, the receiver is pursuing the proper course in suing to set them aside; but it may be that he will not succeed in establishing the fraud which he asserts, and in the meantime he should not be allowed to destroy the security of debts which may be determined to be valid, without resorting to the usual means of an injunction, and giving other security which will indemnify the bank if it shall ultimately succeed in establishing the validity of claims which are at present apparently valid. As to the rest of the answer, it consists of a claim, upon various grounds (notice of lis pendens, etc.), that Frankie White has a superior lien. But, as has been shown, this fact, if it is a fact, does not justify the destruction of the inferior lien. It is no disadvantage to her if the bank is allowed to keep what it has, unless it should happen to turn out that the bank's lien is really prior, in which case it would, of course, be greatly to her advantage to have destroyed it. Writ denied.

GUARDIAN—USE OF WARD'S FUNDS—LIABILITY—RATE OF INTEREST.

1. A guardian who, in good faith, mingles his ward's funds with his own, and uses the same in his business, it not appearing that he was able at all times to invest the same, is chargeable only with legal interest thereon, with annual rests, notwithstanding that the current rate of interest was greater.

2. A guardian who, in good faith and without negligence, loaned his ward's money on mortgage securities which afterwards depreciated, is not liable for interest on a part of the sum loaned which was unavoidably lost, though the loan was made in his own name, and the mortgage was not foreclosed until long after the loan was due, and though the court found that, if the guardian had purchased the property on foreclosure sale, and held it an indefinite time, a greater saving of the ward's funds would have been made, but found that no prejudice resulted from the delay in foreclosing the mortgage.

3. On the sum recovered, he is liable for interest only at the legal rate.

4. A guardian who, without order of court, purchased land for his ward, believing the same to be a good investment, and which was occupied by the ward's mother and stepfather, is, on disaffirmance of the purchase by the ward, liable only for the sum invested with simple interest, though he took title in his own name, so as to dispose of the same without order of court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Estate of Henry Cousins, minor. Appeal by J. M. Fox, guardian of said minor, from an order settling his final account. Reversed.

Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. Daggett & Adams, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by J. M. Fox, the guardian of said minor, from an order settling his final account. But three exceptions are urged, and while they all involve the same general inquiry,—that is, as to the propriety of the rate of interest charged by the court below against the guardian upon certain items of the account,—they each relate to a different item of the account; and, as a different rule of accountability was applied in each instance, it will be necessary to examine them separately. The facts upon which the several exceptions are based appear in the findings of the court, the appeal being upon the judgment roll, unaccompanied by the evidence.

1. The court found, substantially: That, during the whole time that said J. M. Fox has been the guardian of said minor, he has commingled the moneys belonging to his ward with his own, and used said money in his own business, and deposited it in the bank in his own name, and has never at any time kept the same separate and distinct from his own money. That, according to the testimony of the guardian, he could not loan the money all the while, and he thought it better to use the money when he could, and charge himself with regular interest. A good deal of the time it was not used at all, but sometimes he used it, and it was kept mingled with his own funds. That, under the advice of his counsel, in making up his final account, he charged himself with legal interest. That he never made any profit on it. On the contrary, it was a loss. That he may have made a profit in his business in which the money was used. He did not know. And the court finds that said guardian acted in good faith, and without any intent to defraud said ward, and at all times when said ward, or his parents for him, made demands on the guardian for money for the support and maintenance of the ward, such demands were always complied with, and the money for such purposes on hand. The court further found that, from 1874 up to the time of the trial, the current rate of interest charged on money loaned in Tulare county has been from 10 to 12 per cent. per annum. As a conclusion of law from these facts, the court held that, on all of the moneys of his ward thus mingled and used with his own (the specific items of which it is not pertinent here to state), "said guardian is chargeable with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, compounded annually," and in the decree the guardian was charged accordingly.

The objection urged to this action of the court is that the rate of interest charged is wholly unauthorized by law; that, upon the facts found, appellant is only liable to pay interest at the rate established by law,—that is, 7 per cent., computed with annual rests. In this contention we think it very clear the appellant must be sustained. The general rule, now thoroughly well established in this state, as to the limit of the liability of a trustee for mingling the trust funds with his own, and their use in his own business, where it is not shown that a larger profit was realized therefrom, is the return of the principal with legal interest thereon, compounded annually. This rule is applicable alike to guardians and executors as to other trust relations. In Estate of Stott, 52 Cal. 403, where the facts were not essentially dissimilar from those found in the case at bar, showing that the executor had mingled the funds of the estate with his own and those of the firm, and from time to time had employed them in his business, but there was no evidence of actual profits, it was held that the trustee was responsible for presumed profits upon the moneys so employed, and that the general rule in such cases was that he should be charged with legal interest, with annual rests,—citing 2 Redf. Wills, p. 886; 2 Williams, Ex'rs, *p. 1670, and note. The rule there announced was followed in Estate of Clark, 53 Cal. 359, where, upon similar facts, it is held that the rule in such cases is to charge the executor with legal interest, compounded with annual rests. In the latter case the court below had charged the executor, upon the facts found, with interest at 1¼ per cent. per month, that being the current commercial rate during the period the fund was held; but this action of the court was reversed, and the above rule directed to be applied. The doctrine was reaffirmed in Re Hilliard's Estate, 83 Cal. 423, 23 Pac. 393; and in the later case of Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639, where the executors had made an improper appropriation of the funds of the estate to the use of one of their number, the same rule was upheld and applied. See, also, Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 28 Pac. 558; Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 426, 22 Pac. 180.

We think the facts of this case bring it squarely within the doctrine thus established. Certainly, our attention has not been drawn to any element in the case making a different rule applicable. The court below seems to have proceeded upon the theory that, because it appeared that the current, conventional rate of interest prevailing in Tulare county during the period for which the guardian is charged was from 10 to 12 per cent. per annum, the former rate should be applied as a just measure of the guardian's liability; but, as we have seen, this view is erroneous. It is not even found that the funds could have been loaned at any such rate, or at all. Had it appeared that the guardian could, during the time he used the funds of his ward, have loaned them at the rate charged, a different rule might apply (Estate of Holbert, 39 Cal. 597); and, of course, if the facts showed that the trustee had benefited to that extent from his use of the funds, he would be chargeable therefor, upon the well-established rule of equity that he will not be permitted to make any profit out of his office. It was upon this principle that the case of In re Thompson's Estate, 101 Cal. 349, 35 Pac. 991, and 36 Pac. 98, 508, much relied upon by respondent, was decided. There it appeared that the fund with which the moneys of the estate were mingled earned about 11 per cent. per annum net, and it was held that, in view of this fact, the court below did not err in charging the delinquent trustee with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. But, in the absence of such facts, the limit of his responsibility is as above shown. And even the adoption of the rule of presumed profits, to the extent of charging legal interest, is "not for punishing the delinquent trustee, but for the purpose of attaining the actual or presumed gains, and to make certain that nothing of profit or advantage remains to the trustee, except, perhaps, his commission or compensation." Wheeler v. Bolton, supra.

2. The pertinent facts found by the court as to the second item involved are that, on May 27, 1876, the guardian made a loan of $936 of the ward's funds to one Ashton for 12 months, with interest at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month, for which he took a note secured by a mortgage upon certain real and personal property. The loan was made without an order of court authorizing it, and the securities taken in the name of Fox without mention of his trust capacity; but it was made in good faith, for the benefit of the ward, and upon property which at the time afforded ample security. Immediately after the loan, however, the mortgaged property depreciated in value, which fact was known to Fox; but it is found that, if the mortgage had been foreclosed in 1877 (the year of its maturity), it would not have realized any more than when, subsequently, in 1880, foreclosure was had, and the property brought, exclusive of expenses of sale, $415.70; which sum was recovered into the hands of the guardian on August 2d of that year. Prior to this, but just when is not found, Ashton had left the state, and Fox had written to him a number of times demanding payment, and also endeavored to get him to made a deed of the property to the guardian without requiring foreclosure, but without avail. These were the only efforts made to recover the money prior to the foreclosure proceedings. When the property was first put up for sale under the decree, it was bid in by the guardian for $300; but subsequently he refused to take it, and it was resold, with the result above stated. Subsequent to the sale, Fox made efforts to collect the deficiency judgment, but was unsuccessful, as Ashton had no property out of which it could be made. It is also found that, if the guardian had purchased the property on foreclosure sale for the benefit of the ward, and held it, "that at some time between then and now the principal of said loan, and a part of the interest on the same, could have been saved to his ward." Upon these facts the court charged the guardian with $936, the principal of the loan, and interest thereon from May 27, 1876, the day of making the loan, down to January 12, 1895, the date of accounting, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, compounded annually, the interest amounting to the sum of $6,804.03.

Appellant contends that the action of the court in the premises was erroneous; that, under the facts disclosed, he was only liable to legal interest, with annual rests, upon the $415.70 of the principal recovered, which was taken and used by him from the date of its recovery; and that, upon the balance of $520.30 of the principal sum, which was lost, he is not chargeable with any interest whatsoever. No complaint is made of the fact that appellant is charged with that portion of the principal lost, and we may assume that the action of the court in that regard is correct, although, under the facts, it is not clear that he would have been so chargeable, since the mere fact of loss, independently of the question of negligence, does not charge the trustee as matter of law with liability therefor. It depends upon the circumstances under which the loss occurred. Wheeler v. Bolton, supra. As to the interest, however, not only in the rate imposed, but in the charging of any interest upon that portion of the principal sum lost, we think the court was in error. It does not clearly appear upon what theory the court proceeded in fixing the rate of interest charged; but, whatever it may have been, we know of no principle which applied to the facts found will support it. The court not only finds that the loan was made in good faith, and for the benefit of the ward, but does not in terms find that the guardian was guilty of negligence. Nor does it find facts from which negligence must necessarily be inferred. The fact, upon which some stress seems to be laid by counsel for respondent, as evidencing improper conduct and purpose, that the loan was made by Fox in his own name and not as guardian, while not to be commended, loses any baleful significance that might otherwise attach to it, by the finding that the transaction was without taint of bad faith, and was for the benefit of the ward. The court distinctly finds that nothing was lost to the estate by failure to take earlier steps to foreclose, and fails to find, at least distinctly, any want of diligence in the efforts made to recover the loan. And we see nothing necessarily showing a lack of ordinary care and judgment in the premises. The fact that Fox did not wish to take the property at the foreclosure sale, and hold it indefinitely, is not in itself significant of neglect or want of care. Nor does the court find that he was negligent in not having done so. It is simply found that, had he done so, something more could have been eventually saved. But mere error of judgment is not sufficient to subject the trustee to punitive responsibility. As said by Mr. Pomeroy: "The law does not cast upon the trustee an extraordinary duty, nor demand an extraordinary care, nor hold him liable for mere error of judgment. Much less does it make him an insurer of the property. If he has exercised the care and judgment of ordinarily prudent men in their own affairs, he will not be chargeable for his mere errors of judgment, nor for accidental injuries and losses." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1070. And, again, that learned writer says, in section 1071, Id.: "If, however, an investment is made with the exercise of reasonable care, diligence and business prudence, in the form, manner, and securities approved of by the rules of equity, a trustee will not be liable for losses which may occur through the destruction or depreciation of values." In Ellig v. Naglee, 9 Cal. 695, it is said: "Trustees act for the benefit of others, and not for themselves, and the fair exercise of their judgment should be a protection to them. For supine negligence or willful default will render them liable, but to make them liable for mere errors of judgment would tend to discourage good and prudent men from taking any trusts."

The case is not distinguishable in principle from Estate of Holbert, 48 Cal. 630, where the executor of the estate had improvidently, although with honest purpose, made a loan on a piece of real estate, without examining the records, upon which a mortgage already existed for nearly the entire value of the property, as a result of which the amount of the loan was in large part lost to the estate. In reversing the action of the court below in charging the executor with the amount lost, with interest added at the conventional rate, it was said: "Of course, the executor, upon settlement of his accounts, is not to be charged with interest at the rate stipulated to be paid by the borrowers. If such a rule could ever be properly applied, it could only be in a case where mala fides was established; and here, as we have seen, there was none. Nor do we think that, under the circumstances, the executor should be charged with interest, even at the statutory rate. It does not appear, by the record, that he could, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, have loaned it to others at that rate, or at any rate of interest whatever, during the time it has remained in the hands of the borrowers. The basis of accountability under such circumstances is the same as though it had been kept on hand by him for the purpose of making a loan, but without the opportunity of doing so, in which case he would not have been chargeable with interest. The executor should, therefore, have been held liable only for the sum of $732, which is the balance of the loan remaining uncollected after applying the $468 actually received by the executor."

Applying these principles to the facts before us, the appellant should not have been charged with interest upon the part of the principal sum not recovered. As was said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in a similar case, where it was found that the guardian, in making the loan, had acted in good faith, and with ordinary care and prudence: "It is, of course, a great hardship that the appellant should lose so large a portion of her patrimony; but it would be a still greater hardship to compel her guardian to make good the loss, unless it was occasioned by his carelessness. It has been said that the harshest demand that can be made in equity is to hold a trustee answerable for what was never in his hands, or for a loss not caused by his willful default." Jack's Appeal, 94 Pa. St. 371. Upon the $416.70 recovered, appellant is, under the principles announced in the first part of this opinion, properly chargeable with interest at the legal rate, compounded annually, from August 2, 1880, the date of recovery, for the reason that he has, admittedly, since said date, mingled and used the amount so recovered with his own funds. But he was not, for the reasons stated, chargeable with the rate imposed by the court below.

3. As to the third and last item, the court found that, on November 20, 1884, the guardian, at the request of the mother and stepfather of the minor, with whom the ward resided during his minority, purchased 80 acres of land for the ward with the ward's money, paying therefor $1,250. This was done because both the parents and the guardian believed that it was a good investment for the ward. The investment was made without order or authority of court. Ever since the purchase of the land, the parents of the minor have had the possession, use, and benefit thereof, and the guardian has never derived any rents, issues, or profits therefrom, but has paid all the taxes thereon. The title was taken in the name of the guardian, so that the parents of the ward and the guardian might sell the land without an order of court, and the guardian retained the title for the benefit of the ward until July 23, 1893, when he executed and acknowledged a deed granting and conveying said land to the ward. This deed has not been delivered, but the guardian has since been, and is, ready to deliver the same. The mother of the ward arranged for, and knew of the execution of, the deed. The ward, on February 4, 1895, disaffirmed and refused to ratify the purchase of the land. Upon the facts the court held that the ward was not bound by said purchase, and required the guardian to account for the $1,250 thus invested, with legal interest, compounded annually, from November 20, 1884, the date of the purchase, to January 12, 1895, the date of the accounting. The only complaint made against this action of the court is that there was error in requiring the interest to be compounded, and in that particular appellant must be sustained. Where, as here, the trustee has been guilty of no willful breach of duty, or any intentional violation of the obligations of his trust, he is not to be charged with compound interest. This is not only the general rule, as declared by our Code, but is one which has been repeatedly applied by this and other courts. Section 2261 of the Civil Code provides: "A trustee must invest money received by him under the trust, as fast as he collects a sufficient amount, in such manner as to afford reasonable security and interest for the same." And section 2262 provides: "If a trustee omits to invest trust moneys according to the last section, he must pay simple interest thereon if such omission is negligent merely, and compound interest if it is willful." "The general rule," says Mr. Justice Harrison, in Wheeler v. Bolton, supra, "applicable to an executor, as well as to any other trustee, is that, except in cases in which he has been guilty of some positive misconduct or willful violation of duty, he is not to be charged with compound interest." And in Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 439, 22 Pac. 180, it is said: "It is a general rule that, where the omission of the trustee is due to simple negligence, without any actual intent to cheat or defraud, simple interest alone is allowed the cestui que trust on the trust funds; but, if the omission is willful, compound interest is allowed." In this case the trial court has found against any intentional or willful dereliction of duty on the part of the guardian. That finding is conclusive upon us, and we are not at liberty, even if so disposed, to put the construction upon the acts of the guardian contended for by respondent. The order is reversed, and the court below is directed to settle appellant's account in accordance with the views herein expressed.

PEOPLE v. CRAIG. (Cr. 15.)[1]

HOMICIDE—MALICE—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF CHILD AS WITNESS—DEGREES OF MURDER —INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a prosecution for murder of defendant's wife, testimony that, a few weeks prior to the homicide, defendant said that "the Hunters [the wife's relatives] had taken away his wife and children from him, and wouldn't allow him to see his children or his wife, and he wouldn't stand it much longer"; and that, while his wife and children were away from her relatives on a visit, he said that "there would be something happen sure before it would end"; and that if he went out to her father's ranch when they came back, to see them, and they interfered with him, he would put a hole through them,—is admissible on the question of malice.

2. On a prosecution for murder of defendant's wife, whom defendant shot just after shooting her brother, defendant having testified that he shot the brother in self-defense, and that the shot which hit the wife was intended for the brother, it was proper, in connection with prior threats against the whole family, to show that, just after shooting the wife and her brother, he drove rapidly to another house, and, without any warning, killed her father and mother; the jury being charged that it could be considered only for the purpose of determining whether the killing of the wife was accidental or designed, and that it could not be considered by them unless they were satisfied that the killing of the parents was in pursuance of a plan formed prior to the killing of the wife.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, declaring that "children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly," cannot be witnesses, the determination of the judge as to the competency of such a witness is not reviewable.

4. An instruction that if the jury found that defendant shot at H., not in necessary self-defense, but unlawfully, etc., but missed him, and thereby killed L., he would be guilty of murder, is not erroneous for not stating the degree of murder he would be guilty of: the court having elsewhere instructed concerning the different degrees of murder.

Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

John Craig appeals from a conviction of murder. Affirmed.

Geo. P. Phibbs, F. B. Guthrie, and Johnstone Jones (B. M. Marble, of counsel), for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The defendant was tried for the murder of his wife, convicted, and sentenced to death. From this judgment of conviction, and an order denying a new trial, he has appealed.

The facts connected with the killing, as shown by the prosecution, are briefly as follows, viz.: The defendant and his wife had been living separate from each other for several months, the wife living with her children at the "Hunter Ranch" (the property of her father), about three miles north of Los Angeles. On the 25th of July, 1894, soon after sundown, the defendant, having provided himself during the day with some pistols, drove in a buggy from Los Angeles to the Hunter ranch, where he got out, and went to the porch at the back or kitchen part of the house, and attempted to open the kitchen door. Finding it locked, he called out to his wife, who was in the kitchen, and, as she looked through the window and saw who it was, she asked him who gave him the right to come there. Upon his replying that he had the right to come and see his children, she said, "Do you know there is a man on the ranch?" and, upon his inquiring where, she pointed to her brother, George Hunter, who was approaching, saying, "There he comes." As George Hunter came up, Mrs. Craig unlocked the door, and he entered the house, going through the kitchen and dining room to the hall, but immediately returned, going again upon the porch through the kitchen door. As he stepped off the porch, the defendant, who was outside, holding a pistol in each hand shot him with the one in his right hand; and, as Mrs. Craig put out her hands as if to catch her brother from falling, the defendant stepped forward, and, with the other pistol, shot her in the head, killing her instantly. He then stepped over her body into the kitchen, holding up both pistols, saying, "I have got revolvers enough for the whole family," and went into the dining room, where he approached Miss Jensen, who had run out of the kitchen, and threatened to shoot her also. She, however, escaped, and the defendant immediately left the house, and drove away in his buggy.

After the evidence of the killing of the deceased, as aforesaid, had been introduced, Miles Long, a witness called by the prosecution, testified that he had had a conversation with the defendant with reference to the Hunter family, within three weeks prior to the killing, and was then asked to state whether the defendant had made a threat in the conversation relative to his children, and relative to the Hunters. Upon the objection of the defendant, the court excluded the answer, on the ground that the question was leading. He was then asked: "State whether or not, at any time prior to this shooting, within six weeks thereafter, you had a conversation with this defendant relative to his wife having been taken away from him by somebody, and, if so, about when that was." To this question the defendant objected, upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and not a part of the res gestæ. The court overruled the objection, saying in connection with its ruling: "I suppose the object of this testimony is to show some threat. At present I don't see any connection that it possibly could have with this case, except in that view; and I see no objection to this man's stating that conversation. He has been led up to it, and the time and the subject-matter, and I see no objection to his going on and telling what that conversation was. If it was in regard to threats, or anything of the kind, the jury must be the judges of that, and not the court. I can't pass upon the weight of the testimony; nor how much it proves. If it should turn out to be absolutely irrelevant, and did not prove anything at all, we can strike it out. I can't pass upon the testimony in advance." The court thereupon directed the witness to state what the defendant said. The witness thereupon answered that the defendant stated to him, within a period of three weeks, that "the Hunters had taken his wife and children from him, and wouldn't allow him to see his children or his wife, and he wouldn't stand it much longer." Another witness, Emily Snyder, who had testified that Mrs. Craig with her children went to San Francisco in that year, and returned about the last of May, and that, while they were away, she had had a conversation with the defendant, was asked: "Was anything said on that occasion about 'something happening,' or anything of that kind?" And, upon the objection of the defendant to her answering the question being overruled, she testified in answer thereto: "Yes, sir; he said,—that is, while they were in San Francisco,—he said to me that 'there would be something happen sure before it would end'; and then he said that if he went out to the ranch when they came back, and he went to the ranch to see them, if they interfered with him, why he would put a hole through them." It is contended on the part of the appellant that the court erred in admitting this testimony, for the reason that it had no tendency to show any ill will on his part towards his wife, and that upon his trial for her murder it was incompetent to prove ill will or malice on his part towards any other person. This testimony was competent, however, and properly admitted for the purpose of showing the intent of the defendant in killing his wife, and that he acted with malice aforethought. To establish this intent, it was competent for the prosecution to offer any evidence that would enable the jury to ascertain the state of his mind at the time of the killing, and this would be best evidenced by his acts and declarations at or about that time. If the conversation between the witnesses and the defendant embodied a threat on his part, it was proper that it should go before the jury for the purpose of establishing his feeling towards his wife, and determining whether he was actuated by malice. Whether it was of such a character as would authorize such an inference could be determined by the jury only after it had been given, and, while the weight to be given to the testimony was to be determined by them, its admissibility was to be determined by the court before it was known what the testimony would be. The indefiniteness of the threats was not a sufficient reason for excluding the testimony. They were broad enough to include his wife with the other members of her family, and it was for the jury to determine whether she was in fact one of the persons intended by him. Much must be left to the discretion of the trial judge in determining whether the proffered testimony has any relevancy to the issue to be determined, or whether it is such that the jury will be authorized to make any inference therefrom which will aid them in determining the issue they are to try. The court was required to determine primarily whether the general character of the conversation or declaration sought to be shown, as embodied in the form of the question, considered in connection with the evidence already before the jury, was such as to authorize an inference of the intent with which the killing was done. It could not determine in advance whether the answer of the witness would be relevant for the purpose of making such inference. If the answer should be entirely irrelevant, it would be disregarded, or could be struck out; while, if it were relevant, it was proper to be considered by the jury. There was other testimony in the case bearing upon this point. Castoreno testified that the defendant said to him, a few days before the shooting, that "the old folks and his wife was crowding him too much altogether, and they was trying to get the best of him in every respect, and he would put an end to them all some of these nights." It was for the jury to determine from the language used by the defendant in these conversations, taken in connection with other evidence in the case, what was his meaning when he said, "he would not stand it much longer," or "there would be something happen before it would end," or "if they interfered with him he would put a hole through them"; and it was for the jury to determine, too, whether by these remarks he included his wife with the other members of the Hunter family. The testimony of these witnesses was to be considered by the jury in connection with other testimony upon this subject, and it is not to be assumed that the jury would determine any of the questions before them until all of the evidence had been introduced, and the case was submitted to them for a verdict. The court, in admitting the evidence, had limited the scope for which it was to be considered, and, in its instructions to the jury, further told them that, if all the evidence failed to show any motive on the part of the accused to commit the crime charged against him, they were to consider that circumstance in connection with the other evidence in making up their verdict.

The defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and, in recounting the circumstances under which the homicide was committed, testified that the shooting of George Hunter was in self-defense, and that, in the effort to defend himself against him, one of the shots which he had intended for him had accidentally struck his wife, and caused her death. For the purpose of defeating the claim of the defendant that the killing of his wife was accidental, the prosecution called certain witnesses in rebuttal, whose testimony was to the effect that, immediately after the killing, the defendant left the house, and drove rapidly for a distance of about three miles to a house on Buena Vista street, in the city of Los Angeles, arriving there within 20 minutes after the killing of his wife, got out of his buggy, and went up on the porch, where William and Mary Hunter, the father and mother of his wife, were then sitting, and deliberately, without any word of warning, killed them both. The defendant objected to the introduction of this evidence, and now urges it as error for the reason that it tended to establish a different crime from that for which he was on trial, and constituted no part of the transaction connected with the killing of his wife. The introduction of the evidence is upheld by the prosecution on the ground that the killing of the father and mother, and of the wife, was part of a single plan, outlined by the threats of the defendant, and that this evidence tended to establish this purpose on the part of the defendant to exterminate the family, and thus characterize and give point to his threats, and to disprove the claim that the killing of his wife was accidental. We are of the opinion that this testimony was properly admitted. Although a defendant can be convicted for only the offense which he is charged with having committed, evidence which may have the effect to establish another crime than that for which he is on trial is not for that reason inadmissible. If the evidence offered is relevant to establish the crime for which he is on trial, it is not rendered irrelevant by reason of the fact that it could be used to establish another crime for which he might be charged. Evidence of a material fact which tends to show the intent or motive of the defendant, although it tends to prove the commission of another offense by him, is relevant and admissible in a criminal action. Taken in connection with the previous threats on the part of the defendant against the Hunter family, this testimony was relevant for the purpose of showing the scope of those threats, and enabling the jury to determine whether the killing of these persons was a part of the execution of a single plan that had existed in his mind. If the jury should so determine, it would enable them more readily to determine whether the killing of his wife was also a part of that plan, and whether the claim of the defendant that he had accidentally shot her was well founded. The court instructed the jury with reference to this evidence that it could only be considered by them in relation to the motive or intention of the defendant in firing the shot that killed his wife, and that, unless they were satisfied that the killing of William and Mary Hunter was in pursuance of a plan formed prior to the killing of his wife, it could not be considered by them in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant as to the killing of his wife, but that, if they did find it was in pursuance of such plan, it could be considered for the purpose of determining whether the killing of his wife was accidental or designed.

The ruling of the court that Willie Craig was a competent witness cannot be reviewed on this appeal. The provision in section 1880, Code Civ. Proc., declaring that "children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly," cannot be witnesses, implies that it must "appear" to the trial judge that the child is incompetent for the reasons therein named, and, of necessity, requires his capacity to receive impressions of the facts, and of relating them truly, to be determined by the trial judge. The burden is upon the person who objects to the child being a witness to show that he is incapable; and the determination of the judge upon such objection, and an examination of the child, is not a matter for review, any more than is his ruling upon the capacity of an adult who may be offered as a witness. The fact that the testimony of the child differed from that of other witnesses is not even prima facie evidence of his incapacity. Such difference is frequently found in the testimony of adult witnesses.

Objection was taken to certain remarks of counsel for the prosecution, made in their arguments to the jury; but these remarks appear to have been no more than an animated argument upon the testimony in the case, and presented to the jury with no more zeal and earnestness than would be natural in attempting to convince them that it justified a verdict of conviction.

The court instructed the jury that, if they should find that the defendant shot at George Hunter, not in necessary self-defense, but unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, but missed him, and thereby then and there killed Emily Craig, he would be guilty of murder. It is urged by the appellant that this instruction was erroneous in not stating to the jury the degree of murder of which he would be guilty. The instruction was not erroneous. People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 122, 22 Pac. 125. The court elsewhere instructed the jury concerning the different degrees of murder, and the facts necessary for a conviction thereof.

Other exceptions were taken by the appellant to the instructions of the court, and to its refusal to give certain instructions asked on his behalf. It is unnecessary to repeat them here; but, upon a careful consideration of the entire charge of the court, we are satisfied that the jury were correctly instructed upon the propositions of law applicable to the case, and that the instructions requested by the appellant which were not given were not authorized. The judgment and order are affirmed.

YOCH v. HOME MUT. INS. CO. (No. 19,592.)[1]

INSURANCE—CONDITIONS—REPRESENTATIONS—WITNESS—LEADING QUESTIONS.

1. An insurance policy insured, "except as hereinafter provided," a building, occupied as a store, and merchandise, "such as is usually kept in a country store"; the latter quoted clause being written in ink. The policy contained a printed condition that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, it should be void if (any usage of trade to the contrary) gasoline was kept on the premises. Held that, if gasoline was an article usually kept in a country store, during the day, for sale, keeping it on the premises for such purposes did not avoid the policy.

2. In an application for insurance, insured signed a document indorsed: "Daily Report of Policy Issued by the H. M. Ins. Co. Instructions to Agents." The face of the document was headed, "Questions," with the directions that, by having the following questions answered, unnecessary correspondence would be saved. Part of the questions showed that they were intended to be answered by the agent. The agent, from information derived from the contractor who built the house to be insured, and without insured's knowledge, wrote beneath the printed questions, which were numbered to 25 inclusive, "(26) Less than fifteen rooms." Held, that the fact that insured signed the application without reading it did not constitute a representation on his part that the building contained only 15 rooms, so as to avoid the policy if it was false and material.

3. Where it is sought to avoid a policy on the ground that insured represented to the insurance agent that the building contained less than 15 rooms, it is proper to exclude, as leading, a question asked the agent by insurer as to whether insured stated to him that the building contained less than 15 rooms.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by Joseph Yoch against the Home Mutual Insurance Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. V. Montgomery and Kendrick & Kendrick, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant issued its policy of insurance against fire to Mrs. W. H. Brooks, the assignor of the plaintiff, in the sum of $4,000, upon a frame building occupied as a country store, and also upon household furniture and the stock of merchandise, "such as is usually kept in country stores," while contained in said building. Before the expiration of the policy the insured property was totally destroyed, and the present action is brought to recover for the loss thereby sustained. The defendant alleged, as grounds of defense, that the insured kept for sale and allowed gasoline upon the premises, in violation of the terms and conditions of the policy, and that, in her written application for the policy, she made a material misrepresentation in reference to the building to be insured. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The policy was made out upon a printed form, in which, after the agreement of insurance, there were printed certain conditions to be observed by the insured, and certain limitations upon the liability of the insurer. In the insurance part of the policy the defendant insured Mrs. Brooks for the term of one year against all direct loss or damage by fire, "except as hereinafter provided," and intermediate this part of the policy and the printed conditions and limitations was written, with pen and ink, the description of the property upon which the insurance was made. One of these printed conditions was as follows: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed herein or added hereto, shall be void * * * if (any usage or custom of trade or manufacture to the contrary notwithstanding) there be kept, used, or allowed on the above-described premises benzine, benzole, gasoline, Greek fire, etc." Testimony was given at the trial tending to show that gasoline is one of the articles of merchandise usually kept in country stores, but that it is customary to keep it in a room or building by itself. It was also shown that, during the month prior to the fire, the insured would, in the daytime, bring small quantities of gasoline—one or two cans—from a building on another lot, which was used for storing it, into a room within the insured building, and adjacent to the store, for the purpose of selling it at retail to her customers. Upon this evidence the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury: "If, from the evidence, you find that, during the period between the delivery to plaintiff of the policy of insurance in this action sued on and the fire, gasoline was at any time for several days kept for sale in the building described in the policy, or in any part of said building, your verdict should be for the defendant." The court refused this instruction, but told the jury: "If you find, from the evidence in this case, that gasoline was, during all or any portion of said time between the issuance of said policy and the said fire, an article of merchandise usually kept in country stores, then and in such case the fact that the insured did keep for sale or allow gasoline, if she did, either by herself or agent, allowing or keeping such article on the insured premises—that is, habitually—is no defense to this action." It is urged by the appellant that, in giving this instruction, and also in refusing to give the one asked by it, the court erred.

A contract of insurance is to be interpreted by the same rules as is any other contract. It must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable. If it is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible. The whole contract is to be taken together. When it is partly written and partly printed, the written parts control the printed parts, and, if there is any repugnancy between the two, the printed part must be disregarded. It may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made. In cases of uncertainty it is to be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. Civ. Code, §§ 1636–1654. Applying these rules to the contract in the present case, it must be held that it was the intention of the defendant to insure gasoline, if it was an article usually kept in country stores, and that, if such was its intention, it was no violation of the policy for the insured to keep gasoline upon the premises as a part of the stock of merchandise. When the defendant agreed to insure a stock of merchandise "such as is usually kept in country stores," it must be presumed to have known the character of the merchandise which is usually kept in country stores, and that gasoline was one of these articles, and, consequently, that its policy covered all such merchandise. Harper v. Insurance Co., 17 N. Y. 194; Pindar v. Insurance Co., 36 N. Y. 648. The court would have no judicial knowledge of the character of merchandise which is usually kept in country stores, and it was therefore competent to offer evidence upon that point, for the purpose of enabling it, when interpreting the language of the policy, to understand the matter to which it related, and the circumstances under which it was made. Elliott v. Insurance Co., 13 Gray, 139; Whitmarsh v. Insurance Co., 16 Gray, 359; Archer v. Insurance Co., 43 Mo. 434; Maril v. Insurance Co. (Ga.) 23 S. E. 463; Fraim v. Insurance Co. (Pa. Sup.) 32 Atl. 613; Wood, Ins. § 64; May, Ins. § 239. When it was shown that gasoline is one of the articles which is usually kept in country stores, the court correctly held that it was a part of the subject of the insurance, and that the insured did not violate the policy by keeping it in stock. The defendant, when it issued the policy in question, knew the character of a country store, and that Mrs. Brooks kept it for the purpose of retailing to her customers all of the articles kept by her, and that the gasoline which she kept was to be disposed of by retail in the same way as the other portion of her stock. To give to the policy the construction now claimed by the defendant would be to hold that, although it agreed with her to insure all the stock she usually kept in her store, yet, if she continued to keep that stock, she forfeited all rights under the policy. The clause in the policy above quoted, and which is relied on by the appellant, cannot be construed as having this effect. The qualification therein which excepts the policy from becoming void, viz. "unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon," is found in the policy itself. The subject-matter of the risk—the stock of merchandise "such as is usually kept in country stores"—was written on the policy by the insurer; and, as the defendant must be deemed to have intended thereby to insure all such articles as are usually kept in a country store, it must be held that this was an "agreement indorsed" upon the policy, which removed the exemption from liability that would otherwise have existed. Insurance Co. v. De Graff, 12 Mich. 124. If there be any repugnance between the written phrase, "such as is usually kept in country stores," and the printed clause, "any usage or custom of trade or manufacture to the contrary notwithstanding," the former controls the latter, as being the more deliberate expression of the contracting parties. Fraim v. Insurance Co. (Pa. Sup.) 32 Atl. 613; Civ. Code, § 1651.

Counsel for appellant has cited the case of Insurance Co. v. Lenheim, 89 Pa. St. 497, in support of his contention; but this case seems to stand by itself. Mr. Freeman, in his note to the case (33 Am. Rep. 778), says that the case "is utterly opposed to the decisions in all the other states, and that it is quite difficult to reconcile it with previous decisions in the same state." A subsequent case in the same state (Fraim v. Insurance Co., supra) appears to be at variance with the rule in the Lenheim Case. It may also be observed that the opinion of the court in the Lenheim Case rested materially upon the fact that, in the policy then before it, the condition exempting the insurer from liability for loss where turpentine was kept, was "in immediate connection" with the clause by which it insured the property specified, "except as hereinafter provided," whereas, in the present case, the words "except as hereinafter provided" are in direct proximity to the words "loss or damage by fire" which is insured against, and may be regarded as a limitation upon the causes of fire against which the insurance is made, rather than as a qualification of the contract of insurance. In subsequent portions of the policy there are certain causes of loss for which the insurer expressly declares that it will not, under any circumstances, be liable; and it is more reasonable to construe these as the matter referred to by the phrase "except as hereinafter provided," than those provisions in which it is declared that in certain contingencies the policy shall be "void."

The policy sued on contains the following provision: "This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented in writing or otherwise any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof." It is alleged, in the answer, that the policy was issued upon the written application of the assured, in which it was stated that the building to be insured contained less than 15 rooms, whereas, in fact, it contained 20 rooms; and that the materiality of this representation consisted in the fact that the rate of premium for the risk assumed was greater for a building with 20 rooms than it was for a building with 15 rooms. It was sufficiently shown at the trial that the building contained more than 20 rooms, but it was also shown that the statement in the application that there were less than 15 rooms was written therein by the agent of the defendant from information which he had obtained at his own instance, and without any direction on the part of the insured, from one Dungan, the carpenter who had built the house; and it was not shown that either the assured or her husband had made any statements or representations to the agent in reference thereto. The defendant offered in evidence a document signed by Mr. Brooks which is claimed to be the application. This document is indorsed: "Daily Report of Policy Issued for the Home Mutual Insurance Company. Instructions to Agents." The face of the policy is headed, "Questions," with the following direction, evidently intended for the agent of the defendant, viz.: "By having the following questions so fully answered that the company can get a clear idea of the risk, and can verify rates, the agent will avoid much unnecessary correspondence." Under this are various printed questions, numbered consecutively to 25, and beneath these printed questions there was written, upon a blank line on this printed page: "(26) Less than fifteen rooms." The agent of the defendant testified that, before he presented this document to Mr. Brooks for signature, he had written these words in the application from information which he had obtained from Dungan, and he did not testify that he made any inquiry of Mr. Brooks concerning the number of rooms in the house. Mr. Brooks testified that, when the application was presented to him for his signature, he signed it without reading it, and that, when he signed it, he had no knowledge that these words were there. It does not clearly appear whether the matter referred to in these words was the subject of a question which was intended to be put to Mr. Brooks, and to which no answer was written in the application, or whether the words constitute a statement written by the agent of the defendant for the information of his principal. It is quite as consistent with the evidence on this point that the jury should have found that these words were written by the agent for the information of the company, as that they were an answer to any question put to Mr. Brooks by the agent. In the line numbered 24, the questions, "Have you personally examined the risk?" and "Do you recommend it?" are evidently questions which were to be answered by the agent, and he testified that the answer to the next question, "Has the risk been recently rejected?" to which the answer "No" is written, was not discussed by him with Mr. Brooks.

The court instructed the jury, in substance, that if Mr. Brooks, in applying for the policy, made a written representation that the building contained less than 15 rooms, they should find for the defendant; but, if they should find that the facts contained in the application respecting the number of rooms were obtained by the defendant from Dungan, and from the diagram or plans furnished by him, and that Brooks made no representation personally in the matter, but signed the application without knowing what it contained as to the number of rooms, it did not constitute a defense. This instruction properly directed the jury in their deliberations upon their verdict, and their verdict thereunder is justified by the evidence. Whether Mr. Brooks made any representations to the agent concerning the number of rooms in the house was to be determined upon a direct conflict of evidence; and, if the jury believed that he did not, his signing the application with the ambiguous phrase, "Less than fifteen rooms," without knowing that it was there or the purpose for which it had been inserted, cannot be construed as a written representation by him that the building contained less than 15 rooms. The rule that one who signs an instrument which contains terms of obligation upon himself is not absolved from such obligation by showing that he signed the instrument without reading it, has no application in a case like the present, where the instrument signed contains no words of obligation, and the clause invoked against the signer does not purport to be a statement by him, or in answer to a question put to him. The policy sued on does not refer to this application, or in any way incorporate its contents into the conditions upon which the contract of insurance is made; but the appellant sought by extrinsic evidence to connect the two instruments, and make the one dependent upon the contents of the other. In such a case the evidence should be very clear that the statements in the application relied on to defeat the action were made by the applicant, and that, at the time of making them, the applicant knew that they were to form the basis of the policy to be issued to him. Dunbar v. Insurance Co., 72 Wis. 492, 40 N. W. 386; Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, 25 W. Va. 663; Combs v. Insurance Co., 43 Mo. 148; Rowley v. Insurance Co., 36 N. Y. 550; May, Ins. § 144 et seq.

Certain rulings of the court at the trial were excepted to by the appellant, but we are of the opinion that no error was committed in these rulings. In answer to the question asked of Freeman, "In whose handwriting was the statement, 'Less than fifteen rooms'?" he subsequently stated it to be in his own handwriting. The question whether Brooks stated to him that there were less than 15 rooms in the building was clearly leading, and was properly excluded upon that objection. Whether Brooks made such a statement was a material point of inquiry, and it would have been competent for the defendant to ask of Freeman whether any statement was made by him on that subject, and, if so, what it was; but the defendant omitted to make such inquiry. Equally proper was it for the plaintiff to show by Brooks that he did not make such statement, and that, at the time he signed the application, he was not aware that the statement was there. The only objection to these questions was that they were irrelevant and immaterial, and this objection was properly overruled. The judgment and order are affirmed.

FATJO v. SWASEY. (S. F. 53.)[1]

APPEAL—REVIEW—TIME OF TAKING—APPEAL—TRUSTEE—REMOVAL—ALIENATION BY BENEFICIARY—QUIETING TITLE.

1. The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court cannot be reviewed, unless the bill of exceptions contains specifications of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, requires an appeal to be taken within 60 days from the rendition of the judgment, to enable the court to review the evidence, and not merely within 60 days after the notice of the rendition of the judgment is served on the appellant.

3. Where property is given by a testator, in trust, to be converted into cash as soon as it shall be, in the judgment of the trustee, for the best interest of the estate, and the income paid to certain beneficiaries, equity may remove the trustee, and appoint another with all the discretionary powers conferred on the original trustee.

4. Civ. Code, § 867, providing that the beneficiary of a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of land may be restrained from disposing of his interest in such trust during life, by the instrument creating the trust, is not in conflict with section 863, providing that an express trust in land vests the whole estate in the trustee, subject, only, to the execution of the trust, the beneficiary taking no estate in the property, so as to repeal the latter section, and grant to the beneficiary a present estate and alienable interest in the property, unless restrained from alienation by the instrument creating the trust, as the first section applies only to the rents and profits.

5. Civ. Code, § 1338, providing that, where the will directs the conversion of land into money, such property shall be deemed personalty from the time of testator's death, does not affect the title of a trustee to whom land is so devised, so as to prevent an action by him to quiet title to the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by A. V. Fatjo against G. A. Swasey to quiet title to land. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. A. Swasey and Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. Van Ness & Redman, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. L. H. Bascom died, February 22, 1881, in Santa Clara county, leaving real and personal property therein, and also leaving a last will, in which he nominated his wife, Annie M. Bascom, and his son, Alpheus L. Bascom, as the executrix and executor thereof. The provisions of the will, so far as they need be noticed, are as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath to my said executors, all and singular, all my property, real, personal, and mixed, separate or common, wheresoever situated, including all moneys belonging to me, or of which I may die seised or possessed, in trust, nevertheless, and to and for the following purpose and benefits only, and not otherwise. To sell, all and singular, the estate and property above named, and which may come into their hands, or either of them, as such executors, as soon after my death as, in their judgment, may be most for the interest of my estate, and convert the same into cash, and such cash, together with all moneys belonging to said estate, shall be disposed of in the manner following, to wit, to be divided into eight shares, one share to go to each of my children, subject to the following conditions, such shares to be equal in amount: To my daughter, Henrianna B. Swasey, one share, which my said executors shall invest in such way as that she shall have the use and enjoyment of all the income thereof during her life, free from the control, interference, or hindrance of her husband, and on her death to vest in her children in fee. * * * I further provide that, in the event of the death of any of my said children, I leave the share of my estate to which he or she would have been entitled to his or her issue lawfully begotten, or, should any of my children die without such lawful issue, I direct my executors to invest such share for the benefit of the survivors and their children, in equal shares, on the same terms, trusts, and conditions as hereinbefore expressed, severally, as to such survivors."

In due time the said will was admitted to probate, and the persons named as executrix and executor thereof were appointed, and entered upon the discharge of their duties as such. Thereafter the estate was regularly administered upon and closed by a decree of distribution, whereby the property described in the complaint herein was distributed to said Annie M. and Alpheus L. Bascom, as trustees, pursuant to the provisions of said will. Henrianna B. Swasey had three children, all of whom had reached the age of majority, and, in September, 1885, they conveyed to their mother, by a deed duly executed, "all the real and personal estate, situate in the state of California or elsewhere," derived by them "through the last will and testament" of the said decedent. On December 1, 1887, Mrs. Swasey obtained a loan of $1,000 from one Tennyson, for which she gave him her promissory note and a mortgage on a part of the property described in the complaint to secure its payment. Immediately thereafter Tennyson assigned the said note and mortgage to the defendant, who had advanced, through Tennyson, the money so loaned. The said mortgage was duly recorded, but the assignment thereof was never recorded.

In February, 1889, Mrs. Swasey and others commenced an action for the partition of the land distributed to the trustees, alleging, in the complaint, that she had an estate of inheritance therein to the extent of one undivided one-sixth interest in the fee thereof, and also alleging that the trustees, Annie M. and Alpheus L. Bascom, had no interest in or right to the said land, or any part thereof. Said Tennyson was made a party to the action, and was served with summons, but suffered his default to be entered. It was alleged that he held a mortgage made by the plaintiff, Mrs. Swasey, "on her share of said premises, to secure a note for $625, dated March 17, 1887, and payable in two years, which said mortgage was recorded on the 24th day of March, 1887, in the recorder's office," etc. And the prayer of the complaint as to said Tennyson was that the mortgage given by Mrs. Swasey to him be declared to be a charge only on the share assigned to her. The case was tried, and on July 2, 1890, an interlocutory decree was entered, adjudging that Mrs. Swasey and the other beneficiaries of the trust had no vested or present interest in the land described in the complaint, except as such beneficiaries, and further, adjudging that four-sixths of the said land be partitioned to said Annie M. and Alpheus L. Bascom, trustees under said will. And by consent of all the parties a sole referee was appointed to make a partition of the premises in accordance with the decree. On July 18, 1890, an action was commenced by the beneficiaries of said trust to remove said trustees, and for the appointment of another trustee or trustees to act in their place and stead. In said action Annie M. Bascom tendered her resignation as trustee, which was accepted by the court, and thereafter, by the judgment and decree of the court, Alpheus L. Bascom was removed from his position as such trustee, and A. V. Fatjo, the plaintiff herein, was duly appointed as sole trustee of said estate, and was "authorized and empowered to discharge the duties arising from said trust, originally conferred by said decree of distribution upon said A. M. and A. L. Bascom." Thereupon said Fatjo duly qualified as such trustee under said appointment, and ever since has been "the duly authorized, qualified, and acting trustee of said estate of L. H. Bascom, deceased." On December 29, 1890, a final decree in the said partition suit was made and entered, whereby the premises described in the complaint in this action were awarded and set apart to said A. V. Fatjo, as trustee, "to hold the same in trust under said last will and testament of L. H. Bascom, deceased." In October, 1893, the defendant herein, G. A. Swasey, commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage given by Mrs. Swasey to Tennyson, and by the latter assigned to him. The plaintiff in this action was made a party defendant, but the court ordered the action dismissed as to him. The usual decree of foreclosure against Mrs. Swasey was duly entered therein, as prayed for, on January 5, 1894.

Thereafter, on January 10, 1894, the plaintiff commenced this action to quiet his title to the premises partitioned to him, as trustee, and it was held, as in the partition suit, that Mrs. Swasey had no interest in the land, and that the defendant, as her mortgagee, had acquired no lien under the mortgage or the decree of foreclosure which he could assert against the plaintiff's title. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant has appealed on a bill of exceptions.

1. One of the points urged for a reversal is that finding 6, made by the court below, in regard to the partition suit and the judgment rendered therein, was defective, and not supported by the evidence. This point cannot be considered, for the reason—First, that the bill of exceptions contains no specifications of the particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient to justify any of the findings; and, second, an exception to the decision, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 939. Here it appears that the judgment was rendered December 8, 1894, and the appeal was taken February 8, 1895, more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. The claim that the appeal was taken within 56 days after notice of the rendition of the judgment was served cannot be availed of. The rule invoked applies only to the time for giving notice of a motion for a new trial.

2. The validity of the trust created by the will is not questioned, but it is contended that the court had no power to substitute the plaintiff in the place of the original trustees, because the discretionary power granted to them "was born of a particular confidential relationship between the testator and those chosen as trustees," and no such relationship existed between the testator and the plaintiff. It is said: "A discretionary power cannot be delegated. A trust cannot be delegated to a person not contemplated in its original creation." And hence it is argued that, when the original trustees went out, the trust lapsed, and the title to the property vested in the beneficiaries. This position cannot be sustained. Every trust naturally implies a confidential relationship between the truster and the trustee, and yet no rule is better settled than that "courts of equity have inherent jurisdiction over all matters of trust and trustees, and they never allow a trust to fail for want of a trustee." Perry, Trusts, § 240. And the rule is declared in our Civil Code as follows: Section 2283: "The superior court may remove any trustee who has violated or is unfit to execute the trust, or may accept the resignation of a trustee." Section 2289: "When a trust exists without any appointed trustee, or where all the trustees renounce, die or are discharged, the superior court of the county where the trust property, or some portion thereof, is situated must appoint another trustee, and direct the execution of the trust. The court may in its discretion appoint the original number, or any less number of trustees." Under these provisions, and in a proper proceeding, it appears that the court accepted the resignation of one of the original trustees and removed the other, and then appointed the plaintiff as their successor, and conferred upon him "all discretionary powers mentioned in said will, and therein or otherwise conferred upon said original trustees." There can be no question that the action of the court in this respect was authorized, and that the new appointee, when he accepted the place, succeeded to all the rights, duties, and responsibilities of his predecessors.

It is further contended that the trustees had never sold the property or any part thereof, and that their failure to do so operated to destroy the trust and vest the title in the beneficiaries. But this cannot be so. The will provided that the property should be sold as soon after the testator's death as, in the judgment of the trustees, might be most for the interest of the estate. The trustees, then, were to exercise their own judgment as to when the sale should be made, and, if they erred in this regard, the only remedy was an application to the court for an order directing them to proceed and execute the trust, or for their removal.

3. The next question is, did Mrs. Swasey have any mortgageable interest in the trust property? Appellant contends that she had, and that the finding of the court to the contrary was not justified by the evidence and was erroneous. Section 863 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "Except as hereinafter otherwise provided, every express trust in real property, valid as such in its creation, vests the whole estate in the trustees, subject only to the execution of the trust. The beneficiaries take no estate or interest in the property, but may enforce the performance of the trust." It is claimed by appellant that this section is in conflict with section 867 of the same Code, as amended in 1874, and that, to the extent of the conflict, the former was repealed by the amendment of the latter. As originally passed, section 867 read as follows: "The beneficiary of a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of real property cannot transfer, or in any manner dispose of, his interest in such trust." And as amended it reads: "The beneficiary of a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of real property, or for the payment of an annuity out of such rents and profits, may be restrained from disposing of his interest in such trust during his life, or for a term of years, by the instrument creating the trust." The contention is that the last-named section, as it now reads, "grants to the beneficiary a present estate and alienable interest in the property, unless restrained from alienation by the testator." We see no irreconcilable conflict between the two sections. The first relates to the trust property, and declares that the beneficiary takes no estate or interest therein. The last relates to the rents and profits of the trust property, which the beneficiary is entitled to receive, and which were recognized by the section, as originally passed and as amended, as an interest in the trust. Up to the time of the amendment, this interest in the rents and profits could not be transferred, but now it may be unless restrained by the instrument creating the trust. It follows, if Mrs. Swasey had no estate or interest in the real property, that her children had none which they could convey to her. Whether she had and has an interest in the income to be received and enjoyed by her during her life, which could be assigned or levied upon under execution, is a question which does not arise here and upon which we express no opinion.

4. It is claimed that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action to quiet his title to the real property because section 1338 of the Civil Code provides that, "when a will directs the conversion of real property into money, such property and all its proceeds must be deemed personal property from the time of the testator's death." A sufficient answer to this claim is that the devisee of real property subject to a trust acquires a legal estate in the property (sections 863 and 864, Civ. Code), and the law has always been "that the direction in wills to convert land into money, or money into land, is for the benefit of those for whose use the conversion is intended to be made, and that, as to them, it is deemed to have been made from the death of the testator." Estep v. Armstrong, 91 Cal. 659, 27 Pac. 1091. Such a direction, however, does not affect the title to or character of the property, so far as the legatees or heirs are concerned.

It is unnecessary to consider the other questions discussed by counsel. We conclude that the trust was valid in its creation, and that the title to the property, subject only to the execution of the trust, vested in the original trustees, and is now vested in the plaintiff, and that Mrs. Swasey had no mortgageable interest in the property, and the defendant acquired no lien thereon by the execution of his mortgage or the foreclosure thereof. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

O'CONNOR v. WITHERBY. (L. A. 13.)[1]

NATIONAL BANKS—INSOLVENCY—ACTION TO ENFORCE ASSESSMENT — PLEADING — STOCKHOLDERS.

1. The allegation of the complaint, in an action for an assessment on shareholders in a bank, that "defendant, though demanded, has failed and refused to pay said assessment, or any part thereof," is a sufficient averment, as against a general demurrer, of nonpayment at the time action was commenced.

2. The complaint, in an action by the receiver of an insolvent national bank to enforce an assessment on the shareholders, made by the comptroller of the treasury, need not aver that there was a necessity therefor, or that the comptroller determined that there was such necessity, though the law provides that the comptroller may enforce the individual liability of the stockholders, if necessary to pay the debts of the bank. It is enough that the complaint alleges that the comptroller made the assessment and directed its enforcement.

3. In such an action, the necessity of the comptroller's making so large an assessment cannot be litigated.

4. As against creditors of a bank, one cannot allege that he was not the owner of stock therein, the certificate therefor standing in his name, and he being a director and vice president of the bank, and the certificate having been indorsed by him in his own name.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Andrew J. O'Connor, receiver, against O. S. Witherby. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. Parker, W. T. McNeally, and Trippet, Boone & Neale, for appellant. V. E. Shaw and E. W. Britt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The Consolidated National Bank, organized under the laws of congress, failed on June 21, 1893, and on June 23, 1893, the United States comptroller of the currency appointed the plaintiff herein, O'Connor, receiver of said bank. On October 25, 1893, the said comptroller made an assessment for $250,000, equally and ratably upon the shareholders, to the amount of 100 per cent. of the par value of the shares of the capital stock of said bank, and on November 25, 1893, he made an order directing the plaintiff, as such receiver, to institute suit to enforce against each shareholder his personal liability under such assessment, and under that order this action was brought. It is averred, in the complaint, that, at the time of the failure of said bank, defendant, Witherby, was a shareholder to the amount of 100 shares, represented by certificate No. 211 for 25 shares, and by certificate No. 212 for 75 shares. Defendant denied the ownership of said shares. There was a jury impaneled in the case, but, at the close of the evidence, the court instructed the jury to find a verdict for plaintiff, which was done, and judgment was accordingly rendered for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. We have given due consideration to the able and elaborate briefs of respective counsel, but in stating our conclusions we do not deem it necessary to discuss the points made at any great length. The main contentions of appellant are that the complaint is insufficient, and that the court erred in instructing the jury to find for plaintiff.

1. The contention that the complaint does not contain a sufficient averment of nonpayment cannot be maintained. It is averred that "the defendant, though demanded, has failed and refused to pay said assessment or any part thereof"; and this is a sufficient averment of nonpayment at the time of the commencement of the action. There was only a general demurrer. The law provides that the comptroller may enforce the individual liability of the stockholders if necessary to pay the debts of the bank; and the main contention of appellant, as to the insufficiency of the complaint, is that it does not aver such necessity, nor that the comptroller determined that there was such necessity. Appellant relies, mainly, on Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. 498, to support this contention. But, in that case, the complaint showed that the receiver had brought the action of his own motion, without any order of the comptroller to do so, and without any action of the comptroller towards enforcing the individual liability of stockholders; while the court held that the receiver was the mere instrument and creature of the comptroller, and that the latter must decide when it is necessary to institute proceedings against the stockholders, and for what amount. And it is as to this general action of the comptroller that the court say: "The fact must be distinctly averred in all such cases." But an averment that the comptroller made the assessment, and directed the action to be brought, is a sufficient averment,—as against a general demurrer, at least,—that he had determined the necessity of such action. This was expressly decided by Justice Shiras in Welles v. Stout, 38 Fed. 67, where the complaint was like the one in the case at bar. He refers to Kennedy v. Gibson, supra, and says: "Certainly the comptroller would not have made this assessment unless he had decided that it was necessary to enforce the personal liability of the stockholders. The evidence that he had reached the conclusion that it was necessary to resort to the liability of the stockholders is found in the fact averred,—that he made this assessment and ordered it paid." The contention of the appellant that the complaint is insufficient in this respect cannot, therefore, be maintained.

The point made by appellant that the court erred in striking out part of his answer is not tenable. The part stricken out was an averment that the comptroller, in making the assessment, acted without due information of the assets and liabilities of the bank; that such assets, independent of the liability of the stockholders, were sufficient to pay all the liabilities except $125,000; and that a levy of 50 per cent. upon the capital stock would have been sufficient. This averment constituted no defense. The action of the comptroller "cannot be controverted in a suit against a stockholder. It is conclusive upon him, and makes it his duty to pay." Casey v. Galli, 94 U. S. 681. See, also, Kennedy v. Gibson, supra, and Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628. In Kennedy v. Gibson the court say: "It would be attended with injurious consequences to forbid action against stockholders until the precise amount necessary to be collected shall be formally ascertained. * * * If too much be collected, it is provided by the statute that any surplus which may remain after satisfying all demands against the association shall be paid to the stockholders." The owner of stock in a national bank holds it in view of, and subject to, the provision of the law under which the bank is organized.

2. We do not think that the judgment should be reversed because the court instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff. Of course, such an instruction could not be upheld where there was conflicting evidence as to material facts, which the jury had the right to pass on; but, where there is no substantial conflict of evidence as to the facts determinative of the case, or such facts are admitted, there the judgment will not be reversed for such an instruction, although the practice is hazardous, and can be sanctioned only in the clearest cases. In the case at bar the 100 shares in question were originally represented by certificate No. 94, held by Mrs. Howard, wife of Bryant Howard, president of said bank. The evidence shows that this stock was transferred to the appellant on June 30, 1891. Appellant contends that there was a conflict of evidence on this point. We do not see anything in the record as to this matter which could properly be called a conflict; but, if there was, it was immaterial. As between the bank, or its creditors, and the appellant, there was no actual legal transfer of the stock until July 2, 1892; and whatever occurred, or did not occur, before that time, between appellant and Mrs. Howard, is of no importance in this case. The certificates remained in the name of Mrs. Howard, and appellant had no right to represent them. But, on July 2, 1892, the actual transfer was made on the books of the bank, when certificate No. 94 was surrendered, and the two new certificates, Nos. 211 and 212, in lieu thereof, were issued to the appellant, regularly signed by the president and cashier, and corresponding entries made on the books of the bank. This was nearly a year before the suspension of the bank, down to which time the certificates remained in appellant's name, and no other transfer of them was made. There was no conflict of evidence as to these facts. Appellant contends, and testified, that he did not know that these certificates had been issued to him, and had not authorized them to be issued. Of course, a man cannot be made liable to the creditors of a bank merely because, without his knowledge, and under circumstances which did not put him on inquiry, some one had, without authority, caused some stock to be issued in his name. But in the case at bar, in the first place, appellant, during all of the time of these transactions, was a stockholder, a director, and vice president of the bank, attended directors' meetings, and gave advice as to the bank's business, and certainly ought to have known his relations to it. He held himself out as sustaining the bank and indorsing its solvency. And, in the second place, he indorsed these very two certificates with his name in his own handwriting; and this is conclusive proof, by his own admission, that he knew, or ought to have known, that they had been issued to him. He was one of the persons to whom the creditors of the bank had the right to look for the purpose of giving it credit; and he has shown nothing which enables him to escape from that position. See Irons v. Bank, 27 Fed. 591; Keyser v. Hitz, 133 U. S. 147-149, 10 Sup. Ct. 290; Finn v. Brown, 142 U. S. 56, 12 Sup. Ct. 136.

The real alleged grievance of appellant is that he was deceived and defrauded by Bryant Howard. Howard was his trustee of a large amount of property, his attorney in fact, and his confidential agent to manage his business. While appellant does not deny that the indorsements on the certificates are in his own handwriting, he says that he trusted Howard implicitly, and signed all the papers which the latter presented to him, that he did not know what the certificates were when he indorsed them, and that Howard procured him to indorse them for a fraudulent purpose. Whether this be the true state of facts, or whether appellant takes this position for the purpose of repudiating the ownership of property which, in 1892, was supposed to be valuable, but which a year afterwards was a good deal worse than worthless, is a question between plaintiff and Howard. As to the creditors of the bank, appellant was the owner of the stock. With secret transactions between him and Howard they are not concerned. In Keyser v. Hitz, supra, the court said: "There was no connection between her liability to be assessed and the alleged fraudulent intent with which her husband caused the transfers of stock to be made." In the case at bar, it is unimportant how much of the time the certificates were in the possession of Howard, for he was appellant's private agent and trustee, with power to deal for appellant in the purchase and sale of stocks.

Under the foregoing views, we see no disputed material facts for the jury to pass on, and therefore we see no warrant for reversing the judgment on account of the said instruction complained of. And, under these views, the numerous exceptions taken by appellant to rulings of the court on the admissibility of evidence, refusals to give certain instructions asked, etc., are immaterial, and need not be specially noticed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

ERTLE v. PLACER COUNTY et al.

(Sac. 69.)

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT — AMOUNT INVOLVED.

The supreme court has no jurisdiction of an appeal from an order, made after final judgment, refusing to strike out plaintiff's cost bill, which amounts to less than $300.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by John Ertle against Placer county and others. From an order made after final judgment, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

L. L. Chamberlain and F. P. Tuttle, for appellants. Ben. P. Tabor and John M. Fulweiler, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court, made after final judgment, denying defendants' motion to strike out plaintiff's cost bill, amounting to only $65.45. The only ground of the motion was that the memorandum of the items of costs, though properly verified and filed with the clerk, was not served on the defendants within the time prescribed by section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As the whole amount of costs claimed by plaintiff was less than $300, this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal. Fairbanks v. Lampkin, 99 Cal. 429, 34 Pac. 101. Therefore the appeal is dismissed.

THOMPSON v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF ALAMEDA COUNTY. (S. F. 277.)[1]

STATUTES—TITLES OF ACTS—REPEAL.

1. St. 1893, p. 288, entitled "An act providing for the sale of railroad and other franchises in municipalities, and relative to granting of franchises," provides that every franchise to erect telegraph or telephone wires, to construct railroads on public streets, or to exercise any other privilege granted by the governing body of any county, city and county, city, town, or district, shall be granted under the conditions of the act. It prescribes the character of notice to be given for the sale, and provides that the franchise must be awarded to the highest bidder. Held, that such act does not violate Const. art. 4, § 24, declaring, "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title."

2. St. 1893, p. 288, relating to sale of franchises by municipal corporations, was not repealed by County Government Act, § 25, subd. 40, giving the board of supervisors power to grant franchises over "highways for all lawful purposes, on such terms and conditions and restrictions as in their judgment may be necessary and proper," which took effect the day after taking effect of St. 1893, p. 288.

3. St. 1893, p. 288, providing for the sale of railroad and other franchises in municipalities, and relating to the granting of franchises for telephones, telegraphs, and railroads on highways, provides that they "must be awarded to the highest bidder." Held, that such statute requires the franchise to be sold for cash, and that an offer to pay percentage of the gross receipts, or to do or provide any other thing, in consideration of such franchise, cannot be considered.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Petition by Arthur D. Thompson for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors of Alameda county to accept the bid of petitioner, and to declare him the highest bidder at the sale of the franchise for an electric railroad on certain highways of the county. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

S. B. McKee, for appellant. Chas. E. Snook, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is a proceeding by mandate to compel the board of supervisors of Alameda county to accept the bid or tender of one Thompson, the petitioner, and to declare him the highest bidder at the sale of a franchise for an electric railroad upon a certain defined route over the highways of that county. The proceedings of the board of supervisors leading up to the sale of this franchise were taken under a recent act of the legislature found in the Statutes of 1893, at page 288. That statute is entitled "An act providing for the sale of railroad and other franchises in municipalities, and relative to granting of franchises," and provides: "Every franchise or privilege to erect or lay telegraph or telephone wires, to construct or operate railroads along or upon any public street or highway, or to exercise any other privilege whatever, hereafter proposed to be granted by the board of supervisors, common council, or other governing or legislative body of any county, city and county, city, town or district within this state, shall be granted upon the conditions in this act provided, and not otherwise." The act then prescribes the character of notice to be given for the sale, the time of the publication thereof, and fixes the day when tenders will be received for such franchise or privilege. The concluding clause of the section is: "The franchise or privileges must then be awarded to the highest bidder."

It is urged by respondents that the act is unconstitutional, as being violative of section 24, art. 4, of the constitution of this state, which declares: "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title." The alleged violation is claimed to consist in this: that the title refers to sales of franchises by municipalities only, while the body of the act attempts to deal also with franchises issued by counties at the hands of their respective boards of supervisors. We have no doubt but that the word "municipalities," as used in the title of the act, is not broad enough to include counties; but the title proceeds further, and uses the very general language, "and relative to the granting of franchises." These words are broad, not limited in terms to municipalities, and appear, by a fair and reasonable construction, to cover all the legislation found in the body of the act.

The act went into effect March 23, 1893, and it is insisted that it was repealed by subdivision 40 of section 25 of the county government act, which went into effect upon the following day. That section declares the general permanent powers of boards of supervisors, and subdivision 40 thereof gives the board power "to grant franchises along and over the public roads and highways for all lawful purposes, upon such terms and conditions and restrictions as in their judgment may be necessary and proper, and in such manner as to present the least possible obstruction and inconvenience to the traveling public." The law looks with disfavor upon repeals by implication, and we see no such inconsistency in these two provisions as to call for a determination by this court that the earlier provision was repealed by the later. We think full force and effect may be given to both. The franchise may be sold to the highest bidder, and still the terms, conditions, and restrictions upon which the franchise will be granted may be fixed by the board of supervisors under its general permanent powers. We conclude there is no repeal of that portion of the statute here involved by subdivision 40 of section 25 of the county government act.

We pass to a consideration of the tenders or bids made for the franchise. There are various matters discussed by counsel pertaining to this question, but, weighing the case from the angle at which we view it, the consideration of a single one disposes of this litigation. The act declares that the franchise must be awarded by the board of supervisors to the highest bidder, and, in order that petitioner may be entitled to the writ asked for, he must show himself to be such bidder. There were but two tenders or bids presented upon the day fixed for the sale. Vandercook, the successful buyer, made a bid to the following effect: He offered $25 cash, and also agreed "to pay all of the expenses of advertising in connection with the said matters, and also agreed to erect and maintain clusters of five incandescent lamps each, or their equivalent, at twenty different places along the route described, at such locations as the board might direct, and also agreed to furnish said county power sufficient to run a ten horse power motor at the county infirmary in Alameda county, when and during the time the railroad is in operation, and further agreed to pay to the county of Alameda one-fourth of one per cent. of the gross receipts of the said railroad after the first five years of operation." The petitioner, Thompson, made a bid offering to give the county 2 per cent. of the gross receipts after the road had been completed five years. The board refused to accept his bid, whereupon he then and there made another bid, substantially duplicating Vandercook's bid, except as to the percentage of the gross receipts, and offered 2 per cent. of the gross receipts as aforesaid. Respondent insists that there are material differences in these two bids in other respects, but for present purposes we may assume them to be duplicates in the conditions and terms stated.

The only legally substantial thing we find in petitioner's bid is the offer of $25 cash. When the law says a franchise must be sold to the highest bidder, without stating other terms or conditions of sale, it means sold for cash. It does not contemplate that it may be bartered away for meats and produce to feed the inmates of the county infirmary, or traded off for horses to be used in the fire department of the municipality. The moment you give a construction to the law by which the officers selling may accept a consideration for the franchise in any other commodity than money, the whole purpose and object of the act becomes a nullity, for then a discretion is vested in such officers which, most probably, is not subject to review; and values of personal property to be received, or services to be rendered in return for privileges and franchises dealt out, may assume magnified proportions, in the eyes of the municipal or county officers conducting the sale, entirely unjustified by the actual facts. If such things were allowed, the law would be a failure, and utterly inadequate to meet the purposes for which it was enacted. It would thus seem that petitioner's offer to furnish power for the county infirmary, and erect clusters of electric lamps at 20 different points upon the road, cannot be considered; for the officers intrusted with this sale had no more right to accept such properties and benefits in consideration of the franchise than they had to accept horses, cattle, or sheep.

We are also clear in holding that an agreement to pay a percentage of the gross receipts of the road, after completion and when in operation, cannot be received as a legal bid or tender under this act. As already suggested, when a statute provides that property shall be sold to the highest bidder, in the absence of anything in the statute to the contrary, it must be held to mean "to the highest bidder for cash." The gross receipts of a prospective electric road may be little, and they may be much. The sum total of its annual receipts is a most indefinite and uncertain quantity. Such amount is elusive, and dependent upon many conditions. The franchise may be bought, and the road put in operation for the single purpose of shutting off competition with other roads, and with no intention of making its gross receipts anything but merely nominal; and, under such circumstances, the bidder might well offer 10, 20, or 30 per cent. of its gross receipts for the franchise. Parties desiring to purchase in good faith, for the purpose of operating a competing line, could not afford to make any such bid. At the same time a bid from them of 2 per cent. of the gross receipts might bring more money to the county or municipal treasury than the higher offer from the other parties. These suggestions show how unsatisfactory and indefinite sales of franchises and privileges based upon a percentage of gross receipts would be. But, beyond all such reasons, the statute contemplates a cash sale, and a percentage of gross receipts is in no sense cash.

For the foregoing reasons, we are justified in holding that petitioner has not shown himself to be the highest bidder, and his application for a writ of mandate was properly denied. It becomes unnecessary to discuss the legal appropriateness of the remedy of mandate, in view of what has been said. The judgment is affirmed.

HENSLEY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY. (S. F. 423.)

DECEDENTS' ESTATES — ORDER FOR NOTICE TO CREDITORS—SUFFICIENCY—MANDAMUS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1490, requiring notice to creditors of a decedent to file claims to be published "as often as the judge or court shall direct, but not less than once a week for four weeks," the order for notice need not specify the times of publication, unless a greater than the minimum number is required.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1492, provides that, when the notice to creditors to file claims has been duly made, an order showing that due notice has been given, and directing it to be entered and recorded, "must be made by the court." Held, that mandamus will lie to compel the court to make such order.

In bank. Petition by the executrix of the estate of Calvin P. Hensley against the superior court of Sacramento county for writ of mandamus to compel defendant to enter an order of due notice to creditors. Granted.

Stewins & Elliot, for petitioner. Albert M. Johnson and Hiram W. Johnson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The superior court refused to make or enter an order or decree of due notice to creditors in the estate of one Calvin P. Hensley, deceased, pending therein, notwithstanding it appeared that an order had been theretofore made therein directing "that notice to the creditors be given in the Daily Record Union"; and that under said order a notice, proper in form, had been duly published in the designated paper once a week for a period of four successive weeks. Petitioner, the executrix of said estate, seeks mandate here to compel the making and entry of such decree. It appears that the judge of the superior court refused to make the order for the reason that he construed section 1490 of the Code of Civil Procedure[1] to require that in all instances the order for notice to creditors must specify the number of times the notice shall be published, and that as the order, the substantive part of which is above set out, did not so specify, it was held void, and the notice given under it, for that reason, of no effect. We regard this view of the statute as erroneous. While not wholly free from ambiguity, we think it sufficiently clear that the meaning of section 1490 is that only in those instances where the court, in its discretion, by reason of the circumstances, deems it proper to require a more extended publication than the minimum required by the statute, is it necessary to specify the time of publication in the order. In all other instances the order may be silent in that respect, and when it is so a publication of proper notice thereunder, as in this instance, not less than the minimum number of times required by the section, is a compliance with the law, and constitutes legal notice to the creditors. What is said in Wise v. Williams, 88 Cal. 30, 25 Pac. 1064, suggesting a different construction of the section, was not pertinent to the question then before the court, and is therefore obiter; the fact in that case being that the notice was published without any order having been made, and no question as to the requirements of such an order arose. The construction here given accords with the practical construction very generally given the act by the bench and bar alike throughout the state for a great many years, and, even if its correctness were less obvious, should manifestly, on considerations of public policy, be adhered to, in order to avoid the disturbance in titles to real estate passing through the probate court during such period, which would otherwise follow. We think, therefore, that the order of publication in this instance was sufficient, and that, upon the showing made, it was the duty of respondent to make the order applied for.

Nor is there any doubt that mandamus will lie in such a case. Section 1492, Code Civ. Proc., provides that when notice to creditors has been given as provided in the previous sections, and due proof thereof is made, "an order or decree showing that due notice to creditors has been given, and directing that such order or decree be entered in the minutes and recorded, must be made by the court." Where, as here, the law affixes a right to specific relief from certain facts, and there is no question made as to the existence of such facts, the court has no discretion to refuse the relief. In such a case the limit of the discretionary power of the court has been reached, and nothing but a clear duty remains; and if the relief is refused, and there is, as in this instance, no appeal, or other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, mandamus will lie to compel it. Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766; Keller v. Hewitt (Cal.) 41 Pac. 871; Johnston v. Superior Court, 105 Cal. 666, 39 Pac. 36. Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

SUMMERLAND, Assessor, v. BICKNELL, County Auditor. (S. F. 166.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — LOCAL ACTS — COMPENSATION OF COUNTY OFFICER.

The proviso to section 216 of the amended county government act (St. 1895, pp. 1–11), that the percentage on poll and personal property taxes, which the assessor, in other counties, is allowed to retain as compensation, shall not be retained by the assessor in counties of the second class, is not repugnant to Const. art. 1, § 11, providing that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation," nor to article 4, § 25, prohibiting the enactment of any local or special law "affecting the fees or salary of any officer." The fact that there is but one county of the second class is immaterial.

[1] Code Civ. Proc. § 1490, requires notice to creditors of a decedent to be published "as often as the judge or court shall direct, but not less than once a week for four weeks."

In bank. Petition by Theodore Summerland, as assessor of Los Angeles county, for a writ of mandamus to Charles F. Bicknell, as county auditor of said county. Denied.

R. B. Carpenter, for petitioner. C. H. McFarland and J. A. Donnell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is a petition by the plaintiff, as assessor of Los Angeles county, for a writ of mandamus to the defendant, as auditor of said county, directing the latter to audit the accounts of the former, and to allow him 15 per cent. on all state and road poll taxes, and 6 per cent. on all personal property taxes collected by said assessor.

Various sections of the Political Code and of the county government act are cited by counsel in their briefs; but, in determining the question here presented, it is only necessary to consider sections 162 and 216 of the county government act, as amended by the act of January 25, 1895,—to be found on pages 1–11 of the Statutes of 1895. By said section 162 the several counties of the state are classified according to their population "for the purpose of regulating the compensation of all officers," and by that classification Los Angeles is in the second class, and at present is the only county in that class. Section 216 provides that the salaries and fees mentioned in the act shall be in full for all services rendered by officers and their deputies and assistants, and that the principals must pay their own deputies, except as otherwise provided in the act, but that the assessor shall receive and retain for his own use 6 per cent. on all personal property taxes collected by him, and 15 per cent. on all state and road poll taxes, and also $5 for every 100 names of persons returned by him as subject to military duty. Then follows the proviso out of which this litigation arises, and it is as follows: "Provided, however, that in counties of the second class the percentage received by the assessor on poll taxes and personal property taxes, and also amounts allowed for returning names of persons subject to military duty, and which in counties of the other classes is allowed to the assessor as compensation, shall be paid by him into the county treasury, and no part thereof shall be retained by him as compensation, and all expenses in collecting the same shall be paid by the county."

It is contended by plaintiff that the proviso last above quoted is unconstitutional and invalid, and that, therefore, it should be disregarded, and the other parts of the section held applicable to the assessor of Los Angeles county as well as to all other assessors. It is contended that said proviso violates section 25 of article 4 of the constitution, which provides that the legislature shall not pass "local or special" laws "for the assessment or collection of taxes," "affecting the fees or salary of any officer," "in all other cases when a general law can be made applicable"; also, that it is repugnant to section 11 of article 1, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation"; and to section 5 of article 11, which provides that the legislature shall regulate the compensation of public officers in proportion to duties. We do not think that the contention can be maintained as to either of the constitutional provisions invoked. When such a classification of counties as the constitution warrants has been made by the legislature, a statutory provision which applies equally to all the counties of that class is neither local, special, nor wanting in uniformity. And by section 5, art. 11, it is expressly provided that the legislature "shall regulate the compensation of all such [county] officers in proportion to duties, and for this purpose may classify the counties by population." Such was the classification and regulation provided for in sections 162 and 216 of the county government act. In Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. 1081, this court in bank said, by Mr. Justice Garoutte: "A law applicable to all counties of a class as made or authorized by the constitution is neither a local nor special law. If it applies to all the counties of a class authorized by the constitution to be made, it is a general law; and whether there may be few or many counties to which its provisions will apply is a matter of no consequence." That case arose out of the county government act, and involved the power of the legislature to classify counties for the purpose of regulating compensation of officers, and the court further said: "There can be no question as to its being uniform in its operation. It acts upon all counties and all officers of counties of the twenty-fifth class." See, also, People v Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. 413, and Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66. And the fact that there is only one county in a particular class makes no difference. It is not the province of a court to determine how many classes are necessary. "The proper determination of that question of necessity depends upon a variety of considerations, which are for the legislature and not for the courts." Longan v. County of Solano, 65 Cal. 125, 3 Pac. 463. See, also, Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 225, 33 Pac. 66.

Whether or not the provision of section 216 in question works a hardship to the plaintiff is not a legitimate question here. He gets, as assessor, a salary of $3,800 per annum, and the section provides that "all expenses in collecting the same [said taxes] shall be paid by the county," and it is averred in the answer that all such expenses were paid by the county. Appellant says that the provision that the county shall pay such expenses is unconstitutional. That question is not before us, although we may properly say that whether or not the legislature can provide for the payment of the actual expenses of collecting such taxes, the amount to be ascertained as in the case of other demands, is at least an open question. But, under any view, the only question in the premises would be whether or not the provision as to compensation is a wise and proper law, and that question must be answered by the legislature, not by the courts. The prayer of the plaintiff is denied and the petition dismissed.

PEOPLE v. ST. CLAIR. (Cr. 91.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE.

A conviction of larceny of a horse and cart will not, after denial of a new trial, be disturbed, where there was evidence that the property was stolen; that defendant, when seen, shortly afterwards, traveling away with it from the scene of the larceny, tried to evade identification, and when arrested with the property, a few hours afterwards, 23 miles away, made false statements in explanation of his possession.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Frank St. Clair was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Swinnerton and A. V. Scanlon, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was convicted of grand larceny, and now appeals, insisting that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The jury passed upon its sufficiency, and the trial court also did, when it denied a motion for a new trial. Under these circumstances, this court will not hold the evidence insufficient to support the verdict, unless defendant's guilt has no support therein. In this case a larceny of a horse and cart was committed. A short time thereafter the defendant was seen in possession of the property, traveling rapidly away from the scene of the larceny. At this time, when seen, he acted suspiciously, as though trying to evade identification. A few hours thereafter he was arrested 23 miles from the scene of the larceny, still traveling in an opposite direction, with the property in his possession. When arrested he made false statements in explanation of his possession. Upon this state of facts, we will not disturb the verdict of the jury. Judgment and order affirmed.

EPPINGER et al. v. KENDRICK. (Sac. 46.)[1]

PLEADING — ANSWER — DUPLICITY — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY—INCONSISTENT DEFENSES—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In an action on a note against one as surety, defendant denied the suretyship, and alleged that he joined in the execution for the accommodation of plaintiff, and that, if he were liable as surety, the principal maker had put in plaintiff's hands sufficient wheat to pay the note, and directed that the proceeds thereof be applied thereon, and that plaintiff did not so apply them. Held that, though the defenses were not separately pleaded, the answer was sufficient, when questioned, for the first time, on motion to exclude evidence offered thereunder.

2. In an action on a note, on the issue as to whether defendant signed the note for the accommodation of the maker or for the accommodation of plaintiff, the payee, to enable him to use it as collateral, the testimony of defendant and the agent who acted for plaintiff in securing defendant's signature was directly contradictory. There was evidence of subsequent circumstances which, on their face, appeared contradictory of defendant's claim, but, as explained by him, did not discredit his testimony. Held, that a verdict for defendant would not be disturbed.

3. Where inconsistent defenses are pleaded, neither can be used as an admission to destroy the other.

4. Where, in an action on a note, defendant claims that he signed the note merely for the accommodation of plaintiff, to enable him to use it as collateral, and has already testified as to the circumstances of the transaction, as claimed by him, it is not prejudicial to plaintiff to permit defendant to be asked as to what was his understanding as to the purpose of his signature.

5. Where there is no evidence to show any consideration for a note, other than the circumstances disclosed in the statement of counsel, preceding a question asked by him as to whether there was any other consideration, permitting such question to be asked is not prejudicial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county; S. Millington, Judge.

Action by Eppinger & Co. against J. K. Kendrick and another. From a judgment for defendant Kendrick, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Geis & Kelly, for appellants. Hurst & Hurst and C. L. Donohoe, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought against M. P. Farnham and J. Kendrick upon two promissory notes, each dated August 19, 1891, payable one day after date, one for $2,000 and the other for $800, to the order of Eppinger & Co., upon which there was claimed to remain unpaid $1,119.04 and interest. Farnham, having been adjudged an insolvent debtor, did not answer, and the action proceeded against Kendrick alone, whose answer consisted of a general denial and a special defense, in which it was alleged that on September 12, 1887, Farnham was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of about $6,000, and, at the request of Oscar C. Schultz, manager and agent for said plaintiffs in their mercantile business at Germantown, he executed, with Farnham, a promissory note for $2,000, payable to the order of the plaintiffs one day after date, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month; that he executed the same upon the representation of said Schultz that plaintiffs needed money, that Farnham's note was not good as collateral security, and that his (Kendrick's) name would be used for no other purpose than to make the note good as collateral security at the bank; and that the notes in suit were given in renewal thereof, that he did not execute any of the notes at the request of Farnham, and that, as to him, they were without consideration. It was also alleged that, in 1890, Farnham delivered to plaintiffs a quantity of wheat sufficient to have paid said note, with the request that it should be applied thereon, but that Schultz said that he wanted to use the note longer, and he would see Kendrick, and obtain his consent, but did not do so; that he received no consideration for the execution of any of the notes; and that Farnham did not request him to execute them. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and this appeal is from the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial.

Plaintiffs' motion for judgment on the pleadings was properly denied. Whether the general denial was sufficient to prevent judgment, in the absence of proof, need not be considered.

Plaintiff also objected to evidence under the special defense, upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The special defense, so called, really contains two special defenses: (1) That defendant was not Farnham's surety, but joined in the execution of the notes for the accommodation of the plaintiffs, to enable them to raise money upon them as collateral; and (2) that, if he were liable as surety, the principal maker had put in plaintiffs' hands sufficient wheat to pay them, and directed that the proceeds be applied upon the original note, and that they did not so apply it. These defenses should have been separately pleaded; but no objection was taken by motion to require them to be separately stated, nor by special demurrer for ambiguity or uncertainty. Though defectively pleaded, the answer stated a defense, and the objection to evidence upon that ground was properly overruled. So, too, the objection that the agency of Schultz for the plaintiffs is not sufficiently alleged cannot be sustained. The answer in that regard is sufficient, as against an objection to evidence, though defectively pleaded, whatever might have been held if it had been specially demurred to.

The question principally discussed by counsel goes to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The defendant testified that, at the time the original note was executed (September 12, 1887), Mr. Schultz came to him, and said the plaintiffs needed money, that Farnham was owing them, and that he wanted him to go on Farnham's note so that they could use it as collateral; that Farnham did not request it; that defendant declined to execute it, but Schultz appealed to him, reminding him that he had accommodated him in many ways, that as a friend he wanted him to sign it so he could use it as collateral, and he then agreed to do so; and that the notes in suit were renewals, without any new agreement or consideration. Mr. Schultz testified, in relation to the making of the original note, as follows: "Mr. Eppinger had been up and saw that the account was very large, and said the account had to be reduced, told me to go out and see Farnham, which I did, and told him what Mr. Eppinger said. Mr. Farnham said he could not pay at present, and stated he had consummated a transaction with Mr. Kendrick on a patent plow, and was willing that I have the royalty. I told him that wasn't satisfactory to my people at all. I then says, 'If Mr. Kendrick will sign your note with you for $2,000, you can secure Kendrick by allowing him to retain the royalty on the plows he is to manufacture, as security for the money.'" These statements of defendant and Schultz are materially conflicting; but appellants contend that the other evidence given by and on behalf of defendant renders defendant's statement as to the transaction so improbable that the court cannot consider it, and that therefore there is no material conflict. One of these items of evidence relates to the plow contract. Sometime prior to the making of said note, a contract was made between Farnham and Kendrick, by which Kendrick was to manufacture a patented plow for Farnham, under which Farnham was to receive a royalty of $10 for each plow sold; and, at the suggestion of Schultz, at the time the original note was made, an additional agreement was made by which Kendrick was to retain the royalty to the extent of $2,000, and pay the same to plaintiffs; and, if Farnham should otherwise pay the note, this latter agreement should be canceled. Schultz learned of the plow contract when he went to see Farnham, and that, we may reasonably suppose, led Schultz to make the effort to have Kendrick go upon Farnham's note. It should not be overlooked that Schultz nowhere denies that he, and not Farnham, requested Kendrick to go on the note; nor did he deny that he represented to Kendrick that he wanted his signature to enable him to use it as collateral with which to raise money; nor was Schultz's suggestion that Farnham should secure defendant by allowing him to retain and apply the royalty upon the note inconsistent with that purpose. Kendrick did not solicit security from Farnham, but this contract was made at Schultz's suggestion, and was written and retained by him, and the plaintiffs thereby obtained from Farnham whatever security the royalty afforded.

Appellants contend, however, that it is not reasonable that plaintiffs, if they desired to use the note as collateral, would have made it payable one day after date. But, on the other hand, it may be said that, if Kendrick's purpose was to secure the plaintiffs' claim against Farnham, it is equally improbable that he would have placed himself in a situation in which he was liable to be sued the second day thereafter, instead of stipulating for time to enable Farnham to pay. So far, therefore, as the evidence relates to the making of the original note, the evidence is sufficient to justify the jury in finding that defendant was an accommodation maker for the benefit of plaintiffs. The notes here in suit were given in renewal of the former note, the one for $2,000 representing the principal, and the one for $800 representing the interest. There does not appear to have been any new consideration, or any new agreement or understanding at the time they were executed; and defendant testified that they were to be used in place of the other note. The circumstances relied upon by plaintiffs to show that the notes were not executed by Kendrick, otherwise than as security for Farnham, occurred afterwards. There is credited on one of these notes, September 7, 1892, $714.32, and on the other, at the same date, $285.68, making, together, $1,000, and that payment was made by a check drawn by the Bank of Willows on the Bank of California to the order of Mr. Kendrick, and therefore appeared to have been made by him; but he testified that it was Farnham's money, and came from his wheat, and was represented by another check, which he took to the bank at Willows, and got its check on the Bank of California for it. According to the testimony of Mr. Kendrick, Schultz never demanded any payment from him until in July, 1892, and that that was the first time Schultz said or did anything showing that he held him personally liable, and that defendant then denied his liability; that Schultz then said, "You live right here by Mr. Farnham, and you can take a crop mortgage on his crop, and get your money from Farnham. We live down at Dixon, and we do not have the opportunity. Hochheimer & Co. will take what he has, and we cannot get it." Kendrick took a crop mortgage from Farnham, but the date of the mortgage I do not find. On June 6, 1893, Kendrick sold to plaintiffs 50 tons of wheat at $1.15 per hundred, to be delivered in July, the proceeds to apply on these notes, and this makes the amount of the only other credit upon the notes, amounting, together, to $1,156.73, credited on July 15, 1893. On July 4th, prior to this delivery, Kendrick wrote Schultz, in reply to some communication from him, as follows: "Dear Sir: I have just telegraphed you, 'I would with one proposition. See letter.' You said, when here, I could have all month. I mean I will ship immediately with this proposition: Those notes are to be taken up when I pay the $1,000 this month, and a new one made payable 1st of August, 1894. The note will be just as good, and if there is any crisis I will not be compelled to pay it until the time we agreed I could have when you were here." Mr. Kendrick wrote another letter two days later of similar import. The first of these letters was evidently written in reply to some communication from Schultz urging an immediate shipment of the wheat, which, under the contract, was to be shipped in "July." Mr. Kendrick explains what he did by saying he was informed by Schultz that his company was in a bad fix, and, he inferred, "were liable to go under"; that he did not want these notes outstanding; that he "wanted a note that could not touch them for a year," so he could get the wheat out of Farnham's crop, and that was why the letters were written; that he was afraid the company might break up, leaving the notes in the hands of others. That there were grounds for this fear appears from Schultz's letter to him of July 18, 1893, in which he said: "During this awful stringency of money, every available thing was sent to the city, so that it may be some few days before I can get your old note." I fail to find, in any of the transactions subsequent to the making of these renewals, any conclusive evidence affecting the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant as to the circumstances and representations attending the original transaction. Upon the face of some of these subsequent transactions, they would appear to be inconsistent with defendant's claim; but, as explained by him, they do not so affect his testimony as to remove the conflict conceded to exist between the testimony of Schultz and Kendrick as to the original transaction. Besides, defendant was corroborated to a greater or less extent by Farnham and some other witnesses. Upon this branch of the case we cannot say that the jury were not justified in finding for defendant.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider whether the plaintiffs were bound to apply the proceeds of the wheat delivered to them by Farnham in 1889 upon the old note, nor whether the answer of defendant was such as to make that claim available as a defense. It is well settled that a defendant may plead as many defenses as he may have, though they are inconsistent, and neither of two inconsistent defenses can be used as an admission to destroy the other.

Appellants also contend that the verdict is against law, because it is in disregard of 10 different instructions given them by the court. These instructions cannot be repeated here. We have examined each one, and each instructs the jury that, if they find, from the evidence, that certain facts exist, their verdict must be for the plaintiffs; but whether those facts exist was a question for the jury. So that the question is not whether there was a palpable violation of the instructions, but whether the evidence justified them in finding upon these facts as the verdict shows they must have done in order to find for the defendant. The fourth instruction given at defendant's request, relating to the alleged failure of plaintiffs to apply the proceeds of the wheat delivered to them by Farnham in 1889 in payment of the original note, need not be considered, as the verdict of the jury can be sustained under the defense that Kendrick was, as to the plaintiffs, an accommodation maker.

The defendant was asked by his counsel the following question: "At the time of the signing of these renewal notes, what was your understanding as to the purpose of your signature thereto?" Plaintiffs were not prejudiced by the ruling permitting it to be answered. The witness had already testified to the circumstances surrounding the transaction, that he did not sign them for Farnham, that he was not asked to become security for Farnham, that he received no benefit or anything of value, and that the request therefor came from the plaintiffs. The answer was that "it was to be used in place of other note," and there was no evidence to the contrary. The following question was also objected to: "Was there any other or further consideration for the signing of the new notes, other than the $2,000 note that had been previously given?" This question also followed a statement which appeared to be a full recital of all the circumstances connected with the transaction, and was doubtless intended to cover any other possible consideration; and, in the connection in which it was put, cannot properly be considered a conclusion of law. But, if it were so, as there was no evidence tending to show any consideration other than the circumstances already disclosed, we cannot see that plaintiffs were prejudiced.

We are also referred, by folios, to numerous other exceptions taken by appellants, and which are not argued, nor even restated, in appellants' brief. We have, however, examined each of them, and find no error justifying a reversal. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

SHAY v. CHICAGO CLOCK CO. (S. F. 257.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—AUTHORITY OF CLERK TO ENTER — INEXCUSABLE NEGLECT — APPEAL — AMENDMENT OF JUDGMENT—DISMISSAL—DEFECT OF TRANSCRIPT.

1. A refusal to set aside a default judgment against a corporation for excusable neglect was proper, where the complaint and summons were duly served on its secretary, and five days afterwards handed by him to its president, who read them, and observed their date, but took no action in regard to them till after judgment by default had been entered.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subsec. 1, authorizing the clerk to enter judgment in actions on contracts to recover money or damages if defendant fails to answer, does not authorize him to enter judgment by default in an action for trespass.

3. Pending appeal, the judgment cannot be amended or corrected by the trial court.

4. A motion to dismiss an appeal because the transcript does not contain the clerk's certificate that the bond is in due form, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953, was properly denied when it appeared that, in a former motion to dismiss the appeal, such certificate was filed, and the clerk entered it under a different number.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Frank Shay against the Chicago Clock Company for conversion. From a judgment by default for plaintiff, and an order refusing its motion to set aside the same, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed. Order affirmed.

Geo. H. Perry, W. W. Allen, Sr., and W. W. Allen, Jr., for appellant. E. P. Cole, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for a trespass committed by the defendant in taking and carrying away certain personal property of the plaintiff. Service of the summons and of a copy of the complaint was made upon the defendant May 18, 1895, and on May 29th its default for failure to appear was entered by the clerk. June 5, 1895, judgment was entered against the defendant, and in favor of the plaintiff, for the sum of $2,000. June 7th a motion was made to set aside the default and judgment, on the ground that the same were entered and given "through inadvertence and excusable neglect of the defendant." This motion was denied, and the present appeal is taken from this order and also from the judgment.

1. The court properly refused to set aside the default of the defendant. The facts shown by it in support of the motion indicated inexcusable neglect. The summons and copy of the complaint were served upon its secretary on the 18th of May, and he delivered them to the president of the defendant on the 23d. The president read the papers that day, and observed their date, but, without making any inquiry as to the time when they were served, kept them in his possession until after the default had been entered. He stated, at the hearing of the motion, that he did not send for his attorney, or send the papers to him, but kept them, thinking that his attorney would be in every day, and therefore waited until he should come, and that, when he did see him, the default had been entered.

2. The judgment was entered by the clerk, and, after stating that the defendant had been regularly served with process, and that its default had been duly entered, further recites: "Upon application of E. P. Cole, Esq., attorney for said plaintiff, to the clerk, judgment is hereby entered against said defendant in pursuance of the prayer of said complaint." The authority of the clerk to enter judgment, if the defendant fails to answer the complaint, is limited to actions "arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only," and in such actions he is authorized to enter judgment "for the amount specified in the summons." Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subsec. 1. The present action is not upon a contract, but is for damages for a trespass, and the summons which was issued upon the complaint does not specify any sum for which judgment will be entered, but states that "plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief in said complaint demanded." As the judgment was therefore entered by the clerk without any authority from the court, it is erroneous. A motion was made, upon suggesting a diminution of the record, to file, as a part of the record on the appeal, a document purporting to be a judgment entered in the cause September 27, 1895, nunc pro tunc as of June 5, 1895; but, as the appeal from the original judgment was made June 19th, the judgment was thereby removed from the superior court, and, while an appeal from a judgment is pending, that court has no power to amend or correct its judgment.

3. The respondent objects to a hearing of the appeal upon the ground that the transcript, instead of containing a certificate of the clerk that the undertaking on appeal is in due form, as required by section 953, Code Civ. Proc., contains a copy of the undertaking itself. It appears, however, that, upon a motion heretofore made by the respondent to dismiss the appeal, he filed a certificate of the clerk that, on the 19th day of June, 1895, the defendant appealed from said judgment and order, "and upon said date filed two undertakings on appeal, one on the said appeal from said judgment, and one on the said appeal from said order, both of which undertakings are in due form." An appeal will not be dismissed for a defect in the transcript, if, at the hearing of the motion, it appear that the defect suggested has been cured. Warren v. Hopkins (Cal.) 42 Pac. 986. At the time this objection was made, the above certificate of the clerk was on file in this court; and, although it had been entered by the clerk under a different number (S. F. No. 206), it was none the less a part of the records of this court in the same appeal, and, upon our attention having been directed to it, is entitled to as much consideration as if it were presented by a new certificate to the same effect. The judgment is reversed. The order refusing to set aside the default is affirmed.

BATEMAN et al. v. COLGAN, Comptroller.

State Harbor Commissioners—Implied Powers—San Francisco Depot Act—Statutes—Construction—Repeal.

1. Pol. Code, §§ 2520–2553, vesting control of the San Francisco harbor front in a board of state harbor commissioners, authorizes the commissioners (section 2524) "to erect all such improvements" as may be necessary for the safe loading and unloading of merchandise, "and for the safety and convenience of passengers passing into and out of the city and county of San Francisco," and enumerates the steps to be taken by the commission in advertising for proposals, letting contracts, etc. The San Francisco depot act (St. 1891, p. 110) provides that the harbor commissioners shall construct a railroad ferry and passenger depot "in the manner and method authorized by law." Held that, in carrying out the requirements of the depot act, the commissioners rightly proceeded under Pol Code, § 2524, and not under the public buildings act (St. 1875–76, p. 427).

2. The fact that Pol. Code, § 2524, does not expressly authorize the board of state harbor commissioners to employ an architect does not prevent them from proceeding under such section in building the depot provided for by the San Francisco depot act (St. 1891, p. 110), since the authority to make such improvements implies the power to employ all necessary means therefor.

3. Pol. Code, § 2524, giving the board of state harbor commissioners control of the San Francisco harbor front and all improvements thereon, and directing the manner in which the commissioners shall proceed in making such improvements, was not impliedly repealed by the public buildings act (St. 1875–76, p. 427), which was a general law applying to all boards charged with the erection of public improvements, there being no irreconcilable conflict between the two acts.

In bank. Original application by one Bateman and others against Colgan, state comptroller, for a writ of mandate. Granted.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for petitioners. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an original application to this court for the writ of mandate to require the respondent, as state comptroller, to draw his warrant against the San Francisco depot fund, in the state treasury, in payment of a demand in favor of petitioners, arising under a contract awarded them by the board of state harbor commissioners for furnishing certain work and material in the construction of the new railroad ferry and passenger depot, provided for by the act of the legislature designated the "San Francisco Depot Act." St. 1891, p. 110.

The real purpose of the proceeding is to secure a determination of the question, about which controversy has arisen, as to which one of two somewhat divergent statutes controls said commissioners in proceeding to carry out the purposes of said depot act; i. e. whether, in adopting plans and letting contracts for such purpose, they should follow the method pointed out in the provisions of the Political Code giving them control of the San Francisco harbor and water front, or whether they are governed therein by the provisions of an act commonly known as the "Public Buildings Act" (St. 1875–76, p. 427), which latter act, besides certain other minor differences in method, requires the plans, estimates, etc., to be submitted for approval to the governor, treasurer, and secretary of state, and the contracts thereunder to be certified by the attorney general, before commencing construction. Said depot act provides that the commissioners shall construct such depot "in the manner and method authorized by law," and, in taking steps for the erection of such depot building, the commissioners have thus far, under the advice of counsel, proceeded according to the provisions of the Political Code, and particularly section 2524 thereof, wherein is provided the steps to be taken by them as to advertising for proposals, letting contracts, etc., in making improvements upon the harbor front, in instances involving an expenditure of more than $3,000; and it was in pursuance of such proceedings that the contract of petitioners was let.

The objection of respondent, and the ground of his refusal to draw his warrant, is that the commissioners should have followed the requirements of said public buildings act, and that their proceedings thus far in the premises are void. His argument is, in brief, that the building of such a structure as that provided by the depot act is not within the general powers of said commissioners conferred by the Code; that such power is a special one, derived solely from said act; that the building thus provided for is a public building, within the purview of said general building act; and that, when the legislature provided that it should be constructed "in the manner and method authorized by law," it referred by this language to the general building law, and not to the special provisions of the Code governing the harbor commissioners, and must be held to have placed the construction of said depot under the provisions of said general act.

We discover nothing substantially tending to support this contention, but it involves, in our judgment, a misconstruction of both the provisions of the Code and those of the depot act. The latter act, as we construe it, was neither intended to, nor does it, confer any additional power upon the board of harbor commissioners, except the single one of enabling said board to anticipate their revenues, and create an indebtedness for the building of such depot, which, by reason of the restrictions of sections 2526 and 2527 of said Code, the board did not theretofore possess. That, but for such restrictions, the board possessed ample authority, at any time, to provide a suitable building of the kind, for the convenience and need of the public, there can be no question. The provisions of the Political Code (sections 2520–2553, inclusive) provide a very complete and comprehensive scheme for the government of the harbor of San Francisco, and its water front (so far, at least, as the same is within state control), and vest such control and management exclusively, with certain exceptions not pertinent here, in said harbor commissioners. By section 2524 the board is authorized, among other things, to construct, repair, and maintain "all the wharves, piers, quays, landings and thoroughfares the wants of commerce may require, and, generally, to erect all such improvements as may be necessary for the safe landing, loading and unloading, and protection of all classes of merchandise, and for the safety and convenience of passengers passing into and out of the city and county of San Francisco." Under this very broad and plenary grant of power, the only obstacle in the way of such an "improvement" by that board as that contemplated by the depot act was the want of funds from its ordinary source of revenue to erect a building of the cost and character needed, and it was this obstacle, arising from the limitations upon the power of the board above adverted to, which the depot act was evidently designed to remove. This purpose of the act is found expressed in its initial section, which provides that, "for the purpose of providing a fund for the payment of the indebtedness hereby authorized to be incurred by the board of state harbor commissioners for the erection and furnishing of a general railroad, passenger and ferry depot at or near the foot of Market street, in the city and county of San Francisco, at a cost not to exceed six hundred thousand dollars, which the said board of harbor commissioners are hereby authorized to construct, in the manner and method authorized by law, and at a cost not to exceed six hundred thousand dollars, the state treasurer shall immediately after the issuance of the proclamation of the governor, hereinafter provided, prepare suitable bonds of the state of California," etc. The words, "hereby authorized to construct," are not to be taken, in view of the foregoing provision of the Code, as conferring any additional power upon the board to that already possessed, but as a legislative declaration, in keeping with the primary purpose of the act, that the needs of commerce and the public required, in the judgment of the legislature, that the erection of such building should be proceeded with. And it was doubtless in full recognition and contemplation of the very general power and control vested in said board under the provisions of the Code that the legislature wholly refrained, in said depot act, from making any direction or specification whatsoever as to the character, style, plan, or dimensions of the structure to be erected, leaving all matters of detail wholly to the wide discretion vested in said commissioners, and limiting them solely as to the matter of total expenditure. And it must be assumed, in the absence of any express declaration showing a different intent, that, in directing the board to proceed "in the manner and method authorized by law," reference was had to the manner and method for making improvements provided in the law governing said board. That this was the intention of the framers of the law, and that it was intended that the work was to be intrusted solely to said board, is further strongly indicated by the requirement of section 4 of the act, that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds therein provided for shall be kept in a separate fund, to be designated the "San Francisco Depot Fund," and used only for the erection and furnishing of said depot; and that "drafts and warrants upon said fund shall be drawn upon and shall be paid out of said fund in the same manner as drafts and warrants are drawn upon and paid out of the San Francisco harbor improvement fund."

It is further contended, however, that the provisions of section 2524 for advertising and letting of contracts, etc., under which petitioners are proceeding, were superseded or repealed by the provisions of the public buildings act. This claim is based upon the fact that section 2524, which still remains the same in that respect, was approved February 28, 1876, and that said buildings act was approved at the same session, on March 23, 1876, nearly one month later; and the contention is that, the provisions of the two acts being inconsistent, the latter must prevail. But we discover no necessary inconsistency. The public buildings act is a general law, applying to all boards, commissioners, and officers, without special designation, charged with the erection of any state asylum or other improvement. Section 2524 is a part of a special act, applicable to one particular board, and it is well settled that statutes bearing upon the same subject-matter must, if possible, be construed together, and that a general provision will be controlled by one that is special. It is not pretended that there is any express repeal, and it is an established rule of construction that the law does not favor a repeal by implication, but that, where there are two provisions relating to the same subject-matter, they must, if possible, be construed so as to maintain the integrity of both. And, where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter so far as coming within its particular provisions. The rule is well stated in Van Denburgh v. Village of Greenbush, 66 N. Y. 3, where it is said: "It is a rule of construction that a special statute providing for a particular case, or applicable to a particular locality, is not repealed by a statute general in its terms and application, unless the intention of the legislature to repeal or alter the special law is manifest, although the terms of the general act would be taken strictly, and, but for the special law, include the case or cases provided by it." And, as stated by Judge Cooley: "The repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the one later in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in the case of laws of special and local application, which are never to be deemed repealed by general legislation, except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect." Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 182.

This rule is peculiarly applicable to the case before us. Here the legislature has, by special provisions, confided to the board of harbor commissioners control of the harbor front, and all improvements to be made thereon, in terms sufficiently broad to comprehend the character of improvement here provided for, and has made special provisions for the manner in which they shall proceed in making such improvements,—provisions which, it is admitted by respondent, should be held to control in all general work to be done by the board. In such a case, it would require very specific language, indeed, to permit us to hold that these special provisions were intended to be affected by a general statute, the terms of which are not essentially repugnant. The two should rather be regarded in pari materia, and be taken together in ascertaining the legislative will. Furthermore, we have a legislative construction that the provisions of section 2524 were not repealed, or intended to be, by the general act. In 1887 (St. 1887, p. 222), and again in 1889 (St. 1889, p. 380), the legislature amended that section in other respects, but in each instance re-enacted the provisions in question. And, as a further legislative construction that the general provisions of the buildings act were not intended to apply to the proceedings of the harbor commissioners, the legislature, in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 237), amended section 3 of said buildings act so as to require separate contracts to be let for the different classes of work and material to be required in any contemplated building or improvement, and made the law in this particular applicable, "whether the same be let by the state board of harbor commissioners or any other of the aforesaid commissioners, directors, trustees, or other officer or officers," with which last requirement the commissioners in this instance have complied.

It is further objected that the provisions of section 2524 could not have been intended to apply to a work of this character, because the board of harbor commissioners is not authorized thereby to employ an architect, which it is argued is in the essential nature of things rendered necessary in the construction of such a building. But, where power is given to perform an act, the authority to employ all necessary means to accomplish the end is always one of the implications of the law, and, notwithstanding the omission of any special provision to that end, it was competent for the board, in carrying out the purposes of the act, to employ all necessary means to fulfill its requirements. We think the proceedings of the board in the premises were in accordance with the law, and that petitioners are entitled to the relief asked. Let the writ issue as prayed.

GILMAN v. McCLATCHY et al. (Sac. No. 37.)[1]

LIBEL—PRIVILEGED PUBLICATION—PLEADING—DAMAGES.

1. In an action for libel, the defense of privileged publication, within Civ. Code, § 47, must be pleaded.

2. Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, authorizing the publication as privileged of a communication made "without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such a relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information," does not authorize a newspaper to publish an article connecting a private individual with the commission of a criminal offense, which was false in fact, though published in the ordinary course of business as a news item, without malice, and in the belief that it was true.

3. A verdict for $500 compensatory damages in an action for libel is not excessive, where the publication falsely charged plaintiff with having committed a criminal offense.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Gilman against C. K. McClatchy and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. T. Jones and Armstrong & Bruner, for appellants. Holl & Dunn and Johnson & Johnson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Plaintiff's action was for damages resulting from a libel of and concerning him, published by defendants in their newspaper, the Evening Bee. Defendants admitted the publication and their responsibility therefor, but denied that it was libelous. As an affirmative defense, in justification, they pleaded that the publication was true. In mitigation of damages, they further averred their belief in its truth, and that the publication was made only after a due and careful inquiry, which satisfied them of the truth of the matters in the publication contained. The libel was a publication of what purported to be the narrative of one Stella Truitt of the circumstances of a rape committed upon her by Gilman (this plaintiff) while she was employed as a servant in his house. "Mrs. Truitt," so began the account, "has every appearance of an honest woman, and, as she told her story, tears rolled down her cheeks."

The findings of the court, all sustained by the evidence, may be quoted at length, as they contain a sufficient recital of all facts necessary to this consideration: "First. The publication set out in the complaint was false, defamatory, malicious, and unprivileged. Second. The averment in the defendants' first answer by way of defense, 'that said publication was and is true,' was and is untrue. Third. The averments in defendants' second answer by way of defense, 'that the facts contained and related in the said publication are true,' are each and all untrue. Fourth. The averments in defendants' third answer by way of defense, in substance that plaintiff unlawfully and feloniously assaulted one Estella Truitt, with intent to commit the crime of rape upon her, are not proven beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of evidence, and are each and all untrue. Fifth. The publication was not made because of any personal ill will of defendants, or any of them, towards the plaintiff; but it was malicious in the sense which the law imputes because it was not true, and was defamatory, unprivileged, and injurious. Sixth. The defendants at the time of the publication believed it to be true, though it was not true. Such belief was based upon a false story reported to have been related by one Mrs. Estella Truitt, on Saturday morning, August 20th, to neighbors of plaintiff, at a house near his residence. A reporter of the defendants went to said house, and found there the said Mrs. Truitt and three or four other women, with a reporter of another paper and the chief of police of the city of Sacramento. At this conference, the reporter of the defendants obtained his information as it was given to him in part by Mrs. Truitt, but in the greater part by the other women present. From what he thus heard, he wrote the article complained of, except that portion known as the 'head lines,' and submitted it to the defendants, who directed it to be published if a warrant for the arrest of plaintiff, upon the complaint of Mrs. Truitt, should be issued. The plaintiff, having been informed by another reporter of the defendants of the proposed publication, went to the defendants some hours before the publication, and declared the story to be false, and protested against its publication, because, as he said, it would injure him in his business. The head lines were written by one of the editors or employés of the defendants. The warrant was issued about 3 o'clock p. m., and the publication was made in the third edition of the paper, at about 4 o'clock p. m. The affidavit upon which the warrant was issued was made by Mrs. Truitt, and charged the defendant with having committed the crime of rape upon her person, in the city of Sacramento, on the 11th day of August, 1892, but did not otherwise state any of the circumstances or details of the alleged offense. Seventh. The averment contained in the fourth paragraph of the third division of the answer pleaded 'in mitigation for the publication of the article complained of,' that said Estella Truitt 'made the statement in substance as contained in said publication concerning the plaintiff' to the chief of police at his office, is not true; but it is true that at the residence of Mrs. Kelly, a near neighbor of plaintiff, she did state to said chief of police that said plaintiff had committed a rape upon her. The averment in said paragraph that said publication 'was, in all its substantial details, correct and true,' is not true." Under these findings, the court awarded plaintiff, who was a merchant, carrying on business in Sacramento, the sum of $500, as compensatory damages.

By far the greater part of the argument of appellants is devoted to an attempt to show that the published matter was privileged, either under subdivision 4 of section 47 of the Civil Code, or under subdivision 3 of the same section. These subdivisions are as follows: Section 47, Civ. Code: "A privileged publication is one made: * * * (4) By a fair and true report, without malice, of a judicial, legislative or other public official proceeding, or of anything said in the course thereof." "(3) In a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such a relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information." Here it should be said that the defense of privilege is one which, to be availed of, should be pleaded. And there was no plea of privilege in this case. Goodwin v. Daniels, 7 Allen, 61; Langton v. Hagerty, 35 Wis. 150; Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. Com. Law, 413.

But, passing this objection, we proceed to the consideration of the contentions which form appellants' chief reliance. The first of these may be disposed of briefly. The publication is not, and does not purport to be, a report of a judicial, legislative, or other public official proceeding, or of anything said in the course thereof. It is no more nor less than its head lines represent, "A Damaging Tale against a Sacramento Merchant," the materials for which were gathered by the reporter, as the court found, partly from Mrs. Truitt, but principally at secondhand from the neighborhood friends and gossips. Moreover, it was not fair and true, as the court further finds. It may have been a true report of what these women told the reporter, but that is not the truth which will justify a publisher. If A. says B. is a thief, and C. publishes the statement that A. said B. was a thief, in a certain sense this would be the truth, but not in the sense that the law means. It would constitute no defense to C., for it would be but a repetition by him of a slanderous charge. His defense must consist in showing that in fact B. was a thief.

The claim that the publication was privileged under subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code rests, as counsel for appellants phrase it, upon "the fundamental postulate that in this state whatever every citizen has a right to know, that a newspaper has a right to print and publish." The freedom of the press is most carefully protected by constitutional safeguards. "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Const. U. S. Amend. art. 1. "Every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." Const. Cal. art. 1, § 8. Freedom to speak and publish their sentiments is essential to the enjoyment of liberty by a liberty-loving people. To guard against any possible encroachment upon this cherished and most valuable prerogative, it is preserved to the people by the organic laws of the land. The founders of the nation would have the press of the country subject to no censorship. The evil workings of such a system were all too visible at that time, as at the present, in the European governments in which it exists. Moreover, it was well considered that, in a self-governing nation, absolute freedom for the interchange of ideas, for instruction and persuasion, was vital to the growth, development, and stability of our institutions. Thus, we come to have, as part of our heritage, such phrases as a "muzzled press," "strangling free speech," a "servile press,"—terms at which the very children shrink and shudder. Like O'Connor's epithet, "naufragous villain," without understanding their meaning, they recognize them as words of solemn and awful import. These truths are but platitudes, so well are they known and understood. There can be no fear that they will be either overlooked or forgotten, and they should not be. The press itself, should need ever arise, will see that they are not. But there is an obverse of the picture which is not so often looked at. The growth of the enormous power of the press has brought with it corresponding responsibilities. Do the newspapers wield that power with just regard to the duties which it entails upon them? If they do not, then the wrong is a great one; for a libelous publication in a single issue of a newspaper serves to set wagging the thousand tongues of slander, which thereafter can never be silenced, even by the power which provoked them to utterance. By one who lived to experience the evil of which he wrote, it is said: "Men's reputations are tender things, and ought to be like Christ's coat, without seam. Who can see worse days than he that, yet living, doth follow the funeral of his reputation?" (Lord Bacon's Charge against Lumsden.) As the law stands, pecuniary compensation is all that can be recovered for a libel, however damaging it may be. But no one pretends that this compensation re-establishes the injured man or rehabilitates his reputation. The damage done may be, and frequently is, irreparable. In this case, appellants ask for such an extension of the law as would give immunity to publishers of libels provided express malice in the publication be absent. In other words, their contention resolves itself to this: That a newspaper is a purveyor of news. The people have the right to read the news. Any story gleaned by a reporter as this was gleaned, and published in the ordinary course of newspaper business, without personal malevolence against the victim of the tale, should be held privileged. In support of this contention, there is neither authority, law, nor justice. No point of similarity can be found between this case and those which protect a publisher who in good faith discusses the habits, qualifications, and official conduct of a person holding a public office, or presenting himself as a candidate therefor. Even in the latter cases a "line must be drawn between hostile criticism upon public conduct and the imputation of bad motives or criminal offenses where such motives or offenses cannot be justly and reasonably inferred from the conduct." Neeb v. Hope, 111 Pa. St. 145, 2 Atl. 568. But to extend this doctrine, and to seek to apply it, as here, to a charge infamous in its nature and false in its facts, against a private individual, would be to put upon the people a greater evil than that which the constitution sought to prevent.

The contention is completely disposed of in this state by the case of Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 363. In the same connection, the following language of the supreme court of Michigan, in McAllister v. Press Co., 76 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. 431, is apposite: "It is argued that a newspaper in this day and age of the world, when people are hungry for the news, and almost every person is a newspaper reader, must be allowed some latitude and more privilege than is ordinarily given under the law of libel as it had heretofore been understood. In other words, because the world is thirsting for criminal items, and the libel in a newspaper is more far-reaching and wide-spreading than it used to be when tales were only spread by the mouth, or through the medium of books or letters, there should be greater immunity to gossip in the newspapers, although the harm to the person injured is infinitely greater than it would be if published otherwise. The greater the circulation, the greater the wrong, and the more reason why greater care should be exercised in the publication of personal items. No newspaper has any right to trifle with the reputation of any citizen, or, by carelessness or recklessness, to injure his good name and fame or business. And the reporter of a newspaper has no more right to collect the stories on the street, or even to gather information from policemen or magistrates, out of court, about a citizen, and to his detriment, and publish such stories and information as facts in a newspaper, than has a person not connected with a newspaper to whisper from ear to ear the gossip and scandal of the street. If true, such publication or such speaking may be privileged; but, if false, the newspaper, as well as the citizen, must be responsible to any one who is wronged and damaged thereby. It is indignity enough for an honest man to be arrested and put in prison for an offense of which he is innocent, and for which indignity ofttimes he has no redress, without being further subjected to the wrong and outrage of a false publication of the circumstances of such an arrest and imprisonment, looking towards his guilt, without remedy. And no sophistry of reasoning, and no excuse of the demand of the public for news, or of the peculiarity and magnitude of newspaper work, can avail to alter the law, except, perhaps, by positive statute, which is doubtful, so as to leave a party thus injured without any recompense for a wrong which can even now, as the law stands, never be adequately compensated to one who loves his reputation better than money."

The court found that the publication was made without express malice or malice in fact. In the absence of such malice, plaintiff would not be entitled to punitive damages, but he has not been awarded any. Malice in law still remained, and, the publication being indisputably a libel per se, he was entitled to recover compensatory damages. Childers v. Publishing Co., 105 Cal. 284, 38 Pac. 903. It cannot be said that the award of $500 was excessive for that purpose. In Wilson v. Fitch, supra, this court, without other showing than that here made, upheld an award of $7,500 as compensatory damages. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

JACOB et al. v. DAY et al. (Sac. 68.)[1]

HYDRAULIC MINING — RIGHT TO MAINTAIN DITCH OVER ADJOINING LAND—ADVERSE POSSESSION—CUSTOM — PLEADING AND PROOF — ESTOPPEL BY JUDGMENT—INJUNCTION—WHEN GRANTED.

1. In an action to abate, as a nuisance, a ditch over plaintiff's land, maintained by defendant to carry the detritus from an hydraulic mine to a river, evidence of a custom of using such a ditch in all hydraulic mining is admissible under the general issue.

2. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2339, providing that a right to use water for mining, acquired by local custom and judicial decisions, shall be protected, "and the right of way for the construction of ditches * * * for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed," a patentee of mining land, over which an adjoining owner had for several years, by local custom and from necessity, maintained a ditch to carry detritus from an hydraulic mine to a river, took subject to the easement.

3. Error in striking from a complaint a plea of estoppel by judgment was harmless, where plaintiff subsequently put the judgment roll in evidence.

4. A judgment of nonsuit, in an action by the owner of an hydraulic mine to prevent the issuance to another of a patent to land over which he had constructed a ditch to carry the detritus from his mine, based on a motion reciting that "the evidence shows that plaintiff merely has an easement over the land," and that such right was fully protected by Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2339, 2340, and that "he has not shown any right to purchase the land from the United States," did not estop the judgment defendant from setting up, in a subsequent action against him to abate the ditch as a nuisance, that he had acquired an easement by custom and adverse possession.

5. An injunction will not be granted against the use by defendant of a ditch across plaintiff's land for carrying detritus from an hydraulic mine, on the ground of an improper and injurious exercise of the easement, where it appears that the water in the ditch caused a slight caving in of plaintiff's land, and a slight wearing away of the bed rock, but did not cause or threaten any appreciable damage.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county; Edward Sweeney, Judge.

Action by Henry Jacob and others against John C. Day and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Turner, H. R. Given, and John D. Goodwin, for appellants. Cross, Ford, Kelly & Abbott, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. The action was brought to abate an alleged nuisance maintained by defendants upon the lands of plaintiffs, for an injunction, and for damages. The nuisance consisted of a tailrace, sluiceway, cut, or ditch, by which the water bearing detritus from defendants' hydraulic mine was carried across the land of plaintiffs, and discharged into the Trinity river. This ditch had been used in connection with the working of the Bartlett & Evans Mine for many years prior to and after the acquisition of a patent. That mine is the property of defendants, and a patent therefor had been obtained in 1869. The land of plaintiffs, crossed by this ditch, is now known as the "Barthol Jacob Gold Placer Mine." But at the time of the construction of the ditch, and for many years of its use thereafter, plaintiffs' land was open, unappropriated, public mineral land of the United States. Entry and payment for the Barthol Jacob Mine were made in October, 1887. This action was commenced within five years from the date of the issuance of the patent. Defendants rely upon title by prescription, which was pleaded, and, in this connection, proved continuous adverse use under claim of right for more than five years, continuously, after October, 1887. They also rely upon title under section 2339, Rev. St. U. S., asserting that their right is one embraced within the provisions of that section, and sanctioned by the mining custom of the district. This custom was not pleaded, but the claim is made that evidence thereof is admissible under the general issue. The principal questions thus presented are: (1) Did defendants acquire a right of way for the ditch by virtue of the provisions of section 2339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States? (2) Did they acquire a right of way by prescription?

There are certain essentials to the practical conduct of all hydraulic mining operations. Water must be obtained in quantities, and carried to the mining ground under pressure sufficient to disintegrate and wash down the natural bank. For these purposes, in the mining districts of this state, reservoirs, ditches, flumes, and pipe lines are indispensable. The soil and gravel thus eroded must be carried by gravity, and the force of the refluent water, through cuts, sluiceways, and flumes, where the gold, by reason of its greater specific gravity, is deposited, caught, and gathered. Lastly, by aid of the same beneficent agent, the resulting waste matter, soil, and gravel must be carried away through convenient channels, so as not to impede further operations. The water itself does not lose its utility to the miner, nor become an impediment to his work, during any of these processes. Through them all it is not only of high utility, but an absolute necessity. It is therefore inaccurate to call it waste or superfluous water, or to describe the work which it does in carrying tailings as a drainage of a mine. To drain land is to rid it of its superfluous moisture. In the case of a quartz or drift mine, drainage is an appropriate term, when applied to the means by which water which is in them—always superfluous, and a hindrance to the work—is met and disposed of. But "hydraulic mining" is defined to be "mining by means of the application of water under pressure through a nozzle, against a natural bank." Civ. Code, § 1425. Water here is not superfluous. It is of the essence of the work. It does not become superfluous even when it has aided in the extraction of the last particle of gold, since it still must serve the necessary purpose of clearing the ground for further operations. These facts are of such general knowledge and undisputed acceptance,—so inherent in the character of hydraulic mining,—that they scarcely need the evidence of local custom, or any evidence at all, for their establishment. But in this case they were established by abundant and uncontradicted evidence, including that of the plaintiff himself. It was proved that the mine was situated in the Red Hill district, that it was in a region where hydraulic mining was customarily carried on, and that all hydraulic mines have, and must have, a tunnel, flume, or ditch, such as this, to carry away and dispose of the detritus. The plaintiff himself testified that "you can't operate a mine unless you have some such means." The objection to the introduction of this evidence is disposed of by the case of Colman v. Clements, 23 Cal. 245. In support of title, evidence of mining rules and customs may be given without averring such rules and customs.

We are thus brought to the consideration whether the ditch, in connection with its use, vested in defendants a right to its continued use and enjoyment, under section 2339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or, in other words, did title to the Barthol Jacob Mine pass from the government to plaintiffs subject to defendants' rights in the ditch? This question, we think, must be answered in the affirmative. Section 2338, it is true, excludes easements for working mines, drainage, etc., from the purview of the act, leaving these matters for state regulation. But by section 2339 are protected to the fullest extent all the rights and easements enumerated in that section and in section 2340. "Whenever * * rights to the use of water for mining * * * purposes have vested and accrued and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws and decisions of the courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right-of-way for the construction of ditches * * * for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed." There is here a recognition of rights to the use of water for mining purposes, and of rights for the construction of ditches for such purposes. As has been said, the use of water for the purpose of carrying off the tailings, and the construction of the ditch to aid therein, are as essential functions to the successful conduct of hydraulic mining as is the first use to which the water is put, in washing down the natural bank. Every use of water for purposes of legitimate mining, sanctioned by local custom and law, is recognized as a right, and protected as such, and within the protection is embraced the ditch by which the use is made practicable. It does not defeat the conclusion to say that a flume might have been substituted for a ditch, for it is shown that a ditch is the usual and customary means employed. By section 2339, the right of way for the construction of ditches by which water is used for mining purposes is recognized and confirmed. It must be apparent that the use of water in such a ditch is an essential feature of hydraulic mining, and for that reason should not be confounded with the discharge of superfluous water which is encountered in quartz and drift mines. The latter is always superfluous,—always a hindrance. It never serves a useful purpose. It is an accident and detriment to the operation of the mine. It is disposed of by pumps and drainage tunnels, and that disposition frequently involves enormous expense and loss. Not infrequently such a mine cannot be kept free from water at a cost which will justify further operations, and the result is that the mine is shut down and abandoned. Thus water plays no part in the legitimate and ordinary working of such mines. Its appearance is both an accident and a misfortune. It is an easement for the accidental requirement of drainage of such a mine that is contemplated by section 2338. But, in the hydraulic mine, water must be present, and must be used for the enumerated purposes, or work cannot proceed. And it can only follow that if congress, in protecting and conferring rights to the use of water and rights of way for ditches for mining purposes, did not include such ditches as this, then hydraulic mining, as universally understood and conducted in this state, is without the purview of section 2339. Nor has the question thus presented any features in common with the propositions determined in the Gold Run Ditch & Mining Co. Case, 66 Cal. 138, 4 Pac. 1152, and the North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. Case, 9 Sawy. 531, 18 Fed. 753. In the Gold Run Case the question determined was the right to dump hydraulic débris into the principal navigable river of the state, "to the endangerment of habitations and the cultivation of large tracts of country, upon which are cities, towns, and villages, and to the impairment of the navigation of the Sacramento river." In the North Bloomfield Case the same questions were presented as to the effect upon habitations, riparian lands, and the navigability of the Feather, Yuba, and Sacramento rivers. But in the case at bar no question is raised as to the disposition of the débris. Plaintiffs do not complain of any deposit of débris upon their land, but object to the transportation of the débris by ditch across it. The ditch and its use are a part of the recognized system by which hydraulic mining is, and always has been, conducted in this state; and as is said by the supreme court of the United States in Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 453, by the act of which section 2339 is a part, congress "proposed no new system, but sanctioned, regulated, and confirmed a system already established, to which the people were attached." It is concluded, upon this question, that the title to the Barthol Jacob Mine passed to plaintiffs, under the patent, subject to the easement of the right of way for this ditch under section 2339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Any consideration of title by prescription thus becomes unnecessary.

The court erred in striking from plaintiffs' complaint the plea of estoppel by judgment. Upon the face of the pleading, an estoppel was set out; and, as plaintiffs relied upon that estoppel as one of the foundations for their claim of title, it was proper that they should plead it. But the error was without injury. Upon the trial, plaintiffs offered in evidence the judgment roll in the case. It appeared that, when Jacob made application for his patent, Evans, the predecessor of defendants, commenced the action in question, opposing the application so far as it affected a strip of land 60 feet in width, embracing the ditch in question. A motion for a nonsuit in that case was made and granted. The ground upon which it was granted does not appear. But among the grounds urged were "that the evidence shows that the plaintiff merely has an easement over the lands of defendant," and "that, under sections 2339 and 2340 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, all rights of plaintiff, if he has any, are fully protected, and that he has not shown any right to purchase the fee of said lands from the United States." The judgment of nonsuit so granted could not raise an estoppel against defendants in this action.

It is unquestionably the law that an easement must be used in such a manner as to impose as slight a burden and damage upon the servient tenement as practicable. It is but the application of the familiar maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas." In this case, appellants claim a right to an injunction restraining defendants from an improper and injurious exercise of their easement. While defendants have a right to operate their ditch, they have no right so to operate it as to render it a nuisance to, or destructive of, the servient tenement. But the court found "that the running of tailings through said tailrace or sluice ditch, in the ordinary course of mining, caused a small portion of the Barthol Jacob Gold Placer Mine, along the side of said tailrace or sluice ditch, to cave down and wash away, and said tailrace to cut down further into the bed rock; but no material or appreciable injury or damage was thereby caused or done to the plaintiffs, or either of them, or to any part of their said mining property, nor is any damage or injury threatened thereby." Under the rule de minimis, there is here no showing which would entitle appellants to the injunction sought. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TREVASKIS v. PEARD et al. (Sac. 55.)

MINING CLAIM—FAILURE TO DO ASSESSMENT WORK — ADVERSE POSSESSION — PROOF OF ABANDONMENT.

1. The owner of a placer mineral claim does not forfeit his right thereto, so as to render it subject to relocation, by a failure to perform the required annual assessment work during a time when adverse possession is held by another, where he commences action for its recovery within the statutory time.

2. Proof of the abandonment of a mining claim by a defendant may be given by plaintiff, in ejectment therefor, without a special plea, where the defendant pleads, and relies on as a defense to the action, a location prior to that of plaintiff.

3. Where the owner of a mining claim, which was erroneously included in a sale under a decree of court, moved his effects from the claim, and absented himself for two years, allowing the purchasers to work it without objection, while knowing that their title was invalid, and intending to claim it only in case their development rendered it profitable to do so, his acts will constitute an abandonment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Harriet Trevaskis against Thomas Peard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. D. Mason and F. J. Dennis, for appellant. Chas. W. Kitts, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. The action was brought under section 738, Code Civ. Proc., to settle conflicting claims to the land in controversy, being certain placer mining claims. Thomas Peard is the only defendant interested in this hearing; but, as he appears merely as respondent, and has himself prosecuted no appeal, his attack upon certain findings and conclusions of law which he claims are unsupported or unsound cannot be considered. The objections which may be reviewed are those alone which appellant urges.

In 1887 the lands in question were public mineral lands of the United States. Upon that date they were located by Peard and others, to whose rights Peard afterwards succeeded. In this location was included about 17 acres to the north of and adjacent to the land in controversy. The land in controversy lies in section 2; the 17 acres, in section 35. One hundred dollars' worth of labor was yearly expended upon the premises by Peard until the year 1891. In 1889, however, an action was prosecuted against him to foreclose a miner's lien upon his claim. The complaint sought to subject to the lien, not the land here in controversy, but the 17 acres above referred to. Peard made default in this action, and the judgment declared a lien upon the land in controversy as well as upon the 17 acres, and decreed a sale in satisfaction of the same. All the land was accordingly sold in compliance with the decree and order of sale which conformed thereto; but, after the sale, the court amended its judgment and the order of sale by striking therefrom the portion of the land here in controversy, and limiting the lien to the 17 acres described in the complaint. The sheriff's deed, executed after these amendments, purported to convey all of the land, that here in controversy as well as the 17 acres, to the purchaser, Simmons. Thereafter Simmons conveyed all of his interest to Henry Trevaskis (husband of this plaintiff) and to Ida Marion. Trevaskis and Marion continued to hold and work the claim. In December, 1893, this defendant Peard commenced an action in ejectment against Henry Trevaskis and Ida Marion to recover the premises here in dispute. Harriet Trevaskis was not made a party to that action. Judgment therein passed for Peard. Thereupon Trevaskis and Marion abandoned their claim upon it, and Harriet Trevaskis and her married daughter, Ella Raymond, entered upon it and located it as vacant mineral land. Ella Raymond thereafter sold to her mother her interest in the location for an expressed consideration of one dollar, and in due time this action was commenced. In her complaint, plaintiff alleged the location by Peard in 1887, but averred that Peard had not performed the annual amount of work required by law for the years 1891 to 1894 inclusive; that, therefore, the claim became "jumpable," and "Peard's interest was forfeited"; and that she had, under these circumstances, made a valid location. Peard answered, denying that plaintiff had any interest in the land, pleaded his action against Henry Trevaskis as a bar, and set up a valid claim under the first location. He averred that the attempted location of Harriet Trevaskis and Ella Raymond was fraudulent and void, and that the land, at the time thereof, was not subject to location. The court, by its findings and conclusions, determined that the rights which plaintiff and her colocator acquired were separate property; that Ella Raymond had "loaned the use of her name to enable plaintiff to secure title to more land than plaintiff herself could legally locate," and had conveyed her interest to plaintiff; that plaintiff complied with the law in making her location; but that the premises were not subject to relocation. It decreed that plaintiff had no interest or estate in the premises, and that defendant Peard was the owner, and entitled to the possession thereof.

There is, in the foregoing, a determination that a married woman, who is a citizen, may make a valid location of mineral lands, and that such a claim is her separate property. Though much argument has been advanced for and against the soundness of this proposition, the question is not presented by this appeal. Appellant is not complaining, and respondent is not in a position to object. The findings and conclusions are unassailed in this particular, and this consideration must be confined to a discussion of the objections of appellant.

The first of these objections is that the court did not find upon the claim of forfeiture, and that Peard had, in fact, forfeited his claim by failure to do the legal amount of work thereon since the year 1890. The facts in this regard have already been stated. The forfeiture pleaded was claimed to have resulted because of this failure. But, in the year 1890, defendant was ousted, and Henry Trevaskis and Ida Marion let into possession under the sheriff's deed. They maintained this possession as of their own right, and against Peard, continuously, until he had prevailed against them in his ejectment suit to recover the land. So long as Peard's suit was commenced within the time limited by the statute, he cannot be held to have forfeited his claim by a failure to perform the work under such circumstances. Otherwise, one might, by force, maintain possession for a year, and then assert a forfeiture against the dispossessed unfortunate owner. The court found the facts of Peard's ouster by the claimants under the sheriff's deed, that they had continuously held possession of the property ever since, and done the legal amount of work annually thereon, and that Peard had commenced, within the statutory time, an action in ejectment, which was then pending. While the ultimate fact that no forfeiture resulted is not found, yet that is the only determination which could follow the facts actually set forth, and, indeed, it is embraced in the conclusion that the ground was not subject to relocation at the time of plaintiff's entry for that purpose; for, had Peard forfeited, the land would have been relocatable.

The second objection is that no finding is made upon the question of abandonment. Abandonment was not pleaded, but evidence of abandonment may be given, without a special plea, under a denial of title. Bell v. Mining Co., 36 Cal. 214; Willson v. Cleaveland, 30 Cal. 192. In the foregoing cases, the proof was sought to be made by defendant denying plaintiff's title in ejectment. But we conceive the rule to be applicable to a case such as this. Plaintiff, by her pleading, called upon defendant to declare the nature of his claim. This he did by asserting rights under a location earlier than her own, which location, if still valid, necessarily avoided her own; and she undertook to defeat the claim of a valid, prior, subsisting location by evidence of its abandonment. She was within her right in so doing. The court, it is true, did not find upon the question of abandonment; but its declaration that the land was unlocatable at the time of plaintiff's entry carries with it the necessary deduction that there had been no abandonment. It may, for the purpose of this consideration, be treated as a finding to that effect. Even so the evidence fails to support it. There is no conflict, and it is, briefly, as follows: The witness Dean, for the plaintiff, testified that, after the foreclosure suit of Stevens v. Peard, Peard went away and was gone for two years. When he came back, witness asked him if he was going to the claim (the claim in controversy) to work. "He said, 'No'; that it had cost him enough, in lawyers' fees and dead work; that he had abandoned it, and would never return there again unless he crossed it in going to some other place." Peard, when called to the stand, made no denial of this, but testified "that in 1890 he moved the furniture, cooking stove, and other things he had, in a cabin he occupied on the claim, away, before he went to God's Country; that he mined in God's Country for over two years, and was never again on the claim until three weeks before he commenced suit against Trevaskis, Stevens, and Mrs. Marion (December 2, 1893), when he went into their tunnel; that he knew of the sheriff's deed and location, under which Trevaskis and Stevens held possession, and, since his return from God's Country, knew of the work they did on the claim; that he never ordered them to quit, or notified them that he owned the claim; that the reason he gave them no such information was because he intended to let them go ahead, if they saw fit, and develop the claim, and if they struck pay he would claim it; * * * that his counsel had informed him that the decree, certificate of sale, and sheriff's deed were invalid, and passed no title to the portion in section 2, as the complaint in that action only described the mining claim as being in section 35; * * * that, being so advised by his counsel, and knowing that his title to the property of the Mt. Charles in section 2 was good, although so sold to Simmons by the sheriff, he had held back while Trevaskis, Stevens, and Mrs. Marion were trespassing thereon; that it was their business to look out for their own title, and he was glad they were doing the work, as it would save him doing it; that he therefore laid back, never informed them he claimed any interest therein, or forbid them working; never claimed any of the gold they took out, or interfered with them in any manner, until he brought suit December 2, 1893." This is all of the evidence upon the question.

It is not a matter of regret that the scheme outlined by defendant's testimony is no better in law than it is in good conscience. Abandonment, it is true, is a matter of intent; but that intent may be proved by the acts and conduct of a party, even against his express declarations to the contrary (Myers v. Spooner, 55 Cal. 260); and, if the intent has been formed, and once acted upon, the abandonment is as absolute, "if it exists for a minute or a second, as though it continued for years" (Waring v. Crow, 11 Cal. 366). In Seymour v. Wood, 53 Cal. 303, plaintiff in ejectment moved his possessions from the mining claim, and went to Mexico, where he followed mining for several years. He denied that he had abandoned his claim, but admitted that he knew defendants were working it and had applied for a patent. The question of abandonment was submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff. This court said that the verdict should have been set aside, and a new trial ordered, as the abandonment was clearly established. But the evidence in that case was not so convincing as that presented by this record. Defendant's admission of abandonment is not denied. He not only removed his effects from the claim, and prosecuted mining for years in another part of the country, but himself admits a conditional abandonment at least. He had abandoned it, unless others, by their work and labor, developed it into a paying property. No such conditional abandonment can be recognized. It must be all in all, or not at all, and there can be no hesitation in this case in declaring it to be absolute. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

O'CONOR v. MORSE et al. (L. A. 96.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — RELEASE OF SURETY — TENDER.

1. In an action against B. and two others on a note, it appeared that such note was held by plaintiff as collateral security, and that B. paid one-third of the amount for which it was security, and offered to pay the balance; but plaintiff refused to accept it, because he did not want the comakers sued. Held, that B. was released from liability to plaintiff on such comakers subsequently becoming insolvent.

2. Where one of several sureties pays his proportion of the amount for which they are liable, and offers to pay the balance, which the obligee refuses to receive, such surety is discharged from liability, though he does not comply with Civ. Code, § 1500, providing that an obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by a due offer of payment, if the amount is deposited in the name of the creditor with some bank of deposit, and notice thereof is given to the creditor.

Action by Andrew J. O'Conor, as receiver of the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, against E. W. Morse, C. E. Heath, and J. H. Braly on a promissory note executed and delivered by defendants to one F. W. Stewart, who deposited it as collateral security for his own note in such bank. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Braly appeals on the judgment roll. Reversed.

J. W. Hughes, for appellant. V. E. Shaw, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action upon a nonnegotiable promissory note for $1,308.95, bearing interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, compounding monthly. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were in substance as follows: On October 31, 1890, the defendants, E. W. Morse, C. E. Heath, and J. H. Braly, executed and delivered the said note to one F. W. Stewart, to be used as collateral security for his own note, to be given to the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego. Thereafter, Stewart executed his own nonnegotiable note for the same sum to the said bank, and as collateral security for the payment thereof duly indorsed, assigned, and delivered to the bank the said note. On the day of its date defendant Braly paid on said note one-third of the amount due thereon, to wit, $436.32. The interest on the note was paid up to October 30, 1891, but no other payments on account of interest or principal were ever made. On May 11, 1893, the bank was still the owner and holder of the said note. On that day the defendant Braly, through his duly authorized agent, J. C. Braly, called at the bank, and offered to pay the said note, but stated that he did not want it stamped "Paid" upon its face, but wanted such an indorsement made as would show the amount paid, and that it had been paid by J. H. Braly. In answer to a question by the cashier as to what he intended to do with the note, he replied that he was instructed to turn it over to attorneys to bring suit on it. From what was said the cashier understood that he wanted the note so indorsed that J. H. Braly could sue upon it, and he referred the matter to Mr. Howard, the president of the bank, and stated to him that accepting payment "would result in a suit against Heath and Morse." Mr. Howard replied to the cashier, in the absence of Mr. Braly, "that is a matter we must consider." He further said that "the relations of Mr. Morse and Heath to the bank were such that the matter must be considered before suit could be allowed." The cashier then told Mr. Braly to call the next day, and at that time, or later, the president stated to the cashier that he didn't care to have Mr. Stewart and Mr. Morse sued. Braly went back to the bank the next day, as requested, and Mr. Howard, the then president of the bank, stated to him "that they had concluded to hold the note, and make it out of the other parties." Defendant Braly offered to prove, by defendants

Morse and Heath, that they were solvent at the time he offered to pay the bank, but that, on the 25th day of August, 1893, they and each of them became insolvent, and have continuously since been insolvent, which offered evidence the court excluded upon the ground that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, to which ruling defendant Braly duly excepted. And, as conclusions of law, the court found that the effect of the offer to pay, on May 11th, was to stop the running of interest, and to release said defendant Braly from the obligation to pay attorney's fees, but that he was not released from his obligation to pay the note, and that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the three defendants for the principal due on the note, with interest thereon to May 11, 1893, amounting to $1,068.25. Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which the defendant Braly appeals on the judgment roll alone.

The Civil Code, § 2831, declares a surety to be "one who, at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor." In Montgomery v. Sayre, 91 Cal. 206, 27 Pac. 648, the action was upon a promissory note given as collateral security under circumstances similar to those found here, and it was held that the maker of the note was, in law, a surety. The note in suit was executed to be used as collateral security for the payment of Stewart's note, and was accepted and held by the bank as such collateral security. The appellant must, therefore, be regarded as only a surety, and the question is, was he exonerated from liability on the note by the refusal of the bank to accept payment thereof, because it would result in a suit against the comakers, and "they had concluded to hold the note, and make it out of the other parties"? "A surety is exonerated (1) in like manner with a guarantor; (2) to the extent to which he is prejudiced by any act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety, or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security; or (3) to the extent to which he is prejudiced by an omission of the creditor to do anything, when required by the surety which, it is his duty to do." Civ. Code, § 2840. In Hayes v. Josephi, 26 Cal. 535, the action was to recover, from a surety on an undertaking given for the release of an attachment, the amount of the judgment subsequently recovered. The defense was that, subsequent to the recovery of the judgment, the surety tendered to the creditor the full amount of the judgment, and he refused to receive it, and that at that time the judgment debtor was solvent, but afterwards, and before the commencement of the action, became, and ever since has been, wholly insolvent. At the trial the court refused to admit evidence in support of the allegations of the answer, and gave judgment for the plaintiff on the pleadings. On appeal, it was held that the offered evidence should have been admitted, and that, if the facts alleged were established, the surety was discharged from his obligation on the undertaking. In the opinion of the court, rendered by Sawyer, J., it is said: "The law requires the creditor to act in the utmost good faith toward the surety, and will not permit him to do anything that will unnecessarily tend to prejudice his interests. The creditor will certainly not be permited to place obstacles in the way of the surety, which tend to hinder him in the pursuit of such remedies as are guarantied to him by the law. The surety is entitled to pay the debt, and thereby at once acquire the right to proceed against the principal. * * * If it is the legal right of the surety to pay the debt, and at once proceed against the principal debtor, it necessarily follows that he is entitled to have the money accepted by the creditor in order that he may proceed. It is the duty of the creditor to receive it, and a gross violation of duty and good faith on his part to refuse, thereby interposing an insurmountable obstacle in the way of the pursuit by the surety of his most prompt and efficient remedy. * * * If the creditor refuses to receive the money when tendered, he as effectually prevents the surety from promptly pursuing his most efficient remedy as he would by entering into a valid contract with the debtor to extend the time of payment. The reason why a valid contract between the creditor and principal to extend the time of payment discharges the surety is, as we have seen, because the creditor by his further contract places an obstacle in the way of prompt and efficient action on the part of the surety to protect his interest. The principle applies here with equal force." In Sharp v. Miller, 57 Cal. 415, this court said: The plaintiff "refused to accept the money which was offered. Having tendered the money, the defendants, as sureties, did all they contracted to do. The tender made, although it was refused, was equivalent to a payment by them. Solomon v. Reese, 34 Cal. 36. And by it they were discharged from their obligation as sureties upon the appeal bond. Hayes v. Josephi, 26 Cal. 535." The note in suit was held by the bank as collateral security, and appellant was liable thereon as principal for one-third which he paid, and as cosurety with Morse for one-third, and as cosurety with Heath for one-third. Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 136. He had a right to pay the balance due on the note, and to look to his co-makers for their pro rata shares thereof. The bank refused to accept the money because it did not want the comakers sued. But this the bank had no right to do, and, as said in Hayes v. Josephi, the refusal was a gross violation of duty and good faith on its part.

It is objected, however, that it does not appear that appellant was prejudiced by the refusal, since there is nothing to show that Morse and Heath subsequently became insolvent; the finding to the effect that appellant offered to prove their solvency and subsequent insolvency, which evidence was excluded, having no place in the record. It is true that findings should be of the ultimate facts, but this finding cannot be disregarded on the ground urged. It is found in the record, and, so far as appears, was made and accepted without objection on either side. It must be assumed, therefore, for the purposes of this appeal, that the facts were as appellant offered to prove them to be.

It is further objected that appellant was not discharged from liability on the note because he did not comply with the provisions of section 1500 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "An obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by a due offer of payment, if the amount is immediately deposited in the name of the creditor with some bank of deposit within this state of good repute, and notice thereof is given to the creditor." A similar objection was made and overruled in Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 390, 33 Pac. 433. On page 395, 98 Cal., and page 433, 33 Pac., it is said: "E. A. Billings did not, when plaintiff refused to receive her money in payment of rents, deposit the same, or any part of it, in a bank or elsewhere, in compliance with the provisions of section 1500 of the Civil Code." And, after a full discussion of the question it is said, at the close of the opinion: "Even if the obligation of defendants must be regarded as that of sureties for the payment of a debt, still I think the tender sufficient to discharge the sureties." As the case is presented on the record here, we think it clearly appears that the appellant was exonerated from liability on the note, and that the court erred in rendering judgment against him. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

BIGELOW v. BALLERINO. (No. 19,480.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—VACATING STREET—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNERS—COMPENSATION—ESTOPPEL TO CLAIM DAMAGES.

1. The fact that, after a public alley had been vacated by the city, an abutting owner took possession of all land in his front previously covered by the alley, and of a narrow strip lying between its further side and a newly-opened street, in the mistaken belief that he was entitled to a frontage on such street, will not estop him from claiming damages for the closing of the alley without his consent.

2. An abutting owner's easement in the street is "property," within Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by L. N. Bigelow against Bartolo Ballerino to quiet title to land. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Horace Bell, and Geo. H. Smith, for appellant. A. W. Hutton, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Negro alley was, and for many years had been, a public street and highway of the city of Los Angeles. It extended northerly and southerly, and plaintiff and defendant owned opposite frontages upon it. Plaintiff's land was on the west, while defendant's property was on the east, side of the alley. The municipal authorities vacated and abandoned Negro alley, and established a new street to the west thereof, called Los Angeles street. The east line of Los Angeles street and the west line of Negro alley, while in close proximity, did not coincide. There was left a narrow wedge-shaped strip of land between the lines of the two streets. After the vacation of the old and the establishment of the new street, the defendant asserted the right to a frontage upon Los Angeles street corresponding to that which he had enjoyed upon Negro alley. This claim, while not sound in law, drew some support from the language of the revised charter of Los Angeles (approved April 1, 1876). Acting upon this claim, he encroached upon, took, and held possession of so much of Negro alley and the wedge-shaped strip as lay between the lines of his property extended and the east line of Los Angeles street. Plaintiff then commenced this action to quiet her title to the wedge-shaped strip and the western half of Negro alley, conceding to defendant the ownership of the eastern half thereof. The answer interposed several defenses, one of which was that even though Negro alley had been abandoned by the authorities as a public street, and though the fee to the westerly one-half of it might be in plaintiff, yet defendant still retained the easement of a right of way over all of the land formerly within the alley for the necessary and convenient use of his property. Here it should be said that this property, with a frontage of 107 feet, was covered by a brick building two stories in height, the lower story being fitted and used for stores. The court found that Negro alley had been for many years a public street of the city, found that it had been legally abandoned and vacated as a public street, and found and decreed ownership in plaintiff of the disputed strip and portion of the alley. It found that defendant had taken possession of all the lands between his property and the line of Los Angeles street, but that his claim thereto was unfounded, excepting as to the easterly half of Negro alley. It made no specific findings upon defendant's claim of easement, but decreed that, by taking possession of this land, defendant waived all right to other compensation for any damage which he may have sustained by reason of the closing and vacating of the alley, and is estopped from contesting the validity of such closing and vacation.

The findings and decree of plaintiff's ownership in fee of the disputed strip and of the western half of Negro alley are sufficiently supported by the evidence. She was therefore entitled to resist any unwarranted encroachments of defendant (as by building) upon this land.

The conclusion of law that defendant is estopped from contesting the validity of the closing of Negro alley, and has waived all claim to damages, by reason of the fact that he took possession of the land fronting his premises, is not sound. The principle by which defendant's conduct is to be judged is, as respondent's counsel correctly state, the principle of election. It does not appear that he petitioned for or consented to the closing of the alley, but it is said that because, upon the day after the closing, he moved upon and took possession of the vacated land fronting his property, he thereby made his election to take that land in lieu of damages or other compensation, and thus, of necessity, acquiesced in the proceedings leading to the vacation, and will not be permitted thereafter to assert any other claim or right. But in all this an essential element of a binding election is lost sight of, and that is the full knowledge by the elector of his rights. Election is based upon the well-settled rules of estoppel. Where one to whom two or more courses are open, with full knowledge of his rights and liabilities, follows one in preference to another, thereafter he will not be permitted to retrace his steps and pursue another course, to the injury of any person who, with the right to do so, has relied upon the election first made. Burroughs v. De Couts, 70 Cal. 371, 11 Pac. 734; In re Smith's Estate (Cal.) 40 Pac. 1037. But Ballerino's acts in taking possession of the land were manifestly prompted by a mistaken belief that he had title to it, and, indeed, this does not seem to be questioned. He was not then acting with knowledge of his rights, and to say to him that, because he had under honest error claimed more than he was entitled to, he should take less, and yet still be bound by his election, would be to subvert entirely the meaning of the principle. The court did not decree him what he elected to take; he did not elect to take what the court decreed he should have; and by no application of the doctrines of election or estoppel is he forbidden present freedom of action by reason of his past conduct. Of course, if Ballerino had taken under a well-founded claim, and had thereafter, for example, brought an action for damages, the reason for and the justness of the application of the principle would both be apparent. Ballerino cannot, therefore, be held to be estopped by conduct, acquiescence, or election, and the court's conclusion of law in this regard cannot stand.

In their form the proceedings of the municipal authorities looking to and concluding in the passage of the ordinance vacating Negro alley were due and regular. But back of this lies the vital consideration: what effect do these proceedings have upon the rights of a nonconsenting owner of abutting property? Section 14, art. 1, of the constitution, declares that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for, the owner. The owner of property abutting upon a public street has an easement in the street, distinct from the public's right of way, which easement is his property. In Eachus v. Railway Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, this court in bank, speaking through Mr. Justice Harrison, said: "The right of the owner of a city lot to the use of the street adjacent thereto is property, which cannot be taken from him for public use without compensation; and any act by which this right is impaired is to that extent a damage to his property. When a city subdivides a tract of land of which it is the owner into blocks and streets, and sells the same, it thereby dedicates the streets to public use; and the purchaser of one of those lots acquires an easement in the street fronting upon his lot, for the purpose of ingress and egress, which attaches to the lot, and in which he has a right of property as fully as in the lot itself; and any subsequent act of the municipality by which that easement is destroyed or substantially impaired for the benefit of the public is a damage to the lot itself, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, for which he is entitled to compensation. Such easement is a right of property incident to the lot itself; and any damage sustained by the owner in its destruction or impairment is a damage peculiar to himself, and independent of any damage sustained by the public generally. For the purpose of determining this damage, it is immaterial whether he has the fee in the street, or only an easement for its use. In either case it is property, for an injury to which he is entitled to relief,"—citing City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6; Rude v. City of St. Louis, 93 Mo. 413, 6 S. W. 257; Hobson v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. St. 595, 24 Atl. 1048; Schaufele v. Doyle, 86 Cal. 107, 24 Pac. 834. If needed, authorities might be indefinitely multiplied in support of this proposition. The following are but a few of many: Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 38; Concord v. Pembroke, 50 N. H. 530; Lindsay v. City of Omaha, 30 Neb. 512, 46 N. W. 627; Pearsall v. Board of Sup'rs, 74 Mich. 558, 42 N. W. 77; Gargan v. Railway Co., 89 Ky. 212, 12 S. W. 259;

Heinrich v. City of St. Louis, 125 Mo. 424, 28 S. W. 626; Anderson v. Turveville, 6 Cold. 150; Story v. Railroad Co., 90 N. Y. 122; President, etc., of City of Cincinnati v. Lessee of White, 6 Pet. 431; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 114; Parker v. Catholic Bishop, 146 Ill. 158, 34 N. E. 473; Elliott, Roads & S. p. 662; 1 Hare, Const. Law, 377, 382; Tied. Mun. Corp. § 311. The constitutional rights of an owner of private property which is sought to be taken or damaged for public use are two: First, the right to compensation; and, second, the right to have that compensation made or paid into court before his property is taken or injuriously affected. Either or both of these rights he may waive; that is to say, he may waive his right to any compensation, or he may waive his right to prepayment of compensation. But, where there is no such waiver, the property owner may rest secure in the protection which the constitution affords him that his property shall not be taken or damaged without compensation first made. It is not incumbent upon him to demand that the authorities shall respect his rights; the duty is theirs to work no unlawful invasion of them. The vacation of a highway when duly and legally effected involves something more than a mere constructive closing, which would leave the street still a street, but no longer subject to municipal control. It involves a physical closing as well, which entitles the owners of the soil once occupied by the highway to take full and complete possession of their land. Brook v. Horton, 68 Cal. 554, 10 Pac. 204; City & County of San Francisco v. Burr (Cal.) 41 Pac. 482; Com. v. Inhabitants of Westborough, 3 Mass. 406; Hobart Co. v. County of Plymouth, 100 Mass. 159; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447; Barclay v. Howell's Lessee, 6 Pet. 498; Nicholson v. Stockett, Walk. (Miss.) 67; Elliott, Roads & S. p. 661; Thomp. Highw. p. 188; Ang. & D. Highw. § 326. It is such a closing as this which the court found to exist when it quieted plaintiff's title to that portion of the land in controversy, formerly Negro alley. It was right in so doing, under its further findings and conclusions of law, that defendant was estopped from contesting the validity of the closing or of claiming damages therefor. But these conclusions, as has been said, are not supported. It follows that Ballerino has waived none of his rights, and may insist that, as against him, the vacation or closing is without validity or effect until prepayment to him, or into court, of such sum as would compensate him for his property taken and damaged thereby.

It does not result from this that the proceedings of the municipal authorities looking to the closing of the alley are void. It would matter little whether the authorities first compensated the property owners and then declared the alley closed, or first declared it closed and then made compensation, provided it be distinctly understood that in the latter case, which is the case at bar, no rights attach or are lost, no invasion of the property rights of a nonconsenting owner may be worked, and no substantial impairment of his easement result, until compensation has been made to him in the constitutional mode. In other words, the sequence of the acts becomes immaterial, saving that in the present instance, as against nonconsenting property owners, the ordinance of vacation is without force or validity to work the taking or damaging of their property until compensation has been made to them. Chambers v. Railroad, 69 Ga. 320; Langford v. County Com'rs, 16 Minn. 375 (Gil. 333); Brown v. City of Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 31 Pac. 313, and 32 Pac. 214. Until that time, as to them, the street still remains a public street to the full extent necessary to protect them in their constitutional rights. Ballerino, then, so far as the evidence in this record shows, is entitled to all of the rights he formerly enjoyed in Negro alley, among which is included his easement in the piece of land which is a part of Negro alley, and which is here claimed by plaintiff. Though the fee of that piece is decreed by the court to be in plaintiff, she is not entitled to exercise any acts of dominion over it in derogation of Ballerino's rights. Her title to the wedge-shaped strip lying without the alley, and her right of possession and dominion over it, is absolute against Ballerino. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SAN PEDRO LUMBER CO. et al. v. REYNOLDS et al. (No. 19,585.)

BILL FOR ACCOUNTING—MULTIFARIOUSNESS—CERTAINTY—TENDER.

1. A complaint of a corporation against its agent alleged that defendant, as its trusted agent, had entire charge of a branch business; that by various kinds of misconduct, specially described, he caused losses comprised in a large number of separate items, and became liable for large sums of money, the true amount of which could not be determined without an accounting of his trust; that, while the amount of indebtedness was unknown, defendant transferred to its president stock to secure it against loss; and asked for an accounting to determine the amount of defendant's indebtedness, and for a foreclosure of its lien on the stock. Held, that the complaint was not bad for multifariousness.

2. Nor was it subject to the objection of uncertainty in not alleging with particularity how and when each item of liability arose, and its amount.

3. A tender in settlement of an account of a sum less than the amount due is not sufficient as a tender of payment.

4. A complaint of a corporation alleging that defendant, as its trusted agent, has entire charge of a branch business, and by various kinds of misconduct, specially described, caused losses, comprised in a large number of separate items, and thereby became liable for large sums of money, the amounts of which could not be determined without an accounting, is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to an accounting.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the San Pedro Lumber Company and John A. Hooper, its president, against Merick Reynolds and John A. Pirtle, for an accounting and to foreclose a lien. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stephen M. White and R. H. F. Variel, for appellants. Geo. R. B. Hayes, H. W. Latham, and M. L. Graff, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendants upon the judgment roll from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs. Whatever may appear to be the merits of the case on the appeal from an order denying a new trial,—which we learn from counsel is on its way here,—we do not see anything on the face of the judgment roll which calls for a reversal. The pleadings and findings (and briefs) are quite voluminous; and it is contended by appellants that the complaint is fatally defective, and that the findings do not support the judgment. There was a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground, first, of want of a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also upon the grounds that several causes of action have been improperly united, that the complaint is ambiguous, that it is unintelligible, and that it is uncertain; and upon the 4 latter grounds there are 86 specifications. It is impracticable to notice here all these matters in detail, and we will state only our general views as to the sufficiency of the complaint. The complaint is quite lengthy, and we will give only its substance. It is averred that the plaintiff the San Pedro Lumber Company was during all the times mentioned in the complaint a corporation engaged in the lumber business, and having its principal business and place of business at San Francisco; that the plaintiff John A. Hooper was its president; that it had a branch of its business in the county of Los Angeles; that the appellant Reynolds was its trusted agent and employé at Los Angeles for several years prior to September, 1889, and had the sole charge and management of its business at the latter place; that it was his duty to safely keep and accurately account for all moneys and property of the company coming into his hands at Los Angeles, and to oversee and direct all other employés of the company at that place, and see that they honestly and properly performed their duties; that he was to furnish from time to time statements of the accounts, affairs, and property of the company, and pay over all moneys received by him; and that "it was generally his duty to care for and protect in all particulars the financial interests and welfare and the business and property of said corporation in connection with said branch of the said business of said corporation in said county." It is then averred that prior to September 25, 1889, the appellant at divers and sundry times received considerable sums of money for the use and benefit of said company, which he never paid over or accounted for; that he appropriated to his own use moneys coming into his hands as such trusted agent and in the conduct of the business; that considerable sums of money were lost to the company through the dishonesty and embezzlement of other employés in consequence of the neglect of said appellant to properly discharge his duty as such agent and manager of said business; that considerable sums of money and property were lost to the company through the willful failure and neglect of appellant to discharge his duties, and his willful and wrongful mismanagement and fraud; and that during all of said times the said appellant "had the direct charge and control of the books and accounts of said corporation, and that he willfully and fraudulently caused the same to be kept in a false and fraudulent manner, for the purpose of covering up his aforesaid irregular transactions in connection with the discharge of his said trust." It is also averred "that plaintiff is unable to state the precise amount of the several items, but, according to his information and belief, charges that the full amount thereof equals in the aggregate $65,000, or thereabouts." It is further averred that on said September 25, 1889, while the amount of the indebtedness of appellant to the company was "unsettled and unascertained and in dispute," the appellant Reynolds, "in order to secure" to said company the payment by him of all moneys then due or owing by him to it, "or which might thereafter, upon careful investigation of the books and affairs of the said company, be found to be due or owing from the said Merick Reynolds to said corporation, or for the payment of which the said Merick Reynolds was at that time in law or equity liable to said corporation, or for which he might be in any manner liable by reason of having been the agent and employé thereof as aforesaid," executed to Hooper, president of said company, a written transfer and assignment of the following property: First, 111$^5/_6$ shares of the capital stock of the San Pedro Lumber Company; second, 101 shares of the capital stock of the L. W. Blinn Lumber Company; and third, 1,182 shares of the capital stock of the Russ Lumber & Mill Company. The said first two blocks of stock stood in the name of one Talbot, who held them as security for an indebtedness from Reynolds to him (as trustee) for about $13,000, evidenced by a promissory note, which fact was mentioned in said assignment. The assignment, which is copied in full in the complaint, expresses the conditions on which it was made, and they are the same as those averred in the complaint as above stated. Afterwards the corporation respondent, for the purpose of enabling said

Hooper to carry out the design of said assignment, purchased the said note of said Talbot, and the amount of said note is included in the cause of action in this case. There are averments of about 20 different methods by which it is charged appellant's misconduct caused the loss to respondent; such as fraudulent entries and falsifications of balances, footings, etc., in the account books; lumber and other property sold and not accounted for by appellant and others under his direction; rebates, discounts, rents, etc., collected and not accounted for; payments by debtors of the company not accounted for; private bills of appellant and employés under his direction, charged to and paid by the company, etc. It is further averred that to determine the amount of money due said corporation by reason of the said matters averred as aforesaid, and to secure which the said assignment of said capital stock was made, "the taking of an account of the books and affairs and business of the said corporation so carried on under the management and control of said defendant Merick Reynolds, as hereinbefore alleged, is necessary." It is averred that the defendant Pirtle claims some interest in the stock described in said assignment, but that whatever interest he may have is subject, etc., to the claim and lien of plaintiffs. The prayer is "for an accounting between the said defendant Merick Reynolds and the San Pedro Lumber Company of and as to all the matters hereinbefore set forth, in order to determine the true and correct amount of said indebtedness and claim against said defendant, and which he should pay to the said San Pedro Lumber Company by reason of his failure to discharge, and the aforesaid violations of, his trust"; that after such accounting said company have judgment against said defendant for the amount found due; that the said stock be sold, and the proceeds of the sale be applied in the usual manner followed in the foreclosure of liens; and that the defendants be barred and foreclosed of all right, etc., in or to the aforesaid stock.

The foregoing is a short statement of the substance of a long complaint, but it contains all that is needful for a consideration of its sufficiency, except such further matter as may be mentioned hereafter. It is difficult to see how a general demurrer could have been sustained to the complaint, for it certainly states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action upon the $13,000 note. Nor is the cause of action upon the note mentioned in that part of the demurrer which is based upon the improper joining of several causes of action. Indeed, the case, so far as the complaint is concerned, seems to be argued on both sides upon the theory of leaving out of view the averments about the note; and the contention of appellants' counsel is that the other parts of the complaint are defective, because they do not state sufficient facts, because they improperly unite several causes of action, and because they are ambiguous, etc. They say in their brief: "If the action is only to recover $13,000, the amount of the note, and the interest thereon, and to sell the pledged property, it may be, and probably is, sufficient to withstand the first ground of demurrer; but if it is relied upon to recover any other indebtedness arising out of the contract, either express or implied, it fails to show how the indebtedness arose, the time of the creation or the amount thereof, and is all in one count." But, as the question of the validity of the averments other than those which concern the note give rise to the litigation, and is interwoven with the findings and judgment, we may as well follow counsel, and consider whether or not the complaint—leaving out of view the averments about the note—is vulnerable to the attacks of the demurrer.

The complaint sets forth only one cause of action, which is for the enforcement and foreclosure of a lien; and, as necessary to the determination of the amount for which the lien may be enforced, an accounting. For those purposes the averments of the complaint are sufficient. They show that the appellant was the trusted agent of respondent, acting in a fiduciary capacity, and having for a long period of time the entire charge and control of its business at Los Angeles; and that by various kinds of misconduct, which are specially described, and which are averred to consist of a large number of items, he caused losses, and became liable in large sums of money, the true amounts of which cannot be ascertained and determined without an accounting by appellant of the administration of his trust. This is sufficient ground for an accounting in equity. "Even where jurisdiction in equity is limited to cases where at law there is no full, complete, and adequate remedy, a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce a pledge of stock given as security for claims and liabilities then existing or afterwards to be incurred, where these claims and liabilities are alleged to consist of a large number of items of money loaned, notes discounted, and indorsements made for accommodations. Such a case gives rise to a matter of account, and account is a matter of equity jurisdiction." Jones, Pl. § 641; and see cases there cited. "And also where the accounts are too complicated to be dealt with in a court of law, a court of equity will entertain jurisdiction." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 262; Taylor v. Tompkins, 2 Heisk. 89. But, in addition to all this, the case at bar presents a fiduciary relation between the parties in the nature of a trust, which brings it especially within equitable remedies. The case of Thornton v. Thornton, 31 Grat. 212, is very similar to the case at bar. There the defendant had been intrusted for several years with the management of plaintiff's property in Fairfax county, and was charged with many acts of misconduct similar to those charged in this case; and the court enjoined the defendant from proceeding with an action which he had commenced in a court of law, and held that it was "a proper case for equitable interposition." The court quotes from the opinion of Vice Chancellor Stuart in Makepeace v. Rogers, 11 Jur. (N. S.) 215, as follows: "I conceive that, wherever the relation between the person who seeks an account and the person against whom he seeks it partakes of a fiduciary character, a trust is reposed by the plaintiff in the defendant, and that that trust is not the same as is represented to exist in the ordinary employment of an agent, such as a builder or other tradesman." And it is stated that, "in affirming this judgment of the vice chancellor Lord Justice Turner said there was no authority to show that a bill would not lie at any time by a principal against his agent for an account." In Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1421, it is said: "The instances in which the legal remedies are held to be inadequate, and therefore a suit in equity for an accounting proper are: * * * (2) Where the accounts are all on one side, but there are circumstances of great complications or difficulties in the way of adequate relief at law; (3) where a fiduciary relation exists between the parties, and a duty rests upon the defendant to render an account." And it is said in a note that: "Where the relation is such that a confidence is reposed by the principal in his agent, and the matters for which an accounting is sought are peculiarly within the knowledge of the latter, equity will assume jurisdiction." Many authorities are cited by the author to these points. See, also, Conyngham's Appeal, 57 Pa. St. 474; Weaver v. Fisher, 110 Ill. 146.

Such, then, being the nature of the action, and the facts averred warranting the institution of such an action, the points made by appellant that each averment of acts of misconduct by appellant constitutes a separate cause of action, which cannot be properly joined with either of the others, and that the complaint is uncertain, etc., because it does not state more particularly how each item of alleged liability arose, when it was created, and especially its amount, cannot be maintained. The purpose of the action was to call appellant to an accounting touching matters peculiarly within his knowledge, and arising out of the trust reposed in him; and we think that for this purpose the cause of action is stated with sufficient particularity. West v. Brewster, 1 Duer, 647; Green v. Brooks, 81 Cal. 333, 22 Pac. 849; Rippe v. Stogdill, 61 Wis. 38, 20 N. W. 645; Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. v. Hutchinson Mortg. Co., 44 Fed. 219. And the character of the complaint is not changed by the averment that before the commencement of the action an investigation had shown that the respondents had suffered a loss of "upwards of $65,000."

We are not able to see any insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. They dispose generally of the issues made by the pleadings, are very full, and the objections to them are mainly those made to the complaint. There is a good deal of adverse criticism by appellant's counsel of the finding of the court concerning certain bookkeepers and other employés of respondent, that "it was not their duty to keep a correct and accurate, or any, set of books, or to send monthly statements of the business in said county of Los Angeles to the principal office of the company in San Francisco." The statement that it was not their duty to keep accurate books is, considered by itself, a very awkward one; but it was evidently made in response to the averment and contention of appellant that other employés were alone responsible for certain manipulations of the books, and that appellant had no duty to perform in the premises; and it is followed by the statement that "it was the duty of said Merick Reynolds, under his contract with the said corporation plaintiff, and as manager thereof, to see that said bookkeepers kept correct and accurate sets of books, and that correct monthly statements" were sent to the main office; that he "willfully failed and neglected to perform his duty in this regard"; that false statements were sent by him, and that the falsifications of the books were made with his knowledge, consent, and acquiescence. Of course, what the facts were, depends upon the evidence, which is not before us.

A good deal is said in the briefs about a certain tender alleged to have been made by appellants, but, without determining the questions whether the situation was such as to make a tender available at all, or whether it was properly made and kept good, it is sufficient to say that it was of a sum far less than the amount found due. We think that the denials in the answer to the cross complaint are sufficient, particularly in the absence of any showing that the case was not tried upon the theory of the sufficiency of such denials.

It is not feasible, within a reasonable space, to follow further the discussions of counsel. We see no valid reason for disturbing the judgment on this appeal. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OLDHAM. (Cr. 90.)

ROBBERY—ALLEGATION AND PROOF—EVIDENCE OF OWNERSHIP—STATEMENTS OF ACCOMPLICE—CURING ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On an information charging the property stolen to be that of a corporation doing business in the state, and organized under the laws of another state, evidence of a de facto corporation doing business in the state is sufficient.

2. On a prosecution for robbery, possession of the property by the complaining witness, or his agent, at the time it was stolen, is presumptive evidence of ownership.

3. Statements by an alleged accomplice, made after the crime was committed, and in defendant's absence, are not admissible against the latter for any purpose.

4. Error in admitting, under objection and exception, statements made by an alleged accomplice, after the crime was committed, and in defendant's absence, is not cured by instructing the jury, after the case is argued, to disregard such evidence in making up their verdict.

5. Error in admitting statements made by an alleged accomplice after the commission of the robbery, and not in defendant's presence, is not cured by the accomplice testifying to the same facts on the stand.

6. On a trial for robbing a stage coach in transit, there was no error in admitting evidence that defendant previously borrowed a saddle, and attempted to buy cartridges for his gun.

7. An instruction which intimates that, if the jury believe the testimony of a witness willfully false in any particular, they must, as a matter of law, reject all his testimony, is erroneous.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county.

David Oldham was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed.

Seawell & Pemberton, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Upon a certain afternoon the stage traveling from Ukiah to the coast was stopped by one Hilton, a highwayman, and possibly another, and Wells, Fargo & Co.'s boxes, containing about $1,000, were taken. It is conceded that the defendant was not present at the robbery, but it is claimed that, though miles distant at the time, still he connived, abetted, aided, and encouraged the commission of the offense, and that therefore, under the Penal Code of this state, he is equally guilty as a principal.

1. The information charged the property stolen to have been the property of Wells, Fargo & Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the territory of Colorado, and doing business in the state of California. At the trial it was proven that Wells, Fargo & Co. was a corporation de facto, doing business in this state. It is now insisted that there was a failure of proof in not establishing the corporation to have been organized under the laws of the territory of Colorado. Counsel concede that if no such allegation had been laid in the information, the proof would have been unnecessary, but, the fact being so stated, it became material, made so by the pleader, and should have been established as any other material fact in the case. Such contention has support (see State v. Newland, 7 Iowa, 242); but this court has never followed the doctrine there outlined. In People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 651, the identical question here presented was before the court, and it was held that evidence of a de facto corporation was sufficient to support the charge as here laid. The same principle was also involved, and finds full support, in People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 519, and People v. Hughes, 29 Cal. 260. The evidence we find in the record as to the de facto character of this corporation, the nature of the business in which it was engaged, etc., is not at all clear and conclusive; and, as the case must be returned to the lower court for a new trial, the introduction of some additional evidence upon these points would be time well spent.

2. It is claimed that there is no evidence showing the ownership of the money stolen to have been in Wells, Fargo & Co. This contention is not well founded. The evidence indicates the money to have been in the hands of one Hart, as the agent and servant of Wells, Fargo & Co., at Ukiah, and, as such agent and servant, he gave it into the possession of the stage driver, to be carried by him to certain points upon the road, and while so in transit it was stolen. The lawful possession of the money by Hart was the possession of Wells, Fargo & Co., and likewise the actual lawful possession of it by the driver of the stage was the possession of the company. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, in larceny or robbery, possession of the stolen property is sufficient evidence of ownership. The criminal law of this state is not favorably disposed in allowing criminals to escape upon technicalities of this character; and, as supporting the principle here declared, we cite People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 77; People v. Davis, 97 Cal. 194, 31 Pac. 1109.

3. It is conceded that one George Hilton was the acting, participating robber. At the trial he took the witness stand, and so stated, giving all the details bearing upon the perpetration of the crime, and directly charging the defendant as a particeps criminis. It is now claimed by the prosecution that the defendant Oldham, though several miles distant at the immediate time of the robbery, was a co-conspirator, and aided and encouraged the commission of the crime, and that Hilton's testimony in this regard is true. Hilton was arrested, some seven days after the robbery, in an adjoining county. The officer arresting him testified as a witness at the trial to statements made by Hilton when arrested, pertaining to the commission of the offense and Oldham's connection therewith. Another witness (Stanley) testified to statements made by Hilton while in jail, after his arrest, and in the absence of the defendant. The statements made by Hilton at this time amounted to a confession, and included all the details of the robbery. All this evidence was admitted under objection of defendant's counsel, and, we are entirely clear, was erroneously admitted before the jury. Evidence of the statements of a co-conspirator, made during the life of the conspiracy, are admissible against the other conspirator; but, after the crime has been committed, the conspiracy is an accomplished fact. It is a thing of the past, and such statements of a co-conspirator stand in no different relation to the law, and are no more admissible against a defendant, than though he were a stranger to the whole transaction, for they are the purest hearsay. This court said, in People v. Moore, 45 Cal. 19: "It was never competent to use as evidence against one on trial for an alleged crime the statements of an accomplice not given as testimony in the case, nor made in the presence of defendant, nor during the pendency of the criminal enterprise and in furtherance of its objects. To hold such testimony admissible would be to ignore the rules of evidence, settled and everywhere recognized from the earliest times." The same doctrine is also reiterated in People v. Dilwood, 94 Cal. 89, 29 Pac. 420. It seems that the trial court admitted some of this objectionable evidence upon the ground that the statements were proper as proving the commission of the robbery by Hilton, but that cannot be so. As against the defendant, the actual commission of the robbery by Hilton could not be proven by his extrajudicial confessions; certainly not, in a case like this, where they were made without his presence and hearing. If Hilton had refused to take the stand and testify, it would not be contended for a moment that his confessions could have been used against this defendant for the purpose of proving the robbery, or for any other purpose.

It is insisted that the foregoing error of the court was cured when the witness Hilton took the stand, and gave to the jury substantially the same statements and confessions he had prior to that time made to the officers. We cannot say that the jury attached no importance to these statements of Hilton, made shortly after the commission of the crime, nor that the verdict would have been the same if they had been rejected by the court. It is further insisted that the error of the court was cured by the following instruction given to the jury: "I charge you that no statements, or admissions, or confessions (other than his own sworn testimony in court), made by the alleged accomplice, Hilton, after the commission of the offense charged, and not in the presence of the defendant, should be considered by you as evidence in this case against this defendant, as tending to connect him with the offense." Judges are not justified by the law in admitting evidence before the jury, under objection and exception, and then, after the case has been argued by counsel, instruct the jury that such evidence should not be considered by them in making up their verdict. Such a course, if practiced, certainly would be out of the ordinary, and not fair to a defendant. This is the fair interpretation of the instruction; and if the judge also intimated, by this particular charge to the jury, that the admissions and confessions of Hilton, not under oath, and made subsequent to the commission of the robbery, and without the presence of the defendant, were admissible in this case for the purpose of proving a robbery, then, as already suggested, the instruction was clearly erroneous from that standpoint.

4. We think the evidence of the various witnesses offered by the people, as to the borrowing of a saddle, the hauling of the blacksmith tools, and the attempt to purchase cartridges for the gun, was proper and relevant. Of course, the reason why the dealer refused to sell to defendant cartridges was wholly immaterial.

5. The judge gave the jury the following instruction: "If you believe that any witness has willfully testified falsely to a material fact in this case, you should distrust his evidence. Yea, I will go further, and, as a matter of law, will state to you that, if you believe any witness has willfully and intentionally testified falsely to any material fact, you may discard his evidence entirely, and give it no consideration except to reject it. I don't tell you to do this. It is a matter resting in your sound discretion; and I will say that it is your duty, as a matter of law, acting as jurors." This instruction is not clear, but, upon the contrary, somewhat involved. If by the final clause thereof the judge meant to say that, if the jury believe a witness to be willfully false in one portion of his testimony, it is their duty, as a matter of law, to reject all his testimony, then the instruction is not legally sound. It draws the line too strictly, and is opposed to the principles declared in People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 491, and People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 10 Pac. 502.

6. The instruction of the court as to what would be sufficient evidence of corroboration of Hilton's testimony was not justified by any evidence found in this record. We find nothing there, other than Hilton's testimony that defendant promised to establish an alibi for him, if arrested for the commission of the robbery. The other matters appearing in the record, to which counsel for appellant make objection, probably, will not arise upon a second trial of the case, and for that reason we refrain from passing upon them. It is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Homicide—Evidence—Collateral Issues—Self-Defense—Objection to Evidence—Harmless Error — Instruction — Misconduct of Jurors.

1. In a prosecution for a homicide in a difficulty between deceased and defendant arising from defendant's attempt to pass over a road over which he claimed the right to pass, which right was disputed by deceased, evidence in regard to the status of the road should be kept within narrow limits.

2. When one person, without legal right, claims or denies to another the right to pass over land, neither is justified in killing the other to prevent the assertion by such other of his alleged right.

3. When a person is attempting to pass over the land of another without legal right, and intends to do so at all hazards,—such other person also intending to prevent his passage at all hazards,—either person is entitled to take the life of the other in self-defense, he himself having been guilty of no overt act to bring on an affray.

4. In a trial for murder, an objection to the introduction in evidence of clothes worn by deceased when killed, after evidence that they were the clothes then worn, on the ground that no predicate was laid therefor, is too general, and fails to raise the objection that they were inadmissible on the ground that there was no evidence to show that they were in the same condition as when worn by deceased.

5. A witness for the state, who was the first to find deceased's body, testified that a stone was lying near deceased's hand, and denied having made a statement to third persons that the stone was in his hand. There was no evidence that the stone was in deceased's hand after his death. Held, that the exclusion of testimony to impeach the witness—to show that he did make such statement—is not prejudicial,—since, as it was inadmissible to prove that the stone was in deceased's hand, its only effect would be to eliminate the testimony as to the position of the stone near deceased's hand, which was favorable to defendant.

6. The homicide having taken place in defendant's attempt to pass over a road over which deceased denied his right to pass, an instruction that if the necessity for the killing arose by the fault of defendant, or if it was brought on by his misconduct, he cannot set up the defense of self-defense, is erroneous, as tending to impress the jury with the belief that defendant's attempt to pass over the road was such misconduct as to deprive him of the right of self-defense.

7. That defendant began the affray does not absolutely deprive him of the right of self-defense.

8. In a trial for murder, misconduct of jurors, in experimenting on their own account with a rifle similar to the one with which defendant killed accused, to see how far powder marks would be carried upon clothing by the fire, is ground for reversal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Francis M. Conkling was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

G. B. Montgomery, and S. F. Geil, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant has been convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and now appeals from the judgment and order denying such motion.

Deceased was in the possession of a certain tract of land, as a renter. A road passed over this land, which defendant and residents of the neighborhood were accustomed to travel, going to and from the post office and trading station. Deceased placed a fence across this road for the purpose of stopping travel thereon. Upon a certain Friday, defendant met the deceased, his brother, and the owner of the land, at the point of obstruction, and after heated language, threats, etc., passing between the parties, the defendant was prevented from continuing his journey, and was forced to retrace his steps. A day or two later he bought a rifle, and within a day or two thereafter, not in the presence of deceased, he went and tore down the fence erected across the road. Subsequently, and with but a day or two intervening, he passed over the road, and across the deceased's land, presumably unobserved, upon his way to the post office. In the afternoon, upon his homeward journey, he approached the point where the road had been obstructed by the fence, having his rifle with him in his buggy. Deceased being at the point of obstruction, trouble arose between them, and defendant shot and killed the deceased with his rifle. There were no eyewitnesses to the tragedy, other than defendant and the dead man.

There was considerable evidence introduced at the trial as to the ownership of the land over which this road passed, and as to deceased's rights to the road under his lease. Counsel for defendant attempted to show that the road was a valid, legal road, by user and prescription, but this evidence was not admitted. It is possible that the jury, by reason of the evidence that was placed before them upon these questions, were confused to some degree in arriving at a determination as to the exact bearing this class of evidence had upon the merits of the case. But a new trial must be ordered for other reasons, and it becomes unnecessary to look at these matters in detail. Upon a second trial of the case, we think it very proper for the court to keep within narrow limits any investigation as to the title to the land, or the status of this road. These questions are purely collateral to the issue on trial, and the jurors' minds should not be led away from the main question under investigation. For a clear understanding of the evidence bearing upon the homicide, the jury should have been enlightened upon these collateral questions to the extent of showing generally that deceased was in possession of the land as a lessee, that he obstructed the road leading over the land for the purpose of preventing travel thereon, and that defendant claimed that the road was such a road as that he had a right to travel over it, and the deceased had no right to prevent him from so doing. This was far enough for the evidence to go in this direction. It showed the facts leading up to the homicide, and was all that was necessary for the jury to know in order to fully comprehend the case in its important essentials. There is no question of defense of property or habitation here, which would justify the deceased in killing the defendant, nor any question of deceased's preventing defendant from exercising a right which would, in law, justify defendant in killing the deceased. Conceding defendant had the legal right to travel the road, he was not justified in killing deceased in order that he might exercise that right; and, conceding defendant had no right to travel the road, deceased was not justified in killing him to prevent him from traveling it. Defendant admitted the killing, and justified upon the plea of self-defense, and that was the question in the case. The relative rights of the parties, as to the road, were not an issue before the jury, for they shed no light upon the solution of the question as to what actually occurred at the immediate time of the killing.

If it be assumed that, at the time of the killing, deceased was at the opening in the fence, for the purpose of preventing the defendant, at all hazards, from going through, and if it also be assumed that defendant was there, intending to pass through at all hazards, still the question of self-defense is presented to the jury, regardless of the respective rights of the parties to the road. Under such circumstances, the man who began the deadly affray—that is, who, by some overt act, caused the other, as a reasonable man, to believe that he was in great danger of loss of life or limb—placed himself without the protection of the law, and must take the consequences, whether those consequences were his death upon the ground, or the penalty imposed after trial by judge and jury.

During the course of the trial the prosecution offered in evidence a vest and two shirts which were worn by deceased at the time he was killed. The defendant objected to this evidence on the ground that the proper predicate had not been laid for its introduction. At that time evidence had been introduced showing these garments to have been those worn by the deceased at the time he was killed, and, under such circumstances, we consider the objection of the defendant anything but plain and explicit. Counsel now insist that the objection went to the point that the clothes, when offered in evidence, were not shown to be in the same condition as when taken from the body. It was but fair to the court and to the people that this objection should have been framed in more direct and explicit language. It was too indefinite to give the court any information as to the point now raised by counsel. While it is the rule that evidence of this character, in order to justify its admission before the jury, should be shown to be in the same condition when offered as when taken from the body, especially as to the particular point towards which the evidence is directed, yet this objection was too broad and general and vague to justify a review here of the ruling made by the trial court. Upon first thought, the conclusion would be arrived at that the objection went to a failure of the identification of the clothing, but it seems that such was not its purpose; and, indeed, upon an examination of the lexicographers, the word "predicate" would seem to be of doubtful application, even when used in that sense. A similar question was presented to this court in People v. O'Brien, 78 Cal. 44, 20 Pac. 359, and it was held that the objection to the evidence offered was so broad that the court's ruling would not be considered.

Howard Hardwick, a younger brother of deceased, was first at the scene of the homicide. He was called as a witness by the defense, and testified that when he viewed the body he observed a rock, about the size of a goose egg, three feet from deceased's left hand. Defendant's counsel then asked him: "Q. Did you on the 1st of March, 1895, at your father's house, tell Virgil Conkling and Mrs. German that the deceased had a rock in his left hand, and that a hatchet was right close to his right hand, or near his body? A. No, sir; I never told him that. I might have told them the hatchet was there. Q. Did you ever tell them that a rock was in either hand of the deceased? A. No, sir." Virgil Conkling was then called, and asked: "Q. Did Howard Hardwick at that time inform you and your mother that the deceased had a rock in his left hand, and that the hatchet was near his right hand?" An objection was sustained to this question. The evidence of Conkling, if admissible at all, was admissible for the single purpose of impeaching the witness Hardwick by showing his contradictory statements, as allowed by sections 2049 and 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was clearly not admissible as proving a fact, for it was hearsay of the plainest character. As far as the question pertained to the hatchet, the objection was properly sustained, for Hardwick himself testified that he might have told Virgil Conkling that the hatchet was there. Hence there was nothing to contradict in this regard, and Conkling's evidence, as to that point, was clearly objectionable. But let us see as to the rock. Hardwick testified that he found the rock three feet from deceased's left hand. It was then proposed to impeach him by showing that he told Conkling it was in his left hand. The question now presents itself, why should Conkling's evidence have been admitted? How could it have legally served the interests of the defendant offering it? As we have seen, it was clearly improper for the purpose of proving as a fact that the dead man held a rock in his left hand; and, if admitted to impeach Hardwick as to the fact that a rock was lying three feet from his left hand, then, Hardwick being impeached, the rock is removed from the case, and the defendant has been injured by impeaching his own witness, rather than benefited. For, as far as his interests were concerned, it was better to have a rock within three feet of the hand of the dead man than to have had no rock there at all. In other words, the proposition simply comes to this: The evidence of Hardwick as to the rock was not prejudicial to defendant's case, and it is only where the evidence produced by counsel results in injury to his own cause that the aforesaid sections of the Code as to impeachment of a witness by contradictory statements may be invoked. See People v. Mitchell, 94 Cal. 556, 29 Pac. 1106; People v. Jacobs, 49 Cal. 384.

The court instructed the jury upon the law of the case as follows: "The law provides a remedy for a person unlawfully obstructed in the use of his property, or unlawfully prevented from the free enjoyment thereof, and does not justify such person in assaulting or killing the one so obstructing its use or preventing its enjoyment, for that reason alone. and if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant killed the deceased, then, to render such killing justifiable, it must appear that the defendant was wholly without any fault imputable to him by law, in bringing about the commencement of the difficulty in which the mortal wound was given; and, while it is true that an honest apprehension of danger to life or limb may justify a man for taking the life of another, yet that apprehension must arise out of a reasonable cause. But a cause which originates in the fault of the person himself in a quarrel which he has provoked, or in a danger which he has voluntarily brought upon himself by his own misconduct, cannot be considered reasonable, or sufficient in law to support a well-grounded apprehension of imminent danger to his person. Error of apprehension the law overlooks, when a man is called upon to act on appearances, but it does not overlook dishonesty of apprehension. Hence, a real or apparent necessity brought about by the design, contrivance, or fault of the defendant, cannot be availed of as a defense for the commission of a crime or a homicide." We think this instruction was a trespass upon the rights of the defendant, as not containing a sound exposition of the law. There was no evidence in the case that the defendant was the first assailant, and then withdrew, or attempted in good faith to withdraw, from the affray before he fired the fatal shot. In fact, defendant's own testimony is to the contrary. For this reason the instruction, regardless of the soundness of the law covered by it, would seem to be without the facts, and not pertinent to the issues under investigation; and upon a second trial of this case, the evidence being the same, we think the court could well refuse an application for the giving of the principle. But here we cannot say that no injury resulted to defendant from this charge, for it is broad in its language, and covers much ground. It says, in effect, that, if the necessity for the killing arose by the fault of defendant, then the killing was not done in self-defense; and, again, it says, if the danger which surrounded defendant was one brought upon himself by his own misconduct, he cannot defend himself against it. Aside from any question as to the immediate cause which at the time of the killing precipitated the affray, this language of the instruction is broad enough to justify the jury in believing that it was such a fault or misconduct upon the part of the defendant, in attempting to travel this road under existing circumstances, as to deprive him of the right of self-defense, if attacked by deceased at the point where the road was obstructed. Such, certainly, is not the law, and neither court nor counsel for the people would so contend. Taking the instruction as a whole, the principle there declared has some support in the law, and authority may be found for it in a few of the earlier decisions of this court. But the great weight of authority looks the other way, and section 197 of the Penal Code declares a contrary doctrine. This rigid doctrine, broadly stated by Sergeant Hawkins, is, "No man shall justify the killing of another by pretense of necessity, unless he were himself wholly without fault in bringing that necessity upon himself." 1 Hawk. P. C. 82, 83. The same principle is thus stated in another form, "Neither does it lie in the mouth of a party first making a felonious attack upon another, without any lawful provocation, to urge, even in alleviation, this plea of necessity in self-defense, though perhaps it existed in fact." 1 East, P. C. p. 278. But such law is directly opposed by Lord Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown (pages 479, 480), and is also contrary to the whole weight of modern authority. See Stoffer v. State, 15 Ohio St. 47. By the extreme doctrine we have cited, and which is followed in the instruction of the judge in this case, the party first at fault, the one beginning the affray, absolutely forfeits to the other his right to live,—to the extent, at least, of the difficulty which he has created. Having committed the first wrongful act, the plea of self-defense is foreclosed to him, and his life is the penalty, no matter what turn the affray may subsequently take. This doctrine would seem to be utterly inconsistent with the whole theory of self-defense, and gives a party assailed the absolute right to avenge his own wrongs. It authorizes the party first assailed to kill his adversary when he is in no danger, and to defend himself when no defense is necessary. Killing under such circumstances is not done in self-defense, for the necessity to kill is not present, but it is simply wreaking vengeance in satisfaction of a prior wrong; and, in law, the commission of one crime can never justify the commission of another. The true principle is well stated in Horrigan & Thompson's Cases of Self-Defense (page 233): "We are thus brought to the conclusion that where a person has been feloniously assailed, and the felon has desisted from his attempt and taken to flight, the right to pursue for the purpose of private defense ceases as soon as, in the reasonable belief of the assailed, the danger has ceased to be immediate and impending." In the consideration of this question this court, in a few early cases, has wandered from the true path, to wit: People v. Lamb, 17 Cal. 323; People v. Travis, 56 Cal. 254; and People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 306. It will be observed that the doctrine declared in the Westlake Case failed to receive the sanction of a majority of the court. As stating the true rule we cite People v. Simons, 60 Cal. 72; People v. Wong Ah Teak, 63 Cal. 544; People v. Bush, 65 Cal. 129, 3 Pac. 590; People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 569, 12 Pac. 783. And, as discussing the entire question, we refer to People v. Button, 106 Cal. 628, 39 Pac. 1073. See, also, People v. Hecker (Cal.) 42 Pac. 307.

The distance between the deceased and defendant at the time the fatal shot was fired was a vital issue in the case. The clothing worn by the deceased was in evidence, and, when exhibited to the jury, showed no powder marks. When the defendant's motion for a new trial came before the court, he offered the affidavits of certain parties to the effect that, during the progress of the trial, two of the jurors borrowed a rifle similar to that with which the deceased was killed, bought some cotton drilling, retired to the outskirts of the city, and there made experiments, by firing the rifle, for the purpose of determining at what distance powder marks would be carried by the fire. The evidence upon this question disclosed by the affidavits is circumstantial, but, we think, amply sufficient to establish the fact that these things were done by the two jurors. Especially is this so when we pause to consider that those jurors have not denied the fact by counter affidavits. They were evidently honest, and desirous of getting at the truth of the matter; but they were too zealous, and their misconduct in this particular demands a retrial of the case. Jurors cannot be permitted to investigate the case outside the courtroom. They must decide the guilt or the innocence of the defendant upon the evidence introduced at the trial. It is impossible for this court to say that this outside investigation did not affect the result, as to the character of the verdict rendered; for, when misconduct of jurors is shown, it is presumed to be injurious to defendant, unless the contrary appears. People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 37 Pac. 207.

We find nothing further in the record demanding our consideration. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HAIGHT v. TRYON. (S. F. 245.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. March 23, 1896.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

1. The refusal of the court to find on certain issues cannot be reviewed on appeal where appellant does not include such refusal as one of the grounds on which a new trial is asked.

2. Specifications of error based on the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain findings must specify wherein the evidence is insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county.

Action by Daniel Haight against Dennis Tryon for a partnership accounting. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Bledsoe, for appellant. L. F. Cooper, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action for a partnership accounting, in which findings and judgment were in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial.

1. Plaintiff asked the court below to find upon certain issues which he contended were presented by the pleadings, and which he deemed material. His request was refused, and he took an exception, which he now seeks to have reviewed as an error of law. No such practice is recognized by our present method of procedure provided by the Code. Lamb v. Harbaugh, 105 Cal. 680, 692, 39 Pac. 56. It is the duty of the court to find upon all the material issues, regardless of any request of the parties, and a failure in that respect is ground for a new trial to the party aggrieved as "a decision against law." Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 17; Spotts v. Hanley, 85 Cal. 168, 24 Pac. 738. In this case, however, plaintiff did not include that as one of the grounds upon which a new trial was asked, and the error, therefore, if such there be, does not arise upon the record.

2. It is claimed that the evidence does not support the findings in several particulars, but this objection we are likewise precluded from reviewing for want of any sufficient specification. The form of the specifications is exemplified by the following: "To findings, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the court the plaintiff then and there duly excepted upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding, in this: The evidence clearly shows that the total amount contributed to the partnership by Dennis Tryon was the sum of $3,684, and the total amount contributed to the partnership by Daniel Haight was the sum of $3,151.55." This is in no essential a sufficient specification of the particulars to enable us to review the evidence. Spotts v. Hanley, supra. Speaking in that case of specifications in no material respect different from the one above quoted, it is said: "Just such specifications were condemned in Parker v. Reay, 76 Cal. 105, 18 Pac. 124, approving Eddelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 279, in which last it is said, speaking of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure: 'The purpose of the statute is apparent. It was to direct the attention of the court and counsel to the particulars relied on by the moving party, to the end that the evidence bearing on the specifications of error might be inserted in the statement and considered by the court.'" The other attempted specifications are equally vicious and devoid of a single requisite. None of them purport to state wherein the evidence is insufficient, but contain simply general statements of what it shows. As suggested by Mr. Hayne: "It is not necessary that the specifications should state what the evidence does show. Such a statement is insufficient if standing alone, and surplusage if joined to a proper specification." Haynes, New Trials & App. 432; Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 200, 29 Pac. 31; Kumle v. Grand Lodge (Cal.) 42 Pac. 634.

The other points require no special notice. They involve no error, and the judgment and order must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

GOULD v. EATON et al. (L. A. 23.)[1]

PERCOLATING WATERS—TITLE.

Percolating waters belong absolutely to the owner of the soil, and his title thereto is not affected by the fact that an impervious strata beneath, and on which the porous strata containing the water rests in close contact, diverts the course of percolation, to and over adjoining land, into a natural stream.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by one Gould against one Eaton and others to enjoin the diversion of surface springs and percolating waters supplying a natural stream. From a judgment granting relief only as to the springs, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Canfield, for appellant. Wright & Day and B. F. Thomas, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The Cold Spring branch of Montecito creek has its rise in the Santa Inez Mountains, and flows in a southerly direction through a cañon on the southerly slope of said mountains. These mountains, in the neighborhood of said stream, are composed chiefly of parallel strata of sandstone, extending across the cañon, and separated by seams parallel with the strata, filled with clay which is impervious to water. This sandstone is porous, and fissured with seams and cracks, both parallel with the strata and transversely thereto. The trend of the strata is nearly east and west, and nearly at right angles with the general course of the cañon and of the stream; and the dip of the strata is towards the north, and at an angle of about 80 degrees. The stream has a fall of about 400 feet to the mile, and its natural supply is the rain which falls upon the adjacent mountains, and descends into the sandstone, percolating through it, and passing along the seams and cracks thereof in the direction of the trend of the strata. The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land through which it flows, and from which his land derives a benefit. In October, 1892, the owner of the tract of land extending on both sides of the stream, above that of the plaintiff granted to the defendants the right to enter thereon and excavate a tunnel for developing water; and in pursuance thereof the defendants commenced the construction of a tunnel at a point about 30 feet west of the stream, and at an elevation of about 4 feet above its level, and continued the construction of said tunnel in a northerly direction for about 600 feet. The tunnel was constructed so as to be, throughout the greater part of its length, below the level of the stream, and so that its depth below the level of the stream increased gradually towards the head or northern end, where it was about 50 feet below the level of the stream. At a point about 300 feet from the mouth of the tunnel there is a bold outcropping of one of the strata of said sandstone, and for a space of 30 yards along the cañon, extending from near the foot of the western slope of the mountains to the margin of the stream, a distance of about 100 feet, the water, prior to the construction of the tunnel, percolating through this stratum, moistened the ground, and sustained thereon a growth of ferns. Within this growth of ferns there existed, prior to the construction of the tunnel, certain small springs, the waters of which came to the surface in such quantities as to be visible, and, percolating through said ferns, seeped into the stream, along the western bank thereof, but did not form a defined channel or current. The tunnel was constructed a short distance west of this growth of ferns and the locality of these springs, and also about 40 feet below the level of the same; and its effect has been to intercept and divert into and through said tunnel the waters that had previously supplied said springs, and to cause the same, and the seepage therefrom into the stream, to become wholly dried up. The porous character of the sandstone formation which crosses the cañon permits water from the ground neighboring to and overlying said tunnel, and water from the channel of said stream, to drain into the tunnel. The court finds that the intention of the defendants in running said tunnel was to intercept and divert into said tunnel the subterranean waters stored in and percolating through said sandstone, and passing along the seams and cracks thereof, and particularly to intersect the aforesaid stratum of sandstone, and to intercept and divert into the tunnel the water percolating and passing through and along said stratum and the seams and cracks thereof, but that they did not intend to divert from their natural course any waters flowing from said springs, or to divert from said stream any water naturally flowing in the channel thereof, and that the said small springs, and the waters percolating or seeping therefrom, are the only tributaries of said stream affected in any way by the construction of said tunnel.

The plaintiff brought the present action to restrain the defendants from diverting the waters of the stream by means of said tunnel, and from preventing the water which would issue from the mouth of the tunnel from flowing back into the channel of the stream. The court found that at the time of the trial of the action there was a flow of water from the tunnel, at its mouth, of 3.92 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that of this amount 1.43 inches was, and, under the conditions then existing, would be, obstructed and diverted, by reason of the tunnel, from the natural course of the waters flowing in said stream; that, except as to said 1.43 inches, the whole of the flow of water from said tunnel had been developed and gathered from the subterranean waters percolating in the sandstone of the adjacent mountains, and passing along the seams and cracks thereof, and did not come from the channel of said stream. Judgment was thereupon rendered, giving to the plaintiff the relief asked by him, to the extent of 1.43 inches. From this judgment, in so far as, by its terms, the defendants are permitted to appropriate and divert the waters flowing from the tunnel in excess of 1.43 inches, the plaintiff has appealed. The appeal is presented here upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions.

The rule is well established that the principles of law which govern the right to waters flowing upon the surface of the earth are inapplicable to waters which are beneath its surface and percolate through the soil. The water which is held by the soil is a portion of the soil itself, and belongs to the owner of the land, as fully as any other ingredient of the land. Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 303; Railroad Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615, 30 Pac. 783. This rule is not changed by the character of the material through which the water percolates,—whether it be loose sand, or a more compact sandstone. So long as the water is in a condition of filtration or percolation, it is a part of the soil, and subject to the sole dominion of the proprietor of the land in which it is found. The appellant does not dispute this proposition of law, but contends that it is inapplicable to the present case, inasmuch as it appears from the findings of fact herein that by reason of the seam of clay which separated the strata of sandstone, and which is impervious to water, the waters, which had, up to that point, been in a state of percolation through the sandstone, ceased to be in percolation, and thereafter passed along the seam in the direction of the creek; that this constituted a defined stream of water beneath the surface, and is to be governed by the same laws as govern streams upon the surface of the earth. This conclusion, however, necessitates the inference of a fact from the findings which has not been made by the court, and which will have the effect to defeat the judgment which the court has rendered. The inference of one fact from others, unless such fact is a necessary conclusion from those others, must be made by the trial court; and, if the facts that it has found are such as might authorize different inferences therefrom, it will be assumed that the inference made by the trial court was one that will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment. Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 Pac. 742. The court has not found that there is any flow or stream of water at the seam of the stratum, nor do the findings which it has made authorize such a conclusion. As it must be assumed that the stratum of sandstone is uniformly porous, and extends close to the seam which limits it, it must follow that the water within that stratum is in a state of percolation until it is arrested by the seam, and is thereafter, by reason of gravitation, diverted towards the channel of the creek. The mere diversion of its direction does not, however, change its character from percolating water to a flowing stream. So long as it is within the sandstone, although the lower part of the stratum may be more highly charged with the water than the upper part, it merely percolates through the sandstone until it is freed at the outcropping of the stratum where it borders upon the stream. It is frequently the case that the course of percolating waters is in some definite direction, but the owner of the land in which they are found has the exclusive dominion over them, and does not violate the rights of another by appropriating them to his own use, even though the effect be to divert their course from adjacent lands, or to destroy the advantages therefrom previously enjoyed by an adjacent proprietor. The judgment is affirmed.

CARRIERS—EJECTMENT OF PASSENGERS—DAMAGES—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY—TECHNICAL ERRORS—PLEADINGS—DENIAL ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

1. Where a conductor takes up a passenger's ticket without giving him any check or other evidence of his right to ride, whereby he is expelled by another conductor after changing cars, his right of action will not be limited to the breach of the company's contract, though no force was used in his expulsion, but will include all damages sustained through the company's violation of the duties it assumed in entering into such contract.

2. Where the humiliation resulting from plaintiff's wrongful expulsion from defendant's car produced a recurrence of nervous paroxysms to which she had previously been subject, such injury is a legitimate element of damages, whether plaintiff's susceptibility to nervous disturbance was known to defendant or not.

3. Whether the humiliation consequent on plaintiff's wrongful expulsion from defendant's car was the proximate cause of her subsequent nervous paroxysms is a question for the jury.

4. Whether plaintiff exercised reasonable prudence in undertaking to walk from the station at which she was ejected from defendant's train to a place three miles distant, where a relative lived, instead of waiting several hours for a train, was properly left to the jury.

5. After a cause has been tried on its merits, the judgment will not be reversed, for error in striking out or refusing to strike out a portion of a pleading, if the party against whom the ruling was made was not prejudiced thereby.

6. A denial of an allegation in the complaint for want of sufficient information and belief is properly stricken out, if the matter is presumptively within the knowledge of defendant.

7. A corporation cannot deny for want of sufficient information and belief, if the matters alleged are presumptively within the knowledge of any of its officers, though the officer verifying the answer is himself without any information or belief on the subject.

8. A conductor who has taken up a passenger's ticket en route is chargeable with extreme care in seeing that the passenger is provided with the means of continuing his journey.

9. In an action for the wrongful expulsion of a female passenger, no violence was shown, and there was little evidence of rudeness on the conductor's part; and it appeared that, after plaintiff had walked about a mile towards a town where she had friends, she was taken up by a passing vehicle, and carried the rest of the way, suffering no direct physical injury from her walk. Held, that a verdict for $1,400 was excessive.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county.

Action by Annie L. Sloane and another against the Southern California Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. On condition that plaintiff remit a part of the amount recovered, the order and judgment are affirmed.

W. J. Hunsaker, for appellant. Sweet, Sloane & Kirby and Works & Works, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff Annie L. Sloane purchased a ticket, April 8, 1894, from the agent of the defendant, at North Pomona, for passage from that place to San Diego, and on the same day took passage upon the regular passenger train of the defendant. Before reaching San Bernardino the conductor of the train took up her ticket, without giving her any check or other evidence of her right to be carried to San Diego, and on arriving at San Bernardino she was required to change cars, and enter another train of cars of the defendant. After entering this train of cars the conductor in charge thereof demanded of her her ticket, and upon her stating to him that she had given it to the conductor of the other train, and the circumstances therewith, she was informed by him that she must either pay her fare or leave the train. She had no money with her, and when the train reached East Riverside she left the car. After getting off the train, she started to walk back as far as Colton upon the railroad track, a distance of about three miles, but, after walking a portion of the way, secured a seat in a passing vehicle, and was carried to Colton, where she spent the night with her sister-in-law. On the next day, having borrowed some money with which to purchase another ticket, she resumed her passage, and was carried to San Diego. The present action was brought to recover damages sustained by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant's agents. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,400. From the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

It is contended by the appellant that, as the plaintiff left the car at East Riverside in accordance with the previous directions of the conductor, and no personal violence was used or displayed towards her, her only right of action is for a breach of the defendant's contract to carry her to San Diego, and that the extent of her recovery therefor is the price paid for the second ticket, and a reasonable compensation for the loss of time sustained by her. The plaintiff's right of action against the defendant is not, however, limited to the breach of its contract to carry her to San Diego, but includes full redress for the wrongs sustained by her by reason of the defendant's violation of the obligations which it assumed in entering into such contract. If she was wrongfully prevented by the defendant from completing the passage to San Diego for which it had contracted with her, she could either bring an action simply for the breach of this contract, or she could sue it in tort, for its violation of the duty, as a common carrier, which it assumed upon entering into such contract. Jones v. The Cortez, 17 Cal. 487; Head v. Railroad Co., 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. 217; Carsten v. Railroad Co., 44 Minn. 454, 47 N. W. 49. The complaint in the present case is not merely for the breach of the contract, nor is it merely for the wrong committed in excluding her from the car, but it is to recover the damages sustained by her by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant committed in the violation of its contract. It is in the nature of an action on the case, arising out of the conduct of the defendant in wrongfully depriving her of her ticket, and thereafter, by reason of such wrongful act, excluding her from its car, and refusing to carry out its contract. Although her action is for the tort resulting from the defendant's conduct, the wrong which produced that result was twofold,—depriving her of the evidence of its contract to carry her to San Diego, and afterwards excluding her from its car for failure to produce the evidence of which it had wrongfully deprived her. For the purpose of giving her this right of action, it is immaterial that these different acts were by different agents of the defendant. If the conductor who took up the ticket had himself, at a subsequent point in the trip, excluded her for failure to exhibit it, the liability of the defendant would not be questioned. Its liability is the same, notwithstanding, for its own convenience, it has intrusted the management of its train to different conductors. Muckle v. Railroad Co., 79 Hun, 32, 29 N. Y. Supp. 732. The plaintiff was not called upon to question the right of the first conductor in taking up her ticket, and it was the duty of the defendant to see that she was not thereby deprived of her right to a passage upon its cars.

In her testimony regarding her exclusion from the cars, the plaintiff recounted the interview between her and the conductor, and the manner in which she was directed to leave the car, and it was claimed at the trial that she had been thereby subjected to humiliation and indignity, for which she was entitled to redress. Counsel for the appellant does not question, as a proposition of law, that, if the conductor was insulting and violent in removing her, such treatment forms an element of damage to be recovered by her; but he maintains that the evidence fails to show such conduct. The evidence was, however, before the jury, and they were properly instructed in reference thereto; and, although it might be urged upon them that this evidence was insufficient to establish such conduct, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that it was not proper to submit the question to their judgment.

Evidence was given at the trial tending to show that Mrs. Sloane had been previously subject to insomnia, and also to nervous shocks and paroxysms, and that, owing to her physical condition, she was subject to a recurrence of these shocks or nervous disorder if placed under any great mental excitement; and that, by reason of the excitement caused by her exclusion from the car, there had been a recurrence of insomnia and of these paroxysms. The court instructed the jury that, if they found for the plaintiffs, "in assessing damages, if it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff Annie L. Sloane was wrongfully deprived of her right to ride on defendant's cars, and expelled therefrom in a manner and under circumstances calculated to inflict, and which did inflict, feelings of indignity and insult, the jury is authorized to consider, under the evidence, the injured feelings of the plaintiff, the indignity endured, her mental suffering, the humiliation and wounded pride which one in her condition of life and standing in the community would experience, together with any bodily harm or suffering occasioned, and to award such an amount for damages as will compensate her for such humiliation, suffering, and other detriment." The jury were not specially instructed with reference to any damages that might have been sustained by reason of the recurrence of this disturbance of the nervous system, but it is reasonable to suppose that the above evidence was offered by the plaintiffs for the purpose of recovering damages for the injury that might be thus established, and that, under that portion of the above instruction in which the jury were authorized in assessing damages to consider "any bodily harm or suffering occasioned" by the expulsion of Mrs. Sloane from the cars, it was intended that they should consider this evidence, and the injury which it established. The defendant objected to the introduction of the evidence, and excepted to the instruction, and insists that under no circumstances could the jury consider this effect upon the plaintiff as an element of damage for which the defendant is liable; that the court should not have directed the jury to consider any mental suffering experienced by her.

Counsel for the appellant has discussed, in his brief, the want of liability on the part of the defendant for any damages for mental suffering, and has cited many authorities in support of the proposition that mere mental anxiety, unaccompanied with bodily injury or apprehended peril, does not afford a right of action. To the extent that the term "mental suffering" is included in the above instruction, this proposition is inapplicable. The term, as there used, is to be construed with reference to the context in which it occurs. The "mental suffering," there named, is not the mental anguish or pain referred to in the above proposition cited by the appellant, but is the mental experience which is concomitant with the insult, indignity, and humiliation named in the instruction. It would be a contradiction of terms to hold that the individual whose pride had been humiliated, or whose dignity had been insulted, had no mental suffering in connection therewith, or that this humiliation and insult did not of themselves constitute mental suffering; that he could have redress for the injured pride, but not for the mental suffering it produced. Although mental suffering alone will not support an action, yet it constitutes an aggravation of damages when it naturally ensues from the act complained of. 3 Suth. Dam. § 1245.

The real question presented by the objections and exception of the appellant is whether the subsequent nervous disturbance of the plaintiff was a suffering of the body or of the mind. The interdependence of the mind and body is in many respects so close that it is impossible to distinguish their respective influence upon each other. It must be conceded that a nervous shock or paroxysm, or a disturbance of the nervous system, is distinct from mental anguish, and falls within the physiological, rather than the psychological, branch of the human organism. It is a matter of general knowledge that an attack of sudden fright, or an exposure to imminent peril, has produced in individuals a complete change in their nervous system, and rendered one who was physically strong and vigorous weak and timid. Such a result must be regarded as an injury to the body rather than to the mind, even though the mind be at the same time injuriously affected. Whatever may be the influence by which the nervous system is affected, its action under that influence is entirely distinct from the mental process which is set in motion by the brain. The nerves and nerve centers of the body are a part of the physical system, and are not only susceptible of lesion from external causes, but are also liable to be weakened and destroyed from causes primarily acting upon the mind. If these nerves, or the entire nervous system, are thus affected, there is a physical injury thereby produced; and, if the primal cause of this injury is tortious, it is immaterial whether it is direct, as by a blow, or indirect, through some action upon the mind.

This subject received a very careful and elaborate consideration in the case of Bell v. Railway Co., L. R. 26 Ir. 428. Mrs. Bell was a passenger upon one of the defendant's trains, and by reason of the defendant's negligence in the management of its train suffered great fright, in consequence of which her health was seriously impaired. She had previously been a strong, healthy woman, but it was shown that, after this occurrence, she suffered from fright and nervous shock, and was troubled with insomnia, and that her health was seriously impaired. The jury were instructed that if, in their opinion, great fright was a reasonable and natural consequence of the circumstances in which the defendant by its negligence had placed her, and that she was actually put in fright by those circumstances, and if the injury to her health was, in their opinion, the reasonable and natural consequence of such great fright, and was actually occasioned thereby, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for such injury. It was objected to this instruction that, unless the fright was accompanied by physical injury, even though there might be a nervous shock occasioned by the fright, such damages would be too remote. In holding that this objection was not well founded, and that the nervous shock was to be considered as a bodily injury, the court held that, if such bodily injury might be a natural consequence of fright, it was an element of damage for which a recovery might be had, and, referring to the contention of the defendant, said: "It is admitted that, as the negligence caused fright, if the fright contemporaneously caused physical injury, the damage would not be too remote. The distinction insisted upon is one of time only. The proposition is that, although, if an act of negligence produces such an effect upon particular structures of the body as at the moment to afford palpable evidence of physical injury, the relation of proximate cause and effect exists between such negligence and the injury, yet such relation cannot in law exist in the case of a similar act producing upon the same structures an effect which at a subsequent time—say a week, a fortnight, or a month—must result without any intervening cause in the same physical injury. As well might it be said that a death caused by poison is not to be attributed to the person who administered it, because the mortal effect is not produced contemporaneously with its administration." At the close of its opinion, Lord Chief Baron Palles says: "In conclusion, I am of the opinion that, as the relation between fright and injury to the nerve and brain structures of the body is a matter which depends entirely upon scientific and medical testimony, it is impossible for any court to lay down as a matter of law that, if negligence cause fright, and such fright in its turn so affect such structures as to cause injury to health, such injury cannot be a consequence which, in the ordinary course of things, would flow from the negligence, unless such injury accompanied such negligence in point of time." This case is quoted at great length and with approval in the eighth edition of Mr. Sedgwick's treatise on Damages, at section 860. Mr. Beven, in the recent edition of his work on Negligence (volume 1, pp. 77-81), also comments upon it with great approval. In Purcell v. Railroad Co., 48 Minn. 134, 50 N. W. 1034, the defendant so negligently managed one of its cars that a collision with an approaching cable car seemed imminent, and was so nearly caused that the attendant confusion of ringing alarm bells and of passengers rushing out produced in the plaintiff, who was a passenger on the car, a sudden fright, which threw her into convulsions, and, she being then pregnant, caused in her a miscarriage, and subsequent illness. The court held that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, and that it was liable therefor, even though the immediate result of the negligence was only fright, saying: "A mental shock or disturbance sometimes causes injury or illness of body, especially of the nervous system." See, also, Canning v. Inhabitants of Williamstown, 1 Cush. 451; Seger v. Town of Barkhamsted, 22 Conn. 290; Car Co. v. Dupre, 4 C. C. A. 540, 54 Fed. 646; Stutz v. Railroad Co., 73 Wis. 147, 40 N. W. 653; Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289, 22 Pac. 848. "It is a physical injury to the person to be thrown out of a wagon, or to be compelled to jump out, even though the harm done consists mainly of nervous shock." Warren v. Railroad Co., 163 Mass. 484, 40 N. E. 895.

The mental condition which superinduced the bodily harm in the foregoing cases was fright, but the character of the mental excitation by which the injury to the body is produced is immaterial. If it can be established that the bodily harm is the direct result of the condition, without any intervening cause, it must be held that the act which caused the condition set in motion the agencies by which the injury was produced, and is the proximate cause of such injury. Whether the indignity and humiliation suffered by Mrs. Sloane caused the nervous paroxysm, and the injury to her health from which she subsequently suffered, was a question of fact, to be determined by the jury. There was evidence before them tending to establish such fact, and if they were satisfied, from that evidence, that these results were directly traceable to that cause, and that her expulsion from the car had produced in her such a disturbance of her nervous system as resulted in these paroxysms, they were authorized to include in their verdict whatever damage she had thus sustained. Whether the defendant or its agents knew of her susceptibility to nervous disturbance was immaterial. She had the same rights as any other person who might become a passenger on its road, and was entitled to as high degree of care on its part. It was not necessary that this injury should have been anticipated in order to entitle her to a recovery therefor. Civ. Code, § 3333. If the facts under which she was excluded from the car would be an act of negligence on the part of the defendant as to any and all persons, whoever might sustain injury by such act would be entitled to recover to the full extent of his injury, irrespective of his previous physical condition or susceptibility to harm. In Railroad Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 74, 619, the plaintiff was injured upon a car of the defendant, and thereafter a cancer developed itself upon her breast at the place where she had been hurt. Testimony was given to the effect that such hurt was sufficient to cause the development of the cancer, and that, in the opinion of the experts, they would attribute it to that cause. It was shown that, previous to the accident she had been in apparently good health and condition. The court held that it was for the jury to determine, from the evidence, whether the cancer did result from the injury, and, if so, that the defendant was liable, even though it had no reason to anticipate such a result. "It is not for the defendants to say that, because they did not or could not in fact anticipate such a result of their negligent act, they must therefore be exonerated from liability for such consequences as ensued. They must be taken to know and to contemplate all the natural and proximate consequences, not only that certainly would, but that probably might, flow from their wrongful act." See, also, Fell v. Railroad Co., 44 Fed. 253.

The court properly left to the jury to determine whether Mrs. Sloane exercised reasonable prudence in undertaking the walk from East Riverside to Colton, and, if so, that the injury sustained by her was a proper element of damage to be recovered. It could not say, as matter of law, or instruct the jury, that under the evidence before them, such walk was or was not necessary, or whether the route selected by her was the most feasible; nor would it have been justified in directing them not to allow compensation for any injury sustained by the walk, upon the ground that, if she had waited a few hours, she could have gone upon the cars. Malone v. Railroad Co., 152 Pa. St. 390, 25 Atl. 638.

The refusal of the court to strike out certain portions of the complaint as irrelevant is not a ground for reversal of the judgment. The matter embraced therein was relevant to the plaintiffs' right of recovery, and they were justified in setting forth in their complaint the several acts of the defendant which constituted the wrong for which they sought redress. The defendant does not claim to have been prejudiced by any of the probative matters contained in these allegations, and, even if this matter might have been properly struck out by the court, after the cause has been tried upon its merits the judgment will not be reversed for such technical error.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The cause of action set forth therein is neither ambiguous nor uncertain. It clearly states a single ground of recovery, viz. the unlawful violation by the defendant of the obligation it had assumed to carry Mrs. Sloane to San Diego; and, although the damages caused to her by this violation of its obligation were made up of the injuries to her person, as well as the money paid by her as the consideration of this obligation, they all resulted from the wrong committed by the defendant. It was necessary that she should point out the particulars in which she had sustained injuries from the defendant,—the humiliation, injuries to her health, etc.,—in order that evidence thereof might be given at the trial, and also that the defendant might be prepared to meet such evidence; but it was not necessary that she should designate the particular amount of damage which she had sustained by reason of the indignity that she had been compelled to undergo, distinct from the amount sustained from the injury to her health. These elements of damage were not capable of computation, nor would evidence of such amount have been admissible. This amount was to be determined by the jury, in the exercise of an intelligent discretion.

Neither does the action of the court in striking out a portion of the defendant's answer justify a reversal of the judgment. The denial of an allegation in the complaint for want of sufficient information and belief to enable the defendant to answer the same justifies the court in disregarding or striking out such denial, if the matter is presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant; and, although a corporation does not itself have any knowledge of the matters alleged, but is compelled to act through its officers, whose information may be derived from others, yet it cannot place its denials upon its want of information and belief, if the matters alleged were presumptively within the knowledge of any of its officers, even though the officer verifying the answer was himself without any information or belief upon the subject. In the present case it, moreover, clearly appears that the defendant was not prejudiced by the action of the court. In a separate defense to the action, the defendant directly alleged many of the facts which, in the portion of the answer thus struck out, it had denied for want of information and belief; and, although an admission in one defense is not available as against a denial in another, it is competent for the court to consider such admission for the purpose of determining whether the answer containing the denial is sham or evasive. After the ruling of the court, the defendant amended its answer by directly denying the matters alleged in one of the paragraphs which the court held had been insufficiently denied, and at the trial it stipulated to the truth of the matters that had been denied by it in another of the paragraphs which was stricken out.

The defendant was, therefore, not precluded from defending the action in any particular upon which it relied. After a cause has been tried upon its merits, a ruling of the court either in striking out, or in refusing to strike out, a portion of a pleading, will not justify a reversal of the judgment, if it appears that the party against whom the ruling was made has not been prejudiced thereby, and has been able to present to the court his entire cause of action or defense. Mere technical error, unaccompanied by injury, will be disregarded. Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

The court did not err in its instructions to the jury respecting the measure of care which a railroad company must exercise towards its passengers. Rorer, R. R. p. 951; Railroad Co. v. Homer, 73 Ga. 251. The passenger is not required to question the action of the conductor in taking up his ticket, but has to assume that his conduct in taking or withholding the ticket is in accordance with the rules of the company. It is therefore incumbent upon the conductor to exercise more than ordinary care in seeing that, after he has taken the ticket from the passenger, the latter shall be provided with the means of continuing his journey. It is not error to hold that this requires extreme care and diligence. We are of the opinion, however, that the damages allowed by the jury were excessive, and not justified by the evidence. They were properly told that they could not award the plaintiff exemplary damages, but only such as would be a full and fair compensation to her for the injury and detriment she had suffered as the proximate results of the defendant's wrongful acts. The testimony tending to show that the conductor was rude and insulting in directing her to leave the train at East Riverside is quite meager, and consists more of her statement of its character than of the language used by him. The jury were instructed that, in estimating the amount of damages she could recover by reason of the humiliation in being excluded from the car, they were not at liberty to consider her peculiar nervous temperament, but to allow only such damages as would have resulted to a person of ordinary or usual temperament. So, too, the evidence concerning the effect of this expulsion from the car upon her nervous condition consists more of general statements than of details, and it does not appear that this effect was of more than brief duration. She does not claim to have sustained any direct physical injury by reason of the walk to Colton. She testifies, as do also her husband and Dr. Averill, that, except for her nervous condition, she was in fair health, and that she was abundantly able to take a walk of two or three miles; and it is not suggested that the walk had any effect upon her nervous condition, or that she suffered any direct inconvenience therefrom after her return to San Diego. The walk itself was not attended with any unusual inconvenience. It was upon the railroad track, in a level country, on an afternoon in April. The distance is not given, but, after going about a mile, or as far as the railroad bridge, she was taken into a passing vehicle, and carried to Colton. While the amount of damages that may be awarded in a case like the present is in the discretion of the jury, it must be a reasonable and not an unlimited, discretion, and must be exercised intelligently and in harmony with the testimony before them. We think that the jury in the present case must have been influenced by other considerations than the testimony before them in arriving at the amount of their verdict.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, unless the plaintiffs shall, within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur in the superior court, file with the clerk and give to the defendant a stipulation remitting from the judgment the sum of $1,000. If such stipulation be so filed and delivered, the superior court is directed to amend the judgment in conformity therewith, and thereupon the judgment and order shall stand affirmed.

COSS et al. v. McDONOUGH. (S. F. 221.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ELEVATOR PART OF BUILDING—SUBCONTRACTOR'S LIEN—COMPLAINT—OBJECTIONS TO, ON APPEAL.

1. Where the original plans for a large building provided for an elevator, and the contract for the construction of the elevator was let when contracts for other work were let, the elevator was a substantial part of the building, and the building not completed, so that limitations for filing mechanics' liens would run, until it was finished.

2. The objection that the complaint insufficiently alleges some of the necessary requisites of the claim of lien cannot be urged for the first time on appeal, where the claim of lien was not on the trial objected to as being insufficient in these respects.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, which authorizes a subcontractor, where the original construction contract is void, to enforce his lien directly against the owner on an implied contract, without reference to the construction contract, a subcontractor can enforce his lien under contract with the owner, where both the construction contract and his own contract with the original contractor, on which his claim of lien was based, were void.

4. The fact that a subcontractor is entitled, where his contract with the original contractor is void, to enforce his claim of lien against the owner, does not render him, as to the owner, an original contractor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Three separate actions by Thomas Coss and two others, respectively, against Joseph McDonough, to foreclose mechanics' liens, consolidated. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Freeman & Bates, for appellants. Geo. C. Sargent, J. H. Lucas, and Wickliffe Matthews, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal involves the correctness of a judgment in three consolidated actions for the foreclosure of liens against the property of the defendant McDonough for materials furnished and labor performed in the construction of a building upon certain property of his, situate in the city of Oakland, and described in the complaints. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

It is first insisted that some of the claims of lien were prematurely filed, and that others were filed too late. The court found as a fact that the building was completed April 10, 1893, and, if that finding has support in the evidence, then all the claims of lien were filed within 30 days thereafter. The building to be erected was of large size, costing a quarter of a million dollars, and different contracts were let by the owner for the construction of various portions of it, and among these contracts let was one for the construction of an elevator. The trial court held that the elevator was an essential and necessary part of the building, and held that the completion of the building dated from the completion of the elevator, the work upon this elevator being the last work done. While there may have been a little work done on the elevator upon the 11th and 12th days of April, it must of necessity have been of trifling character, and the finding of the court as to the date of completion will not be disturbed for that reason. For, as said in Mills Co. v. Kremer, 94 Cal. 208, 29 Pac. 633: "Whether the items of work which were done after the date at which the appellant claimed the building was completed were a 'trivial imperfection' was also a matter of fact to be determined by the court." Again, we have no doubt of the soundness of the trial court's views in holding that the elevator was a substantial and necessary part of the building, and until the elevator was constructed and placed in position it could not be said that the building was completed. An elevator was called for by the original plans and specifications. A contract was let for its construction at the same time that other contracts were let. It was attached to the building, and formed an integral part thereof. The fact that the building might have been used without it, and that it was a convenience merely, is immaterial. That is not the question. Conceding an elevator in this character of building to be a mere convenience,—which would seem not to be the fact,—still conveniences are a material part of the building, when provided for by the plans and specifications; and, when so provided for, the building is not completed until the demands of the plans and specifications in this regard have been satisfied.

Appellant now makes objection to the sufficiency of the complaint, and the allegations of the claim of lien of respondent Coss as to the description of the land to be charged with the lien. But appellant offered no demurrer to the complaint at any time; neither did he object to the sufficiency of the claim of lien in this regard when offered in evidence at the trial in the lower court. And upon an examination of both the claim of lien and the complaint based thereon we find nothing of sufficient importance omitted therefrom to authorize this court in the first instance to interfere. The objections are too technical to be raised in this court for the first time. As a fair illustration, it is claimed that the complaint should have stated that the claim of lien contained a "description of the property sufficient for identification." As a matter of fact, the claim of lien contained a description of the real property, and the complaint so alleged the fact. Nothing more is demanded by the statute.

At the trial appellant moved for a nonsuit against the respondent Grubb, because his claim of lien did not state the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, and because there was no money due by the terms of his contract; and the motion was granted as to the first count of his complaint. His complaint was alleged in two counts: First, that he was a subcontractor of one Andrews; and, second, that he furnished the materials and performed the labor at the personal instance and request of appellant McDonough. His recovery of a judgment is based upon the second count, the court having held the contract between McDonough and Andrews to be void. It is now contended that a fatal variance exists between the claim of lien and the count in the complaint upon which recovery was had. It is insisted the claim of lien having set up a contract between respondent Grubb and the original contractor, Andrews, no recovery could be had upon a complaint setting out a contract with defendant McDonough, the owner. We think this contention unsound. That a complaint against the owner of the building may be brought under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon a claim of lien setting up a contract with an alleged original contractor, is expressly held in Lumber Co. v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 646, 22 Pac. 860, and the principle is also fully supported in Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 1111. We do not think there is anything in the point that respondent Grubb was an original contractor. It is held to the contrary in Davis v. McDonough, 42 Pac. 450. Neither was the verification of the claim of lien premature. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

In re THOMAS. (S. F. 91.)[1]

VOLUNTARY INSOLVENCY—STATUTE—PETITION UNDER FOR DISCHARGE.

Under Insolvent Act 1880 (Append. Code Civ. Proc.) § 2, which provides that one owing over $300 may file a petition for discharge from his debts in a county where he has resided the six months preceding the filing, and provides that, in the petition, the petitioner shall "set forth his place of residence," a petition need not allege that the petitioner resided in the county where the petition was filed the six months preceding the filing thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; A. L. Frick, Judge.

Petition by Richard P. Thomas to be declared an insolvent under act for relief of insolvent debtors. From an order adjudging the petitioner an insolvent, one of his creditors appeals. Affirmed.

Stateler, Pierson & Mitchell and R. A. Friedrich, for appellant. Thos. C. Kierulff, for respondent insolvent. A. W. Thompson. for respondent assignee.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by a creditor from an order adjudicating one Thomas an insolvent debtor. It is insisted that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order of adjudication, by reason of a want of sufficient averment of facts in the petition of the insolvent. Insolvent Act, § 2 (Append. Code Civ. Proc.), provides: "An insolvent debtor, owing debts exceeding in amount the sum of three hundred dollars, may apply by petition to the superior court of the county or city and county in which he has resided for six months next preceding the filing of his petition to be discharged from his debts and liabilities." It is now claimed that the petition only showed that the insolvent had resided in the county for six months next preceding his signing and verifying the petition. The latter portion of section 2 sets forth the particular matters which must be alleged by the petition of the insolvent, and that provision says he must "set forth his place of residence." There is no requirement that he must state in his petition that he has resided in the county where the petition is filed six months next preceding the filing thereof, and we hold that an averment to that effect is not required. Subsequently to the adjudication, if creditors desire to contest that question of fact, the road is plain to them. A statement in the petition to that effect would not be conclusive upon the creditors, for they could attack its truth at a subsequent stage of the proceedings; and it is the fact of an immediate preceding residence of six months in the county where the petition is filed, and not the allegation to that effect, that is jurisdictional. We see no substantial merit in this appeal. For the foregoing reasons, the order appealed from is affirmed.

TROMANS v. MAHLMAN et ux. (S. F. 92.)

HOMESTEAD—INTENTION—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

1. The statement of the declarant that at the time of filing her declaration of homestead she actually occupied the premises, with the intention to reside thereon, was not conclusive, where other facts to which she testified were inconsistent with such intention.

2. A finding of the trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Joseph Tromans against Henry Mahlman and wife for possession of a house and lot claimed by defendants as a homestead. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

For facts, see report on former trial. 27 Pac. 1094.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Metcalf & Metcalf, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The facts in this case are set forth in the opinion given upon a former appeal. 92 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 1094, and 28 Pac. 579. It was then held that the evidence was insufficient to show an actual residence upon the premises at the time of filing the declaration of homestead, and, consequently, that the premises were not impressed with the attributes of a homestead; and the case was remanded for a new trial. Upon that trial, from which the present appeal is taken, the evidence before the court was substantially the same as upon the former trial, and the decision of the court thereon in favor of the plaintiff was, by necessary implication, a decision that the evidence did not show such actual residence on the premises; and, under the decision of this court upon the former appeal, the superior court was fully justified in making this finding. The only respect in which it is claimed by the appellant that the evidence herein differed from that at the former trial to such an extent as to authorize a different conclusion is that Mrs. Mahlman testified that at the time she went to the premises, on the 21st of August, 1883, it was her intention to remain there and occupy the house continuously, but that, by reason of supervening circumstances she was compelled to return to San Francisco the next day after the declaration of homestead was filed. Whether she did in fact reside on the premises at the time the declaration was filed was a question of fact, to be determined by the court from the evidence before it. The physical fact of actual occupancy, as well as the intention with which she occupied the house, were both elements to be considered in determining actual residence; and the court was not bound to accept her statement that she intended to reside thereon as conclusive, if other facts to which she testified were inconsistent with such intention. Whatever inconsistency there was between these facts and her statement of her intention presented merely a conflict of evidence, on which the decision of the trial court was final. Its decision, upon this conflict of evidence, that she did not reside there, is conclusive upon this court. The order is affirmed.

SUSSKIND v. HALL et al. (L. A. 33.)

ATTACHMENT—MINGLING OF GOODS—ILLEGAL SEIZURE—NOTICE BY CLAIMANT.

1. The fact that goods of an attachment defendant are in the possession of a third person, who has mingled them with his own goods, and refuses to point them out, but claims ownership of all, does not warrant the seizure of goods, his title to which is unquestioned, and which are readily distinguishable from those of the attachment defendant.

2. A notice to an officer of a claim of ownership of attached property is not vitiated by the statement therein that the claimant is the owner of all the property "except a portion owned by" another, who is not a party to the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Henry Susskind against J. C. Cline as sheriff, A. I. Hall, assignee, intervener. Judgment for the intervener, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wells & Lee and Calvin Edgerton, for appellant. Graff & Latham, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In 1892, Mrs. L. M. Wagner was engaged in the jewelry business in the city of Los Angeles, the business being chiefly managed by her husband, J. B. Wagner. Her store was at No. 125 South Spring street, and in it she had been accustomed to keep a large stock of goods, consisting, among other things, of diamonds, watches, and jewelry. On September 28, 1892, she filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county her voluntary petition in insolvency, and was thereupon adjudged to be an insolvent debtor. Thereafter A. I. Hall was duly elected and qualified as assignee of the estate of the insolvent, and on November 2, 1892, the clerk of the court, by an instrument in writing, assigned and conveyed to him all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor. The assignee at once took possession of all the goods and property in said store, and held possession thereof till November 16, 1892, when, under an order of the court, he sold the same at public auction to Henry Susskind, the plaintiff herein, he being the highest and best bidder, for the sum of $7,100. The property sold consisted of a great variety of articles, including the fixtures and a safe, of which a list or inventory is presented, covering about 33 pages of the transcript. The purchase price was paid and the sale was reported to and confirmed by the court. Susskind immediately took possession of the property purchased, obtained a new lease of the store, and thereupon commenced and thereafter continued the business of selling such goods and of buying and selling other goods of a similar character, until July 26, 1893. On the last-named day all the goods and property then in the store were seized and taken possession of by J. C. Cline, the sheriff of Los Angeles county, as the property of L. M. Wagner, the insolvent, under a writ of attachment issued in an action commenced by M. Wunsch et al. against her in the superior court of that county. Susskind on the same day notified the sheriff that the property taken was his, and demanded a return thereof, but his demand was refused. He thereupon commenced this action to recover the possession of said property or the value thereof, alleged to be $20,000, and damages.

The property sought to be recovered is described in the complaint as "a stock of jewelry consisting generally of various articles of gold and silver and plated jewelry, watches, chains, ornaments, also a lot of silverware and plated silverware, lot of fixtures, one safe, lot of diamonds and other precious gems, lot of money, lot of jeweler's tools and implements, shelving, counters, clocks, all situate and contained in that certain store and premises in the city of Los Angeles known and designated by city number 125 South Spring street." The sheriff answered, denying, for want of information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer the allegations of the complaint, that on the 26th day of July, 1893, or at any other time, plaintiff was the owner, or in possession, or entitled to the possession of the goods and chattels described in his complaint, or that he, the defendant, wrongfully took the said goods and chattels from the possession of the plaintiff, or unlawfully withheld the same from the plaintiff; and alleging that he took the said property under and by virtue of a writ of attachment, as hereinbefore stated. On the same day this answer was filed, A. I. Hall, the assignee of the insolvent's estate, asked and was permitted to intervene in the action. In his complaint in intervention he set up the facts of the insolvency of Mrs. Wagner, her voluntary petition in insolvency, his election and qualification as assignee, the assignment of the estate to him by the clerk of the court, and his taking possession, as such assignee, of all the property of the estate that he was then able to find, his settlement of the estate, and final discharge, as such assignee, on May 24, 1893, and the vacation and setting aside of that discharge by an order of the court on September 1, 1893. He then alleged: "That the said Henry Susskind, before the said discharge of said intervener as such assignee, conspired with said insolvent and J. B. Wagner, her husband, to secrete and conceal a portion of said insolvent's estate, consisting of diamonds, watches, and jewelry, to prevent the same from coming into the possession of said intervener as such assignee, a particular description of which property so concealed is unknown to said intervener, but is known to the plaintiff, Henry Susskind; and said insolvent did secrete and conceal said property; and Henry Susskind afterwards received and took possession of said concealed property, knowing that it was a part of said insolvent's estate at the time of filing her petition in insolvency, and that the same had not been delivered by said insolvent to her said assignee. That the said intervener did not know that said property, or any part thereof, had been concealed, or that said defendant had taken possession thereof, or had disposed of any part thereof, until after the discharge of the intervener as assignee of said insolvent's estate. That the property was taken by the sheriff under a writ of attachment, as before stated, and was still held by him, a schedule of the property taken being appended. That the said stock so taken by virtue of said writ was a part of the estate of said insolvent debtor concealed and withheld by her from said assignee. That said Henry Susskind, for the purpose of defrauding said estate, is wrongfully claiming to be the owner of and entitled to the possession of said property so taken and held by said J. C. Cline as sheriff, but said Henry Susskind has no right, title, or interest therein." And the prayer was that the intervener, as assignee of the insolvent's estate, have judgment for the possession of said property. The plaintiff answered the complaint in intervention, denying all of its material averments.

The case was tried without a jury, and, among other things, the court found: "That prior to the filing of said insolvent's petition in insolvency a portion of said insolvent's estate, consisting of diamonds, watches, and jewelry, was secreted so as to prevent the same from coming into the possession of said intervener as such assignee, and to prevent the same from being distributed among said insolvent's creditors by such intervener as such assignee. That the plaintiff, after the secreting and concealing of said goods, and knowing that said goods had been secreted and concealed, and for the purpose of preventing the same from coming into the possession of said assignee, received and took possession of said concealed property, and, after selling a portion thereof, retained possession of the remainder thereof" until July 26, 1893, "when the said property was taken by the defendant as the sheriff of said county, by virtue of said writ of attachment, at which time they were so mixed and confused by said plaintiff with other goods that they were not distinguishable from them; and plaintiff neglected and refused to point out and distinguish in said stock taken by said sheriff by virtue of said writ of attachment the goods owned by him prior to said confusion and mixing therewith of said diamonds, watches, and jewelry concealed and secreted by said insolvent, and also failed and neglected and refused to point out and distinguish the said watches, diamonds, and jewelry so secreted and concealed by said insolvent, and mixed and confused by him with said other goods. That plaintiff, in taking and retaining possession of said stock of diamonds, watches, and jewelry, was acting with said insolvent in the secreting, concealing, and withholding said diamonds, watches, and jewelry, for the purpose of defrauding said estate, and preventing the said property from coming into the hands of said intervener, and from being distributed among the creditors of said insolvent. That plaintiff was not, at the time of the taking by the defendant of said diamonds, watches, jewelry, and fixtures, the owner of, or entitled to the possession of, the property described in his complaint or in his notice, and is not now the owner thereof, or entitled to the possession thereof." It was ordered "that judgment be entered herein in favor of the intervener for the possession of the property described in plaintiff's complaint, and in favor of defendant against plaintiff for his costs." Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The findings above quoted are assailed by the appellant as not justified by the evidence, and numerous rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence are specified, and urged as errors in law which call for a reversal. The statement on motion for new trial, as found in the transcript, consists of about 400 printed pages. To state the evidence intelligibly, and to review the rulings complained of, would require a very extended opinion, and, in view of the conclusion reached upon another point, we have deemed it unnecessary to attempt to do so. It is undoubtedly well-settled law that if two owners of goods or chattels of a similar character mix and intermingle them together in such a manner that they are not distinguishable, and if, under a writ of attachment or execution against one of the owners, all of the goods or chattels so mingled are taken by the sheriff as his property, the burden is upon the other owner to point out and designate to the sheriff the particular goods or chattels which are his, and until he does so he cannot maintain an action against the officer to recover the portion which he claims. Wellington v. Sedgwick, 12 Cal. 469; Wade, Attachm. § 134. But this rule does not apply if the goods or chattels are plainly and easily distinguishable. Queen v. Wernwag, 97 N. C. 383, 2 S. E. 657. For example: If A. had a band of sheep, and also horses or mules in the same pasture, and if with his consent B. had been permitted to mix and intermingle his own sheep with A.'s, so that they were not distinguishable, and if then, under a writ of attachment against B., the sheriff should seize all the sheep and horses or mules as the property of the latter, there could be no pretense that the rule as to confusion of goods would have any application except as to the sheep. And in such a case, if A. should bring an action against the sheriff to recover possession of all the property seized, he could not be defeated as to the horses or mules because he did not, before commencing suit, point out to the sheriff the particular sheep which were his. Here it appears that the plaintiff purchased at the assignee's sale and paid for a large stock of goods, consisting of a great variety of articles, and no question is made as to his title to all the goods so purchased. He afterwards continued the business, and purchased and paid for other goods. At the time of the attachment the stock of goods in his store was of the value of $20,000, as the court found. Of these goods many articles, as shown by the schedule—a large majority in number—were as distinguishable from diamonds, watches, and jewelry as would be a horse from a sheep. For instance, there were show cases on counters, wall cases, mirrors, desks, tables, chairs, and stools, clocks, opera and field glasses, silverware, table and tea spoons, knives and forks, a letter press, a stepladder, a safe, gold-headed canes, a sack of gold coin containing $840, etc. Now, conceding that, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, and for the purpose stated, there had been brought into his store, and mingled with his goods of a like character, so that they could not be distinguished, diamonds, watches, and jewelry which still belonged to the estate of the insolvent,—a fact which plaintiff positively denied,—still the sheriff was not authorized to seize all the other goods which were distinguishable, and in doing so he was clearly a trespasser. The notice to the sheriff was sufficient to meet the requirements of sections 549, 689, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1891. It stated that the plaintiff claimed and was the owner of all the property levied upon, "except a portion owned by Geo. L. Bannister," but that exception did not vitiate it. There is no question here as to the portion owned by Bannister. It follows that the court clearly erred in adjudging that the intervener, as assignee of the insolvent, was entitled to the possession of all the property described in the plaintiff's complaint; and the judgment and order appealed from should therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BRITT, C.; SEARLS, C.

ACKLEY v. BLACK HAWK GRAVEL MIN. CO. et al. (No. 18,435.)

LIEN FOR WAGES—EMPLOYES OF CORPORATIONS—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 195) §§ 1, 2, require every corporation to pay its mechanics and laborers the wages earned by and due them weekly or monthly, and provide that a failure to do so entitles each of such mechanics and laborers to a lien on its property for such wages. Held that, in an action to establish such lien, plaintiff must allege and prove that the wages for which it is sought were payable weekly or monthly.

2. Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 195) §§ 1, 2, require every corporation to pay its mechanics and laborers the wages earned by and due them weekly or monthly, and provide that a failure to do so shall entitle them to a lien for such wages, and that in an action to recover the amount of such wages, or to enforce such lien, plaintiff shall be entitled to reasonable attorney's fees. Held, that where plaintiff in such action only shows himself entitled to a judgment for his wages, but not that they were payable weekly or monthly, it is error to allow attorney's fees.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by David Ackley against the Black Hawk Gravel-Mining Company (a corporation) and others to establish and enforce a lien for wages alleged to be due plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified.

Frank R. Wehe, for appellants. F. D. Soward, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover from the corporation defendant for work, labor, and services performed by plaintiff for said defendant, and to have the value thereof declared a lien upon the property of said defendant, under and pursuant to an act of the legislature of the state of California approved March 31, 1891, entitled, "An act to provide for the payment of the wages of mechanics and laborers employed by corporations." St. 1891, p. 195. The other defendants are made parties, and averred to have, or claim to have, some interest in the property of the corporation, or lien thereon, etc. Plaintiff had judgment against the corporation for $397 for wages, a counsel fee of $100, and costs taxed at $27.35, making a total of $524.35, which was declared to be a valid lien upon the property of the corporation defendant described therein, and superior and paramount to any lien or interest of the other defendants, and decreeing the property so subject to said lien to be sold in satisfaction thereof. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and the cause comes up on the judgment roll, without a statement or bill of exceptions.

The statute in question is brief, and we quote it in full. It is as follows:

"Section 1. Every corporation doing business in this state shall pay the mechanics and laborers employed by it the wages earned by and due them weekly or monthly, on such day in each week or month as shall be selected by said corporation.

"Sec 2. A violation of the provisions of section one of this act shall entitle each of the said mechanics and laborers to a lien on all the property of said corporation for the amount of their wages, which lien shall take preference over all other liens, except duly recorded mortgages or deeds of trust; and in any action to recover the amount of such wages, or to enforce said lien, the plaintiff shall be entitled to a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court, and which shall form part of the judgment in said action, and shall also be entitled to an attachment against said property."

Various points are made by appellant in favor of reversal, one only of which need be noticed. The complaint is for work, labor, and services performed by plaintiff for the corporation defendant, and, so far as essential to the point in hand, is as follows: "That between the 1st day of May, 1892, and the 1st day of May, 1894, plaintiff performed twenty-four months' services for defendant, Black Hawk Gravel-Mining Company, as watchman of its property, known as the 'Jenkins Ranch Property,' hereinafter described, which said services were performed by plaintiff for said defendant corporation at its request; that said services were reasonably worth $2,190; that no part thereof has been paid." The findings are in almost the exact language of the complaint, except that the court finds the value of the services were $480, and that $83 has been paid on account thereof. There is no allegation or finding that plaintiff was employed by the week or month, or that his wages were "due weekly or monthly." In Keener v. Irrigation Co. (decided by department 1 of this court, Dec. 31, 1895) 43 Pac. 14, this same statute was under review, and the court, speaking through Harrison, J., said: "By the terms of the first section of this act, it does not apply to all corporations, but only to those who, while doing business in this state, employ laborers and mechanics by the week or month, whose wages, under the terms of their employment, are payable weekly or monthly. It does not purport to impose upon those corporations any duty or liability towards all the mechanics or laborers whom it may employ, or to create a right in favor of those of its employés whose wages are not earned or payable by the week or by the month. As the remedy sought to be enforced herein exists only by virtue of the statute, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to bring himself within the terms of the statute, and to show that the wages earned by him were 'due weekly or monthly.' His complaint is, however, defective in this respect, and contains no allegation concerning the times at which the wages were payable, or that he was employed at weekly or monthly wages; and, from the allegations in reference thereto, it would seem that there was no agreement upon this point." Following the case above quoted, we add: As the plaintiff is not entitled to avail himself of the provisions of the act of 1891, that provision of the judgment allowing him a counsel fee was unauthorized. We recommend that the judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $397, as wages and costs, be affirmed, and that that portion of the judgment awarding counsel fees, and declaring that plaintiff is entitled to a lien upon the property of the corporation defendant, and directing a sale of such property, be reversed, and that appellant recover its costs on this appeal.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $397, as wages and costs, is affirmed, and that portion of the judgment awarding counsel fees, and declaring that plaintiff is entitled to a lien upon the property of the corporation defendant, and directing a sale of such property, is reversed, and it is ordered that appellant recover its costs on this appeal.

DAM v. ZINK. (No. 1,625.)

QUIETING TITLE—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to quiet title to land, the complaint merely alleging that defendant claims to hold a judgment lien against the land, but that the claim is without any foundation or right, a finding that the judgment, though recorded, is not, and never has been, a lien on the land, is sufficient to sustain a judgment quieting plaintiff's title, without finding the reason why the judgment is not a lien, as that the land is plaintiff's homestead.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; E. A. Davis, Judge.

Action by Charlotte G. Dam against Elizabeth Zink and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Zink appeals. Affirmed.

Forbes & Dinsmore, for appellant. W. T. Phipps, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by Elizabeth Zink, defendant, upon the judgment roll (which includes findings) from the judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to quiet title to a tract of land in Yuba county. The only question raised is as to the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. In the complaint, after the usual averments of ownership of the land by plaintiff, it is averred that the defendants (of whom there were several) claim some interest in the land, but that said claim was without any right, and, further, that the defendants Elizabeth Zink and Jacob Zink "claim to hold a judgment lien against the said real property, but which claim is without any foundation or right." All the other defendants filed disclaimers, and Elizabeth Zink answered, setting up that, before the commencement of this action, she had recovered a judgment in the superior court of said Yuba county against the said plaintiff and one Benjamin F. Dam for several hundred dollars; that said judgment was regularly docketed and recorded in the judgment book of said court; that no part of the same has ever been paid; and that by virtue of said judgment, recovered and docketed as aforesaid, she "has held, and does hold, a judgment lien against the said real property." And she denies "that her said claim, or any part or portion thereof, is without any foundation or right." The court found (1) that the plaintiff, at the commencement of the action, was the owner in fee, etc., of the land described in the complaint, with the exception of some designated parcels thereof; (2) that all the defendants except Elizabeth Zink had disclaimed any interest in the land; (3) that Elizabeth Zink has "no right, title, interest, claim or lien of, in or to or against, any of the land or premises so as aforesaid now owned and possessed by plaintiff." The court found, also, that the appellant had recovered a judgment against the respondent and Benjamin F. Dam, as averred in the answer, and that the same had been docketed as therein averred, but further found that the said judgment "is not now, and never has been, a lien against the said land and premises so as aforesaid now owned and possessed by plaintiff."

It is contended by appellant that as, under section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a docketed judgment becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor in the county, the finding of the court that there was no such lien in the case at bar is an erroneous conclusion of law drawn by the court from the facts found. But, if facts are stated in the findings in the same way in which they are stated in the pleadings, they are sufficient. As is said in Hayne on New Trials and Appeals, the only purpose of the findings is to answer the questions put by the pleadings. Hayne, New Trials & App. pp. 723, 724, and cases cited. The issue made by the pleadings as to the asserted judgment lien is whether or not said judgment constitutes a lien, and the finding that it is not a lien is responsive to the averments and denials of the pleadings with respect to that subject, and is therefore sufficient. Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 184; Pralus v. Mining Co., 35 Cal. 34; Frazier v. Crowell, 52 Cal. 401; Smith v. Acker, Id. 217; Daly v. Sorocco, 80 Cal. 367, 22 Pac. 211, and cases there cited. The findings were as broad and specific as the averments of the pleading. It does not follow that, because appellant had a docketed judgment, such judgment was necessarily a lien. For instance, if the land were exempt from execution, it would not come within the provisions of said section 671 of the Code; and, if the land here involved was a homestead, and therefore exempt from execution (as is stated in respondent's brief), it was not necessary for the court to state that fact as a reason for finding the issue as to the lien against the appellant. The ultimate facts were sufficiently found. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re PINA'S ESTATE. (S. F. 280.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — APPOINTMENT —WHEN NECESSARY.

On an application for letters of administration of the estate of a decedent, it is not within the province of the court to determine the question of the title to real property, as between the estate and persons claiming adversely to it; but if it appears that decedent left any estate, and the same has not been administered, letters should be granted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Application of one Carrillo for letters of administration with the will annexed, in the matter of the estate of Antonio Pina. The application was contested by the public administrator, who asked that letters be granted to him. Both applications were denied by the court below, and Carrillo appealed. Reversed and new trial ordered.

George Pearce, for appellant. C. L. Pond, Moreland & Norton, A. B. Ware, and Thos. Rutledge, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. The deceased died testate in the county of Sonoma, leaving estate therein. His will was duly admitted to probate, and letters testamentary issued to the person named therein as executor. Subsequently the executor resigned his trust without having closed the administration of the estate, and thereafter, in 1891, an administrator with the will annexed was appointed and qualified. In March, 1895, while the administration was still incomplete, the bondsmen of the administrator withdrew from his bond, and on the 26th of that month his letters were revoked for failure to file a new bond. Thereupon, in April, 1895, the appellant, Carrillo, claiming as the nominee of the next of kin entitled to administration, applied to be appointed administrator of the estate. His application was contested by the public administrator, who asked that letters be issued to himself. Certain other parties seem to have opposed the appointment of any administrator of the estate, but upon what ground, or with what right, does not clearly appear. At the hearing there was evidence tending to show that there was property of said estate—an interest in certain real property coming to deceased under a patent from the United States government—which had not been administered, and that the administration of the estate had never been concluded, by decree of distribution or otherwise. Notwithstanding this showing, the court below denied and dismissed the petition of said Carrillo, and also that of the public administrator, upon the ground, as stated in its order, that it appeared that there were no creditors of said estate, and no property thereof, and hence no necessity for an administrator. From this order, Carrillo appeals.

We think the action of the lower court was justified by neither the facts nor the law. There was no evidence whatever to sustain the finding, if it may be so regarded, recited in the order that there was no property of the estate. The evidence, as stated, clearly tended to establish the existence of property of the estate; and that it had ever been fully administered was not even pretended. The court seems to have acted largely upon some general statements that the heirs of the deceased had parted with their interest in the property of the estate; but not only was there no competent evidence of that fact (assuming that such question was material, or could be litigated on an application for letters), but there was no evidence to show who the supposed heirs really were. We know of no such authorized method, under the law, of dispensing with the usual and ordinary administration of an estate of a deceased person, or of thus determining the question of title to real property, as between an estate and persons claiming adversely to it. Under the facts appearing, it was the duty of the court to proceed and appoint an administrator with the will annexed, to complete the administration. Code Civ. Proc., § 1426. Whether the appellant is entitled to be so appointed, the court did not, by reason of the erroneous view taken by it, proceed far enough to determine, but dismissed the application upon the grounds stated, without hearing the evidence as to appellant's right to administer. The latter was entitled to have his application determined upon its merits, and, for the failure of the court to so determine it, the order must be reversed.

We have not acted upon the suggestion made by counsel appearing amicus curiæ, for a diminution of the record, for the reason, in the first place, that we do not deem the matters suggested material; and, in the next place, we do not recognize any right in counsel appearing as an amicus curiæ to interfere with or control the condition of the record in such an instance. They have not the rights in that regard of an adversary in the litigation. Nor are the liberties of counsel thus appearing at all enlarged in this instance because the court below assumed to appoint them as amici curiæ to represent it on the appeal. The court is not a party to the appeal, and we know of no authority for the making of such appointment in any case. To the extent to which they are entitled to be heard, they have the same rights without such appointment as with it. The order, so far as it affects the appellant, Carrillo, is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SAN DIEGO, O. T. & P. B. R. CO. v. PACIFIC BEACH CO. (L. A. 52.)

CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—RATIFICATION.

1. That a majority of the directors in one corporation were also directors of another corporation does not render a contract between the two corporations, entered into through the directors, absolutely void.

2. A land company, engaged in platting and selling land, contracted with a railway company to pay it a certain sum in installments, in consideration that the railway company should run a certain number of trains daily for two years to the land company's land. The contract was executed on the part of the railway company, and several of the installments paid by the land company. At a stockholders' meeting of the land company, the contract was affirmed by a majority of the stockholders. Held, that the land company, even though it could have avoided the contract in the first instance, could not defeat a recovery of the unpaid installments on the ground that, at the execution of the contract, the two corporations had directors in common.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by the San Diego, Old Town & Pacific Beach Railroad Company, a corporation, against the Pacific Beach Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McDonald & McDonald, for appellant. Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action upon two promissory notes made by defendant to plaintiff,—one for $15,000, and the other for $1,500; the latter being for interest due upon said first-named note. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

Each of the parties is a corporation. The respondent owns and operates a railroad from a certain point in the city of San Diego to another point in said city, about 10 miles distant, known as "Pacific Beach"; and it is the only railroad running to the latter point. The appellant is a real-estate company owning a large tract of land at said Pacific Beach, and engaged in subdividing, improving, and selling said land by lots and blocks. In July, 1888, the two corporations entered into a written contract, by which respondent covenanted that, in consideration of certain sums of money to be paid it by appellant, it would operate its road between said points for two years; that, during said time, it would run at least four trains daily, at such times as appellant should direct, the appellant to have the right to change its directions; that it would charge for passenger fare not exceeding 25 cents for each round trip, and sell to residents at Pacific Beach commutation tickets for a sum not exceeding $4.50 per month; and it bound itself to appellant in the sum of $35,000, and pledged all its property as security for the obligation, to comply with all its covenants, and agreed that, in case of its failure to so comply for five days, the said sum of money should be paid to appellant as liquidated damages. In consideration of these covenants appellant gave its three promissory notes to respondent,—one for $5,000, due in six months, one for $15,000, due in one year, and the third for $15,000, due in two years. Respondent complied with all its said covenants, and operated its road in accordance with said contract during the two years. The appellant paid the two first notes in full, and paid the interest on the third ($15,000) note up to July 10, 1891; the last installment of said interest having been paid by the $1,500 note here sued on. Afterwards appellant refused to make any further payment, and this suit is upon the second $15,000 note, and the said $1,500 given for interest, as aforesaid.

The main contention of appellant for a reversal arises out of these facts: The respondent had five directors, and the appellant nine; and at the time the contract was made four of the directors of the appellant were also directors of the respondent, and it is also claimed that, before the completion of the contract, a fifth director of appellant—D. C. Reed—became a director of respondent. A majority of the directors of both corporations were also stockholders in both, and the contention of appellant is that, because there were common directors of the two corporations as aforesaid, therefore the contract was absolutely void, and incapable of ratification. Respondent contends that, upon these facts, the contract was, at the most, only voidable, and that the appellant ratified it. Appellant also contends that, even though ratification were possible, there was none. In this case there is no actual fraud, either alleged or found; and this distinguishes it from many of the cases cited by appellant. The contract seems to have been a fair, open one, and carried into effect before the eyes of all persons interested. Neither is there any question of ultra vires; and this also distinguishes the case from cases cited by appellant. The court found that appellant's charter expressly gave it the power to make such a contract. See, also, on this point, Vandall v. Dock Co., 40 Cal. 83. The contention, therefore, at this point of the case, is that the mere fact that there were common directors, as above stated, of the two corporations at the time of the contract, makes it absolutely void; and this contention cannot be maintained.

Where two corporations, through their boards of directors, make a contract with each other, the directors who are common to both are not within the rigid rule of the cases which hold that one who acts in a fiduciary capacity cannot deal with himself in his individual capacity, and that any contract thus made will be declared void, without any examination into its fairness, or the benefits derived from it to the cestui que trust. Two corporations have the right, within the scope of their chartered powers, to deal with each other; and this right is certainly not destroyed or paralyzed by the fact that some, or a majority, of the directors are common to both. Of course, if such directors should wrongfully and willfully use their powers to the prejudice of one of the corporations, their action, if not acquiesced in, and if contested at the proper time, could be avoided, as in any other case of actual fraud. But such common directors owe the same fidelity to both corporations, and there is no presumption that they will deal unfairly with either. Therefore, their acts as such common directors are not void. There are abundant authorities to this proposition, but it is hardly necessary to refer to any other than that of Pauly v. Pauly, decided by this court (107 Cal. 8, 40 Pac. 29), and the cases there cited. In that case the court, in its opinion, says: "The stumbling block in this case, however, seems to have been the double relation of agency of Collins, Dare, and Harvermale, being at the same time officers and directors in both corporations," —and quotes approvingly from Mining Co. v. Senter, 26 Mich. 73, and Leavenworth Co. Com'rs v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 134 U. S. 688, 10 Sup. Ct. 708, which cases strongly declare the rule above stated. The conclusion reached is correctly condensed in the syllabus, as follows: "The fact that some of the directors of the bank were also directors of the cable company does not prevent them from being distinct corporations, who have the right to contract with each other in their corporate capacities; and, if the relation of the parties has not been abused, it constitutes no bar to a recovery of moneys advanced by the bank and used for the benefit of the cable company." We will notice one or two other recent authorities to the same point. In Coe v. Railway Co., 52 Fed. 543, Judge Pardee says: "That the East & West Railroad Company could lawfully contract with the Cherokee Iron Works, although all the stockholders of the one were also stockholders of the other, in the absence of fraud and misrepresentation, is indisputable; nor would the fact that the two corporations had substantially the same directors, who were the active agents negotiating the contract, render it void,—at worst, only voidable, but subject to ratification." In Jesup v. Railroad Co., 43 Fed. 483, the validity of a lease between two corporations in which there were common directors was involved; and Justice Harlan held (we quote, for brevity, from the syllabus, which is correct) as follows: "The contract by which the Dubuque Company leased the Cedar Falls road would not have been void, even if the majority of the directors of that company had been personally interested in the Cedar Falls Company. It would have been simply voidable at the election of the Dubuque Company, or, in a proper case, at the suit of its stockholders; and that election must have been exercised, or the suit brought, within such time as was reasonable, taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case."

In the notes to section 658, Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law (3d Ed.), there are many cases cited on the subject. They are not all in perfect harmony, but they abundantly warrant the statement in the text that "this class of contracts certainly are not void." See, also, Booth v. Robinson, 55 Md. 419; Kitchen v. Railroad Co., 69 Mo. 224. The decisions of this court and of other courts, cited by appellant, are mostly in cases where trustees attempted to contract about the trust property directly with themselves, for their individual benefit, and not cases where corporations dealt with each other through common directors; or in cases of ultra vires in the strict sense; or in cases where actual fraud was the ground of the alleged invalidity of the contract. For instance, Graves v. Mining Co., 81 Cal. 303, 22 Pac. 665, is greatly relied on by appellant; but in that case the directors of a single corporation had undertaken to vote themselves money,—partly for salary prohibited by the by-laws,—and to execute in the name of the corporation a note and mortgage for a large amount of money to themselves as individuals. This was an entirely different state of facts from those in the case at bar. Moreover, that case was decided upon the grounds of actual fraud and a failure to prove ratification,—the court saying, "The fairness, honesty, and good faith of the transaction under consideration are further impeached by the testimony," etc.; and the court say, even in that extreme case, "It is not intended to decide however, that these directors may not have recovered from the corporation the value of money or property honestly advanced by them, and which had been used by and for the benefit of the corporation in carrying on its business, or the value of services rendered by them outside of the duties of their office, in a proper case and upon a proper showing." It is true that the opinion there holds—no doubt, correctly—that directors of corporations are trustees within the meaning of sections 2228–2230 of the Civil Code; but those sections, so often invoked by appellant, are mere statements of the fundamental principle of the law of trusts that a trustee cannot deal with the trust property for his own individual benefit, and that principle obtained in all the jurisdictions where the decisions about common directors hereinbefore cited were rendered. It is unnecessary to notice each of the other cases cited by appellant. It is sufficient to say that each case, in some of the features above indicated, differs essentially from the case at bar.

The contract, therefore, was not void; and assuming that it was voidable, and might have been avoided by the appellant at the proper time and in the proper manner, it is clear that it was not so avoided, but that it was ratified. In the first place, there was no attempt to avoid it, nor any intimation of such intention, until long after the time mentioned in the contract had expired, and respondent had performed all its covenants therein provided, until long after appellant had received all the benefits coming to it from respondent's performance, and until long after it had become impossible to restore anything to respondent, or to put it, in whole or in part, in statu quo. And during this time appellant without objection paid, from time to time, the greater part of the principal and a large part of the interest which by the contract it had promised to pay; thus inducing respondent to perform the whole of its part of the contract in confidence that appellant would do the same. This, we think, under the circumstances of this case, constitutes ratification by acquiescence; for the rule is that a party cannot repudiate the burdens of a contract while enjoying its benefits. Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 312, 28 Pac. 1049. There is some question as to the sufficiency of the findings on this point, although, in our judgment, they sufficiently state the facts constituting such acquiescence. The court, however, also found that, at three different meetings of the stockholders of appellant, at two of which over two-thirds of the stockholders were represented, and at the other over a majority, the action of the directors in making the contract in question was ratified, approved, and confirmed; and the evidence supports this finding. At the regular annual meeting on August 29, 1888, six weeks after the making of the contract, at which more than two-thirds of the stockholders were represented, all the previous acts of the board were expressly ratified. At the regular annual meeting on August 29, 1889, at which more than two-thirds were represented, the reports of the secretary and treasurer, showing the existence of the $15,000 note sued on, were read and approved, and all the proceedings of the preceding year were unanimously approved; and at a regular adjourned meeting, on September 5, 1889, at which a majority of the stock was represented, the same thing was shown by the reports of said two officers, and the action of the board again unanimously approved. It is admitted that there was also another annual meeting of the stockholders in August, 1890, at which all former actions of the directors were approved. These acts constituted a ratification of the contract in question. Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 313, 28 Pac. 1049.

The contention of appellant that the contract could not be ratified except by the unanimous consent of all the stockholders cannot be maintained. That principle does not apply to acts which might have been authorized by a majority in the first instance. "The corporation may, however, ratify an unauthorized transaction of its agents; and this may be done either by the unanimous acquiescence of the shareholders, or by a vote of the majority if the transaction is of such a character that the majority might have authorized it at the outset." 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. (2d Ed.) § 525, and the cases there cited. The rule is that the majority governs, and every stockholder contracts that such shall be the rule. Civ. Code, § 312; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 474.

There is nothing in the contention that the ratifications were made without knowledge of what they meant. In the first place, this is not an action by individual stockholders to set aside a contract made by the corporation. The point is made by the corporation itself, in a defense in which it seeks to violate its own obligation; and it would be absurd to say that it did not know what it was doing. But, if we assume that in this action the corporation could shield itself between the ignorance of a few of its stockholders, it is clear that the latter knew, or ought to have known, the nature of the contract and the circumstances attending it. The respondent ran its railroad through the premises of appellant upon land purchased for that purpose by the former from the latter, there was a continuous operation of the road according to the contract, and a continuous payment from time to time by appellant of large sums of money under the contract, and the relations of the two corporations were of an intimate character. And, as was said in Blen v. Mining Co., 20 Cal. 613, 614: "The natural presumption is that it was fully considered, and the particulars inquired into and explained, and the idea that this was not done is certainly at variance with the usual mode of conducting business." And, again: "A ratification supposes a knowledge of the thing ratified," and "there is no evidence of any mistake in this case." Moreover, at the meeting of the stockholders at which the contract was first ratified, the minutes of the meeting of the board of directors of appellant at which the contract was made were read; and they showed that Gassen, who was a director of appellant, was also director, president, and general manager of the respondent, and presented the table of trains, and acted for the respondent. Furthermore, as was said in Underhill v. Improvement Co., supra, quoting from Morawetz: "Nor can the shareholders of a corporation avoid responsibility for the unauthorized acts of their agents by abstaining from inquiring into the affairs of the company, or by absenting themselves from the company's meetings, and at the same time reap the benefits of their acts in case of success." It is significant that in the case at bar there was no attempt to show a want of knowledge of any of the stockholders of any circumstance connected with the contract which is now sought to be repudiated.

With respect to the discussion by appellant of the value of the consideration for which it entered into the contract, it is sufficient to say that the wisdom or good policy of that contract is not a matter for decision here. The facts found show what the consideration was. In considering this case, we have assumed, without deciding, that the contract involved was one which the appellant, if there had been no acquiescence or express ratification, might by prompt action have avoided. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—COMPLAINT—REVIEW—NOTICE TO ATTORNEY FOR INFANT — ASSIGNMENT BY INFANT OF WAGES—EXECUTION—CLAIM FOR WAGES—NOTICE—WAIVER.

1. The sufficiency of the complaint is not subject to review on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

2. An attorney employed by a guardian ad litem to prosecute an action for his ward may accept notice of a claim for wages accruing against the judgment debtor, within 60 days preceding levy of execution which Code Civ. Proc. § 1206, requires the claimant to give the judgment creditor before execution sale, in order to entitle him to have his claim preferred as therein provided.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 1206, provides that a claim for wages accruing against a judgment debtor within 60 days preceding levy of execution shall be a preferred claim, provided notice is given to the judgment creditor and debtor by the claimant before execution sale, and it is undisputed, and, if disputed, is established by an action brought within 10 days. Held, that a judgment creditor, by answering in an action to enforce a claim disputed by him, waived notice.

4. In an action on a partnership debt, a debt due by the plaintiff to one of the partners individually cannot be pleaded in set-off.

5. Where a father, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 211, has relinquished to his son the right to control him and to receive his earnings, a debt due the son for wages is under his control, within Civ. Code, § 33, prohibiting contracts by minors under 18 years of age relating to personalty unless it is under their "control."

Action by George Taylor against B. P. Hill, sheriff, and T. West, Jr. Plaintiff had judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

V. E. Shaw, for appellants. Colyer & Colyer and D. L. Murdock, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. This action was brought under section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure to compel the defendant Hill, sheriff, to apply proceeds of a sale of property on execution to the payment of the claims of plaintiff and his assignors for labor performed for the judgment debtors within 60 days next preceding the levying of the execution. The execution on which the sheriff sold the property was issued on a judgment for $5,000 in favor of T. West, Jr., an infant aged seven years, and against J. D. Palmer and W. H. Palmer, copartners, of the firm name of Palmer & Co. The judgment was obtained on February 21, 1894, and the execution was issued and levied on all the property of Palmer & Co. on February 23, 1894. Before the sale of the property by the sheriff, to wit, on March 24, 1894, the plaintiff herein and four others, claiming that Palmer & Co. were indebted to them severally for labor performed by each of them within 60 days next preceding February 23, 1894, notified the sheriff and the judgment creditor of their several claims and the amount thereof, and demanded that said claims be first paid from the proceeds of the sale of the property levied on, according to section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said claims were disputed by the judgment creditor, and thereupon each of the other claimants assigned his claim to plaintiff, who in due time commenced this action. The court found said claims to be valid claims against Palmer & Co. to the amount of $334.09 for labor performed within 60 days next preceding the day on which the execution was levied, and that the sheriff had in his hands $675 of the proceeds of the sale of said property, and thereupon ordered and adjudged that the sheriff pay to plaintiff, from said proceeds of sale, the said sum of $334.09, and costs, taxed at $26.60. Defendants bring this appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial, but have not appealed from the judgment.

1. The principal point urged by appellants is that the complaint does not state a cause of action because it is not therein alleged that either the plaintiff or any one of his assignors gave notice of his claim to the judgment debtors, Palmer & Co. They contend that, although the statute does not expressly require such notice to the judgment debtor, it does so by implication. Upon this point it is necessary to say, only, that no question as to the sufficiency of the complaint can be considered on appeal from an order denying a new trial. Spanagel v. Dellinger, 38 Cal. 278; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186.

2. It is contended that the finding by the court that due notice of the several claims of plaintiff and his assignors was served upon the judgment creditor is not justified by the evidence. The judgment creditor being an infant, his father (Tom West) was appointed his guardian ad litem for the purposes of the action in which he recovered the said judgment for $5,000 against Palmer & Co. The guardian ad litem employed an attorney at law, E. W. Britt, Esq., to commence and conduct that action. The complaint in that action was signed: "Tom West, Guardian ad Litem. E. W. Britt, Attorney for Guardian ad Litem." And a demurrer to the answer of the defendants therein was signed: "E. W. Britt, Attorney for Plaintiff." On behalf of defendants herein, Mr. Britt testified, in substance, that he was employed by the guardian ad litem to commence and prosecute the action of T. West, Jr., v. Palmer & Co.; that he, as attorney at law, conducted the proceedings in that action, and was the only attorney that appeared therein for either T. West, Jr., or the guardian ad litem; that, in his absence, his clerk signed his name to the demurrer to the answer in that action, and also to written admissions of service of notices of the several claims and demands of plaintiff herein and his assignors against Palmer & Co. as "attorney for plaintiff" in that action; and that his clerk had authority from him to accept service of papers for all parties whom he represented as attorney. The judgment creditor having disputed the claims of plaintiff and his assignors against Palmer & Co. as aforesaid, he, with the sheriff, jointly answered plaintiff's complaint in this action, their answer being introduced by the following language: "Come now B. P. Hill, as sheriff, by his attorney, and T. West, Jr., by Ruth West, his guardian, and answer the plaintiff's complaint herein as follows." This answer is signed: "E. W. Britt, Attorney for Defendants." Upon the pleadings and evidence as above stated, appellant contends that Mr. Britt was not authorized to admit service of the notices for the infant judgment creditor as he did, and, therefore, that said notices to him are not such notice "to the creditor" as required by section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, for this reason alone, it is claimed that the finding of due notice to the creditor is not justified by the evidence.

I think the notices were properly served on Mr. Britt. Undoubtedly the guardian ad litem had authority to employ a professional attorney at law to commence the action and conduct the proceedings therein on the part of the infant. Cole v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 86; People v. New York Common Pleas, 11 Wend. 166. And it was held, in the case of Carter v. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 222, 23 Pac. 317, that in cases under section 1206, Code Civ. Proc., the notice of plaintiff's claim was properly served on the attorney for judgment creditor. The court said: "The attorney for the plaintiffs in an action is their agent for all its purposes, and on him all the papers made by defendants and counterclaimants are to be served. He may direct the sheriff as to what property he shall seize, and may receive and receipt for any money realized from a sale thereof."

See, also, Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 346. No authority has been cited, and I have found none, to the effect that the authority and duties of an attorney, employed by a guardian ad litem to conduct the proceedings in an action by or against an infant, are more restricted than in any other case. After diligent search, I have been able to find only one case in which it was questioned that the authority of an attorney employed to prosecute or defend an action for an infant was the same as in other cases, namely, People v. New York Common Pleas, supra, which was a suit by the infant, Baker, commenced by Hitchcock as prochein ami (equivalent to guardian ad litem). After the suit had been commenced and certain proceedings taken therein by Hitchcock, J. Blunt was retained as attorney for plaintiff, and filed a replication to one of the pleas of defendants and a demurrer to the other, and served them on defendants' attorneys, with notice of a rule requiring defendants to join in demurrer. The replication and demurrer were signed, "J. Blunt, Atty. and of Counsel," and the notice was signed, "J. Blunt, Atty." Afterwards the default of the defendants for not joining in demurrer was entered. The rule for the default and the rule to join in demurrer were entered in the common rule book in the name of "J. Blunt, Atty. for Plt." The court of common pleas set aside the default with costs, holding that all the proceedings on the part of the plaintiff by and in the name of Blunt as attorney were irregular. An alternative mandamus from the supreme court requiring the common pleas to vacate the order setting aside the default was made peremptory. Savage, C. J., said: "The rule that a plaintiff who appears first by prochein ami shall not afterwards appear by attorney relates to the appearance on the record. * * * The question, then, is, may an attorney who conducts the proceedings do so in his own name, or is he obliged to sign the name of the prochein ami to his notices, and use the name of the prochein ami in entering rules as if he were attorney? I am of opinion he is not bound to do so, but may conduct the proceedings in his own name." If the attorney, Blunt, had authority to conduct the proceedings and give notices pertaining thereto in his own name, he must have had authority to accept and admit service of like notices from defendants.

I think, however, the point under consideration may be disposed of in respondent's favor upon the ground that the issue to which the finding in question responds is wholly immaterial, for the reason that the infant creditor, by his guardian and attorney, appeared and answered plaintiff's complaint in this action, and thereby waived prior notice of plaintiff's claim or demand; and this view of the matter also answers the argument of appellant based on the assumption that this is a distinct original action, and is not in the nature of an intervention in the action of West v. Palmer. By their voluntary appearance and answer the defendants submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court. Their denial in their answer that notice of plaintiff's claims was served on the judgment debtor raised an immaterial issue, and whether or not the finding of the court upon that issue is justified by the evidence is of no legal consequence. Randall v. Falkner, 41 Cal. 242; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121.

3. The court found that Palmer & Co. were indebted to Oscar Palmer, Allen Coburn, and Scott Palmer, three of plaintiff's assignors, as follows: To Oscar Palmer, $59.71; to Allen Coburn, $54.48; and to Scott Palmer, $62.60. It is contended that, as to the first two, the finding is not justified by the evidence, because the evidence showed that Oscar Palmer and Allen Coburn were each indebted to J. D. Palmer individually in the sum of about $20 for board, which should have been, but was not, deducted by the court from the indebtedness of J. D. Palmer & Co. to them. It seems too clear to admit of argument that the deduction or set-off claimed was properly refused. As to Scott Palmer, it appeared that he was a son of J. D. Palmer, and under 18 years of age; and it is contended (1) that his earnings belonged to his father, and (2) that, even if the father had relinquished to his minor son the right of controlling him and the right of receiving his earnings, pursuant to section 211 of the Civil Code, yet the son could not have assigned to the plaintiff the debt due him from Palmer & Co. because such debt, though his personal property, was "not in his immediate possession or control," in the sense of section 33 of the Civil Code. The evidence tended to prove that the father had relinquished to the son the right to control him and the right to receive his earnings, and justified the findings to this effect; and I think the debt due him for his labor was under his control, in the sense of section 33 of the Civil Code, and was therefore assignable by him. See Schouler, Dom. Rel. §§ 267, 268.

4. It is claimed that the findings that Palmer & Co. had been adjudged insolvent, and that the defendant sheriff was their assignee at the time notice of the claims of plaintiff and his assignors were served on him, are not justified by the evidence. If, however, the foregoing opinion is correct, these findings are wholly immaterial. I think the order should be affirmed.

BRITTAN v. OAKLAND BANK OF SAVINGS. (S. F. 211.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. March 23, 1896.)

PLEADING — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS — APPEAL — REVIEW.

1. Error, if any, in striking out a portion of a complaint, and in sustaining a demurrer to it, is waived by the filing of an amended complaint.

2. Where averments stricken out of a complaint have relation only to defendants who ceased to be parties by the filing of a substituted complaint which operated as a discontinuance of the action against them, plaintiff, in order to have the order of the court striking out such averments reviewed, must include them in the complaint on which the action is tried.

3. The action of the court in overruling a demurrer to a special defense will not be reviewed on appeal, where it does not appear that the judgment, in any respect, depends on such defense, or that defendants offered any evidence at the trial in support of it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by one Brittan against the Oakland Bank of Savings. From a judgment entered on a verdict of a jury in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

James L. Crittenden, for appellant. Dunne & McPike and J. C. Martin, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. After a demurrer to the original complaint had been sustained by the court, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint. Upon the motion of the defendant the court struck out certain portions of this amended complaint on the ground that they were irrelevant and redundant. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a second amended complaint, to which the defendant answered, and subsequently, having obtained an order substituting the appellant for the original plaintiff in the action, filed a third amended and supplemental complaint, to which the defendant filed its answer, denying many of the allegations in the complaint. Subsequently the defendant filed certain amendments to its answer, and set up a separate and special defense. The plaintiff demurred to this special defense, and, his demurrer having been overruled, the cause was tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant. From the judgment entered thereon the present appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone. It contains a bill of exceptions relative to the order striking out certain portions of the first amended complaint, but there is no bill of exceptions relating to the trial, or showing the evidence upon which the verdict was rendered. The appellant, in his brief, seeks a review by this court of the order sustaining the demurrer to the original complaint, the order striking out certain portions of the first amended complaint, and the order overruling his demurrer to the special defense in the answer.

1. The amended complaint, which was filed after the demurrer to the original complaint had been sustained, superseded the original complaint; and the error, if any, committed in sustaining the demurrer, was thereby waived. Gale v. Water Co., 14 Cal. 25; Ganceart v. Henry, 98 Cal. 281, 33 Pac. 92. For the same reason the subsequent filing of another amended complaint, upon which the cause was tried, whereby the cause of action was substantially varied, waived any error committed in striking out portions of the complaint which was thus amended. The grounds upon which these portions were struck out of the complaint was that they were irrelevant and redundant, and the appellant has not pointed out any respect in which they are relevant to his cause of action. The third amended complaint, upon which the cause was tried, was in favor of the substituted plaintiff, and, as it was against respondent alone, operated as a discontinuance of the action against the other defendants. Many of the averments that had been struck out had relation to only those defendants who had thus ceased to be parties to the action, and other portions were in fact included in this third amended complaint. If the plaintiff had desired to have the correctness of this order reviewed, he should have included those averments in the complaint upon which the action was tried, so that their relevancy to the cause of action which he finally presented for trial might be determined.

2. The appellant asks a reversal of the judgment upon the ground that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the special defense alleged in the answer. It does not appear, however, that the judgment, in any respect, depends upon this defense, or that the defendants offered any evidence at the trial in support thereof. Upon an appeal from a judgment, only such errors can be reviewed as have conduced to the judgment. It is incumbent upon the appellant to show that the judgment appealed from has resulted from some error committed by the trial court, and, as every presumption is in favor of the correctness of the judgment, the burden is upon the appellant to make the error apparent. In an action tried by a jury a judgment rendered in accordance with its verdict will be sustained, unless it is made to appear that the verdict was the result of some error at the trial, or that the cause was submitted to the jury for trial by reason of some error of the court. When an appeal is heard upon the judgment roll alone, containing a verdict for the defendant, and in which there is no bill of exceptions, we will assume, if necessary to sustain the judgment, that the plaintiff failed to introduce any evidence in support of his cause of action. In the present case all the material allegations of the complaint were denied in the answer, and it is consistent with the judgment to assume that at the trial the defendant withdrew its special defense from consideration by the jury. There is no presumption that any evidence was offered by the defendant in support of this defense. "Where there are two presumptions, both equally reasonable, arising upon the face of the record, this court is bound to adopt that which will maintain the judgment of the court below." Whipley v. Flower, 6 Cal. 630.

It was suggested at the argument that, unless the action of the court in overruling the demurrer can be reviewed upon an appeal from the judgment, there is no opportunity to review it. If, however, the judgment does not depend upon the defense to which the demurrer was interposed, the sufficiency of such defense becomes a mere moot question, which it would not be proper for us to determine; and, if it does depend upon such defense, that fact must be made to appear upon the record. The judgment is affirmed.

O'CONOR v. WITHERBY. (L. A. 12.)

ATTACHMENT AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

An attachment affidavit which alleges that the payment of the indebtedness has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property is sufficient, without adding the other statutory clause, "or any pledge of personal property," since the declaration of affiant that he has no lien negatives the possibility of his having a pledge.

Attachment proceedings by Andrew J. O'Conor, receiver of the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, against O. S. Witherby. From orders refusing to dissolve the attachment or to retax costs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. Parker, W. T. McNeally, and Trippet, Boone & Neale, for appellant. V. E. Shaw and E. W. Britt, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to dissolve an attachment, and from an order refusing to retax the costs of said attachment. Appellant's only contention is that the affidavit for attachment is defective and insufficient in the following particulars: (1) That it does not show that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff; (2) that it does not specify the amount of such indebtedness; (3) that the amount of plaintiff's demand in said writ is not stated in conformity to the complaint; (4) that it does not specify the amount of such indebtedness over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims; (5) that it does not state that the payment of said alleged indebtedness has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon personal property, or any pledge of personal property. All of these objections, except the last, were considered, and decided adversely to appellant, in the case of O'Conor v. Roark, 108 Cal. 173, 41 Pac. 465; the affidavit in that case being the same as the one before us, so far as the first four objections are concerned. Those points need not, therefore, be considered. So far as appellant's fifth point is concerned, the language of the affidavit is as follows: "That the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property, or any pledge upon personal property." The statute uses the word "of" instead of "upon." It is said that a pledge "upon" personal property is meaningless. The intention of affiant, however, is plain, and it might properly be held a mere clerical error, which would not affect its sufficiency. If that clause of the affidavit had been omitted, we should be compelled to hold that it was sufficient. The declaration that he has no lien upon personal property negatives all possibility of his having a pledge; for, if he had a pledge of personal property, he must have had a lien upon it. It was expressly so decided in Glidden v. Whittier, 46 Fed. 437, under the statute of Idaho, which contains precisely the same requirement. In that case the last clause was entirely omitted. The affidavit for attachment being sufficient, the motion to retax the costs was properly denied. The orders appealed from should be affirmed.

LITTLE v. CALDWELL. (Sac. 23.)[1]

PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING BY SURVIVOR.

A law firm agreed, in writing, to conduct certain litigations for 15 per cent. of the amount recovered. The contract was afterwards modified by parol so that a part of the expenses were to be paid by their client. After the death of one of such firm the survivor and such client agreed that such survivor should prosecute at his own cost all further litigation, and, in the event of final success, receive 45 per cent., "which amount is in addition to the amount of said estate agreed to be paid" to such firm. Deceased's widow and son, as heirs, afterwards executed to such survivor an assignment of their rights in such contract, in consideration of the promise by him that in the event of success he "would do what was right" by them. He was afterwards successful in the litigation. Held, in an action by deceased's widow against such survivor for an accounting, that a judgment in her favor for one-half of the compensation originally agreed upon was proper.

A. D. Mason and F. J. Dennis, for appellant. J. M. Walling, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. This cause was previously before the court upon appeal from the judgment after demurrer sustained to plaintiff's complaint. It will be found reported in 101 Cal., at page 553, 36 Pac. 107. The opinion there set forth renders unnecessary any extended statement of facts. By the original contract the firm of Caldwell & Little was to conduct the litigation to a final determination, paying all the expenses thereof, and, in the event of success was to receive 15 per cent. of the estate that would fall to their clients. This contract was in writing. Thereafter the firm refused to defray the expenses of litigation, and a parol modification of the contract was agreed to, whereby the clients were to pay $500 for such purpose. Of this sum they paid $200. The firm then proceeded with the litigation, but, before further court proceedings were had, Little died. Caldwell then, without the knowledge of this plaintiff, entered in his own name into a contract with the clients, whereunder he was to prosecute at his own cost all further litigation, and, in the event of final success, was to receive "forty-five per cent. of the amount of said estate which may be decreed to them, * * * which amount is in addition to the amount of said estate agreed to be paid by them to Caldwell & Little by written agreement dated January 30, 1889." Subsequently this plaintiff and her son, as heirs of Little, deceased, executed to defendant an assignment of all their rights in the Caldwell & Little contract, the assignment reciting a consideration of one dollar, and expressing the unwillingness of assignors to bear any of the expense of the litigation. The true consideration for the execution of this instrument was the promise of defendant to plaintiff that he (defendant), in the event of success, "would do what was right by the plaintiff." Defendant carried the litigation to a successful issue, and received therefor the sum of $12,618.50, being the 60 per cent. of the contract. One-half of one-fourth thereof, or one-half of the 15 per cent. of the original contract, amounting to $3,154.60, the court found to be due plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The foregoing is a substantial summarization of the findings. We think that the court was justified in holding that the contracts were not separate, distinct, and independent agreements, each in turn made after agreed abandonment or rescission of the earlier contract. The later contracts were but modifications of the original. The consideration moving from the attorneys, that they were to prosecute to a conclusion the litigation in question, always remained. The terms of their compensation and risk in so doing alone were varied. And herein two circumstances are significant, and were doubtless considered so by the trial judge: First. That the last written contract entered into by Caldwell, the surviving partner, does not stipulate for a flat consideration of 60 per cent., as would have been natural had the original contract been rescinded and abandoned, but provides for the payment of 45 per cent. "in addition to the amount agreed to be paid to Caldwell & Little by written agreement," etc. There is here a distinct recognition that the original contract is vital and operative. Second. If the original contract and its parol modification made during Little's life had been abrogated and rescinded, it would have been meaningless for defendant to have asked and obtained an assignment to himself of all of plaintiff's rights thereunder. The fact that the assignment was executed to and received by defendant at his request amounts wellnigh to a demonstration that at that time one of the parties to the original 15 per cent. contract, defendant himself, believed that it was still in force. The findings being justified in this regard, and the further finding as to the true consideration for the assignment having been determined, upon a conflict of evidence, in favor of plaintiff, leaves little to be said. The facts found correspond so closely with those averred in the complaint, and discussed in the opinion in volume 101 of the Reports, that the law there laid down has become the law of the case. It matters not, therefore, whether plaintiff's interest was assignable or not. The instrument purported to be an assignment, not a release. If an assignment was permissible, then defendant must be held for the consideration which the court found induced its making. If the interest was not assignable, then, as in the former opinion set forth, defendant is responsible as surviving partner. Under either construction the judgment was for an amount due. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BILBY v. McKENZIE (McBEAN, Intervener. Sac. 97).

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Money in the sewer fund of a city for a certain year cannot be used, after the expiration of such year, in paying claims for a subsequent year, while suit is pending against the city to recover on a claim against such fund, arising in such prior year, on a contract which the city had for previous years recognized as valid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by M. Bilby against M. H. McKenzie, defendant, and A. McBean, intervener. From a judgment for plaintiff on demurrer, defendant and intervener appeal. Judgment against defendant reversed, and against intervener affirmed.

E. D. Edwards and W. C. Graves, for appellants. L. W. Moultrie, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff commenced proceedings in mandamus against defendant, McKenzie, treasurer of the city of Fresno, to compel the payment of certain warrants issued for work performed upon the sewers of the city in the month of May, 1895. The claims represented by the warrants had been duly allowed and ordered paid by the board of trustees, and warrants therefor had been properly drawn upon the treasurer. It was alleged that there was in the sewer fund of the city, and not otherwise appropriated, a sum largely in excess of the amount of the warrants. Defendant McKenzie, in his return and answer, showed that the city of Fresno had entered into a contract with Alexander McBean whereby McBean agreed to take care and dispose of the sewage of the city for a period of five years for the sum of $4,900 per annum, payable quarterly. This contract had been performed by McBean, and the city had, from year to year, assessed and levied a tax for the sewer fund sufficient to pay McBean's demands, and for the purpose of paying the same, and had in fact devoted the money to these payments until the year 1893. In that year, though McBean had fulfilled the terms of his contract, and though there was in the sewer fund sufficient unappropriated moneys wherewith to pay his claims, the city refused payment, asserting that the contract was void, and that it was no longer bound by it. McBean then instituted suit against the city, which action was pending and undetermined. Defendant further alleged that the moneys which were in the sewer fund, and which were claimed to be available for the payment of plaintiff's claims, were moneys thus collected and set over to the sewer fund for the payment of the claims of McBean for the year 1893, and were sufficient only for that purpose; that by reason of the pending litigation between McBean and the city, to which he had been made a party defendant, he could not and should not be compelled to pay plaintiff's claims out of the revenues of the year 1893 until the claim of McBean upon the revenues of that year had been finally adjudicated. McBean was allowed to intervene and set up the same facts asking payment to himself of the moneys in the sewer fund. Plaintiff interposed general demurrers to the answer and complaint in intervention. They were sustained, and defendant and intervener appealed.

The demurrer to defendant's answer was improperly sustained. The moneys in the sewer fund for the fiscal year 1893 could be used for no other purpose than the payment of the legitimate claims of that year, until they had, one and all, been met and extinguished. Thereafter any excess over could be carried into the sewer fund of the following year, or transferred from the sewer fund to the general fund, and from the latter expended or appropriated to meet deficiencies in other funds. But, until all just demands upon the sewer fund for the year 1893 had been met and paid, the integrity of the fund could not be impaired. The fact that the moneys remained in the treasury in 1895 did not make them a part of the fund of 1895. They were still a part of the fund of 1893. As the revenues of a given year, and those only, may be devoted to the payment of claims arising in that year, it would be the height of injustice to suffer a rightful claimant to be robbed of his due by a technical transfer of the moneys of a fund of the year in which the demand accrued into the fund of a later year, before adjustment and settlement of all demands. Whether McBean's claim was valid or not, it was sufficient for the treasurer and the municipal authorities to know and to show, as they did, that it had previously been recognized as valid, and was being pressed in the courts in good faith. Under these circumstances the moneys in the sewer fund for the fiscal year 1893, to the amount of McBean's claim, were not available to pay claims arising in 1895, and the treasurer's showing was a sufficient defense to the action. The demurrer to McBean's complaint in intervention was properly sustained. It amounted to nothing more than an attempt to retry issues determined adversely to him in his action against the city and the treasurer to compel payment under his contract. That action is now pending before this court upon appeal, and presents propositions entirely independent of those brought up in this appeal. They are reserved for a separate consideration. The judgment against defendant, McKenzie, is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to his answer. The judgment against the intervener, McBean, is affirmed.

PERJURY — REQUISITES OF COMPLAINT — INFORMATION—MUST FOLLOW COMPLAINT.

1. A complaint for perjury, which charges the making of a false oath to a criminal complaint, but fails to aver that such complaint contained a charge of which the court before whom it was filed had jurisdiction, does not charge an offense.

2. An information cannot go beyond the charge made in the complaint, and to which the defendant has been held to answer; and where a complaint fails to charge an offense, no valid information can be based upon it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

H. E. Howland was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Reversed.

Tanner & Taft, Goodrich & Garrison, H. E. Monroe, and John H. Dickinson, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was convicted of perjury in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial. Upon his arraignment, defendant moved to set aside the information upon the ground that he had not been legally committed by a magistrate. The motion was denied, and its denial is the basis of one of the exceptions upon which defendant relies for a reversal of the judgment. The complaint lodged with the magistrate, upon which the prosecution is founded, attempted to charge defendant with having on October 25, 1894, at the city of Pasadena, in said county, committed perjury before one J. G. Rossiter, the recorder of said city, in falsely swearing to a criminal complaint charging one Howard with a misdemeanor in disturbing a religious meeting. The material part of the complaint, after alleging the taking of the oath, the official character of the officer before whom the same was taken, and his competency to administer such oath, is "that said defendant did then and there willfully, and contrary to said oath, state as true that this affiant did on the 7th day of October, 1894, disturb and disquiet an assemblage of people met for religious worship, by noisy, rude, and indecent behavior," etc.; the truth of the statement being then negatived. Upon this complaint, defendant was examined, and held to answer for the crime of perjury; and thereupon the district attorney filed the information in question, charging defendant with such offense.

It is urged on behalf of defendant that this complaint did not charge a public offense, and did not, for that reason, constitute a legal basis for a prosecution against defendant, or upon which he could be competently held to answer. The particular objection pointed out as rendering the complaint deficient is its failure to show that the recorder before whom the alleged false oath was taken had any jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action in which the false oath was taken; that is, that while the averments of the complaint show that the alleged false oath was taken in a criminal prosecution against said Howard, before the recorder of said city, for an alleged misdemeanor, it is not alleged, directly or otherwise, that the said misdemeanor so falsely charged was committed within the city of Pasadena, and so within the jurisdiction of said recorder. And it is claimed that, unless it affirmatively appear that the false oath was taken in a case whereof the recorder had jurisdiction, the matters sworn to are not material, and do not constitute perjury. That the complaint in question is lacking in the particular specified is patently manifest. It charges the defendant with falsely stating that Howard "did on the 7th day of October, 1894, disturb and disquiet an assemblage of people met for religious worship"; but it does not show that such alleged misdemeanor was one of which the recorder had jurisdiction to inquire, since it is nowhere alleged that the same was committed within the city of Pasadena. One of the primary essentials of the crime of perjury is that the false oath must be material or of consequence in the matter or proceeding in which it is taken (Pen. Code, § 118); and it is well established that the matter or thing sworn or testified will not be held so material where the officer or tribunal before whom the oath is taken had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the oath, notwithstanding there may have been general authority to administer oaths in like cases, if within the jurisdiction. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 1020–1028; 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 905; Stedman's Case, 1 Cro. Eliz. 137; Wyld v. Cookman, 2 Cro. Eliz. 492; State v. Jackson, 36 Ohio St. 281; State v. Peters, 57 Vt. 86; U. S. v. Curtis, 107 U. S. 671, 2 Sup. Ct. 507; Jackson v. Humphrey, 1 Johns. 497. And it is equally well settled that the facts showing such jurisdiction must be affirmatively alleged. 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 905; Stedman's Case, supra; Hitesman v. State, 48 Ind. 473. Says Mr. Bishop in the section above cited, "Since to render a false swearing perjury, there must be an issue or inquiry before some tribunal or person competent in law to act therein, this must be alleged, and in a way to show jurisdiction." It is quite obvious that the complaint in question must, within the test of these principles, be held bad, since everything charged therein might be indisputably true, and yet perjury be not shown.

It remains to be determined whether the fact that the complaint upon which a defendant is arrested and committed states no offense against him is so fatal to the regularity of the proceeding as to require the information based thereon, itself sufficient in form, to be set aside upon the ground that he has never been legally held to answer. Some of the earlier cases arising under the provision of our present constitution providing for prosecutions by information seem to treat the sufficiency of the complaint before the magistrate as largely an immaterial or nonessential factor in determining the regularity of the proceeding for a commitment (see People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457; People v. Wheeler, 65 Cal. 77, 2 Pac. 892; People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23, 27 Pac. 523), although none of those cases, we think, go to the extent of holding that the complaint need not state an offense. But in the recent case of People v. Christian, 101 Cal. 471, 35 Pac. 1043, where the latest expression of the court upon the subject is to be found, all the earlier cases are fully reviewed, and the reasoning and conclusion in that case would seem to impart more dignity and importance to the office of that pleading in criminal prosecutions than heretofore accorded it. In that case the defendant was charged with an assault with a deadly weapon upon one George Magin, and was held to answer therefor. The district attorney filed an information charging him with such an assault upon one George "Massino." It was held that the information must be set aside; the court, after stating the facts showing that defendant had been brought before the magistrate to defend himself against a charge of assaulting Magin, saying: "Under those circumstances, and under a complaint charging that offense, he could not be called upon to defend himself for assaulting one Massino, for there was no complaint on file upon which to base an examination of that character." And, after reviewing the cases upon the subject, it is said: "It may be laid down as an unquestioned proposition that the district attorney has no authority to disregard the commitment, and cull from the evidence taken at the preliminary examination some real or imaginary offense not included in the complaint upon which the defendant was charged and examined. * * * The district attorney is not only required to file the information for some offense included in the allegations of the complaint, but the magistrate likewise only has the power to commit for some offense included therein." The principles to be deduced from this case are that the complaint lodged with the magistrate constitutes the groundwork of the whole superstructure to be thereafter built thereon, and draws the lines which must circumscribe the limits the prosecution can take. The defendant, in other words, may be competently informed against and tried for any offense charged in the complaint, or included therein, but beyond that limitation the prosecution cannot go. And this doctrine would seem to be in accord with the spirit and intent of the statute interpreting the purpose of the constitution. As remarked in People v. Christian, supra: "If such were not the true rule, the whole procedure as to preliminary examinations would be absurd, and as to the defendant a mockery. Where a defendant is brought before a magistrate, charged with having committed a public offense, he must be informed of the charge against him, and advised as to his right to the aid of counsel in every stage of the proceeding. He is entitled to a certain time to prepare his defense. These provisions of the statute clearly contemplate that he shall be required to defend himself against the crime with which he is charged, and no other crime. He has not been notified of any other charge, and consequently is not prepared to defend himself against another charge. There is no provision of the statute by which a defendant may take advantage of the admission of immaterial or incompetent evidence by the magistrate. Hence all manner of crimes may be proven against him, and thus the district attorney would have the privilege of selecting the most heinous on which to frame his information. Such is not the law, and whenever a defendant is informed against for an offense different from that charged in the complaint upon which he was examined, or not included therein, he has had no examination for that offense, and is entitled to have the information set aside upon the ground that he has not been legally committed." From these principles it would seem to follow as a necessary corollary that, if the complaint is the measure of the people's rights in proceeding against a defendant in any case, such complaint must charge him with a public offense. If the commitment and information cannot go beyond the complaint, and the latter fails to state any crime, the logic is irresistible that the defendant has not been legally held to answer for an offense. And this must be true. It cannot be that it was ever contemplated, either by the framers of the constitution, or the legislature proceeding under that instrument, that a citizen can be arrested, and put to the indignity and public shame of detention and examination upon a criminal charge, to say nothing of the inconvenience and pecuniary detriment incurred thereby, without a formal complaint, which charges, at least in substantial effect, some offense known to the law; for, if the complaint need not state an offense, it would subserve no useful purpose, since a pleading which does not state a cause of action is, in legal contemplation, no pleading. That such was not the purpose or intent of the legislature is evident from section 806 of the Penal Code, which provides that "the complaint is the allegation in writing, made to a court or magistrate, that a person has been guilty of some designated offense." Of course, such complaint need not necessarily charge the offense with all the technical nicety of an indictment or information, but that it must state the essential elements of the crime to a common certainty we have no doubt. In this requirement the complaint before us fails, as has been pointed out; and it follows, within the principles above stated, that the district attorney was not authorized to present, as he did, an information which traveled outside the complaint for facts upon which the charge therein stated is based. It results from these views that defendant was not legally committed, and the court should have granted his motion to set aside the information. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to notice the other questions raised. The judgment and order are reversed and the court below is directed to set aside the information.

DE LA MONTANYA v. DE LA MONTANYA. (No. 15,996.)[1]

DIVORCE—JURISDICTION—ALIMONY—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—RELIEF FROM VOID JUDGMENT—APPEALABLE ORDER.

1. In awarding a divorce on substituted service, where defendant and the minor children, though domiciled in the state, are living elsewhere, and defendant makes no appearance, the court has no jurisdiction to allow alimony.

2. Nor has it power to award the custody of the children to plaintiff. Beatty, C. J., and McFarland and Van Fleet, JJ., dissenting.

3. Where a divorce has been granted without personal service on defendant, who was not in the state when suit was brought, and made no appearance, a motion to vacate that part of the judgment allowing alimony will lie; and defendant need not seek relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, by offering to appear and plead to the merits.

4. Where a divorce has been granted without personal service on defendant, who was not in the state when suit was brought, and made no appearance, an order denying a motion to set aside that part of the judgment awarding alimony is appealable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Lorraine W. De La Montanya against James De La Montanya for a divorce. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, defendant making no appearance; and from an order denying a motion to vacate that portion of the judgment which awarded plaintiff alimony, and the custody of the minor children, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Dorn & Dorn, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action to obtain a divorce, in which the plaintiff also asked for the exclusive custody and control of two children, the issue of the marriage, and also for permanent alimony, as well as for a suitable allowance to enable her to prosecute this action. The defendant and the children, who were, of course, infants, were absent from the state when the suit was commenced, and have ever since remained absent. No personal service of the summons was had on the defendant, and he did not appear in the action. An attempt was made to serve the summons by publication. It is claimed that the service was void because not made as required by the laws of this state, but I shall assume that such attempt at a constructive service was in accordance with the statute in every respect. The defendant was born, and during his whole life had lived, in this state. He left the state on the 20th day of November, 1893, with two children of plaintiff and defendant, proceeding to New York, and on the 9th day of December, 1893, left New York for Paris, France, where he arrived with his children on the 19th day of December. January 4, 1894, he made application to the ministry of justice of France for express permission to be domiciled in France. Such permission was granted on the 14th day of July, 1894. Since December 19, 1893, defendant has resided in France with his children, and neither he nor either of the children have since been within this state. This suit was commenced two days after the departure of the defendant from the state, and it is claimed that defendant left the state and took the children for the express purpose of evading the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. As stated, the defendant did not appear in said action, and, the publication of summons having been made, in due time the default of the defendant was entered, and the court proceeded to hear the cause; and on the 16th day of May, 1894, judgment was rendered against defendant, wherein it was adjudged (1) that the marriage be dissolved; (2) that the exclusive custody, care, and control and education of the children be awarded to plaintiff; and (3) that plaintiff "shall have the right, at such time in the future as she shall be advised, to apply to the court for such suitable allowance and sum to be paid her by said defendant for her support during her life, and such further sums as may be necessary in order to enable her to make proper compensation to her attorneys and counsel in said action, and to enforce this decree and judgment." On the 7th day of September, 1894, on due notice, the defendant moved the court for an order (1) vacating the judgment in so far as the same relates to alimony, or any provision for the support of plaintiff, or for the support of the children of plaintiff and defendant; (2) vacating the judgment so far as it relates to the care, custody, and control of the children; (3) vacating the judgment so far as it relates to alimony, or allowance for the support of plaintiff or the children,—and for an order striking out from the judgment all the provisions relating to or providing for alimony, or support for the plaintiff or the minor children of plaintiff and defendant, or awarding or providing for the custody, care, or control of the said two minor children. The motion was based upon the claim that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this action, in so far as it relates to the matters, subjects, and things hereinbefore specified, and had no jurisdiction or power or authority to make any order or judgment in relation to the subject-matters and things aforesaid, and had no jurisdiction over the person of the defendant sufficient to enable, authorize, or empower it to make any order, judgment, or provision in relation to said subject-matters and things, and that said defendant was at the time of the commencement of this action, and ever since has been, and now is, without the jurisdiction of the said court, and without the territorial limits of the state of California, and has never been served with process herein personally, and no service of process has been had herein to enable the court to make any order, judgment, or provision in regard to the subjects, matters, and things aforesaid, and that said infant children of plaintiff and defendant were not at the time of the commencement of this action, and never since have been, and are not now, within the state of California. In support of the motion, various affidavits were read, showing the above facts and others.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Appellant here bases his claim for reversal upon three grounds: First, that the proof of publication shows that constructive service has never been had according to the statutes of this state, and that, therefore, the judgment is wholly void; second, the defendant and children were at the time of the attempted service of summons domiciled in France, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction to award the custody of the children to plaintiff, or to provide for alimony; and, third, that the mere fact that the defendant and children were without the territorial limits of California when the action was commenced deprives the court of jurisdiction, even admitting that defendant and the children are domiciled in California, and the constructive service of summons was in all respects regular. Respondent admits the facts in regard to the departure of defendant from the state with the children, but claims that, as matter of law and fact, it appears that the domicile of the defendant and children is, and has always been, in California; and she contends that, such being the case, the court acquired jurisdiction, not only to grant the divorce to her, but to enter a judgment in personam against the defendant, valid at least in California. She also contends that the judgment awarding to plaintiff the custody of the children is in rem; that it is valid, because it is a mere incident to the divorce; and that, upon a dissolution of the marriage, it was necessary to provide for the children. Furthermore, she insists that there is no judgment for alimony, or for an allowance of any kind.

Conceding that the defendant and the children are all domiciled in California, although in fact absent from the state at the time of the commencement of the action and since, and that the constructive service of summons was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to grant the divorce, did the court have the power to award to plaintiff the exclusive custody of the children, and to allow alimony? I have concluded that it had no such power. Some cases are cited which seem to hold that a personal judgment obtained by constructive service of the summons is valid within the state, although the defendant may have been in fact absent from the state at the time of such service. As to most of these cases, it may be said that such statements are entirely obiter, the question before the court being as to the extraterritorial effect of such judgment. In such cases the argument is, in general, that, conceding the validity of the judgment within the state where rendered, another state will not recognize its validity, because it will not permit the process of another state to be served within its territory, so as to compel one resident there, or in fact being there, to answer a writ issued by the courts of such foreign state. It is a sort of an invasion of a state to serve a foreign writ there at all. The logic would require the courts to go further, and hold that such judgment is wholly void. Constructive service upon a party who is within the state does not raise the question. The question there is simply whether a defendant had such reasonable opportunity to be heard as will constitute due process. The leading case upon subjects of this character is Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714. Counsel for respondent contends that it is not there held that jurisdiction to enter a personal judgment cannot be obtained over one domiciled in the state by constructive service, when such defendant is absent from the state at the time of the attempted service, but only that such service is not good against a defendant who is not only without the state, but is actually domiciled elsewhere. Domicile has never, so far as I am aware, been made the test of jurisdiction to render a personal judgment. The question there is always whether there has been due process, —whether the defendant has had a reasonable opportunity to be heard. Substituted service may be valid upon those within the state when the same service would be void as to those without the state. As to those within the state, the question would be whether it has afforded a defendant a reasonable opportunity to be heard. But the process cannot go beyond the state, and compel any person in another state to resort to the state where the action is pending, there to make his defense. No service will be recognized, made there, whether actual or constructive. It is as much an invasion of a foreign jurisdiction to serve a citizen of the state in which the action was brought, temporarily resident there, as it would be to summon from its borders a citizen of such foreign state. If such things could be done, who would determine where the domicile of a particular person really was? Domicile often depends upon secret intention. It would be a most unsatisfactory test. I am aware that it is often said by courts and law writers that domicile is the test of jurisdiction in divorce. This doctrine was built up mainly, if not entirely, to prevent parties really residing in a state from going to another for the purpose of getting a divorce. So far, its effect has been beneficent; but it is obvious, after all, that what in these cases is called domicile is not domicile. As between states, it would be no test at all, unless it is domicile as defined in international law. To concede that each state may give a different definition, or to speak of domicile for the purposes of divorce, as is often done, is to concede that the test is not domicile. These writers and the courts say the test is "actual, bona fide domicile." Since every person always has a domicile, and can have but one, how does "actual and bona fide domicile" differ from "domicile"? It is meant, I presume, that domicile and actual residence must coincide. Where, then, is the jurisdiction in those cases where they do not? One may be domiciled in California who never was within the state, and never had thought of going there. Or he may be domiciled therein years after he has left without the intention of returning. Persons have in California exercised for years all the rights of citizens, and even held high office, who, according to Phillimore, Jacobs, Dicy, and other writers on the law of domicile, never had a domicile here, because they at all times had a fixed and definite intention of returning to their domicile of origin. Had the wife of such a person obtained a divorce while he was here exercising the rights of a citizen of the state, would the courts of any state declare such a decree void upon proof of the existence of such intention? If not, then domicile is not the test of jurisdiction, even as to the status of the litigants, and certainly not in personal actions. Jurisdiction is derived from the constitution and laws creating the court, and I know of no limitation in the constitution of the United States upon the power of a state to give to its courts jurisdiction over all persons found within its borders. Certainly it has not imposed any such limitation as the test of domicile. Domicile is the test of personal rights in regard to inheritance, but, unless made so by local law, is not important as affecting the relation of the individual to the government. The relation of the individual to the government depends upon actual presence within the territorial limits of a country, and upon citizenship or allegiance.

But I cannot understand Pennoyer v. Neff as counsel do. It is true that, in the case in which the judgment there under consideration was rendered, the defendant was said to have been a nonresident, and presumably was domiciled abroad, but that circumstance seems to have been treated as one immaterial in the discussion. The judgment there was personal, and jurisdiction was obtained, if at all, by constructive service of summons. I use the term "constructive service" for convenience, although it does not constitute service at all when the defendant is without the state. No property had been attached. The conclusion is based upon a proposition of international law laid down at the outset: "No state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. Story, Confl. Law, c. 2; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 2. The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others. And so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity, and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory so as to subject persons or property to its decisions." The idea seems to be that the state has no jurisdiction over either persons or property not within its territory, and that to allow it to summon one from another state is an encroachment upon the independence of such state. The judge then cites the case of Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308. In that case Justice Miller was considering a judgment obtained by W. G. Brownlow against Reynolds and others for false imprisonment. Brownlow made affidavit to the effect that the defendants had fled from the state, or so absconded or concealed themselves that the ordinary process of law could not reach them. Thereupon, under the statutes of Tennessee, the plaintiff caused an attachment to be issued, and due publication to be made. Default was entered, and a judgment, personal in form, against defendants. The land attached was sold, and the case before the court was ejectment, brought by the original owner against the purchaser under the judgment, who had taken possession. The question was as to the validity and effect of the judgment. The court proceeded to state that the proceeding, in case the defendant did not appear, was strictly in rem; that, if he appeared, it then became in personam. It was there said: "That such is the nature of this proceeding in this latter class of cases is clearly evinced by two well-established propositions: First, the judgment of the court, though in form a personal judgment against the defendant, has no effect beyond the property attached in the suit. No general execution can be issued for any balance unpaid after the attached property is exhausted. No suit can be maintained on such a judgment in the same court, or in any other; nor can it be used as evidence in any other proceeding not affecting the attached property; nor could the costs in that proceeding be collected of defendant out of any other property than that attached in the suit." After making a quotation which includes the above, Judge Field proceeds: "The fact that the defendants in that case had fled from the state, or had concealed themselves so as not to be reached by the ordinary process of the court, and were nonresidents, was not made a point in the decision. The opinion treated them as being without the territorial jurisdiction of the court; and the grounds of the extent of its authority over persons and property thus situated were considered, when they were not brought within its jurisdiction by personal service or voluntary appearance." The judge then proceeds to add that to the doctrine stated in the citation all the judges of the court agree. I understand this to be a deliberate statement to the effect that domicile and residence, or both, are immaterial, as, indeed, they must be, if, as appears all through the opinion, the basis of the doctrine is that process cannot run beyond the limits of the state. I might make further quotations from this opinion, but it is too familiar to the profession to require it. An impartial consideration of the opinion will, I think, convince any one that it holds that process cannot be served upon any one without the state. And the same doctrine is announced in Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, where it is said: "Whenever, therefore, it appears from the inspection of the record of a court of general jurisdiction that the defendant against whom a personal judgment or decree is rendered was at the time of the alleged service without the territorial limits of the court, and thus beyond the reach of its process,—that he never appeared in the action,—the presumption of jurisdiction over his person ceases." From this, and other like expressions in other cases, it is manifest that domicile or even residence in a state, cuts no figure at all. The idea that domicile determines jurisdiction in divorce rests upon the assumption that status depends upon domicile, and is of interest there only. Judge Field could not have had this in mind in Pennoyer v. Neff, and therefore, when he speaks of "absent defendants," he cannot mean those not domiciled within the state, but must have meant simply those physically absent, and upon whom, therefore, personal service of process could not be made. But it is claimed that the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff was explained in Machine Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 11 Sup. Ct. 92, in accordance with the views of respondent. I cannot find anything in that case upon the subject. The judgment there under consideration was a judgment by confession entered by a prothonotary in a court of Pennsylvania, in pursuance, as it was claimed, of a bond and warrant of attorney executed by John Benge, who was then a resident and citizen of Maryland. The warrant of attorney authorized any attorney of any court of record to confess judgment against him. The statute of Pennsylvania authorized the prothonotary of any court of record in the state to enter judgment upon such an instrument. An attempt was made to execute this judgment in Maryland. It was claimed that the judgment was void, not being entered in pursuance of the power, and that defendant not having been served with process, and not having appeared, the judgment was without jurisdiction and void. The numerous cases cited by the chief justice were used to show that such a judgment would be held invalid without the state where rendered, and not to show that it should be held valid within the state; and I think the question whether such a judgment would be valid within the state where rendered was not before the court in any of the cited cases. But, in discussing the question as to whether the judgment would be valid in another state, it was assumed that it might be valid within the state where rendered. That was the very question in Pennoyer v. Neff. A personal judgment upon constructive service had been rendered against a nonresident, and property in Oregon sold under execution to satisfy it. The question was as to the validity of the judgment within the state where rendered.

It is contended also by the respondent that the decree is valid as to children and alimony, although the service was constructive, and the court could not render a personal judgment because these are incidents to the divorce. Conceding that they are incidents to the cause of action for a divorce, the result would not follow. In proceedings in rem, where there is no jurisdiction of the person, no such result has ever been recognized. In Cooper v. Reynolds, supra, it was said that costs cannot be recovered from any other property of the defendant. There is, in reality, no defendant save the res. So here it cannot properly be said there was a defendant. In the proceeding the court had before it only the status of the plaintiff. The summons was not really a writ to bring the defendant into court, but merely a notice prescribed by the statute in the interests of fairness, and to rebut the idea that the proceeding was secret. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 159. It brought the res into court, and not the defendant. The adjudication must be confined to that status. It is said that the relation of the parents to the children, and their relation to each other in regard to the children, is a status. If so, it would not help the respondent, for no such status was before the court. But the very meaning of the word "status," both derivative and as defined in legal proceedings, forbids that it should be applied to a mere relation. "Status" implies relations, undoubtedly, but it is not a mere relation. But the authorities are all one way on this subject. If the children are within the jurisdiction, and the defendant is personally served with summons, and perhaps if he is not, the court may award the custody of the children to one of them. It is a mode of appointing a guardian, which is always a matter of local control, regardless of the legal domicile of the children, if domicile and residence do not coincide. It seems to have been held that, when the defendant appears and makes issue upon the point, the court may determine that one spouse is a suitable person to have the custody and control of the children, and that the other is not. People v. Allen, 40 Hun, 611. An appeal was taken from the order made in that case, which was a proceeding in habeas corpus, to the court of appeals. There the appeal was discharged because it appeared that the lower court, "in view of all the existing facts relating to the welfare and interests of the infants, exercised its discretion in awarding to the mother the custody of the children, and, in so doing it, gave to the Illinois decree, not the force of an estoppel, or the conclusive effect sometimes due to a judgment, but simply regarded it as a fact or circumstance bearing upon the discretion to be exercised, without dictating or controlling it." This seems to hold that, without the state, such a finding would have no binding force. But where, as in this case, no personal judgment could be entered, there can be no question. Van Fleet, Coll. Attack, §§ 389, 391, and authorities cited. And Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations (6th Ed., p. 499), says: "The publication which is permitted by the statute is sufficient to justify a decree in these cases changing the status of the complaining party, and thereby terminating the marriage; and it might be sufficient also to empower the court to pass upon the question of the custody and control of the children of the marriage, if they were then within its jurisdiction. But a decree on this subject would only be absolutely binding on the parties while the children remained within the jurisdiction. If they acquire a domicile in another state or country, the judicial tribunals of that state or country would have authority to determine the question of their guardianship there. But in divorce cases, no more than in any other, can the court make a decree for the payment of money by a defendant not served with process, and not appearing in the case, which shall be binding upon him personally. It must follow, in such a case, that the wife, when complainant, cannot obtain a valid decree for alimony, nor a valid judgment for costs. * * * The remedy of the complainant must generally, in these cases, be confined to a dissolution of the marriage, with the incident benfits springing therefrom, and to an order for the custody of the children, if within the state." See, also, Freem. Judgm. §§ 584, 585; Brown, Jur. §§ 6, 8, 78, 79. The doctrine is very clearly stated in Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321: "Every sovereignty exercises the right of determining the status or condition of persons found within its jurisdiction. The laws of a foreign state cannot be permitted to intervene to affect the personal rights or privileges even of their own citizens, while they are residing on the territory and within the jurisdiction of an independent government."

Respondent contends that there is no judgment for alimony. If so, it is not apparent how plaintiff would be injured by striking from the decree the clause complained of. I think the decree, if valid, settles the right of plaintiff to alimony for her support during life, and, as the court had no jurisdiction to provide for alimony, that part of the decree should be stricken out.

Respondent contends that a motion to vacate the judgment in this case could only be maintained under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The point of the contention, as I understand it, is that defendant should come in and submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, show a meritorious defense, and ask leave to have his defense considered. It is obvious, of course, that defendant cannot do this; for he cannot show that the judgment was taken against him by his inadvertence, mistake, or excusable neglect. The argument, therefore, is that no such motion will lie. No authority for such a proposition is cited, unless Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899, may be claimed to have that effect. In that case, however, the motion was to vacate a judgment rendered because a demurrer was sustained to a complaint, and the plaintiff failed to amend within the time allowed. The motion was made 11 months after the entry of judgment. Plaintiff was not notified, as the Code requires, of the order sustaining the demurrer. If this case is not put upon the ground that the failure to give the notice was not jurisdictional, I think it was overruled by Norton v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452. It was, however, but a default, and the parties were in court. A plaintiff who for six months should fail to know what had become of a demurrer which had been submitted for decision would be guilty of great negligence. The remedy offered by section 473 was ample. The case of Norton v. Railroad Co. seems in point here.

It is also claimed that no appeal lies to this court from an order refusing to set aside the judgment, because the judgment was appealable. To this proposition many decisions of this court are cited. I do not care to review these cases. No doubt it has been held—and, I think, correctly—that, when a motion is made to vacate an order under such circumstances that it merely calls upon the court to repeat or overrule the former ruling on the same facts, the last order is not appealable,—not because the last order is not within the terms of section 963 of the Code, allowing appeals, for it may be, but because it would be virtually allowing two appeals from the same ruling, and would, in some cases, have the effect of extending the time for appealing, contrary to the intent of the statute. Nor will such practice be allowed merely to permit a litigant to take an exception, or get a bill of exceptions, which he has neglected to do at the proper time. But I see no reason why this appeal should not be entertained. It is plainly within the terms of the statute allowing appeals, and no other method is suggested in which the right of the appellant to the relief sought could be considered here. An appeal upon the judgment roll would not present all the facts upon which the motion is based, even if one may have a bill of exceptions when he has not been in court and has taken no exceptions. Besides, it is a case in which it was eminently proper, if not necessary, that relief should first be asked from the trial court. Its action could not have been asked in any other mode. The defendant was not in court, and had no opportunity to be heard. The order is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court to grant appellant's motion.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. This is an action of divorce, and the present appeal is by defendant from an order of the superior court denying his motion to strike from the judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff all the provisions thereof relating to the custody of the minor children of the parties, and to support by way of alimony. The facts of the case are these: The respondent and appellant were both born in, and are citizens of, the state of California. They were married, and their children were born, in this state, and they have been continuously domiciled and resident here. The parties have two children,—a girl named Lorraine, about five years old at the commencement of this action, and a boy named James Francis, about two years old at that time. This action was commenced December 20, 1893. About three weeks before that time, appellant, by force and fraud, took the child James Francis away from respondent, and, on the following day, took and carried away both of said children, and kept them secreted from respondent, and has never since let her see them; and, a short time before the commencement of this action, he clandestinely left the state of California, and took said children with him; and about November 27, 1893, he clandestinely left the United States, taking said children with him, and since then has temporarily sojourned in the city of Paris, in France. In January, 1894, he made application to the proper authorities of France for permission to be domiciled there; and it is admitted by respondent that he obtained such permission in July, 1894. But it appears by the preponderance of evidence that he claimed his legal residence and domicile to be in the city of San Francisco, Cal.; that "his purpose in applying for permission to fix his domicile in France was to prevent his wife from serving summons on him in an action for divorce which she had commenced, and also to keep her from getting possession of their children"; that his sojourning in France was only temporary, for the purposes above mentioned; and that his intention was and is to return to California, where all his interests are, as soon as these purposes shall be subserved. Service of summons was duly made upon him by publication, and sending him a copy of complaint and summons to Paris, France, in accordance with the provisions of the statute of California on that subject; and, default having been regularly entered against him, judgment, after the introduction of evidence, was duly entered in favor of respondent. By said judgment (1) a divorce was granted respondent upon the grounds of the adultery and extreme cruelty of appellant; (2) the custody of the said two children was given to respondent; and (3) it was further ordered that respondent "shall have the right, at such time in the future as she shall be advised, to apply to the court for suitable allowance and sum to be paid to her by said defendant for her support during life," etc., as she may be entitled to under her complaint. The motion made by appellant, from the refusal of which this appeal is taken, was to strike out the said second and third parts of said judgment, upon the ground that the said service of summons did not give the court jurisdiction over the matters embraced in those parts of the judgment.

Waiving the objection of respondent that said motion was not a proper remedy, under our system of practice, it is apparent that the motion could be granted only upon the theory that the judgment, so far as it embraces the parts sought to be stricken out, is void; absolutely void; void in the state where it was rendered. And a court should certainly not judicially declare such utter inefficiency of a sovereign state to deal with the property and personal rights of its own citizens, unless it be driven to such declaration by the force of inevitable judicial authority. I do not think that there is such authority. The case chiefly relied on is Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, which is declared by counsel for appellant, and by others, to have established what is called the "modern" doctrine in regard to the jurisdiction of state courts over persons not personally served with process within the state. A close examination of that case shows, however, that the main proposition decided by it—which may, perhaps, be styled "modern"—is that a judgment in personam rendered in a state court against a nonresident upon substituted service cannot be enforced even in the state where it was rendered, or satisfied even out of property situated within the state where it was rendered, while, before that, the weight of authority was that, although the courts of another state would not recognize such a judgment, it was valid in the state where it was rendered, and could be satisfied out of property of the defendant situated within that state. This is evidently the view of that case taken by Mr. Freeman, for in his work on Judgments (section 567) he says: "Until a comparatively recent date, the opinion extensively prevailed that judgments in personam, entered after constructive service of process upon a nonresident, while they were not enforceable beyond the limits of the state where entered, were nevertheless so far valid in that state. This opinion has been overthrown by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714." Many of the authorities which show that such was the former doctrine may be found in the cases cited in the briefs, and in the opinion of the court in Weaver v. Boggs, 38 Md. 255. In that case the court states the rule in this language: "It is well settled that a judgment obtained in a court of one state cannot be enforced in the courts and against a citizen of another, unless the court rendering the judgment has acquired jurisdiction over the defendant by actual service of process upon him, or by his voluntary appearance to the suit, and submission to that jurisdiction. Such a judgment may be perfectly valid in the jurisdiction where rendered, and enforced there, even against the property, assets, and credits of a nonresident defendant there situated, but it cannot be enforced or made the foundation of an action in another state. A law which substitutes constructive for actual service is binding upon persons domiciled within the state where such law prevails, and as respects property of others situated there, but can bind neither person nor property beyond its limits." (The italics are ours.) And in Machine Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 11 Sup. Ct. 92, the supreme court of the United States, speaking of the states of Pennsylvania and Maryland, says, "And the distinction between the validity of a judgment rendered in one state, under its local laws on the subject, and its validity in another state, is recognized by the highest tribunals of each of these states."

But, whether or not the state of the law on the question determined by Pennoyer v. Neff was the same before as after that decision, it is apparent that Pennoyer v. Neff did not determine the question involved in the case at bar. There Neff was a bona fide, actual nonresident. The facts of that case were that one Mitchell recovered in a state court of Oregon a personal judgment for professional services against Neff, who was a nonresident of that state, and resided in the state of California; that the service of summons upon Neff was by publication; that, on a common execution issued upon that judgment, certain land of Neff, situated in Oregon, was sold to Pennoyer; and that Neff brought an action against Pennoyer to recover said land, and recovered upon the ground that the judgment was not valid, even in Oregon, and could not be satisfied out of land in Oregon, because substituted service would not support a judgment against a nonresident. There was no claim that the defendant had either residence or domicile in Oregon. In that case the fact was that Neff was, in every sense, a nonresident of Oregon, having his domicile and citizenship elsewhere; and the scope of a judicial decision is limited by the facts upon which it is based. In the second place, however difficult it may be to accurately define "residence," in its legal signification, and to distinguish it from "domicile," it is apparent that in the opinion in Pennoyer v. Neff the word "nonresident" is used as expressing the fact of an actual, bona fide residence outside of the state where the judgment is rendered, —such a residence as usually accompanies domicile, and not a mere temporary flight from one's home, in fraudem legis. Indeed, throughout the opinion the words "residence" and "domicile" are used indiscriminately, and as synonymous. There was no necessity in that case to notice any distinction, if there be any, between the words; for Neff was a nonresident, in every sense, either of residence or domicile, and the opinion is to be taken as written in view of that fact. For instance, it is said in the opinion that "the plaintiff here was a nonresident of the state"; again, it is said that there cannot be an encroachment upon the independence of the state "in which the persons are domiciled"; again, it is said that "the state, through its tribunals, may compel persons domiciled within its limits to execute," etc.; again, it is said that property within a state, owned by "nonresidents," may be subjected to certain processes, and that this "in no respect infringes upon the sovereignty of the state where the owners are domiciled"; again, "process from tribunals of one state cannot run into another state, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory, and respond to proceedings against them;" and finally the court, in the last sentence of its opinion, says, "The question here respects only the validity of a money judgment rendered in one state, in an action upon a simple contract against the resident of another, without service of process upon him, or his appearance therein." And as, in the case at bar, the appellant was neither a nonresident of the state where the judgment was rendered nor domiciled elsewhere, as was the plaintiff in Pennoyer v. Neff, the latter case cannot be relied on as imperative authority for holding that the power of the state of California to control and preserve, through her tribunals, the personal and property rights of her own citizens, can be evaded by flight perpetrated for that express purpose. As to the reasons sometimes given for an opposite rule, how can the dangers of judgments upon substituted service against persons who might not have seen the publication be marshaled in aid of a party who, knowing of the coming suit, flees to avoid it? In Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, no question was raised as to the validity of the asserted nonresidence of Reynolds.

That the laws of a sovereign are binding upon all its citizens domiciled within its borders, whether temporarily absent or not, seems to be the clear result of the authorities. "The laws of a sovereign rightfully extend over persons who are domiciled within his territory." Story, Confl. Laws, § 539. Freeman—although he also includes the extraterritorial effect of a judgment, which does not concern us here—sums up the result of the authorities as follows: "The position, however, which seems to be best sustained, both by reason and precedents, is that each state has the authority to provide the means by which its own citizens may be brought before the courts; that the courts of other states have no authority to disregard the means thus provided; and, finally, that every judgment or decree obtained in a state against some of its citizens, by virtue of a lawful though constructive service of process, should be obligatory upon such citizens in every other state whence it is taken. Nor is it destructive of the extraterritorial effect of a judgment based on constructive service that the defendant, being a citizen of the state, was temporarily absent therefrom. It is sufficient that he was at the time subject to the laws of the state, and to the territorial authority of the court." There are numerous judicial decisions to the same point, one or two of which we will notice: In Henderson v. Staniford, 105 Mass. 504, the court say: "The defendant was not in California when the action was commenced against him there, nor at any time during its pendency. No service of process or notice was ever made upon him personally. He did not appear by counsel, or otherwise, nor assent to the judgment which was rendered upon his default of appearance. But he had been for a long time before that a resident of California, the contract was made there, and that continued to be his legal domicile when judgment was rendered. He was therefore, upon principle of international rights, subject to the laws and to the jurisdiction of the courts of that state." In Welch v. Sykes, 3 Gilman, 201, the supreme court of Illinois declare that "it is competent for each state to prescribe the mode of bringing parties before its courts," and that, "although its regulations in this respect can have no extraterritorial operation, they are nevertheless binding on its own citizens." In Beard v. Beard, 21 Ind. 321, the question is quite exhaustively considered, and many authorities examined, and the general conclusion is that "notwithstanding a state may authorize its courts to render personal judgment, upon constructive notice, against its citizens, it cannot, we think, authorize such a judgment upon such notice against a citizen of another state, resident in such other state." But the statute there did not provide for service by publication, and the court say, "In such a case (that is, of temporary absence of a resident of the state), notice must be given by leaving a copy of process at his last place of residence." In Burnam v. Com., 1 Duv. 211, the court of appeals of Kentucky, considering a statute which provided for substituted service, said: "We cannot adjudge any provision in the act to be unconstitutional. As in other cases where actual notice cannot be given to absent defendants, there must either be no remedy, or constructive notice must be substituted as sufficient; and what constructive notice shall be given is a question of legislative discretion, rather than of power." In that case the defendants were presumably citizens and residents of the state, although temporarily absent. In Huntley v. Baker, 33 Hun, 578, the action was upon a money judgment rendered against the defendant in the state of Wisconsin, upon substituted service, when the defendant, who had lived for a long time in Wisconsin, was absent from that state, and in fact he never returned to it. The court, after referring to the doctrine that there is generally no extraterritorial jurisdiction, say: "But it has been repeatedly held in England that this doctrine is not applicable when the person sought to be charged by judgment is a subject or citizen of the country where and at the time the proceedings are taken, and when they are in conformity to the statute there, although the person be then absent from the country; and that is put upon the general ground that the person domiciled there owes allegiance to the country, and submission to its laws." It is then stated that there are not many reported cases on the point in this country, but reference is made to cases in the United States supreme court, and in the court of appeals of New York, where the English cases are cited with approval. The court then say: "Without stating the principle more at length, it may be assumed that by reason of the relation between the state and the citizen, which affords protection to him and his property, and imposes upon him duties as such, he may be charged by judgment in personam, binding on him everywhere, as the result of legal proceedings instituted and carried on in conformity to the statute of the state, prescribing a method of service which is not personal, and which in fact may not become actual notice to him. And this may be accomplished in his lawful absence from the state." The court then states that it is not necessary to consider the distinction between domicile and residence, but that such question was "one of fact, dependent upon all the circumstances appearing by and inferable from the testimony, to which it is unnecessary here to refer in detail," which justified the referee to conclude that the domicile or residence of the defendant had not been changed. And the evidence in that case was vastly stronger in favor of a permanent change of residence and domicile than in the case at bar. There are many other authorities to the same point, but we will only refer, in addition to those above cited, to Black, Judgm. § 907, and the numerous cases cited and quoted from in the notes to Steamboat Co. v. Foster, to be found in 48 Am. Dec., commencing at page 274.

In nearly all the cases on the subject the words "resident," "domicile," "citizen," and "inhabitant" are used indiscriminately to signify an actual, permanent residence, which has not been actually and in good faith changed; and "nonresident" is applied to one who is not such a citizen, inhabitant, or resident of, and has not such domicile within, the state in which the judgment is rendered. We are not concerned here with the question how far full faith and credit should be given to the judgment in another state, but only with the question, is it void in this state? As the appellant was not a nonresident, the case does not fall within the decision in Pennoyer v. Neff, and under the general authorities the judgment is valid in the state in which it was rendered. All that is necessary to be determined in this case is that a citizen and resident of California cannot escape the performance of his duties, and baffle our courts in their attempts to enforce the rights of others against him. by sudden flight and temporary absence, expressly intended for that purpose.

Every rule of law, and every sentiment of justice, is an obstruction to the success of such strategy. Nor will the affirmance of the order appealed from be violative of either the general international law, or the American interstate law. A sovereign state might be justified in refusing to enforce within its own territory, and against one of its own citizens, a judgment rendered in another state upon substituted service; but neither its interest nor its dignity would be touched by the enforcement of such a judgment by another state within its territory, and against its own citizens.

We cannot see merit in the point made by appellant that the substituted service was not sufficiently in compliance with the statute of this state which provides for it. The main contention is that the statement in the affidavit for publication that the defendant "has departed from the state of California, and is now absent therefrom," is of a mere conclusion, and not of a fact; but it would be difficult to suggest any other language that would express the facts of departure and absence with more clearness and certainty. The fact that a few of those words are used in the statute does not prevent their use in an affidavit, if they are apt words to express the meaning of the affiant.

Respondent contends, also, that the order appealed from should be affirmed upon the further grounds that those parts of the judgment which relate to the custody of the children and alimony are mere incidents to the divorce, and that the jurisdiction to grant the divorce, which is admitted on all hands, carries with it the jurisdiction of the incidents, and, furthermore, that the relation of children to parents is a status, like that of marriage, and that, therefore, an action to determine the custody of children, like a suit for divorce, is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. But it is unnecessary to discuss these points at length, because the views heretofore expressed would be determinative of the case in favor of respondent upon another ground. We may say, however, that, so far as the custody of the children is concerned, this second contention of respondent seems to be correct. The judgment merely determines generally the custody of the children, and whether it could be enforced in another state or country is not here involved. It is settled law that a decree of divorce operates upon the relation, the status, and that, therefore, such a decree founded upon constructive service by publication is valid, even as against one resident and domiciled beyond the state. See cases cited on pages 273, 274, 48 Am. Dec. A judgment for divorce is quasi, at least, in rem. Judgments in rem, it is well known, are not, as the name implies, confined to adjudications against things. They are rendered in many instances where the prior proceedings are entirely in personam, as in cases establishing or dissolving marriages. Freem. Judgm. § 606. In Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 734, 735, it is said: "The jurisdiction which every state possesses to determine the civil status and capacities of all its inhabitants involves authority to prescribe the conditions on which proceedings affecting them may be commenced and carried on within its territory." Now, is not the relation between parent and child a "civil status"? It is so assumed to be in Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 499. In Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. § 1189, it is said that "the relation of parent and child is a status, * * * like marriage." And in Re Newman's Estate, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887, the court said, "So far as the action of Maldonado v. Maldonado affected the status of the parties and the custody of the child, it was a proceeding in rem, and service by publication in such case is good." See, also, Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 238, and People v. Allen, 40 Hun, 611. In Brenot v. Brenot, 102 Cal. 294, 36 Pac. 672, it was held that in an action for divorce the custody of the children was an incident in the main relief sought,—the divorce. See, also, Younger v. Younger, 106 Cal. 377, 39 Pac. 779. Upon these authorities, and upon principle, we think that, in an action brought for both divorce and the custody of the children, the latter is an incident of the former, and that the court has jurisdiction over the status founded on the relation of parent and child, as well as of the status founded on the relation of husband and wife, even as against a bona fide nonresident domiciled elsewhere. And in such a case the actual physical presence of the children is no more necessary for jurisdiction over the status in the one instance than is the presence of the husband necessary in the other. It is not necessary to determine whether or not jurisdiction to decree alimony would follow as an incident to the divorce. It is doubtful if the judgment in this case really awards any alimony, but, if it does, its validity in that respect has sufficient basis in the proposition first discussed in this opinion.

With respect to the statement of facts hereinbefore made, it is proper to observe that where, as in this case, the appeal is from a mere order of the court below granting or denying a motion, and where findings are not necessary, this court will assume the existence of such facts necessary to support the ruling of the lower court as fairly appear from the evidence. Here the preponderance of the evidence is largely in support of the facts above stated. Indeed, the fact that appellant fled the state, and clandestinely carried away the children, to avoid the action, is too apparent to be even debatable. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

Guardian of Infant—Appointment—Jurisdiction.

A court has no jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of infants absent from the state, though their domicile be within it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Lorraine W. De La Montanya against James De La Montanya, Jr., her husband, and their children, for the custody of the children. Plaintiff had judgment, and from an order denying his motion for its vacation the husband appeals. Reversed.

Dorn & Dorn, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent. Edwin R. Taylor, for guardian.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action prosecuted by the respondent for the custody of the children of plaintiff and defendant James De La Montanya, Jr., appellant. The children are the other defendants. The facts in regard to the time of the commencement of the action and the publication of summons, and the absence of the defendants from the state, are in all respects as in the divorce case, No. 15,996, just decided (44 Pac. 345). Default was entered May 8, 1894, and, on the same day, Francis E. Spencer was appointed guardian ad litem for the infant defendants. On the same day he filed an answer admitting all the allegations of the complaint, and joining in the prayer. Appellant did not appear in the case, and none of the defendants were within the jurisdiction of the court at any time after the suit was instituted. May 15, 1894, a decree was entered which formally adjudged (1) that all the defendants were citizens of this state, and domiciled therein; (2) that the removal by the appellant of the children from the state was without right, and in fraud and violation of the rights of plaintiff; (3) awarding exclusive custody of the children to plaintiff; and (4) requiring appellant to forthwith bring the infants into the state, and deliver them to the plaintiff. September 3, 1894, appellant, after due notice, applied for an order vacating and setting aside the decree, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to make it. Affidavits were read on the hearing setting forth facts showing the absence of all the defendants from the state. The motion was denied, and this appeal brought.

The order must be reversed, for the reasons given in the divorce case. Jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for infants, under the American system, is entirely local. I do not doubt that the mere presence of infants within a jurisdiction is sufficient to confer jurisdiction, although they may be residents of another state. But, as such jurisdiction is always exercised for the good of the child, the courts would never allow the power to be used for purposes of oppression, or to prevent an infant temporarily within its jurisdiction from being taken away, when its best interests required it, to its more permanent residence. The jurisdiction is never used except when necessary for the good of the child. Counsel claim here, also, as in the other case, that domicile, and not actual residence, is the test of jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the person of infants. The case apparently most relied upon is In re Willoughby, 30 Ch. Div. 324. But that case, if authority at all upon the subject, is the other way. Counsel stated in his argument that England was the domicile at least by choice of the infant's father. Nothing in the case warrants that assertion. The case does not show that either parent of the infant was ever in England, or ever expected to be, or had a domicile there of any kind. On the contrary, it is expressly stated that the infant was domiciled in France, and the whole point of the opinions in the case is to show that domicile is not the test of jurisdiction, but that allegiance is. Judge Lindley, in his opinion on appeal, states the facts very curtly, as is the manner in the English courts: "This is a curious case. The infant is English by nationality, and French by domicile. Her father is dead, and her mother is, by the French law, under the Code Civil, the guardian of the infant. The infant is not resident here, and has no property here." The infant was simply a grandchild of an Englishman, and therefore, by the law of England, declared to be an English subject; and the broad doctrine is announced that the court had the power to appoint a guardian for an infant subject of Great Britain, wherever the infant might be, and although domiciled in a foreign country. By the same rule, it would have jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for any infant in the United States whose grandfather was a natural born subject of Great Britain, though its parents were natural born citizens of the United States, and neither infant nor its parents had ever been domiciled in England. It is easy to see that the case proves nothing for respondent. The order is reversed, and the trial court directed to grant to appellant the relief demanded in his motion.

DUNN v. PRICE et al. (L. A. 82.)

Written Contract—Parol Evidence.

B., who had delivered personal property to certain persons under a written agreement to give them a bill of sale when their note for the price was fully paid, assigned the contract, giving the assignee authority to complete the same and collect the money; but the assignment did not purport to transfer title to the property, and B. thereafter received from C., one of the buyers, the latter's share of the note. Plaintiff, who claimed under a bill of sale from B.'s assignee, sought to recover the property from defendants, who had purchased the same from C. Held, that evidence was admissible to show an oral agreement between B. and C. that the latter should have title to one-third of the property on payment of his share of the price, since Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, makes parol evidence incompetent for the purpose of varying the terms of a written instrument only as between the parties thereto and their representatives or successors in interest, and plaintiff was neither.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by James T. Dunn against Charles Price and others for the recovery of personal property. From an order denying a motion for a new trial after judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Kendrick, for appellant. W. B. Mathews and Walter Bordwell, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the possession or value, alleged to be $416, of four horses and two sets of harness, with damages for the detention thereof. The answer denied that the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to the possession of the described property, or of any part thereof, at the time of the commencement of the action, or at any time prior thereto, and denied that defendants had ever unlawfully withheld or detained said property, or any of the same, from the possession of the plaintiff. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were that the plaintiff was not at any of the times mentioned in the complaint, or at the commencement of the action, the owner of, or entitled to the possession of, the property described in the complaint, or of any part thereof. Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiff take nothing by the action. A motion for new trial was subsequently made upon a bill of exceptions, and denied, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted. The bill of exceptions contains no specifications that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and the only points made for a reversal are that the court erred in certain rulings upon the admission of evidence.

It appears from the record that on September 16, 1890, W. W. Howard, as party of the first part, entered into a written agreement with L. W. Weller, W. B. Brainard, and J. A. Brainard, as parties of the second part, whereby he agreed to sell to them, and they agreed to buy of him, a large amount of personal property, including that described in the complaint. The price to be paid was $1,366.10, for which a promissory note was given, payable three months after date, with interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per month. The agreement provided that "the title of all the aforesaid personal property shall be and remain in and belong to the said party of the first part until the aforesaid payments of said promissory note have been made in full," and, "that any sum or sums of money that the parties of the second part shall pay to the party of the first part, upon the aforesaid note, before final payment thereof, shall be considered and treated as rent for the use of the aforesaid personal property, which the first party may give to them, until the whole of said note has been paid, and that on the full and complete payment of said note the party of the first part will make, execute, and deliver to the parties of the second part, a good and sufficient bill of sale of the aforesaid personal property, and deliver to them the absolute and unconditional possession thereof; and the parties of the second part hereby agree that they will give, as security that they will purchase and pay for all the aforesaid personal property in the manner hereinbefore described, a crop mortgage on all crops and grain put in by them in Los Angeles county during the winter and spring of 1890 and 1891, as soon as said crops are planted." Attached to this agreement was an assignment thereof made by Howard, and dated October 30, 1891, in these words: "For a valuable consideration in hand paid, I hereby sell, assign, transfer, and set over to California Loan & Trust Company, all my right, title, and interest in and to the within agreement, and authorize and empower and direct the California Loan & Trust Company to fulfill all agreements therein and collect all money thereon and do all other acts and things as fully as I might or could do." On August 26, 1892, the California Loan & Trust Company executed to J. T. Dunn, the plaintiff, a bill of sale of all the property described in the said agreement; and on the next day he entered into a new agreement with said L. W. Weller, W. B. Brainard, and J. A. Brainard, whereby he agreed to sell to them, and they to buy of him, all of the said property, for the sum of $1,000, for which a note was given, payable three months after date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and which was to be secured by a crop mortgage on all crops and grain put in by them in Los Angeles county during the winter and spring of 1892 and 1893, as soon as crops are planted. This agreement contained the same provisions in regard to the title, the advance payments, and the making a bill of sale, etc., as those above quoted from the agreement made by Howard. Indorsed upon this agreement, under date of October 12, 1893, was a release by L. W. Weller and W. B. Brainard to James T. Dunn from all his obligations to them under the said agreement, and a transfer by them to him of all their interest in or to the property described in the said agreement. The only right or title to the property in controversy shown to be in the plaintiff was such as he acquired through the assignment of the Howard contract to the California Loan & Trust Company, and the bill of sale of the company to him. And the only title to the said property shown to be in defendants was such as they acquired by a purchase thereof from J. A. Brainard. George Price, one of the defendants, testified that he bought the horses of J. A. Brainard in October, 1893, and gave to W. W. Howard a mortgage thereon for the full purchase price, and also a crop mortgage for the same debt, which Howard still held at the time of the trial, in January, 1894. J. A. Brainard testified that the only title he ever had to the property he acquired from W. W. Howard. He was then asked by counsel for defendants, and answered, the following questions: "Q. Was there any understanding or agreement between you and Mr. Howard, at the time you executed that contract, with reference to your paying any portion of it? A. Yes, sir, there was. Q. State what that agreement was. A. When Mr. Howard had the contract drawn up, or was going to draw it up, I told him I would not sign the contract unless, if either one paid his own one-third, he was to have one-third of the stuff clear, and Mr. Howard said that was all right. I made this statement to him for my benefit only. Q. Did you subsequently make any payment to Mr. Howard on that contract? A. I paid Mr. Howard $585 as one-third of the note. That was about one year from the time we dissolved. Q. At the time you signed that contract, did Mr. Howard agree that, if you paid one-third of the purchase price, you should have one-third of the stock and the property released to you? A. He did. This $585 which I paid Howard was one-third of the amount that was at that time due on the contract." W. B. Brainard testified in reference to the release indorsed upon the plaintiff's agreement or contract under date of October 12, 1893. He was asked by counsel for defendant: "Q. What was the consideration for the execution of this instrument? A. The consideration for the execution of the instrument was J. T. Dunn's agreement with us, at the time of the execution, to release myself and L. W. Weller from all obligations under our agreement to purchase the horses described in the complaint, and the other property described in the agreement." The above questions were severally objected to by counsel for plaintiff, upon the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the objections were overruled. These rulings constitute the errors complained of, and upon which the plaintiff relies for a reversal of the order appealed from.

It is claimed that the answers to the first four questions were improperly admitted, because the object and effect of the evidence was to vary and supersede the terms of a written agreement by a contemporaneous oral agreement concerning the same matter, which is inhibited by section 1625 of the Civil Code, and section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The sections referred to read as follows:

"Sec. 1625. The execution of a contract in writing, whether the law requires it to be in writing or not, supersedes all the oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument."

"Sec. 1856. When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and, therefore, there can be between the parties and their representatives, or successors in interest, no evidence of the terms of agreement other than the contents of the writing," etc.

It will be observed that the rule thus declared applies only as between the parties to the instrument, and their representatives or successors in interest. It cannot be invoked by strangers to the instrument. "The rule that parol testimony may not be given to contradict a written contract applies only in suits between the parties to it, or their privies. In a contention between a party to an instrument and a stranger, either can give parol testimony differing from the contents of the instrument." McMasters v. Insurance Co., 55 N. Y. 222; Lowell Manuf'g Co. v. Safeguard Fire Ins. Co., 88 N. Y. 591; Darby v. Hotel Co., 97 Cal. 384, 32 Pac. 454. The evidence objected to was evidently admitted upon the theory that the plaintiff was not shown to be the representative or successor in interest of Howard, as to the property involved in this action; and this theory, so far as we can discover from the record, was very clearly tenable. Howard must be presumed to have owned the property which he contracted to sell by his agreement of September 16, 1890. The assignment of that agreement to the California Loan & Trust Company did not purport to transfer the title to any of the property described, but, in effect, seems to have been only a power of attorney authorizing the company to carry out the contract, and to collect the money that would become due thereon, and then execute a bill of sale to the purchasers. The note does not appear to have been assigned, and it must have been intended that the money, when collected, should be paid over to Howard. And that this must have been so is further shown by the fact that Howard afterwards received from J. A. Brainard one-third of the amount due on the note, and also, as late as October, 1893, received from the defendants a mortgage on the horses, and a crop mortgage to secure their purchase price. No authority is shown in the trust company to sell the property to any third party, and, under these circumstances, the court below might properly have concluded that the bill of sale from the company to the plaintiff passed no title, and was without effect. Besides, section 1698 of the Civil Code provides that "a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement." Here it appears that the oral agreement between Howard and Brainard was executed, and the evidence as to the circumstances attending it was therefore properly admitted.

The last question objected to was neither irrelevant nor incompetent. Plaintiff having accepted a release and transfer from L. W. Weller and W. B. Brainard, it was proper to show what was the consideration for that release and transfer. It may be, as claimed, that J. A. Brainard was not thereby released from any of his obligations, but that was a question of law. We see no prejudicial error in any of the rulings complained of, and advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

MAIER v. FREEMAN et al. (L. A. 10.) [1]

CHATTEL MORTGAGES — RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE — SUBSTITUTION—GARNISHMENT.

1. Where the mortgagee authorizes the mortgagor, before the mortgage debt is due, to sell the mortgaged chattels, the proceeds to be applied upon the mortgage debt, the mortgagee has no lien on the unpaid price due the mortgagor, as against creditors of the mortgagor attaching the purchase money by garnishment proceeding; Civ. Code, § 2888, providing that the title to mortgaged chattels remains in the mortgagor.

2. Service of a writ of garnishment by a creditor of the seller upon the buyer before completion of the sale, by delivery of the chattels sold, creates no lien on the purchase price.

Interpleader by Simon Maier against B. N. Freeman and others. From the judgment, defendant Freeman and certain others appeal. Affirmed.

Ben Goodrich, A. B. McCutchen, and John D. Pope, for appellants. Allen & Flint and Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for respondent.

BRITT, C. The plaintiff, Maier, being indebted in the sum of $2,898.90 for sheep purchased by him from one Nellis, and conflicting claims being made upon him for the money by several creditors of Nellis, he instituted this action against said creditors and Nellis to compel them to interplead concerning their several pretensions. This being done, after trial, the court entered judgment awarding the fund (which Maier had then paid into court) to certain of the defendants who had summoned Maier as garnishee in the course of actions prosecuted by them, respectively, against Nellis. By such determination of the court the demands of Haas, Baruch & Co., a copartnership, and of defendant Perkins, are to be first paid, and the fund is sufficient to satisfy them in full. The residue thereof is to be paid to defendant Boyce, and is not sufficient to pay the whole of his claim. Defendants Freeman, Kimball, and Hoskins constitute a copartnership engaged in business in the territory of Arizona, under the firm name of the Arizona Central Bank; they having complied with the laws of the territory respecting fictitious names of partnerships, and being authorized to carry on business under that name. They claim the whole of the fund in dispute by reason of a chattel mortgage made by Nellis to them upon the said sheep, and certain other transactions they had with him touching the sheep, before the sale thereof to Maier. The court gave judgment in favor of Freeman and his said copartners, against Nellis, personally, for the unpaid amount of the debt specified in the mortgage,—something over $4,000. They appeal from that portion of the judgment which applies the fund to the payment of the attaching creditors, and ignores their mortgage security. Boyce appeals from so much of the judgment as postpones his demand to those of Haas, Baruch & Co. and Perkins.

The appeal of Freeman, Kimball, and Hoskins presents several interesting questions (some of them not necessary to be now considered), which have been argued by their counsel ably and ingeniously; but, in our opinion, the judgment adverse to them was right. On November 28, 1893, before the debt specified in the mortgage became due, the mortgagees agreed with Nellis in writing as follows: "We hereby appoint William Nellis as agent to take six cars of sheep to California, one of which goes to San Bernardino and five to Los Angeles, he to turn over the proceeds of said sheep to us to be applied upon his mortgage to us, which said mortgage covers said sheep. This applies to these six cars only, and extends for ten days only from this date, said sheep to be shipped in our name. Arizona Central Bank, M'tgees, by J. H. Hoskins. 11-28-'93." Appellants allege that it was part of the agreement between the parties to the mortgage that the mortgagor should deposit the net proceeds of the sale of the sheep in a bank at Los Angeles to the credit of the mortgagees; also, that the sale and delivery of the sheep to Maier was made pursuant to such agreement; and so, in substance, was the finding of the court. Now, plainly, by this agreement, the mortgagees intended, upon a sale by Nellis, that title to the sheep should pass to the purchaser free of the lien of their mortgage, and that the proceeds of the sale should be paid to Nellis; and on these facts the lien on the sheep was not translated to the proceeds in the hands of the purchaser. Bank v. West, 46 Me. 15, is a case directly in point, and we agree with the view there stated (page 20), that "from the time of sale the lien of the mortgage was extinguished, and the mortgagee was left with no security but the personal promise of the mortgagor to pay the proceeds to him." There are many decisions that the mortgagee of chattels may authorize the mortgagor to sell the incumbered property and apply the proceeds of sale upon the debt secured, and that such an agreement does not render the mortgage fraudulent in law, nor affect the lien thereof, prior to the sale (Brackett v. Harvey, 91 N. Y. 221; Murray v. McNealy, 86 Ala. 234, 5 South. 565; Lane v. Starr, 1 S. D. 107, 45 N. W. 212, and cases cited); but we have found no case in which the lien was held to attach to the proceeds unpaid by the purchaser. The doctrine of the case from 46 Me., above cited, is that, if the mortgagee "wished to reach the proceeds in the hands of the purchasers, he, like other creditors, should have resorted to a trustee process under the statute."

It is urged, for the mortgagees, that the agreement of November 28, 1893, operated to create a trust in their favor in the fund to be derived from the sale, or an equitable assignment of such fund to them. It seems to us there might be more color for this contention, or some part of it, if the mortgage had vested the title to the sheep in the mortgagees, as was the rule of the common law; but, under our law, and presumptively under that of Arizona, the title remained in Nellis. Civ. Code, § 2888; Bank v. Moore, 106 Cal. 681, 39 Pac. 1071. He being the owner and possessed of the sheep, to say that his agreement created, as against creditors, a trust in or an assignment of the proceeds of a sale which he had not then made, or, so far as shown, contracted to make, is to say that he could create a secret trust in the sheep or a pledge thereof and yet retain possession of them, contrary to the statutes. Civ. Code, §§ 2988, 3440. Authorities are cited to show that such enactments have no application to choses in action; but the agreement of November 28th did not purport to deal with a chose in action. And, aside from other considerations, the retention by Nellis of the authority to collect the anticipated fund to arise from the sale was inconsistent with the idea of an equitable assignment of the same. Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. 69, 84; Christmas' Adm'r v. Griswold, 8 Ohio St. 558.

The appeal of Boyce is easier of disposition. By the contract of sale between Nellis and Maier, the former was to deliver the sheep at Maier's slaughter house, about five miles from the railroad station at Los Angeles. They were to be weighed at the slaughter house, and he was to be paid for them at the rate of three cents per pound. The garnishment in the suit of Boyce against Nellis was served on Maier after the sheep had been unloaded at the station, and while they were yet in charge of Nellis' employés, and before they had reached the slaughter house or had been weighed; consequently, before the sale was completed, and before any credit existed in favor of Nellis and against Maier, and when it was not certain that any ever would exist. The law aids the vigilant, but in this instance the creditor was vigilant overmuch, and his attachment was invalid. The garnishment under his subsequent execution was after the attachments of the other creditors had been levied and perfected by judgment, and they were rightly held entitled to precedence in the distribution of the fund. Early v. Town of Redwood City, 57 Cal. 193; 1 Freem. Ex'ns, § 165. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

McBEAN v. CITY OF FRESNO et al.

(Sac. 86.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 25, 1896.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS — DISPOSITION OF SEWAGE — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

1. A city authorized to maintain a system of sewers has authority to contract for the disposition of the outfall of the sewers without the limits of the city.

2. Const. art. 11, § 18, prohibiting the city from incurring indebtedness or liability, in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, does not invalidate a contract for the disposition of the sewage of the city for a period of five years, the sum to be paid yearly being within the amount which the city is authorized to levy yearly for such purpose; but no portion of the amount payable one year can be paid from the amount levied for a succeeding year.

3. Nor does the charter of the city of Fresno (St. 1883, p. 255), providing that the trustees shall not create, audit, allow, or permit to accrue any debt or liability in excess of the available money in the treasury that may be legally apportioned and appropriated, render such a contract invalid.

4. Such a contract, in the absence of fraud, or statute prohibiting the same, will not be held invalid, as a suspension of the legislative power of the trustees of the city, succeeding those by whom the contract was entered into, where, at the time the contract was entered into, it was fair and reasonable, in view of the expense the contractor would be required to incur to fulfill his contract.

Action by Alexander McBean against the city of Fresno and W. H. McKenzie, treasurer. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. C. Graves and E. D. Edwards, for appellant. I. W. Moultrie, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The city of Fresno duly and regularly, so far as form and procedure are concerned, entered into a contract with plaintiff by which plaintiff agreed to take care of and dispose of the sewage of the city for the period of five years for the sum of $4,900 per annum, payable quarterly. Plaintiff was required to give, and did give, a bond in the sum of $10,000, to which extent he agreed to reimburse the corporation for any liability or loss it might incur or suffer by reason of a faulty performance of his contract. No natural means were available to Fresno for the disposition of its sewage. It had provided sewers, but had made no provision for the care of their contents. These were to be discharged beyond the city limits. But, before the sewers could be used, a sewer farm was necessary for the reception and treatment of the waste matter. The city had secured no such farm. Under these circumstances, the contract with McBean was entered into. He made the necessary expenditures, and year by year performed his contract according to its letter and spirit. Each year, in turn, the city levied, collected, and apportioned to the sewer fund a tax to cover the yearly amount due McBean, and duly audited and paid his demands on the fund. This continued for three years. During the fiscal year ending May 31, 1894, plaintiff performed his contract, but the city refused payment upon the ground that the contract was void. McBean then instituted this action, charging, in the first count, for the value of labor and services furnished at defendant's request, and, in the second, pleading at length and standing upon the contract in question. He also averred that there was in the sewer fund, not otherwise appropriated, and available for the payment of his demand, more than $3,000, and such is the undisputed fact. Indeed, none of these facts is disputed. Upon the trial most of them were admittted under stipulation, and others proved without conflict. The court sustained a general demurrer to the second cause of action. At the close of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit upon the cause of action in assumpsit was made and granted. These two rulings are the errors complained of.

Against the validity of the contract, the first objection urged is that the city had no power to enter into this contract for the care and disposition of its sewage, because "it has no reference whatever to the sewage within the city, but provides for the care and disposal of the sewage from the outfall of the sewers some distance from the city." We see no force in this objection. Proper sewers are in this day so essential to the hygiene and sanitation of a municipality that a court would not look to see whether a power to construct and maintain them had been granted by the charter, but rather only to see whether, by possibility, the power had been expressly denied. In the case of the city of Fresno, a city of the fifth class, the power is, however, expressly conferred. "The board of trustees shall have power to establish, construct, and maintain drains and sewers." Municipal Corporation Bill, § 764, subd. 5. Disposition of the outfall is an essential part of the maintenance of a sewer system, and it must often be necessary for inland cities to arrange for that disposition without their corporate limits. Coldwater v. Tucker, 36 Mich. 474.

But the controlling questions presented by this contract for determination are: (1) Does it violate the constitution and charter of the city of Fresno? (2) Does it operate as a surrender or suspension of the legislative powers of the trustees of the city? The constitution provides (article 11, § 18): "No * * * city * * * shall incur indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without, etc. * * * Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision shall be void." The charter of the city of Fresno provides, in terms harmonious with those of the constitution: "The trustees shall not create, audit, allow or permit to accrue any debt or liability in excess of the available money in the treasury that may be legally apportioned and appropriated for such purposes, etc." St. 1883, p. 255. The charter of the city of Fresno authorizes the levying and collecting of a tax, not exceeding 10 cents on each $100 for the sewer fund. Municipal Corporation Bill, § 764, subd. 9. No question is here presented but that the tax which may thus be collected is ample for the payment of the sums due or to become due to plaintiff under his contract, and the question of the validity of the contract is free from any embarrassment from this consideration. In the constitutional provision under consideration, the framers had in mind the great and ever-growing evil to which the municipalities of the state were subjected by the creation of a debt in one year, which debt was not, and was not expected to be, paid out of the revenues of that year, but was carried on into succeeding years, increasing like a rolling snowball as it went, until the burden of it became almost unbearable upon the taxpayers. It was to prevent this abuse that the constitutional provision was enacted. In Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641, and in Shaw v. Statler, 74 Cal. 258, 15 Pac. 833, the question is discussed, and the interpretation of the constitutional provision laid down, and the reasons for it given. Each year's income and revenue must pay each year's indebtedness and liability, and no indebtedness or liability incurred in one year shall be paid out of the income or revenue of any future year. The taxpayers of municipalities are thus protected against the improvident creation of inordinate debts, which may be charged against them and their property in ever-increasing volume from year to year, until he who is without any property may be in a better financial situation than one who owns much.

Upon the other hand, the correlative rights of a creditor of the city, under these circumstances and under this law, have been recently set forth with exactness and clearness by Mr. Justice Harrison in Weaver v. City and County of San Francisco, 43 Pac. 972: "Whoever deals with a municipality does so with notice of the limitation of its powers, and with notice, also, that he can receive compensation for his labor and materials only from the revenues and income previously provided for the fiscal year during which his labor and materials are furnished, and with the knowledge, too, that all other persons dealing with the municipality have the same rights to compensation, and are subject to the same limitations, as he is. Even though, at the time of making his contract, there are funds in the treasury sufficient to meet the amount of his claim, he is charged with notice that these funds are liable to be paid out for municipal expenditures before his contract can mature into a claim against the city; and, if others, whose claims have accrued subsequent to his, are able to intercept these funds, he is in the same condition as any creditor who has dealt with one whose assets are exhausted before he presents his claim. He acquires no claim in the nature of a lien upon these funds for the amount of his demand, nor is there any legal obligation upon the municipality, any more than upon any other debtor, to pay the claims against it in the order in which they are incurred, unless they are presented in that order, and in such condition and with such formalities as entitle the claimant to immediate payment. In dealing with the municipality he must rely upon the integrity of its officers that they will not incur any liabilities during the year in excess of the income and revenues provided for that year, and, as a prudent man, he will ascertain, not only the amount of that income, but also the amount of the claims already existing, and of those that are likely to be incurred."

In the case of contracts extending over a period longer than one year, it may be readily seen that the municipality is abundantly protected, and that it is the contractor therewith who subjects himself to peril and risk of loss. If there are not revenues for any given year sufficient and available for the payment of his claims for that year, those claims become waste paper, and are not carried over as a charge against the income, and revenue of a succeeding year. This determination of the law in this state removes a potent objection found by the supreme court of Michigan to sustaining a contract under a law similar to our own, where the life of the contract was for several years. Says the court: "There can be no doubt, in our opinion, that this whole contract obligation is a liability to the full extent of the 30-years rental, and it is equally clear that all unpaid sums will be aggregated until paid." Niles Water Works v. City of Niles, 59 Mich. 312, 26 N. W. 525. In this state such a rule would not obtain, and the contract under consideration is left with its validity to be determined primarily as the question is answered, does it or does it not create a debt or liability for a given year exceeding the revenues of that year? And upon this it may be said, at the outset, that there is a contrariety of opinion in the courts of the states which have been called upon to interpret constitutional or charter provisions similar to or identical with our own. The state of Michigan, as will be observed from the case last cited, holds such contracts to be void, for the reason above quoted. Ohio, New Jersey, Montana, and Oregon have reached the same conclusion, and perhaps other states. State v. Medberry, 7 Ohio St. 526; Davenport v. Kleinschmidt, 6 Mont. 502, 13 Pac. 249; Salem Water Co. v. City of Salem, 5 Or. 29; Water Works Co. v. Read, 50 N. J. Law, 665, 15 Atl. 10. Upon the other hand, in Illinois, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New York, Iowa, Indiana, and Oklahoma (and it may be others which have not come beneath our notice), it is uniformly held that contracts such as these are not violative of the constitutional inhibition. City of East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas Light & Coke Co., 98 Ill. 415; Appeal of City of Erie, 91 Pa. St. 398; Smith v. Dedham, 144 Mass. 177, 10 N. E. 782; Weston v. City of Syracuse, 17 N. Y. 110; Grant v. City of Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396; City of Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1; City of Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Gas Light & Coke Co., 66 Ind. 396; Territory v. City of Oklahoma (Okl.) 37 Pac. 1094.

In a certain very restricted sense it may be said that a liability is created by a contract such as this; but to call it a present liability for the aggregate amount of the payments in the contract contemplated thereafter to be made is not legally permissible. A liability to the city would arise upon breach of contract, but the constitution never meant to protect the city from the consequences of its own willful and tortious acts. A liability might arise against the city for the negligence of its officers, and the damages due to an individual who had suffered therefrom might be great; but such liability for a municipal wrong the constitution never meant to protect against. When we come to consider the contractual relations between the city and appellant, it is at once seen that the city cannot be liable in any one year for more than $4,900, an amount far within the revenue derived to the sewer fund, and further that it cannot become liable for this amount at all until faithful service rendered by the contractor each year. If the city, in any one year, should fail to collect into its sewer fund moneys sufficient to pay the just claims of the contractor, then, as above said, it would be the contractor's loss, the city would be chargeable with no financial responsibility therefor, and the result, at the most, so far as it was concerned, would be a failure upon the part of its officers to observe good faith in their dealings. There need be here no struggles with the niceties of definitions given to "debt" or "liability." An able discussion of those questions will be found in the case of City of Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1. We base our views upon the conviction that, at the time of entering into the contract, no debt or liability is created for the aggregate amount of the installments to be paid under the contract, but that the sole debt or liability created is that which arises from year to year in separate amounts as the work is performed. These views find abundant support in the adjudicated cases in this state. Article 8 of the former constitution of California provided that the legislature shall not create any debts or liabilities in any manner which shall exceed the sum of $300,000, except under certain specified contingencies. The state made a contract for the care of its prison, for convict labor, etc., for the period of five years, agreeing to pay therefor the sum of $10,000 per month. The act came before this court for review in State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429, where the question was elaborately argued, and fully considered by the court. Chief Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, spoke as follows: "The unconstitutionality of the act is asserted on two grounds: First, that it appropriated the sum of $600,000, and thus created a debt or liability against the people of the state exceeding the limit prescribed by the eighth article of the constitution. * * * The contract provides for the payment of $10,000 a month, and the act appropriates this sum per month. The appropriations are to take effect, and the services are to be rendered, in future. Until the services are rendered, there can be no debt on the part of the state. The lessee could not have claimed, at any time after the making of the contract, the aggregate of all the monthly installments, because the state never owed him that amount. The state only became indebted as the services were each month performed. * * * The eighth article was intended to prevent the state from running into debt, and to keep her expenditures, except in certain cases, within her revenues. These revenues may be appropriated in anticipation of their receipt as effectually as when actually in the treasury. The appropriation of the moneys, when received, meets the services as they are rendered, thus discharging the liabilities as they arise, or, rather, anticipating and preventing their existence. The appropriation accompanying the services operates, in fact, in the nature of a cash payment." This interpretation, after further consideration and argument, was reaffirmed in McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11, and again in Koppikus v. Commissioners, 16 Cal. 248. In People v. Arguello, 37 Cal. 524, it is said: "A sum payable upon a contingency is not a debt, or does not become a debt until the contingency has happened."

These decisions being before the framers of the present constitution, under familiar rules of interpretation it will be held that their enactment of similar provisions was made in the light of them. Wallace v. Mayor, etc., 29 Cal. 181, is not in conflict with these decisions. The contract there contemplated a payment which might become a debt in the year in which the contract was executed, as well as in some future year. Under the peculiar language of the charter, which forbade the creation of any debt unless the money was actually in the treasury to meet it, it was declared that the council had no authority to provide for the creation of a debt to arise in the future, any more than to create one directly and in præsenti.

Upon the second proposition, namely, whether or not the contract operates as a surrender or suspension of the legislative powers of the trustees of the city, it is to be observed that there is in this state no inhibition against the making of a contract by a municipal board which shall extend for more than one year, or even beyond the term of office of the board which makes it. If the legislature desired to restrict municipalities in this particular, it could easily do so by the passage of a law, such as exists in some other states, declaring void any contract upon the part of a municipality which is to extend beyond the current fiscal year, or beyond the term of office of the authorities which enter into it. But, even in the absence of such provisions, courts look with disfavor upon contracts by municipalities involving the payment of moneys which extend over a long period of time—First, because such contracts, in their nature, tend to create a monopoly in favor of the other party thereto for supplying the city with the article contracted for; second, because they may involve an undue restraint upon the legislative powers of the successors of the board, and prevent those successors from availing themselves of a change in the times, of opposition, of reduced rates, or of other causes operating legitimately to decrease the price of the commodity, of which decrease in price the city, by reason of its contract, cannot avail itself. There is thus, by law and reason, a well-defined limit set to such contracts. In the absence of any other objection to them, they will not be upheld, in the absence of a clear showing of a reasonable necessity for their execution. But if, on the other hand, it be made to appear that, at the time the contract was entered into, it was fair and just and reasonable, and prompted by the necessities of the situation, or was in its nature advantageous to the municipality, then such a contract will not be construed as an unreasonable restraint upon the powers of succeeding boards. In Gaslight Co. v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 585, this court says: "In the absence of express limitation as to the period of time for which a contract may be made, we would hold, perhaps, that the contract with the plaintiff for five years was not beyond the power of the supervisors." In Riehl v. City of San Jose, 101 Cal. 442, 35 Pac. 1013, an action was brought to set aside a contract for five years, made by the city with an electric company for the lighting of its streets. The complaint sounded in fraud, and further declared that the contract was against public policy, illegal and void. The contract was upheld, it being found that there was no fraud, and "that the members of the common council acted as honest men, and exercised their honest discretion for the best interests of the city."

We have here, then, a contract made for a purpose expressly authorized by the charter, a contract which looked to supplying the city with an absolute need, a contract which pertained to the ordinary expenses of the city, and, together with other like expenses, was well within the limit of the current revenues authorized by its charter annually to be provided for this specific purpose. The term of the contract was fair indeed, in view of the considerable expense which the evidence showed plaintiff was obliged to undergo to fulfill his undertaking. Under these circumstances, we hold the contract to be valid, operative, and binding upon the city.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to overrule defendants' demurrer.

SWAMP-LAND DIST. NO. 307 v. GLIDE.

(Sac. 5.)[1]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — RETROSPECTIVE ACTS — STATUTES — AMENDMENT — OPERATION AND EFFECT — LIMITATIONS — VESTED RIGHTS — SWAMP-LAND ASSESSMENTS—LEVY—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Under Pol. Code, § 3466, as amended in 1880, causes of action for collection of swamp-land assessments accrued when the county treasurer, 30 days after filing of the assessment list, reported the assessments as delinquent to the trustees. Held, that Act March 31, 1891 (amending said section by providing that assessments, when so reported delinquent, should be paid in installments as ordered by the trustees, and that causes of action thereon should accrue at the expiration of 20 days from the date of any order for the collection of an installment, or, if the entire assessment then remained unpaid, a cause of action should then accrue upon it), was not void as being retroactive, since it operated only on assessments existing, and as they stood when it went into effect.

2. Nor did it amend Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, prescribing a limitation of three years, to which causes of action accruing under Pol. Code, § 3466, were subject, so as to require the republication thereof under the constitutional provision relating to amendments.

3. Under Pol. Code, § 3466, as amended in 1880, causes of action for collection of swamp-land assessments accrued when the county treasurer, 30 days after the filing of the assessment list, reported the assessment as delinquent to the trustees. Act March 31, 1891, amending said section, provides that assessments, when so reported delinquent, shall be paid in installments as ordered by the trustees, and that on the expiration of 20 days from the date of any order for installment a cause of action shall accrue on the installment, and on the entire assessment if the installment shall remain unpaid. Causes of action accruing under said section and under the act of 1891 are both subject to a three-years limitation. Held, that Act 1891 is not, in changing the time when the cause of action on an assessment accrues, unconstitutional, as interfering with the vested rights of one against whom an assessment was reported delinquent in 1889, since one can have no vested right in the running of the statute of limitations until it has barred the action.

4. The republication, as required by the constitution, of an entire law as amended, does not operate as a repeal and re-enactment of the portions of the act not altered by the revision.

5. When, in an action to collect a swamp-land assessment, defendant admits ownership of the land described, the fact that the land did not contain the acreage alleged is immaterial, where it is not shown that the assessment was levied by acreage.

6. The objection of variance between the estimate of acreage within the reclamation district and that in the assessment roll cannot be urged for the first time on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Action by swamp-land district No. 307 against J. H. Glide for reclamation assessments. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Armstrong & Bruner, for appellant. McKune & George, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. The commissioners of the plaintiff swamp-land district in 1889 made their assessment under the reclamation act. The list was filed with the county treasurer April 5, 1889. The defendant refused to pay certain installments upon his assessment, and this action was brought, charging upon the installments, in separate counts, and seeking to collect the same. Section 3466 of the Political Code, as amended in 1880, was the law in force at the time of the assessment, and at the time when the charges therein became a lien upon the land. That section provided: First, that the county treasurer, at the end of 30 days after an assessment list was filed with him, should return the same to the board of trustees; second, that the board of trustees must thereupon commence action for the collection of such delinquent assessments, and for the enforcement of the lien. This law was found to be inconvenient, as it required the whole assessment to be paid at once, when the money could only be used from time to time. To remedy this difficulty the legislature, by act passed March 31, 1891, amended section 3466, Pol. Code, retaining the provision that the county treasurer must return the list to the board of trustees, and providing: First, that all unpaid assessments must be collected and paid in separate installments, of such amounts and at such times, respectively, as the board, from time to time, in its discretion, may, by order entered on its minutes, direct; second, that a cause of action for the collection of any such installment shall accrue at the expiration of 20 days from the date of the order directing its payment; third, that, if any such installment shall remain unpaid at the expiration of 20 days, then the whole of the assessment against the land owned by the person failing to pay such installment shall become due and payable at once, and may, in the discretion of the board, be collected immediately, in one action.

It has been decided in People v. Hulbert, 71 Cal. 72, 12 Pac. 43, that the cause of action contemplated by section 3466 of the Political Code, as amended in 1880, was one embraced within the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant here contends that the last amendment to section 3466 of the Political Code operates to fix another and different limitation upon the cause of action, and that it is consequently inapplicable to this assessment and void—First, as having a retroactive effect; second, as an attempt to amend section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure without reference to the amended act, or a republication of it as amended; and, third, as interfering with the defendant's vested rights in the bar of the statute. These contentions may be briefly disposed of:

1. The amendment has no retroactive effect. It operates upon existing assessments as they stood at the time the law went into effect. If at that time a cause of action upon an assessment was barred to a district, this amendment did not, and did not attempt to, revive the old, or give another cause of action therefor. What it did was merely to change the mode of procedure for the collection of the assessment, by providing for installments. and by changing the time when the cause of action accrues.

2. The amendment did not in fact, or in effect, modify or change section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The statute of limitations begins to run against a right only when a cause of action upon that right has accrued. By the act of 1880 it began to run 30 days after the assessment list was filed with the treasurer, and, if action was not commenced within three years thereafter, the cause was barred. Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1. Under the amendment the cause of action accrued 20 days from the date of the order directing its payment. The right of action thereafter existed for 3 years, when it was barred by the same section of the Code of Civil Procedure. The same limitation exists in both cases, and it is the limitation provided by section 338, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc. Manifestly, there has been no amendment, and no attempt to amend this section.

3. It is not claimed that the cause of action under the law of 1880 was barred, as to this assessment, at the time the amendment went into effect. Only two years of the three had passed; but it is insisted that appellant had such a vested right in the passage of time and the statute of limitations that the cause of action against him must be held to be the cause of action under the law of 1880, so that when the third year had expired, in March, 1891, the causes of action were one and all barred. Railroad Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261, is here relied on. It is not at all in point. When the law of adverse possession was changed so as to require the payment of taxes by a claimant, the question was presented whether, in establishing the necessary five-years possession, it was incumbent to prove the payment of taxes during all of that period, when a part of it was paid before the amendment became a law. It was held not to be a question of vested right, but of giving to a law a retroactive effect, which the legislature never intended. But a man has no vested right in the running of the statute of limitations until it has completely run and barred the action; and, when a change in the statute is made during the time of its running, that time is not a credit to the defendant, under the new law. The whole period contemplated by the new law must lapse, to bar the action. Such are the general rules applicable alike to criminal and civil actions, unless the new act itself expresses a contrary intent. Com. v. Duffy, 96 Pa. St. 506; Bigelow v. Bemis, 2 Allen, 497; Vance v. Vance, 108 U. S. 517, 2 Sup. Ct. 854; Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 599; Wheeler v. Jackson, 137 U. S. 255, 11 Sup. Ct. 76; Gilman v. Cutts, 23 N. H. 376; Henry v. Thorpe, 14 Ala. 103; 1 Wood, Lim. Act. (2d Ed.) § 12, and cases; Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 448; Bender v. Crawford, 33 Tex. 745; Pearsall v. Kenan, 79 N. C. 472.

Section 3466 of the Political Code was not repealed in 1891, but was amended in the particulars indicated. The constitution requires a republication at length of an amended act, that the legislators may readily see what effect the proposed amendments will have upon the original law. But this republication of portions of the act unchanged and unmodified by the amendment does not operate as a repeal and re-enactment of these portions which have continued to be the law throughout. Railroad Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261.

Upon the trial, defendant admitted ownership of the tracts of land described in the complaint, and the court found accordingly. Whether or not one of these tracts so described, and so admitted to be land of defendant, contained 70 acres, as alleged, or less, is immaterial, as it is not shown that the assessment was levied upon the lands by acreage.

The claim that a difference exists between the acreage embraced within the exterior lines of the district and that in the assessment roll is here made for the first time, and cannot be considered. In any event, there would be no presumption in favor of the accuracy of the former estimate over that of the latter. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FOO. (Cr. 79.)

CRIMINAL LAW — EVIDENCE — DECLARATIONS OF THIRD PERSONS — CROSS-EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANT — INSTRUCTIONS — REMARKS OF COUNSEL.

1. Where evidence offered is imperfect for want of preliminary proof, an objector must specifically point out the defect in his objection, or it will be waived. So an objection to the admission of an article as an exhibit as "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not connected with the defendant," will not raise the question, on appeal, of the sufficient identification of the exhibit.

2. Testimony of declarations made by a third person is not admissible in behalf of a defendant charged with crime, though made in his presence.

3. Unless apparently done in bad faith, for the sole purpose of prejudicing him with the jury, a defendant, when on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, may properly be asked by the prosecution in cross-examination questions which, if answered in the affirmative, will tend to impeach statements made in his direct examination.

4. It is not error to refuse an instruction which is covered by another given.

5. A conviction will not be set aside because a prosecuting attorney, in his argument, urged the jury to disbelieve defendant's witnesses, who were Chinamen, where he also told them they were the sole judges of the credibility of all witnesses, and the court gave a proper and full instruction on the point.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Louie Foo was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals. Affirmed.

Cheney & Cronin and Marble & Phibbs, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant was informed against, with two others, viz. Lee Kim and Ah Young, for an assault with a deadly weapon upon one Hom Lock, alleged to have been committed in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, on the 12th day of January, 1895. The defendants demurred to the information upon the grounds "that said information does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950–952 of the Penal Code of California"; (2) "that the facts stated in said information do not constitute a public offense." Their demurrer was overruled, whereupon they entered a plea of not guilty. The defendant Louie Foo was tried separately, and a verdict of "guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon" returned. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and judgment of imprisonment for two years in the state prison at Folsom, Cal., was entered. Defendant appeals from the judgment, from the denial of a motion in arrest of judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point made by appellant is that the court erred in admitting in evidence certain cartridges offered by the prosecution. The point made here is that they were not sufficiently identified as the cartridges taken from a certain pistol presented by the witness J. B. Robbins. There had been testimony introduced tending to show that defendant and several other parties, all Chinamen, upon a public street in what is called "Chinatown," Los Angeles, had, by direction of defendant, fired a number of shots from pistols at the prosecuting witness, also a Chinaman; that defendant fired one or more of the shots; that immediately after the shooting defendant was seen running towards a wash house, where he was employed; that a few minutes later the witness J. B. Robbins proceeded to the wash house, found the defendant there, and arrested him, and in the room where he was found a pistol was also found in one of the beds, which Robbins, who was a police officer, took into his possession, examined, and found, as he said, indications of its having been recently fired, such as powder marks and smell of powder, etc. Robbins was recalled for the prosecution, when the following proceedings were had: "Mr. Appel: You spoke about finding a pistol down on Macy street, where you arrested the defendant Louie Foo. I will ask you to look at that pistol, and state whether that is the pistol? A. Yes, sir; that is the one I found down there. Q. And you took the cartridges out of it? A. Yes, sir. (Paper containing cartridges shown witness.) A. Yes, sir. Mr. Appel: We offer these in evidence. Mr. Cheney (for defendant): We object, upon the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not connected with this defendant. The Court: The objection is overruled. Mr. Cheney: Note an exception." The cartridges were afterwards submitted to the jury, and their appearance, as being fresh, and not covered with verdigris, commented upon as tending to show the pistol had been recently loaded. There was testimony on the part of the defendant tending to show that the pistol belonged to Suey Ah Him, who kept the wash house, that the bed in which it was found was his, and that it had been loaded for several months. The pistol and its contents, if properly identified, were clearly admissible in evidence as tending in some degree to show that defendant might have taken, fired, and reloaded it. The answer, "Yes, sir," made by the witness immediately after the expression in the record "paper containing cartridges shown witness," would seem to indicate the probability that a question was in that connection put to the witness, which was not put down; but, if so, we are not at liberty to conjecture what it was, or to formulate a question to fit the case. There is, it is true, an affidavit bound with the record, and filed the day the motion for a new trial was filed, in which Robbins, the witness, says the question was put to him, "Did you take these cartridges from the pistol?" or, "Are these the cartridges you took from the pistol?" and that he answered, "Yes," etc. This affidavit is not, however, marked, or in any way identified, as having been used on the motion, and is not embodied in the statement or contained in any bill of exceptions. As was said in People v. Mahoney, 77 Cal. 532, 20 Pac. 73, it is a mere loose paper, and wants the authentication essential to constitute any portion of the record. People v. Price, 17 Cal. 313; People v. Padillia, 42 Cal. 535.

The question still remains, was the objection offered by counsel for defendant sufficient to cover a want of identification of the cartridges as the ones taken from the pistol? We think this question must be answered in the negative. The general rule is, he who objects to the admission of evidence "must specify the ground of his objection when the evidence is offered, and will be considered as having waived all objections not specified." People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 338. Where the objection to the introduction of testimony is, in general terms, that it is irrelevant, without stating the particular reason why it is irrelevant, and the objection could have been cured by the party offering the testimony if the reason for it had been given, the supreme court will not notice the objection. Owen v. Frink, 24 Cal. 171. In Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271, it was held, where a general objection to the admission of evidence (that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial) is overruled by the trial court, the party against whom the ruling is made cannot be permitted to urge in the appellate court a particular objection which, if it had been openly urged in the trial court at the time of the ruling complained of, might have been easily cured. In Water Co. v. Swartz, 99 Cal. 278, 33 Pac. 878, a like ruling was made. The reasons given in those cases are peculiarly applicable to the case at bar. Here, had the specific objection, viz. that the cartridges had not been sufficiently identified, been pointed out, no doubt the identification would have been made complete. In People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, this court held that a general objection to testimony offered that it is irrelevant and inadmissible is not sufficient if the real ground of objection is that no proper foundation has been laid for its introduction. See, also, People v. Eckman, 72 Cal. 583, 14 Pac. 359. People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, is in point. The defendant was indicted for forgery At the trial, with the object of showing guilty knowledge, the prosecution introduced in evidence three other drafts, claimed to have been forged by defendant. As to one of them—"Draft No. 9"—there was no preliminary proof connecting defendant with it, or that it was a forgery. The objection to its introduction in evidence was that it was "irrelevant and incompetent." The objection was overruled, and an exception noted. The supreme court, after suggesting that at the time the court ruled upon the objection it doubtless expected that the needed proof would follow the admission, held that when no such evidence appeared counsel should have renewed the objection on that ground, and added: "We have repeatedly held that counsel must make their objection in such a manner as to leave no doubt as to the precise ground upon which it is placed. We do not think that was done in the present case, and we do not think that we should be justified in reversing the judgment on this ground, especially as it is more than probable that 'Draft No. 9' had no effect on the result." In People v. Mahoney, 77 Cal. 529, 20 Pac. 73, the converse of the proposition was involved. A witness was asked his opinion as an expert. An objection was made that the evidence was "incompetent, no foundation having been laid for it." The witness was then shown to be an expert, and answered as such, and this court held that the competency of the answer as evidence could not be inquired into under the objection as made. An objection made to a power of attorney offered in evidence, that it is "irrelevant and incompetent," does not enable the objector to raise the question that the power only authorizes the sale of "lots unsold," and that there is no evidence that the lot in controversy is unsold. As was said by the court, had the objection that there was no proof that the lot was unsold been specifically made, the plaintiff would have been afforded an opportunity to supply the necessary proof. Gardiner v. Schmaelzle, 47 Cal. 588. A general objection to the introduction of a copy of a deed in evidence is not a sufficient predicate to urge that it is not the best evidence. Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1, 21 Pac. 431, and 24 Pac. 382. See, also, Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 507. Where a certified copy of a deed duly recorded was offered in evidence, and the objection was that it was not "duly certified and proved," it was held to be a waiver of the objection that the original was not produced or not shown to be under the control of the party offering the evidence. Mayo v. Mazeaux, 38 Cal. 442. The concensus of opinion, as illustrated by these cases and many others, is that, where the proffered evidence is imperfect by the lack of preliminary proof, which may or may not be supplied by the party offering the evidence, the objector must specifically point out the defect by his objection, and if he fails to do so it is waived; and the general objections of "immaterial, inadmissible, irrelevant, and incompetent," made when the evidence is offered to the jury, are not sufficient to warrant an investigation on appeal of the insufficiency of such preliminary proof. "Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius." It follows that the objection of appellant cannot be upheld.

The next error assigned relates to a ruling of the court excluding evidence on cross-examination of the witness Robbins as to what was said to the witness by the boss Chinaman at the wash house when he, the witness, went to arrest the defendant. It was not in explanation of anything called out on the direct examination, was not proper cross-examination, and, as the declaration of a third party, was not admissible, although made in the presence of the defendant. The cases cited by the appellant, viz. People v. McCrea, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171; People v. Ah Yute, 53 Cal. 613; People v. Shem Ah Fook, 64 Cal. 380, 1 Pac. 347,—were cases where declarations of third persons, made in the presence of defendants, and their replies thereto, etc., were offered as being tantamount to admissions by such defendants against their interest. No such offer was made here, and, if there had been, the testimony would not be admissible in favor of defendant.

Defendant was a witness on his own behalf, and testified at length touching his whereabouts on the night of the shooting, and denied generally having been present at the scene of such shooting, and averred that he was at the washhouse all of that evening until arrested. Upon cross-examination he said white people were there for clothing before the policeman came, but that he did not remember their names, as it was so common a thing. He was then asked—as was stated, to lay the foundation for impeachment—if he had not tried to get a white man to say in court that he was there before the policeman came, and again, "Didn't you and the rest of your men make some tickets at the time, that night of the shooting, and give them to a white man, so that he could swear that he had left some clothes there that night?" Objections were made to the questions by counsel for defendant upon the grounds "that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not cross-examination; and, if it is for the purpose of impeachment, the proper foundation has not been laid." The argument of appellant is that the questions were but insinuations tending to prejudice the jury against defendant, and were not proper in cross-examination, and had nothing to do with defendant's guilt. In response to the question, defendant answered in the negative. We see no evidence of bad faith on the part of the prosecution in putting the questions. If every question asked on behalf of the people which looks to the guilt of a defendant is to be excluded for that reason, it must end all prosecution. Had the questions been answered in the affirmative, it would have tended to shake the statement of defendant that he was present at the washhouse the entire evening of the shooting.

Objection is made by appellant to the refusal of the court to give the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that the argument of the district attorney that the testimony of the Chinamen from the washhouse who testified to the alibi is not worth believing unless corroborated is not law, and that the testimony of a Chinaman must receive the same consideration as that of a white man, all other things being equal." The rule had already been enunciated by the court in better form, and in unexceptionable language, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that testimony of Chinese witnesses is governed by the same rules as that of any witness, and the credibility of Chinese witnesses must be determined by the jury in the same manner that they determine the credibility of any other class of witnesses."

Exceptions were also taken to the conduct of the district attorney in his address to the jury, where, in commenting upon Chinese testimony, he said in substance: (1) I do not think there is any doubt of the guilt of the defendant; and, (2) in substance, that the jury should disregard the testimony of all the Chinese witnesses in support of an alibi, as against the testimony of the white witnesses for the prosecution; and that the testimony of Chinese witnesses, unless corroborated by white witnesses, was insufficient to raise a reasonable doubt; and closing with: "But, gentlemen of the jury, you are the sole judges of the sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses." I do not find from the record that an exception was taken at the trial to the remarks of the district attorney touching the testimony of Chinese witnesses; but, conceding that there was, it was but the expression of an opinion of the prosecuting officer, followed by a clear statement of the undoubted right of the jury to pass upon the question, and is not of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal.

The instructions of the court were full, clear, and quite favorable to the defendant. The testimony on the part of the prosecution was full and explicit, and, if believed by the jury, fully warranted a verdict of guilty. No point is made upon the demurrer or the motion in arrest of judgment. Upon the whole case as presented, we recommend that the judgment and orders appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

GAINSLEY v. GAINSLEY. (Sac. 67.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1896.)

TRIAL—SEPARATE STATEMENT OF FACTS—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—JUDGMENT—CONTINUANCE.

1. Where the statement of facts found is distinctly separate from the conclusions of law, though both are written on one piece of paper, there is a substantial compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 633, requiring that "the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated."

2. Where the judgment fully expresses the conclusions of law, and is attached to the statement of facts found, and is filed at the same time, there need not be an additional statement of the conclusions of law.

3. A motion for a continuance on the ground of defendant's sickness was supported by a certificate signed "H. H. L." To the court's question as to who L. was, defendant's attorney answered that he did not know, and did not know whether L. was a physician or not. The motion was denied, and no exception was taken. The trial proceeded, and defendant's attorney's subsequent offers to prove that L. was a regular physician were denied. No offer of competent evidence to prove defendant's sickness was made, and no delay was asked for the purpose of an examination of defendant by a physician. Held, that the motion was properly denied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by Seth Gainsley against Mamie E. Gainsley. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hiram W. Johnson and Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Hinkson & Van Fleet, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for divorce on the ground of adultery, in which the judgment was in favor of plaintiff. The defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and findings were not waived. The only written findings of fact are those prefixed to the judgment, as follows: "And the court, being fully advised in the premises, finds that the allegations of plaintiff's complaint and supplementary complaint are sustained by the testimony, and are true; and all and singular the law and the premises being by the court here fully understood and considered, wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the marriage between the said plaintiff, Seth Gainsley, and the said defendant, Mamie E. Gainsley, be dissolved, and the same is hereby dissolved, and the said parties are, and each of them is, freed and absolutely released from the bonds of matrimony and all the obligations thereof. A. P. Catlin, Judge. Attest: W. B. Hamilton, Clerk, by E. F. Pfund, Deputy. [Seal.]" Indorsed: "Filed November 8, 1894. W. B. Hamilton, Clerk, by E. F. Pfund, Deputy."

1. No objection is made on the ground that the facts as found do not warrant the judgment, but it is contended for appellant that they are not stated separately from the conclusions of law. But I think the statement of facts found is as distinctly separate from the conclusions of law as if it had been written on a separate paper, and, in this respect, is in substantial compliance with section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As to intermixture of law and facts in findings, see Millard v. Supreme Council, 81 Cal. 340, 22 Pac. 864; Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 21 Pac. 847.

2. It is further contended that there are no written conclusions of law distinct from the judgment itself, and that, for this reason, the judgment cannot stand. In this case the judgment fully expresses the conclusions of law, and, having been attached to the statement of facts found and filed at the same time, there was no necessity for any other statement of the conclusions of law. All that is required is that "the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated" (Code Civ. Proc. § 633); although it is true that a statement of the conclusions of law generally precedes the rendition of a final judgment, in which case it is provided that the judgment must accord with the preceding conclusions of law; but, except in cases of this kind, I can imagine no reason why the conclusions of law should be twice stated in the same case. It is well settled that the findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute the "decision" of the court, but this does not preclude the inclusion of the conclusions of law in the judgment alone, in case the judgment is drawn and filed at the same time that the findings of fact are drawn and filed. In such case, an additional statement of the conclusions of law would be superfluous. In Miller v. Hicken, 92 Cal. 230, 28 Pac. 339, this court said: "It is objected that the court did not find, in terms, that the defendants and intervener had not 'constructive' notice of plaintiff's mortgage; but that followed from the facts found, and it is immaterial that the court did not make an express 'conclusion of law' to that effect." Whether or not the judgment in that case was erroneous depended upon the effect of the recordation of the mortgage and an alleged discharge thereof, as constructive notice to defendants. If, therefore, constructive notice, effected by our registration laws, is a conclusion of law, as seems to have been correctly assumed in the above quotation, that case authorizes the views above expressed. And it seems to be well settled that constructive notice, which is imputed by law, is a conclusion of law and not a fact. Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 249; Drey v. Doyle, 99 Mo. 459, 12 S. W. 287; Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 156; Johnson v. Dooly, 72 Ga. 299; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 791, 792, and authorities there cited; And. Law Dict.; Black, Law Dict. What is here said is limited to notice expressly imputed by statute, as the case of Miller v. Hicken, supra, involved no other kind of notice.

3. There is nothing worthy of special consideration in the point that the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence, as the evidence strongly tended to prove all the material allegations of the complaint, and, as to the ground of divorce, much of it may be deemed direct.

4. It is contended that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a continuance, on the ground that defendant was sick and unable to attend court, made, when the case was called for trial, upon the following certificate: "This is to certify that Mrs. M. E. Gainsley is suffering from nervous prostration, complicated with gastritis, and is not able to leave her rooom. H. H. Look." The motion was objected to on the ground that the showing of sickness was insufficient. Thereupon the court called attention to absence of any evidence that H. H. Look was a physician, and asked who he was, to which defendant's attorney answered that he did not know, and that he did not know whether Mr. Look was a physician or not. Thereupon the court denied the motion, and no exception was taken. The trial then proceeded, and, after the pleadings were read, defendant's attorney offered to prove that Mr. Look was a regular physician, but proffered no evidence, documentary or oral, and the court ordered the trial to proceed, to which order defendant's attorney excepted, and then asked the court for a delay of 20 minutes in which to procure evidence that Mr. Look was a regular practicing physician, and also to prove the illness of the defendant, and, this being denied, he again excepted. He then offered to prove, by a witness present, Henrietta Wohl, the sickness and inability of the defendant to attend the trial. This was denied, and he again excepted. After the examination of three witnesses for the plaintiff, defendant's attorney again asked the court to continue the case on the ground of the illness of defendant, but at this time offered no evidence of such illness. The court then took a recess until 1:30 o'clock p. m., at the expiration of which defendant's attorney offered to prove by Dr. Nichols that "Mr. Look was a regular practicing physician of standing and a member of the Medical Association of Sacramento," but the court declined to hear this testimony. After the examination of two witnesses for defendant, on motion of defendant, the further trial of the case was postponed for three days, at the expiration of which the trial was renewed, and the defendant, being present, testified in her own behalf. I think it does not appear that the court exceeded its discretionary power in denying defendant's motion for a continuance. No competent evidence of the sickness or inability of the defendant was offered, nor was the denial of the motion in the first instance excepted to. On the renewal of the motion, after a recess of an hour and a half, and without leave of the court, defendant's attorney proposed to prove by Dr. Nichols that Mr. Look was a regular practicing physician, but not that defendant was sick. As it appeared that the defendant was then in the city of Sacramento, why, during the recess, was not the certificate of Dr. Nichols or that of some other physician procured? Was Dr. Look the only physician in the city who would certify or testify to the inability of defendant to attend the trial? No delay was asked for the purpose of an examination of the defendant by any physician. The court may well have suspected that the motion was not in good faith, from the circumstances that the certificate of H. H. Look, not purporting to be that of a physician, and who was not known to be such by defendant's attorney, was the only evidence of sickness offered before the motion was first denied, and thereafter every offer made tended to confirm such suspicion. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order and judgment are affirmed.

BULLOCK v. TAYLOR et al. (L. A. 88.)

Appeal—Notice—Adverse Parties — Dismissal.

1. A complaint for breach of contract alleged that defendants executed it as co-partners. It appeared that the firm name was signed by defendant P. A nonsuit was granted to the other defendants on the ground that it was not their contract, and judgment was rendered against P., who appealed, and served notice of appeal on plaintiff alone. Held, that the other defendants were adverse parties, within Code Civ. Proc. § 940, requiring notice of appeal "upon all whose rights may be affected by a reversal of the judgment," because, if reversed for granting their motion for a nonsuit, they must litigate the case anew.

2. Adverse parties, who have not been served with notice of appeal, may move for its dismissal.

3. Where in any manner it is suggested that steps necessary to confer jurisdiction have not been taken, the court may dismiss an appeal of its own motion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldorn York, Judge.

Action by John Bullock against Jones Taylor and others and C. O. Perry. From a judgment against him and in favor of plaintiff, defendant Perry appeals. Dismissed.

Geo. J. Denis, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson and H. C. Dillon, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Action for breach of a contract in writing, which plaintiff alleged was executed by defendants as co-partners. By its terms plaintiff undertook to haul freight to be furnished by defendants, and they promised to pay him therefor. It was executed in the alleged firm name by defendant C. O. Perry. At the trial the court granted the motion of defendants Taylor and Godbe for nonsuit as to them on the ground that the instrument sued on was not their contract, said Perry excepting. A verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff and against Perry for the sum of $2,500, on which judgment was entered. Perry appealed, but his notice of appeal was served on plaintiff only. He contends here for a reversal on the ground, among others, that the court erred in granting a nonsuit as to Taylor and Godbe and refusing it as to him, Perry. The said Taylor and Godbe have moved this court to dismiss the appeal, for the reason that they were not served with notice thereof. Section 940, Code Civ. Proc., requires such notice to be served on the adverse party; "that is to say, upon all whose rights may be affected by a reversal of the judgment." Williams v. Association, 66 Cal. 195, 5 Pac. 85; Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 267, 33 Pac. 1103; Lancaster v. Maxwell, 103 Cal. 67, 36 Pac. 951. "Adverse parties are those who, by the record, appear to be interested in the judgment so that they will be affected by its reversal or modification." Terry v Superior Court (Cal.) 42 Pac. 464. Suppose the judgment should be reversed for the alleged error of the court in granting the motion of Taylor and Godbe for nonsuit, whereby Perry was made solely responsible for plaintiff's damage, it is manifest that a new trial must be had, and that they must litigate the case anew. Indisputably, then, they may be affected by the reversal, and are interested in upholding the judgment; and service of the notice should, therefore, have been made on them. There could be no better illustration of the necessity of the rule than is afforded by the present case. The complaint alleged that the defendants entered into the contract sued upon. An answer filed on behalf of all the defendants admitted that allegation, and this was the only answer brought to this court in the transcript as originally filed, it being stipulated by plaintiff and defendant Perry that such transcript was correct, and that the appeal might be heard on the same. The fact is that Taylor and Godbe had filed a separate and amended answer, denying the partnership, and denying that they executed the contract, and this comes here in a supplemental transcript. Accordingly, before such supplemental transcript was filed, the point was made in the brief for appellant that the granting of the nonsuit as to Taylor and Godbe was in the face of the admission in the pleadings. It is conceded that this argument was advanced by inadvertence, the brief being prepared, not by the learned and candid gentleman who appears here for Perry, but by a friend not conversant with the true state of the record. The circumstance shows, however, the evils likely to result from committing the preparation of the record on appeal and the protection of the judgment solely to the hands of those not interested in sustaining every part of it; in other words, from not notifying all the adverse parties.

There is an objection by appellant that his co-defendants, not having been served with notice, are not parties to the record, and so have no standing to move for a dismissal. Blanc v. Rogers, 47 Cal. 606, is cited to support such objection. Concerning this we observe: (1) The matter going to the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the appeal, it would seem to be immaterial in what manner comes the suggestion that the steps necessary to confer such jurisdiction have not been taken, and so the court has said (In re Castle Dome Mining & Smelting Co., 79 Cal. 249, 250, 21 Pac. 746) the court may dismiss of its own motion (Bienenfeld v. Milling Co., 82 Cal. 425, 22 Pac. 1113). (2) To hold that only a party receiving notice of appeal may move to dismiss is to place with the appellant, in any case where there are several parties adverse to him, the power to select his opponents on appeal. Naturally he would choose those least interested in sustaining the judgment. The appeal should be dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal is dismissed.

DAILEY et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 209.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1896.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

Under Const. art. 1, § 9, providing that "every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press," the superior court in which a murder case is pending has no jurisdiction, on application of the defendant, to make an order directing a particular person to refrain from giving any public performance of a certain play, and to cease from advertising the same, on the ground that such play is based on the facts of defendant's case as established at the preliminary examination and coroner's inquest, and that the production of such play during the progress of the trial would be an interference with the administration of justice, and deprive defendant of a fair and impartial trial. McFarland and Temple, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Petition by W. R. Dailey and others for writ of certiorari to review the action of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and D. J. Murphy, judge of such court, in making an order directing petitioner Dailey to desist and refrain from giving any public performance of a certain play, and to cease from advertising the same. Order annulled.

Carroll Cook, for petitioners. A. W. Thompson, William S. Barnes, John H. Dickinson, Eugene N. Deuprey, and Edgar D. Peixotto, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. One Durrant was upon trial in the city of San Francisco, charged with murder, and, while the jury was being impaneled, the petitioner, Dailey, advertised by posters and newspapers that he would produce in a certain theater in said city of San Francisco a play entitled "The Crime of a Century." Thereupon, Durrant presented an affidavit to the court wherein his trial was then pending, setting forth that said play was based upon the facts of his case as established at the preliminary examination and the coroner's inquest, and that the production of said play during the progress of his trial would be an interference with the administration of justice, and deprive him of a fair and impartial trial. The affidavit was full and complete as to details, but we see no purpose to be subserved by a further statement of the allegations therein set out. Upon the presentation of the affidavit the superior court made an order directing this petitioner, Dailey, to desist and refrain from giving any public performance of said play, and further ordered him to cease from advertising the same. The present proceeding is one of certiorari to review the action of the court in making the aforesaid order, it being insisted that the trial court thereby exceeded its power and jurisdiction. The record before us incidentally develops that this order was subsequently served upon petitioner, that he defied the power of the court in making it, produced the play, and was adjudged guilty of contempt; but with those matters we are not now concerned.

The production of a tragedy or comedy upon the theatrical stage is a publication to the world by word of mouth of the text of the author, and, as to the question here presented for our consideration, it is immaterial whether the words be publicly spoken from the stage or upon the hustings, or go out to the world through the channels of the printing press. By the constitutional provision we are about to invoke, a citizen may speak, write, or publish his sentiments with equal freedom, and this case now stands before us exactly as though one of the daily journals was threatening to publish its sentiments pertaining to the conduct of a criminal trial then pending, and the court where such trial was pending and in progress, believing such publication would interfere with the due administration of justice, had issued an order restraining and prohibiting the threatened action of the paper. We are entirely clear that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order which forms the basis of this proceeding, for such order was an attempted infringement upon rights guarantied to every citizen by section 9, art. 1, of the constitution of this state. That section provides: "Every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." The wording of this section is terse and vigorous, and its meaning so plain that construction is not needed. The right of the citizen to freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments is unlimited, but he is responsible at the hands of the law for an abuse of that right. He shall have no censor over him to whom he must apply for permission to speak, write, or publish, but he shall be held accountable to the law for what he speaks, what he writes, and what he publishes. It is patent that this right to speak, write, and publish cannot be abused until it is exercised, and before it is exercised there can be no responsibility. The purpose of this provision of the constitution was the abolishment of consorship, and for courts to act as censors is directly violative of that purpose. This provision of the constitution as to freedom of speech varies somewhat from that of the constitution of the United States, and also more or less from the provisions of many state constitutions treating of this question; but, if there is a material difference in the various provisions, it works no harm to this petitioner, for the provision here considered is the broader, and gives him greater liberty in the exercise of the right granted. The meaning of this provision, or others of similar import, has been declared with unanimity by all commentators upon the law. Blackstone declares that the liberty of the press consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matters when published. He says: "Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. To forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press. But if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licensor, as was formerly done before and since the Revolution of 1688, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government. * * * Thus the will of individuals is still left free. The abuse only of that free will is the object of legal punishment." Story, in his work upon the Constitution (section 1885), declares: "Indeed, the liberty of the press, as understood by the law of England, is the right to publish without any previous restraint or license; so that neither the courts of justice nor other persons are authorized to take notice of writings intended for the press; but are confined to those which are printed." De Lolme, in his Constitution of England (page 872), declares: "Liberty of the press consists in this: that neither courts of justice nor any other judges whatever are authorized to take notice of writings intended for the press, but are confined to those which are actually printed." In Ex parte Barry, 85 Cal. 607, 25 Pac. 256, the foregoing doctrine is reiterated and approved.

It would seem that the jurisdiction here attempted to be exercised would essentially belong to a court of equity. Yet, even if this proceeding for a restraining order had been inaugurated in such a forum, it would have signally failed. In Story, Eq. Jur. § 948a, the author says: "But the utmost extent to which courts of equity have gone in restraining any publication by injunction has been upon the principle of protecting the rights of property in the book or letters sought to be published. They have never assumed, at least since the destruction of the court of star chamber, to restrain any publication which purports to be a literary work, upon the mere ground that it is of a libelous character, and tends to the degradation or injury of the reputation or business of the plaintiff who seeks relief against such publication." And this principle was declared by the learned chancellor in Brandreth v. Lance, 8 Paige, Ch. 26, wherein he said: "It is very evident that this court cannot assume jurisdiction of the case presented by the complainant's bill, or of any other case of like nature, without infringing upon the liberty of the press, and attempting to exercise a power of preventive justice which, as the legislature has decided, cannot safely be intrusted to any tribunal, consistently with the principles of free government." After referring to the court of star chamber, he proceeds: "Since that court was abolished, however, I believe there is but one case upon record in which any court, either in this country or in England, has attempted, by an injunction or order of the court, to prohibit or restrain the publication of a libel, as such, in anticipation." In effect, the order made by the trial court in this case was one commanding the petitioner not to commit a contempt of court, and such a practice is novel in the extreme. The court had ample power to protect itself in the administration of justice after the contempt was committed. As to the offender, it could punish him; as to the defendant on trial, he could be deprived of no rights by any act of this petitioner. If the publication deprived him of a fair and impartial trial at that time, a second trial would have been awarded him.

We conclude that the order made by the trial court was an attempted restraint upon the right of free speech, as guarantied by the constitution of this state, and that petitioner's mouth could not be closed in advance for the purpose of preventing an utterance of his sentiments, however mischievous the prospective results of such utterance. He had the right of free speech, but at all times was responsible to the law for an abuse of that right. For the foregoing reasons, the order is annulled, as being beyond the power of the court to make.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. All the provisions of the constitution must be construed together, and effect given, when possible, to each. The one section (9) of article 1, which provides that "every citizen may freely speak," etc., is to be construed in view of that large and important part of the constitution by which a judicial department of the government is created, and all the usual and necessary powers of courts given to the tribunals established under it. One of the most essential of these powers of a court is to protect itself against unlawful intrusion upon its orderly conduct of business, and to insure litigants in a pending proceeding the free and unembarrassed administration of justice. In the case at bar, in a court of record established by the constitution, a trial was gravely progressing in which a man's life was at stake, and an act was about to be done which it is admitted "would be an interference with the administration of justice, and deprive him of a fair and impartial trial." Is it possible that a court is powerless to protect a defendant in a case pending before it from an act that would deprive him of a fair and impartial trial? In my opinion the right given by section 9 of article 1 not to be stopped beforehand from speaking slanders and writing libels, does not include the right not to be stopped from interfering with a pending proceeding in a court, and preventing a party thereto from having a fair and impartial trial. The right to slander and libel individuals, and the right of a court to prevent interference with the course of justice in a pending trial, are not inconsistent, and may both stand together. And I think that the cases where it has been held that a threatened publication could not be enjoined will be found to be nearly all cases of threatened libels against individuals or property, and not cases where there was a threatened interference with a pending proceeding in a court, and an attempt to deprive a party thereto of a fair and impartial trial. I think that the order under review should be affirmed.

SALISBURY v. BURR, Sheriff (PERKINS, Intervener). (L. A. 79.)[1]

INSOLVENCY—CALIFORNIA INSOLVENT ACT—FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS.

In replevin, where defendant, as assignee of an insolvent debtor, alleges that the property was fraudulently transferred to plaintiff by the insolvent in order to defeat his creditors, special findings that plaintiff knew the debtor was insolvent at the time of the transfer, and that the transfer was made to prevent the property from coming into the hands of the assignee, and from being distributed among the creditors with a view to defeat the object of the California insolvent act of 1880, plaintiff having reasonable cause so to believe, but that the transfer was not made to give preference to any creditor, are sufficient to support a general verdict for the defendant under Act April 16, 1880, § 55, relating to transfers by insolvent debtors.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

This was an action in claim and delivery, brought by A. B. Salisbury against John Burr, as sheriff, to recover a stock of merchandise taken by the sheriff under a writ of attachment sued out by Gregory Perkins, Jr., assignee of F. E. Randall. Perkins intervened. There was a verdict and judgment for the intervener, and, a motion for new trial having been granted, intervener appeals. Reversed.

Graff & Latham, for appellant. Walter Rose and W. H. Young, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal by the defendant and the intervener from an order of the court below granting a new trial on the motion of plaintiff. The action is in claim and delivery to recover by the plaintiff, A. B. Salisbury, a stock of groceries, trade fixtures, horses, wagons, harness, etc., alleged to be of the value of $2,800. The defendant, John Burr, denied the ownership or possession of plaintiff, and justified the taking and detention of the property: (1) As the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, under and by virtue of a writ of attachment sued out by Gregory Perkins, Jr., in an action instituted by said Perkins against F. E. Randall, who was indebted to said Perkins in the sum of $370.98, which said writ was levied on the property March 5, 1895, as the property of said Randall. (2) Defendant justifies further by showing that on the day of the levy of the attachment, viz. March 5, 1895, said F. E. Randall filed his voluntary petition in insolvency, was adjudged an insolvent, and thereupon defendant was, by order of the court, duly appointed receiver of the estate of said insolvent, and on the 7th day of March, 1895, filed bond and qualified as such receiver, took possession of the property, and still retains the same as such receiver. That said insolvent, within 30 days next before the filing his petition in insolvency, pretended to sell said property to plaintiff. That such sale was fraudulent, without consideration, and made to defraud creditors and to prevent the property from going to the receiver, etc., averring certain facts tending to show fraud on the part of plaintiff and said Randall. George Perkins, Jr., intervened in the action by leave of the court, and showed by his complaint that he had been duly elected, and had qualified as assignee in insolvency of the estate of the insolvent, F. E. Randall, and had received an assignment of said estate, executed by the clerk of Los Angeles county; and also averred that the property in question had been fraudulently transferred by the insolvent to plaintiff, without consideration, out of the usual course of business, and to prevent the property coming to the hands of the assignee, and from being distributed to the creditors of said insolvent, and to defeat the object of the insolvent act of 1880; that plaintiff was cognizant of the fraud, etc., and that the insolvent had no other property than that conveyed, etc. The cause was tried by a jury, a general verdict rendered in favor of intervener, and several special findings returned. These findings may be summarized as follows: Randall was insolvent at the time he transferred the property to plaintiff, which fact plaintiff had reasonable cause to believe. The transfer was made with intent to prevent its coming to the assignee in insolvency; to prevent its being distributed ratably among his creditors; and with a view to defeat the object of the insolvency act of 1880, which last fact plaintiff had reasonable cause to believe at the time of the transfer. The transfer was not made to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against the insolvent, or to any one who was under liability to him, or to prevent the property which the insolvent received in exchange for the property transferred from coming to the hands of the assignee or from being ratably distributed; and, if the insolvent so intended, plaintiff had no knowledge thereof, or reason to so believe. There is a statement on appeal, but it does not set out any of the evidence, or the instructions given to the jury or refused by the court, and the question must turn upon the sufficiency of the specifications upon which the notice of motion for a new trial specified that it would be made "upon the minutes and records of the court and upon the instructions of the court to the jury and the pleadings, records, and findings in said action."

Under the fourth subdivision of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure it was necessary for the moving party to specify in his notice of motion the particular errors upon which he would rely. The only specifications of error are as follows: (1) Insufficiency of the special findings to justify the verdict, and that the general verdict is against the law. (2) Errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by plaintiff. (3) That the verdict is against the law. (4) That the general verdict rendered by the jury in the action is not supported by the special findings of fact made by the jury. (5) Upon the ground that the general verdict is inconsistent, and contrary to the special findings made by the jury. (6) That upon the special findings of fact it appears that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendant and intervener for the return of the property. There is no suggestion that the evidence failed to support the verdict or special findings. We must therefore assume that it was sufficient in these respects. If there is any error assigned which the court below could consider, it must have been that the special findings were antagonistic to the general verdict, and did not support it. The general verdict in favor of intervener was the equivalent of a finding in his favor upon all the issues in the case. The special findings did not cover all of those issues, but, so far as they went, they were in harmony with such general verdict, and tended to its support. We fail to find in the record any ground upon which, by the most liberal construction, the act of the court below granting the new trial can be upheld. It is suggested—but whether rightly we cannot say—that the court regarded the cases of Ohleyer v. Bunce, 65 Cal. 544, 4 Pac. 549, and Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 573, 21 Pac. 305, which construed section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880, as being overruled by Hass v. Whittier, 87 Cal. 613, 25 Pac. 917; and in the same case in 97 Cal. 411, 32 Pac. 449. Hass v. Whittier, 87 Cal. 613, 25 Pac. 917, was a case in which the action was brought by the assignee of an insolvent to recover from a creditor of the insolvent the value of certain personal property transferred to such creditor. There was no allegation in the complaint or finding that the insolvent transferred the property to his creditor "with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him," and on appeal this court reversed the judgment, for the want of such allegation and finding. In the case at bar the complaint in intervention shows that within 30 days next before filing his petition in insolvency the insolvent pretended to transfer the property in question to plaintiff; that the transfer was without consideration, "and such pretended transfer was made out of the usual course of business, with the full knowledge on the part of said Salisbury that said F. E. Randall was then insolvent; and the said pretended sale was entered into by and between said F. E. Randall and said Salisbury for the purpose of preventing said property from coming to this intervener as the assignee of said insolvent, to prevent the same from being ratably distributed among his creditors, and to defeat the object of the insolvent act of 1880; and at the time of said pretended transfer said F. E. Randall had no other property with which to pay his debts, or out of which the same could be satisfied; * * * that said A. B. Salisbury, for the purpose of defrauding said estate, is wrongfully claiming to be the owner thereof," etc. These allegations, while not as full and complete as they might have been, are deemed sufficient in the absence of a demurrer. Hass v. Whittier was here again (97 Cal. 411, 32 Pac. 449), and on the second appeal it was held, among other things, that where there is a transfer by an insolvent debtor to his creditor, not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, the transaction is presumed prima facie to be a preference not allowed by section 55 of the insolvent act; but that such presumption may be rebutted by showing that no preference was intended, and that the insolvent intended to treat all his creditors alike. In the present case there is no showing that the plaintiff was a creditor of Randall, the insolvent. Section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880 is aimed not only at cases where an insolvent debtor, in contemplation of insolvency, within one month before filing his petition in insolvency, causes his property to be seized, etc., with a view to giving a preference to a creditor or person having a claim against him, but also at all persons who receive assignments, transfers, or conveyances of his property within the same period, having reasonable cause to believe that such person (the assignor) is insolvent, and that the transfer, assignment, or conveyance "is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors," etc., in which cases the transfer is void, and the assignee in insolvency may recover the property or its value. We are satisfied that upon the specifications of errors as assigned in the notice of motion for a new trial no cause was assigned upon which a new trial could properly be granted, and hence we recommend that the order granting a new trial be reversed, and the cause be remanded, directing the entry of judgment in favor of intervener.

PEOPLE ex rel. SAN FRANCISCO & S. J. RY. CO. v. CRAYCROFT et al., Board of City Trustees. (S. F. 360.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES — RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH TOWNS—GRANTED ACCORDING TO MERITS OF APPLICATION.

The grant of the right of way to a steam-railway company which desires to make a connection, through the town, of those portions of its road extending upon either side of the town, to its opposite termini, must be acted on according to the merits of the petition therefor, and is not within Act March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 288), requiring that "every franchise or privilege to erect or lay telegraph wires, to construct or operate railroads along or upon any public street or highway, or to exercise any other privilege whatever" proposed to be granted by the governing body of any town, must be advertised, and be granted to the highest bidder.

In bank. Petition for a writ of mandamus by the San Francisco & San Joaquin Railway Company against Craycroft and others, constituting the board of trustees of the city of Fresno. Granted.

E. F. Preston, for relator. L. W. Moultrie, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding, in which the petitioner asks the issuance of a writ of mandate to the respondents, commanding them to act upon its petition for leave to extend its railway track through the city of Fresno, and across and along certain streets and lands of said city. The petitioner is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of California, and, by its incorporation, authorized and empowered to construct, maintain, and operate a steam railway for the transportation of passengers and freight from a point at or near the Bay of San Francisco, in a line generally easterly and southeasterly to a point at or near the city of Bakersfield, in Kern county, a distance of about 350 miles. The route of the road, as laid out, passes through the city of Fresno; and the petitioner has already constructed a section 20 miles in length on such proposed route, between Stockton and Fresno. It is necessary, for the proper and successful operation of the road, that it should be constructed as laid out; and this involves the right to pass through the city of Fresno upon a line and over and across the streets particularly designated in an application which was by the petitioner duly presented to the respondents. But they, instead of passing upon the question as to whether the proposed route was properly located, and the application one proper to be granted, resolved to advertise for bids for the privilege of operating a steam railway over the route proposed, and determined that they would grant said privilege to the highest bidder, without regard to the question whether such bidder was engaged in constructing a road between the same termini or not. There is not, in fact, any other corporation or person proposing to build such a road, or who could make a bona fide bid in competition with the petitioner; and the award of the privilege sought, to any other person, would simply prevent the construction of the road through the city of Fresno, and to that extent defeat the purpose for which the petitioner was incorporated. All these facts are admitted by the respondents, and it is not denied that the course they are pursuing involves a seeming absurdity; but they hold themselves bound to that course by the terms of an act of the legislature approved March 23, 1893, entitled "An act providing for the sale of railroad and other franchises in municipalities, and relative to granting of franchises." St. 1893, p. 288. This act does, in express terms, provide that "every franchise or privilege to erect or lay telegraph wires, to construct or operate railroads along or upon any public street or highway or to exercise any other privilege whatever hereafter proposed to be granted by the board of supervisors, common council or other governing or legislative body of any county, city and county, city, town or district within this state shall be granted upon the conditions in this act provided and not otherwise"; i. e. the fact that a franchise or privilege (describing it) has been asked, and that it is proposed to grant it to the highest bidder, shall be advertised, and at the expiration of the time limited the bids must be opened, and the franchise or privilege must be awarded to the highest bidder. Any member of a board of supervisors, or other governing body, who, by his vote, violates or attempts to violate any of the provisions of the act, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and of malfeasance in office, for which he may be removed by any court of competent jurisdiction.

It cannot be denied that the language of this act is broad enough to include the franchise and privilege which the petitioner seeks, but a statute will not always be held to include every case which falls within its literal terms. The penalty of death denounced against any person who draws blood in the street is not incurred by a surgeon who bleeds one who has fallen in a fit; and so, generally, no law will be so applied as to work a palpable absurdity. The word "railroad" is certainly broad enough to cover a steam railroad, and the privilege of laying and operating a steam railroad through a city is clearly included in "any privilege whatever"; but at the same time, if it is perfectly evident from the whole tenor of this act, and other acts in pari materia, that the legislature could not have intended the consequences of a literal construction of the language above quoted, such a construction cannot obtain. It is the policy of this state to encourage the building of railroads, and a corporation complying with the statutory prerequisites acquires, among other things, the right to construct and operate its road between the termini named in its articles of incorporation. In the exercise of this right, it may pass through cities and towns along its route, if they are willing to grant the privilege. Generally it is to the interest of the inhabitants of such towns and cities, as well as of the railroad company, to have the road pass through the corporate limits; and it is not to be supposed that the legislature intended to make it impracticable, if not impossible, for the builders of the road and the governing bodies of the cities and towns along the route to promote their mutual interests in this way. But, if this law is to be enforced in a literal sense, such must be the result. When a railway is constructed to the boundaries of a town or city, the corporate authorities may be as desirous as the builders of the road to have it pass through on its selected route, but their hands are tied. They cannot grant the privilege to any but the highest bidder, and the highest bidder may be some one who merely desires to prevent the road from passing through, and who cannot make any use of the franchise except for that purpose. In fact, the franchise sought is not the subject of competition. A particular railway company desires permission to construct its road through the town, or, in other words, to make a connection through the town of those portions of its road extending upon either side of the town to its opposite termini. In the nature of things, there can be no competition for this privilege. The builder of the road must own and operate the whole line. The right to do so is part of its corporate franchise, and how is it possible that any other person or corporation can acquire the right to construct and own and operate, as a distinct and independent road and franchise, that part of the road necessary to connect its two ends? This law was not intended to apply to such a case, but only to those cases—as of street railroads—in which bona fide competition is possible. It follows that, when the application of petitioner was presented, it was the duty of respondents to consider and act upon it, without subjecting the petitioner or themselves to a condition which might preclude them, in the exercise of a proper discretion, from granting the privilege sought. It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue, commanding the respondents to act upon the application of petitioner without reference to any bids for the privilege sought, and to grant or deny it according to its merits.

PEOPLE v. HOWARD. (Cr. 37.)[1]

HOMICIDE—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—CHARACTER OF DECEASED.

1. In a prosecution for murder, one of the state's witnesses testified that defendant called at her house, inquiring for deceased, and made threats against him. Held, that it was not reversible error to refuse to permit defendant to show by cross-examination that defendant went to witness' house in response to a call by the witness for a policeman, defendant having been given the right to call the witness as his own to prove such fact.

2. Where, in a prosecution for murder, defendant introduces evidence to show that the reputation of deceased for peace was bad, it is not error to admit evidence to show that his reputation in such respect was good, on the ground that the evidence of defendant was immaterial, in that it was not shown that the reputation of deceased was known to defendant, defendant's evidence having shown that he was well acquainted with deceased, and knew of threats against him made by deceased.

3. The prosecution claimed that defendant shot deceased, with whom he had had a wordy dispute, in the back, after he had turned from defendant. Defendant claimed that he shot while deceased was making a murderous assault upon him. Held, that it was proper to refuse, as unwarranted by the evidence, an instruction that a person whose life has been threatened, if he casually meets his foe, and has reasonable cause to believe him armed and ready to execute his threats, and that his personal safety can be secured in no other way, need not wait to be assaulted, but may kill his foe if necessary to secure himself from the imminent danger.

4. A person whose life has been threatened, casually meeting his foe, and having "good reason" to believe him armed, and ready to execute his threats, and that "personal safety" can be secured in no other way, before he is assaulted, is not justified in shooting his foe, to secure himself from the imminent danger. Such a homicide would be murder. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

John E. Howard was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Lamberson & Middlecoff and H. C. Lillie, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and Power & Alford, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. Defendant, having been convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to suffer death, takes this appeal from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial.

The first point has reference to certain rulings sustaining objections to questions propounded by the defense on cross-examination of witnesses for the people. The deceased, prior to the homicide, was living with a prostitute named Susana Del Gardo. She testified for the prosecution that on the day preceding the killing the defendant called at her house and inquired for the deceased, and that, being informed that he was not there, proceeded to utter some threats in regard to him. On cross-examination she was asked by counsel for the defense if she had sent for a policeman by one Bradley. This was objected to on the ground that it was not proper cross-examination. Counsel for the defense stated that they proposed to show that she had sent for a policeman, and that defendant, who was acting as a deputy marshal, went in response to such request. The objection was sustained, the court saying: "You have the liberty to recall the witness as your own." I think the question should have been allowed, but it was at least a debatable question, and upon such matters a large discretion must be given to the trial court. The defense was not deprived of the evidence by the ruling, and I think we can see that defendant was not injured. The witness did finally answer the question on cross-examination, for she said she had not sent by any one word to the marshal to the effect suggested. The testimony would have been important as explaining that defendant was not then seeking the deceased, but it would not have qualified or contradicted anything that the witness had said. It was a new fact, favorable to the defendant. I think it was legitimate cross-examination, for it would have rebutted an unfavorable inference which might be made from the testimony of the witness. But it would have been just as effectual for that purpose if given by the defense as their own testimony.

The same course of reasoning will dispose of a similar exception taken during the cross-examination of Bradley.

I am unable to see how the fact (if it was a fact) that defendant was employed by the city marshal to find evidence to secure convictions in a certain class of cases would have thrown any light upon the homicide. Nothing indicates that a prosecution of that character was contemplated against the deceased. On the contrary, it seems that the deceased was expected to assist defendant in procuring evidence. The theory of the defense, however, was not that the fatal affray grew out of this matter, but that deceased was indignant because he thought defendant had attempted to have him arrested for beating the witness Del Gardo, and therefore made an assault upon him. Evidence was offered by the defense, and received without objection, to the effect that the reputation of De La Nina for peace and quietness was bad. Afterwards the prosecution in rebuttal offered testimony to the effect that De La Nina's reputation in the respects named was good. The defense objected on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and that no foundation had been laid for the introduction of such testimony. The objection was overruled, and the evidence was received. It is now claimed here that this ruling was erroneous. This contention seems to be founded upon the proposition that the evidence introduced by the defense upon this point was wholly immaterial, because it was not made to appear that defendant knew of the bad reputation of the deceased,—if it was bad,—and therefore it was error to permit the prosecution to disprove it. But I do not think this proposition can be maintained. The evidence shows that defendant was acting as deputy marshal of Tulare. He testified in his own behalf that he knew De La Nina quite well. The testimony given by several witnesses tended to prove that they were quite well acquainted. The witness Del Gardo testified that defendant told her that De La Nina was a man he did not like, and that he was glad "to get to run him out of town, and make him some trouble." He claims himself that he went to the house of Del Gardo to see about arresting him for having beaten his mistress, and that several different persons had informed him of threats made against him by the deceased. It was, therefore, doubtless assumed by court and counsel that whatever reputation De La Nina bore was known to the defendant. The defendant cannot complain that this proposition was practically conceded to him. According to his own contention, therefore, the evidence was material. In rare cases such evidence may be introduced as one of the circumstances tending to justify a defendant in the belief that he is in imminent danger, and that it was necessary to take life in self-defense. Of course it could have no material bearing upon that point unless defendant was at the time aware of the character of his assailant. In this case all parties seem to have assumed that such knowledge existed, and I think the state of the evidence warranted the belief.

Many other objections were taken to rulings admitting or refusing to admit evidence. But they were all unimportant, and in my judgment they are all correct. A discussion of them would not be interesting or profitable.

The court refused to give the following instruction asked by the defendant. In so doing, it is contended, the court erred: "One whose life has been threatened may arm himself to resist his foe; and if he casually meets such foe, having good reason to believe him armed and ready to execute his threats, and that his personal safety can be secured in no other way, need not wait to be assaulted, but may secure himself from the imminent danger, even by killing his adversary, if necessary." I find considerable difficulty in understanding why the defense desired this instruction, or upon what view of the facts it could help them. The prosecution claimed that there had been some wordy dispute between the defendant and De La Nina, and that defendant shot deceased, after deceased had turned away from him, through his head, from behind, and that deceased was unarmed, and had made no demonstration towards defendant. The theory of the defense and the evidence of the defendant was that the deceased was slain while making a murderous assault upon the defendant with a deadly weapon. There was no evidence whatever tending to make a case to which the instruction asked would have the slightest application. But the instruction was not correct. A homicide committed under the circumstances indicated would be murder. It lacks several matters essential to a case of self-defense. (1) It does not require that a defendant shall believe himself in imminent danger, nor that the killing is necessary. (2) It leaves out the requirement that the circumstances must be such as would convince a reasonable man that danger was imminent, and that it was absolutely necessary to take life to save himself from death or great bodily injury. It not only does not require that the danger shall be real, but ignores the doctrine of appearances as well. And (3) it tells the jury that to secure immunity from any sort of injury would justify the taking of human life. The phrase "personal safety" does not necessarily indicate the class of injuries, danger and fear of which will alone justify taking human life. The addition made by the court to the fifth instruction asked by the defendant correctly states the law upon the subject. There was nothing in the line of argument pursued by the district attorney of which the defendant can rightfully complain. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment. As to the ruling of the court upon the question to the witness Del Gardo, it was clearly erroneous, and the propriety of the question, in my opinion, not open to debate. It was also highly material, and the exclusion of the evidence could not be defended upon the ground that it was within the discretion of the court. But the witness subsequently answered questions to the same effect, and therefore it can be seen that the ruling, though erroneous, was not prejudicial.

As to the instruction refused by the court and commented upon by Justice TEMPLE, it was perhaps not sufficiently explicit in some respects, but is not, in my opinion, open to the second ground of objection stated by him. Its refusal was justified, however, upon the ground that there was no evidence to which it was pertinent.

HOLLY v. HEISKELL. (Sac. 82.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY — PLEADING — ALLEGATION OF RIGHT OF POSSESSION.

In an action to recover personal property, the complaint must allege the ultimate fact that plaintiff is the owner of or entitled to possession of the property at the time the action is commenced; an allegation of ownership or right of possession on a prior date is insufficient.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; Stanton L. Carter, Judge.

Action by George N. Holly against William Heiskell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. D. Edwards, for appellant. Strother & Strother, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant, upon the judgment roll, from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The action is claim and delivery. Appellant contends that the judgment must be reversed because there is no averment in the complaint that respondent was the owner or entitled to the possession of the property sued for at the time the action was brought; and, under the authorities, the contention must be sustained. In a suit to recover personal property, the complaint must show the ultimate fact that plaintiff was owner or entitled to possession at the time of the commencement of the action; and it is not sufficient to merely aver that he was the owner or entitled to possession at some period prior to that time. It was so expressly held in Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750, Afflerbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 269, 21 Pac. 837, and Masterson v. Clark (Cal.) 41 Pac. 796; and the two first-named cases were referred to approvingly in the still more recent case of Williams v. Ashe (Cal.) 43 Pac. 595. Counsel for respondent seek to show us a distinction between those cases and the case at bar, but we are not able to see it. In Afflerbach v. McGovern there was no demurrer to the complaint. In the case at bar the only averment of the respondent's ownership or right of possession is "that on the 22d day of April, 1895, plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the following described personal property, to wit." And the action was not commenced until after the said 22d day of April. Under the authorities above cited, the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, of course, that objection can be taken at any time. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to allow respondent to amend his complaint, if he shall be so advised.

SAVINGS BANK OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA v. THORNTON et al. (L. A. 16.)

MORTGAGES—PROMISE TO PAY PRIOR LIEN—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where the mortgagee in a mortgage taken to secure the repayment of money loaned to the mortgagor assumes and agrees to pay an unpaid balance due on a prior note and mortgage given by the same mortgagor to a third party, such agreement is for the benefit of the mortgagor only; and no right of action founded on the contract arises in favor of such third party incidentally to be benefited thereby.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

This was an action brought by the Savings Bank of Southern California against Isabella Thornton and James C. Barr and others to recover the unpaid balance on a note and mortgage executed by Barr and wife to plaintiff, for the sum of $1,000. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

Albert M. Stephens, for appellant. J. T. Houx, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Counsel agree that the plaintiff's appeal was taken from an order of the superior court refusing its motion for new trial, made after a second trial of the case; and we shall so regard it, although on the face of the notice of appeal it is at least doubtful whether it is not directed to a previous order of the court granting a like motion of the defendant Thornton after a former trial. Defendants James C. Barr and wife on January 24, 1888, executed to plaintiff their promissory note for the sum of $1,000, payable in two years from date, with interest, and, to secure the same, executed also a mortgage of certain lands. On January 24, 1890, said note being mainly unpaid, the defendant Thornton loaned to Barr and wife the sum of $432.60; and, as security for its repayment, they executed to her an instrument in form a deed absolute of the land previously mortgaged to plaintiff. Such instrument (intended as a mortgage) contained a clause to the effect that the second party named therein, said Isabella Thornton, "assumes and agrees to pay" the balance unpaid on the said former note and mortgage. The Barrs have never repaid to her said sum of $432.60, or any part thereof; and the land is worth less than the sum due to plaintiff. Plaintiff brought this action to foreclose its said mortgage, and the question for decision here is whether the defendant Thornton is personally liable to the plaintiff for any deficiency which may remain after applying upon its mortgage debt the proceeds of sale of the incumbered land; plaintiff claiming that her agreement with the Barrs was made for its benefit. Civ. Code, § 1559.

The respondent urges in support of the order, among other matters, that she never assented to the clause in her mortgage providing that she should discharge the prior mortgage, and that it was inserted without authority from her by the agent who had the business in hand for her; that she did what she could to rescind the contract apparently created by the instrument as soon as she learned of the existence of that clause; and that she received no consideration for such agreement. Without considering these propositions, which are combated by appellant as being unsustained by the evidence, we are of opinion that on other grounds the decision in her favor was right. This is not the case where the grantee of mortgaged premises undertakes, as part of the consideration for the conveyance, to pay the grantor's debt to the mortgagee, of which transaction several examples are furnished by our Reports: Alvord v. Gold Co., 106 Cal. 547, 40 Pac. 27; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 37 Pac. 411; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609. Here, the promisor, Mrs. Thornton, owed the Barrs nothing, and did not undertake to discharge a debt of her own to them by paying the amount thereof to plaintiff. She undertook to release the land from a prior incumbrance for the benefit, not of plaintiff, but of Barr and wife, whose property the land remained. "Regarding the conveyance as a mortgage, the stipulation was in effect to advance to the promisee on the security of the property, to discharge prior liens, and was made for the benefit of the promisee only. If such a contract could be enforced by the creditor who would be incidentally benefited by its performance, every agreement by which one party should agree with another, for a consideration moving from him, to become security for him to his creditors, or to advance money to pay his debts, could be enforced by the parties whose claims were thus to be secured or paid." Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 241. Such benefit, therefore, as plaintiff would derive from the performance of the contract by Mrs. Thornton being merely an incident thereof, no right of action founded on the contract arose in plaintiff's favor. Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100. Appellant relies on Ricard v. Sanderson, 41 N. Y. 179, and Bassett v. Bradley, 48 Conn. 224. But the first of these decisions rested on the supposed authority of previous cases which have been said in this court to have "little persuasive effect" (Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 357, 30 Pac. 609); and it can hardly now be considered authoritative, even in the court which pronounced it (Garnsey v. Rogers, supra; Pardee v. Treat, 82 N. Y. 385; Jones, Mortg. § 756, note 4). And in the Connecticut case, the plaintiff, a prior mortgagee, had taken an assignment of the rights of the mortgagor under such a promise of the subsequent mortgagee, and on that ground was permitted to maintain the action, the court saying: "In such cases there is little room for the conclusion that the promise was made for the benefit of the prior mortgagee. It is simply a transaction between the immediate parties." 48 Conn. 240. See, also, Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 624, 10 Sup. Ct. 494, and cases there cited. Other difficulties attending the theory of respondent's liability to plaintiff suggest themselves by reason of the maturity of the Barrs' debt to her, and their failure to pay it; but what has been said already suffices for the disposal of the case. The order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

In re BYRNE'S ESTATE. (Sac. 60.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1896.)

SALE OF DECEDENT'S ESTATE—PETITION—MINES—SALE—PETITION.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1537, authorizing the probate court to order a sale of property of a decedent on presentation of a petition showing certain facts, the court acquires no jurisdiction unless the petition avers all the facts required.

2. A petition describing land of a decedent as acquired by him under a mineral entry, designating it as the "Irish and Byrne Mine," without averring that the land is or contains a mine, and which avers that no work has been performed thereon for 20 years, fails to show that the property is a mine or an interest in a mine, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1529, authorizing the sale under order of court of "mines or interests in mines" belonging to decedents' estates.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county.

Petition by an heir of Joseph Byrne for a sale of real property belonging to the estate. From an order directing the sale, Maggie G. Barrett, administratrix, appeals. Reversed.

W. B. Lardner (Geo. B. Merrill, of counsel), for appellant. L. L. Chamberlain, for respondent Byrne. J. M. Fulweiler, for respondents absent heirs.

HARRISON, J. Appeal from an order directing the sale of certain real property belonging to the estate of the decedent. The deceased died intestate, and letters of administration were issued upon his estate to Maggie G. Barrett, who duly made and returned to the court an inventory of the estate, and caused to be published a proper notice to his creditors. Thereafter one of the heirs at law of the deceased presented to the superior court a petition for the sale of certain real property belonging to the estate, upon the ground that it would be for the best interest of said estate that it should be sold, assigning various reasons therefor. The administratrix demurred to this petition, and filed certain objections thereto, which were overruled, and the court made an order directing her to cause the property to be sold. From this order she has appealed.

The authority of the superior court to order the sale of any real property belonging to the estate of a deceased person depends upon the presentation of a petition therefor containing a statement of the facts required by section 1537, Code Civ. Proc. The sufficiency of the petition is the basis of the order of sale, and upon a direct appeal from this order, if the petition is defective in any of these statutory requirements, it is fatal to the validity of the order. It is conceded by the respondent that the petition fails to state many of the facts made requisite by section 1537; but it is contended by him that, because the real property which he asks to have sold is a mine, that section is inapplicable, and that the proceedings are to be governed by the provisions of sections 1529–1533, Id. These sections are headed "Summary Sales of Mines and Mining Interests," and form article 3 of the chapter providing for "Sales in General," while article 4 of the same chapter is headed "The Sale of Real Estate, Interests Therein, and Confirmation Thereof." Section 1536 authorizes the making of an order for the sale of "real as well as personal property"; and section 1537 declares that, "to obtain such order," the petition therein referred to must be presented, containing certain enumerated facts. It may be conceded that a mine or an interest in a mine belonging to the estate of a decedent, where the only title is that of possession, which may be lost by abandonment or by failure to comply with local regulations, is subject to the provisions of article 3; but it does not follow that a piece of real estate may be sold under these provisions merely because there is thought to be mining ground within its boundaries. In the present case the property which is directed to be sold is a tract of land containing 115 acres, of which the decedent was the owner in fee simple, by virtue of a patent issued therefor by the United States. It was patented under a mineral entry in 1874, 16 acres thereof "included in the same patent" being situate in a different township; and it is stated in the petition that no work has been done upon the mine for upwards of 20 years. The description in the petition refutes the idea that the property is either a mine or a mining interest, within the meaning of section 1529. There is no direct statement, either in the petition or in the order, that the property is either a mine or an interest in a mine; nor is it even stated that there is any mining ground upon the tract of land. Throughout the entire proceedings it is treated as real estate, except for the name which it bears,—"Irish and Byrne Mine." This, however, is not even evidence that the property is a "mine." The order of the court directs the administratrix to sell "the real estate belonging to the said estate hereinafter described" and, in giving the description of the property, proceeds: "The following real estate, hereby authorized to be sold, being situate in the said county of Placer, state of California, and bounded and described as follows, to wit: An undivided one-half interest in and to the Irish and Byrne Placer Mine; also sixteen acres included in the same patent, situate at Wisconsin Hill, Tp. 7, Placer county, Cal., more particularly designated as mineral entry No. 334, in the series of the Sacramento land office, * * * in the Wisconsin Hill mining district, and containing 115.54 acres, more or less, and found more fully described in Book C of Patents, pages 265–9, Placer county records." We hold, therefore, that the property directed to be sold is real estate, and that the court could not make an order directing the administratrix to sell it, unless there was presented to it such a petition as is required by section 1537, Code Civ. Proc. The order is reversed.

CONSOLIDATED NATIONAL BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. HAYES et al. (L. A. 57.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—PRESENTATION OF CLAIM — MORTGAGE — FORECLOSURE — PARTIES—INTEREST—LIMITATIONS.

1. A claim against an estate recited that it was indebted to a certain bank on a note of a specified date and amount, with interest from such date; such "note being secured by mortgage recorded in the recorder's office of S. county, in Book No. 36 of Mortgages, at page 211 et seq. A copy of said note and mortgage is hereto attached." The attached paper was a copy of the mortgage, with the indorsements thereon showing the date, volume, and page of its record in the recorder's office, and containing a copy of the note. Held a substantial compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1497, providing that if the claim be founded on a bond, bill, note, or any other instrument, a copy of such instrument must accompany the claim, and if it be secured by a mortgage, or other lien, which has been recorded in the office of the county recorder, it shall be sufficient to describe the mortgage or lien, and refer to the date, volume, and page of its record.

2. Where a claim against an estate is secured by a mortgage, and has been filed among the approved claims against such estate, it is no objection to the foreclosure of the mortgage that the verification of the claim was defective.

3. The mere delivery of a note and mortgage by the mortgagee, as collateral security for a debt, without any indorsement or written transfer, will not preclude such mortgagee from suing on the note and foreclosing the mortgage in his own name, with the consent of the pledgee.

4. A claim against an estate was on a note of $3,000, dated December 20, 1887, which bore interest at 12 per cent., and, as presented, was "for $3,000 and accrued interest." It was by the administrators "allowed and approved for $3,000 this 15th day of May, 1889"; and by the court it was "allowed and approved for $3,000 this 15th day of November, 1889." The note was secured by mortgage. Held, that on foreclosure of the mortgage, not brought within three months after such allowance, it was error to allow interest from the date of the note, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1498, 1503, providing that, whenever any claim presented to an administrator or judge is rejected, the holder must bring suit in the proper court against the executor, etc., within three months after the date of its rejection, otherwise the claim shall be barred.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego against Richard V. Hayes and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal on the judgment roll. Modified and affirmed.

Trippet & Neale and Leroy & Palmer, for appellants. C. H. Rippey, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage executed by Edward Hayes and Richard V. Hayes to secure payment of a promissory note made by them to the plaintiff. The note was for $3,000, bearing interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, compounding quarterly, and was dated December 20, 1887, and payable March 20, 1888. The mortgage was executed April 3, 1888. Edward Hayes died testate on February 4, 1889. His will was duly admitted to probate, and Richard V. Hayes and Edward Dougherty were appointed and duly qualified as administrators of the estate with the will annexed. Notice to creditors was duly published, and within the time limited in the notice the plaintiff presented to the administrators, for allowance, its claim based on said note and mortgage; and the same was allowed and approved by them and by the judge of the court, and filed in the court among the acknowledged debts of the estate. The action is based on said claim, and was commenced April 26, 1892. The defendants are the two administrators and the widow and children of the decedent. The administrators and the other defendants answered separately. The answer of the administrators denied the nonpayment of the note; denied that the interests or claims of defendants in the premises described were subsequent or subject to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage; denied that the claim of plaintiff was duly or properly presented to or allowed by the administrators or the judge of the superior court; denied that the plaintiff was the lawful owner or holder of said note or mortgage; and, as a further defense, set up that, prior to the commencement of the action, plaintiff pledged, assigned, and delivered said note and mortgage to the Savings Bank of San Diego as collateral security for the payment of an indebtedness of the plaintiff to said savings bank amounting to $3,000, with interest thereon at 10 per cent. per annum from said date, and that no part of said sum had been paid, and the savings bank still held the said note and mortgage as collateral security for the payment of said indebtedness. The answer of the other defendants set up the same defense as above, and, in addition thereto, that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of sections 337 and 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court below found in favor of the plaintiff, and gave judgment foreclosing the mortgage, from which the defendants have appealed on the judgment roll, without any statement or bill of exceptions.

1. Section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except that an action may be brought to enforce a mortgage or lien against the property of the estate subject thereto, where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint. In the complaint in this case there was no such waiver, and appellants contend that there was no legal presentation of the claim relied on, and hence that the action was not authorized and cannot be maintained. This contention is based upon the theory that no copy of the note accompanied the claim, and that no sufficient affidavit in support of the claim was attached thereto. The claim presented was as follows: "Estate of Edward Hayes, Deceased. To the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, Dr., May 15, 1889. To one promissory note dated December 20, 1887, $3,000, and interest thereon from date of note at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum; said note being secured by a mortgage recorded in the recorder's office of San Diego county, in book Number 36, of Mortgages, at page 211 et seq. A copy of said note and mortgage is hereto attached." The attached paper was a copy of the mortgage, with all the indorsements thereon, showing the date, volume, and page of its record in the recorder's office, and also containing a full and complete copy of the note. This, we think, was quite sufficient to meet the requirements of section 1497, Code Civ. Proc., which provides, "If the claim be founded on a bond, bill, note, or any other instrument, a copy of such instrument must accompany the claim;" and "If the claim, or any part thereof, be secured by a mortgage, or other lien, which has been recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which the land affected by it lies, it shall be sufficient to describe the mortgage or lien, and refer to the date, volume and page of its record." See Bank v. Burns, 104 Cal. 473, 38 Pac. 102.

The affidavit was in these words: "State of California, County of San Diego—ss.: John Ginty, cashier and authorized officer of the corporation whose foregoing claim is herewith presented to the administrators of said deceased, being duly sworn, says that the amount thereof, to wit, the sum of three thousand (3,000) dollars, and accrued interest till paid, is justly due to said claimant; that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited; and that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of said claimant. [Signed] John Ginty, Cashier." It is objected that this affidavit was insufficient, because (1) it did not state that the affiant was the cashier of the corporation, and as such made the affidavit; (2) it did not set forth the reason why it was made by him; and (3) it stated that there were no offsets to the claim "to the knowledge of said claimant," when it should have stated that there were no offsets "to the knowledge of the affiant." And in support of the objection the case of Perkins v. Onyett, 86 Cal. 348, 24 Pac. 1024, is cited. That case is not in point. By reference to it, it will be seen that it was an action against an estate, based upon a note and mortgage, but that no claim on the mortgage was ever presented, and the claim on the note was supported by a defective affidavit, and was rejected by the executor. In the opinion the court clearly distinguished the case from that of Estate of Swain, 67 Cal. 637, 8 Pac. 497. In the last-named case, as in this, the claims had been allowed and approved by the administrator and the probate judge, and had been filed among the approved claims against the estate, and it was held that such allowance established prima facie their validity. Afterwards, upon the settlement of the final account of the administrator, the heirs contested the claims, but upon the hearing they were adjudged to be valid, and on appeal the judgment was affirmed. This court said: "In law, the allowance of the claims, although made upon defective verifications, was not void. It was a judicial act, which entitled the claims to rank as acknowledged debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration; but, as a judicial act in their favor, it was not binding and conclusive against the heirs, because they were not parties to it. They had therefore the right to question the allowance at the settlement of the estate. The burden of showing the invalidity of the allowance was, however, cast upon them." In this case the letters of administration were issued to defendants, Hayes and Dougherty, April 8, 1889. The notice to creditors was given April 22, 1889, and the plaintiff's claim was presented and allowed May 15, 1889. Under section 1491, Code Civ. Proc., the time for the presentation of claims must have expired in February, 1890, and may have expired in August, 1889. Under section 1622, Code Civ. Proc., an exhibit under oath, showing the claims presented, the names of claimants, and other matters, was due from the administrators in October, 1889; and, if such an exhibit was not rendered, it was, by the next section, made the duty of the court to enforce its rendition. Under section 1628, Code Civ. Proc., a full account and report of the administration was due as early at least as April, 1890, and may have been due in September, 1889; and, if not presented, it was made the duty of the court to compel the rendering of it by attachment. And under section 1626, Code Civ. Proc., when an exhibit was rendered any person interested was authorized to appear and contest any account or statement therein contained. It does not appear here that the exhibit and full account of the administration were not rendered as required, nor that there was ever any contest in regard to plaintiff's claim in the probate court. It must therefore be assumed that the exhibit and account were rendered, and that plaintiff's claim was in no way objected to or questioned. Indeed, it is admitted by counsel for appellants that "the allowance of the claim entitles it to rank as an acknowledged debt against the estate, to be paid in due course of administration," the only contention being that, because of the defective verification, the foreclosure of the mortgage should be denied. But a mortgage is a mere incident of the debt it was intended to secure, and passes by an assignment of the debt, is discharged by a payment of the debt, and is barred by the statute of limitations when the debt is barred. If, therefore, the allowance of the plaintiff's claim was sufficient to make it an acknowledged debt of the estate, it was also sufficient to keep alive the mortgage, and to entitle the plaintiff to have it foreclosed.

2. Appellants contend that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and hence the action could not be prosecuted in its name. Section 367, Code Civ. Proc. The court below found that the plaintiff on the 13th day of March, 1889, delivered the said note and mortgage to the Savings Bank of San Diego, without any indorsement or written transfer thereof, to secure the payment of an indebtedness of the plaintiff to the savings bank then existing, for the sum of $3,000, with interest thereon; that no part of said indebtedness had been paid, and the savings bank still held the said note and mortgage as security for the payment thereof; that on May 15, 1889, the plaintiff, with the consent of the savings bank, presented the claim, based on said note and mortgage, to the administrators, and the same was allowed and approved by them and the probate judge, and filed and registered in court as alleged in the complaint; and that on the 26th day of April, 1892, this action was commenced by and in the name of the plaintiff, with the consent of the said savings bank. We do not think the delivery of the note and mortgage, without any indorsement or written transfer, constituted such a transfer as would deprive the plaintiff of the right to sue on them in its own name, with the consent of the transferee. At most, it was only a pledge, and, as between the pledgor and pledgee, the legal title remained in the former. And the rule is that, when a plaintiff holds the legal title to the demand, he is the real party in interest. O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 Pac. 236; Grant v. Heverin, 77 Cal. 263, 18 Pac. 647, and 19 Pac. 493.

3. As before stated, the note was dated December 20, 1887, and bore interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. The claim presented was "for $3,000 and accrued interest." It was by the administrators "allowed and approved for $3,000 this 15th day of May, 1889," and by the judge of the court it was "allowed and approved for $3,000 this 15th day of November, 1889." The court below found that no part of the promissory note mentioned in the complaint, or of the principal or interest due thereon, was ever paid, and that there was due and unpaid on the note and mortgage the sum of $3,000 principal and $3,913.16 interest, the interest being computed from the date of the note, for which sums judgment was entered. Appellants contend that the court erred in computing and allowing interest on the note from its date to the date of the presentation and allowance of the claim by the administrators, and that the judgment should be modified by striking therefrom the interest so allowed, estimated by counsel to be $2,068.16. We think this contention must be sustained. The claim was allowed by the administrators and the judge for the principal only, and was, in effect, rejected as to the accrued interest. The Code provides that "whenever any claim is presented to an executor or administrator or to a judge, and he is willing to allow the same in part, he must state in his indorsement the amount he is willing to allow." Code Civ. Proc. § 1503. The Code further provides that "when a claim is rejected either by the executor or administrator or a judge of the superior court, the holder must bring suit in the proper court against the executor or administrator within three months after the date of its rejection * * * otherwise the claim shall be forever barred." Code Civ. Proc. § 1498. This suit was not brought within three months after the rejection of the claim for accrued interest, and was therefore not in time to avoid the bar of the statute.

4. It is claimed for appellant Richard V. Hayes that the action was barred, and the judgment should therefore be reversed as to him. No personal judgment was asked for or rendered against any of the defendants, or against the estate, and counsel for respondent state in their brief that "it was stipulated at the trial that the decree of foreclosure should be so drawn as to not affect any interest in the land acquired by Richard V. Hayes prior to the execution of the mortgage, but, by a mere inadvertence, the stipulation was overlooked, in drawing the judgment." The judgment should therefore, in accordance with the alleged stipulation, be modified so that only the interest in the land which the said Richard V. Hayes took as heir at law or devisee of the decedent be included in the foreclosure. We advise that the cause be remanded, with directions to the court below to modify the judgment in accordance with the views above expressed, and that as so modified it be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to modify the judgment in accordance with the views above expressed, and as so modified it is affirmed.

RYAN v. LOS ANGELES ICE & COLD STORAGE CO. (L. A. 22.)

NEGLIGENCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—FELLOW SERVANTS—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for personal injuries it appeared that plaintiff had been employed by defendant as a carpenter, and afterwards as a general laborer, making alterations and repairs. He was not a machinist, nor familiar with machinery. He was ordered by the engineer in charge of a gas generator in defendant's factory to tighten certain bolts in order to stop a leak. It appeared that gas was being generated at the time, though working pressure had not been reached; that while so tightening bolts as ordered, the generator exploded. There was testimony that it needed skill to tighten the bolts safely, so as to keep the strain equal, but none that plaintiff possessed that skill, or that he had any knowledge of the machinery, except what he may have picked up during his employment, or that he had ever done similar work before. Held, that the evidence justified a verdict for plaintiff.

2. In an action for injuries caused by the explosion of a gas generator, where the testimony showed that, in order to stop a leak in the generator, plaintiff, an inexperienced man, was tightening certain bolts; that the work was dangerous, while the generator was under pressure, because of the liability of disturbing the strain by unequal tightening of the bolts; and that while so at work the generator exploded, —the jury were justified in finding that the explosion was caused by the tightening of the bolts by an inexperienced workman.

3. In an action for personal injuries, where it appeared that defendant employed an inexperienced man to do work which was unsafe unless performed by a skilled workman, without cautioning him expressly as to the danger, it was not necessary to show further that defendant should have foreseen that an accident would occur, or even that it would probably occur, in order to hold him liable.

4. Where, in an action for negligence, the court instructed the jury that, if they found by a preponderance of evidence that certain facts existed, they should find for plaintiff, but, if plaintiff failed to prove any of those facts by a preponderance of evidence, then the verdict should be for defendant, and the facts mentioned were within the issue, no reference being made to the evidence as sustaining or tending to sustain any particular fact, such instructions are not in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19, which declares that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact.

5. Plaintiff, while working upon a gas generator in defendant's factory, under the direction of the engineer, was injured by the explosion thereof. It did not appear, except from plaintiff's own testimony, whether the engineer had ordered him to do the work, but it was shown that he saw plaintiff at work, and that the engineer was, in the absence of the general manager, in charge of the machinery, and that at the time of the explosion the manager was absent. Held, that the engineer, having the power of control at the time, was not a fellow servant of plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Patrick F. Ryan against the Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee and Calvin Edgerton, for appellant. E. H. Lamme and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to recover damages for personal injuries, and this appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The injury occurred March 20, 1890. Plaintiff was a carpenter by trade, and some two years prior to the accident was employed by the defendant in that capacity alone, but after the completion of the buildings he was used in making alterations and repairs when necessary, and as a general laborer, roustabout, or handy man. He was not an engineer, or machinist, or familiar with machinery at the time he entered defendant's service, nor afterwards, and prior to the accident, except so far as his general employment may have given opportunity for observation. A new still or generator had been put in place, and was first attempted to be used the day of the accident. This generator consisted of a wrought-iron shell about 2 feet in diameter, and was made in two sections, each about 10 feet long, connected at the center by a cast-iron drum, and each end closed with a heavy cast-iron head, kept in place by iron rods running from end to end on the outside of the shell and through the heads, and secured by nuts on the outside of the heads, by which they could be drawn and secured against the ends of the shell. These heads were rabbeted to the depth of five-eighths of an inch, corresponding to the ends of the shell or cylinder, the groove being nearly filled with lead, so that the ends of the cylinder were drawn partially into the grooves against the lead, the object being to make a tight joint. Within the generator or cylinder were a system of steam pipes, connected with the boiler in the engine room, for the purpose of heating the aqua ammonia with which the generator was filled to about two-thirds of its capacity, the steam not escaping into the generator, but passing through it within the pipes. The ammonia being thus heated produces a gas which fills the remaining space in the generator in the same manner that steam fills the vacant space in a boiler, and the pressure of the gas thus generated increases rapidly as the heat of the ammonia is increased. The steam, being confined within pipes, does not add to the pressure of the gas except as it operates in heating the ammonia. According to Mr. Troutwein, a witness for defendant, the proper working steam pressure is 45 to 50 pounds, and that produces an ammonia pressure of 180 to 235 pounds to the square inch. On the day of the accident the generator had been charged with ammonia for the first time. The steam pressure being used at the time of the accident appears to have been 20 pounds, and the ammonia pressure is variously stated at from 117 to 120 pounds, as shown by the gauge. A working pressure had not yet been reached, but at this stage it was discovered that the generator was leaking at the drum in the center of the generator, and the plaintiff and another employé, who had no more knowledge or experience, were called upon by the engineer, according to plaintiff's testimony, "to get a socket wrench and a bar, and set up on those bolts or nuts and stop that leak," and while they were doing so, or had just ceased work on it, the generator exploded, and the plaintiff was seriously injured. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff, and also answers to certain special issues submitted to them. It is not claimed, however, that the special issues required a different judgment, but it is strenuously insisted that the evidence does not justify the verdict. It would require more space than can be devoted to this opinion to discuss fully and in detail the many points made by counsel for appellant on this branch of the case. The controlling questions only can be noticed.

It is urged that plaintiff's employment was general; that he worked at anything he was called upon to do, and that this included the work of tightening up the nuts on the generator, and that he was not inexperienced in that particular work. Conceding that, in a sense, his employment in course of time became general, the evidence is uncontradicted that he was wholly inexperienced in the operation of machinery, except so far as he may have acquired it during his employment by the defendant; but there is no evidence tending to show that he understood or appreciated the expansive force of steam, or of the gas generated from ammonia, or the principles involved in the construction of generators, or the care required to preserve an equal strain upon all its parts. Whether he had, prior to the time of the accident, assisted in this particular work, is a matter about which the evidence is strongly conflicting; but the jury found upon one of the special issues that "the explosion was caused by allowing inexperienced men to tighten up on the nuts on the bolts with an increasing ammonia pressure." Even if plaintiff had before this been required to tighten such bolts under similar circumstances, the operation being conceded to be dangerous unless skillfully done, his skill and experience would not thereby be necessarily established. These qualifications require something more than knowing how to handle a wrench. He must be able to determine where the pressure is least, and when he has secured an equal pressure upon all the bolts, then, if further tightening is required, he may turn each uniformly a little, so as not to disturb to any appreciable extent the equal pressure secured. If he is simply told to turn each a little, and go round the whole number, he may commence where the bolts are tightest, and thus increase the already unequal pressure, while strictly obeying instructions. Whether the plaintiff had ever tightened the bolts before is disputed. Richards, one of the engineers, says he did not set plaintiff and Richmond at work tightening the bolts, but saw them at work at it. Dempsey, another of the engineers, testified that he did not exactly remember whether he set the men at work at it or not; that he saw them at work at it; that he did not pay any particular attention to how they proceeded. "Of course, they understood how to do it. They had been instructed before. Every man that had ever tightened had always been instructed to turn the nuts first one some and then others, and keep going round and round." It is not clear from defendant's testimony that they received any instructions at that time; and whether the plaintiff had ever received instructions as to the mode of doing the work must depend upon whether he had ever done it before. Plaintiff denied that he had done so while the generator had pressure on. It is clear that he was not an engineer, and was not employed as such. The work was dangerous, and required skill, and should have been performed by the engineers. No man, however skilled and experienced, can tell where the bolts are slack or tight, unless he has hold of the wrench, and therefore cannot tell whether the work is being properly and safely performed, though standing by and directing it; for, though the tension of the rods or bolts may have been equal before heat was applied, it is by no means certain that the expansion of them, when heated, would be equal. Whether the tightening could be done with reasonable safety without first reducing the pressure was strongly controverted in the evidence, but there was no controversy that doing it without reducing the pressure required care and skill.

Appellant also contends that the accident occurred from an unforeseen and unaccountable cause, which cannot with certainty be traced to the negligence of defendant, and that therefore no relief can be granted the plaintiff. In one aspect of the evidence the explosion seems difficult of satisfactory explanation. The generator was manufactured at Carbondale, Pa., and was there tested with water pressure, and also with air pressure, up to 350 pounds to the square inch, and was calculated to sustain a pressure five times greater than the working pressure required of it. The day before the accident, according to the testimony of Engineer Richards, they subjected it to an air pressure of 160 pounds, and according to the testimony of Mr. Hendrick, 130 pounds. Just before the explosion the gauge showed a pressure of 120 pounds, according to Richards. A given number of pounds pressure, whether produced by gas or condensed air, would make no difference in testing the strength of the cylinder or generator, though possibly, if a break occurred, the expansive qualities of the gas might produce more serious results. If, therefore, the generator were in all its parts in the same condition at the time of the accident that it was in the day before when tested with a greater pressure, it would seem impossible that it should have given way. The solution must therefore be found in what was done to the generator at the time of the explosion. All the expert evidence shows that the danger of doing such work while the generator is under pressure lies in disturbing the equality of the strain upon the parts; that is, in making one part sustain more than its just proportion of the pressure; but as to whether it is prudent or reasonably safe to do the work in question while there is a pressure, there is a serious conflict. It is true, as appellant contends, that the mere happening of an accident, the attending circumstances being unknown, is not evidence of negligence on the part of the owner of the machinery or appliance; but in this case, the tightening of the nuts and the explosion concurring in point of time, we are not authorized to say that the jury could not properly infer that the procuring cause of the explosion was the tightening of the nuts. The explosion did occur. A cause—the tightening of the nuts—which might have produced it, if unskillfully done, concurred; while the prior tests to which the generator was subjected would seem to exclude all other supposable causes. It is said, however, that the tightening of the nuts and the explosion did not concur in point of time; that plaintiff and Richmond had completed their work. But this statement is not quite accurate. It is true that, after they had been at work some time in tightening the nuts, they stopped, and stepped aside, to see whether the work they did affected the leak, and that at that moment the explosion occurred. But the fact that they were not at work turning up the nuts at the moment or within a minute or two or three minutes of the explosion does not affect the question. The steam had not been turned off the pipes, nor had the steam pressure reached its working point, so that the heating power of the steam was increasing, and the pressure of the gas generated by the heat was also increasing; but this small increase in the pressure could not have affected the generator had it been in the condition it was in the day before, when it sustained a much greater pressure; and hence this extremely short interval between the suspension of the work and the explosion does not affect the theory adopted by the jury that the explosion was caused by the tightening of the nuts by inexperienced men.

But counsel for appellant, in their very able brief, further contend that, in order to establish negligence upon the part of the defendant, it must not only appear that the explosion was caused by the agencies and in the manner above indicated, but that such result should reasonably have been foreseen by the defendant; "that a party is not to be held responsible for injuries which could not reasonably have been foreseen or expected as a result of his misconduct." There was evidence tending to show that it was unsafe for a skilled engineer or machinist to tighten up these nuts while the pressure was on, though it may be conceded that the preponderance of the evidence was that it could be done by skilled men with reasonable safety; but there was little conflict in the evidence tending to show that it was dangerous for unskilled or inexperienced men to do it. In order to fix the liability of the master, it is not necessary that he should know that injury will inevitably follow, for that would exhibit express malice, or intent to injure; nor that he knew or believed that it would probably occur, for that would be recklessness scarcely less criminal. This court in Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 421, 422, 27 Pac. 306, quoted with approbation the following from Jones v. Mining Co., 66 Wis. 277, 28 N. W. 207: "We think it is now clearly settled that if a master employs a servant to work in a dangerous place, or where the mode of doing the work is dangerous, and apparent to a person of capacity and knowledge of the subject, yet, if the servant employed to do work of such a dangerous character, or in a dangerous place, from youth, inexperience, ignorance, or want of general capacity may fail to appreciate the dangers, it is a breach of duty on the part of the master to expose a servant of such character, even with his own consent, to such dangers, unless he first gives him such instructions or cautions as will enable him to comprehend them, and do his work safely with proper care on his part." The instructions given plaintiff by the engineer have already been considered; but, in addition to what has been said, it may be added that it nowhere appears that he was informed that the work was dangerous, or that his safety in any degree depended upon the manner of doing it, or the care with which it was done.

What has been said covers appellant's first and second points. Its third point is that the verdict is against law; but, if we are right in our conclusions upon the propositions above discussed, this contention cannot be sustained. In support of it, however, appellant calls attention to the special finding No. 8. That question and the answer of the jury thereto are as follows: "Did plaintiff and Richmond tighten on one nut, and then pass to the next, tightening a little on each nut as they went along? If not, what does the proof show in respect to tightening the nuts? State how they tightened. A. Yes, but was ignorant of the manner in which the same should be tightened." What has been said heretofore in reference to these instructions, and the manner in which the work should be done, is sufficient to show the meaning of the answer given by the jury.

It is also claimed by appellant that the first and second instructions given by the court of its own motion, and instructions 1 and 3 given at plaintiff's request, violate that provision of the constitution which declares that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." Article 6, § 19. The objection to these instructions is not well taken. The court instructed the jury that, if they found by a preponderance of the evidence that certain enumerated facts existed, they should find for the plaintiff; but that, if the plaintiff failed to prove any of said facts by a preponderance of the evidence, their verdict should be for defendant. The enumerated facts were within the issues as to which evidence had been given. No reference was made to the evidence as sustaining or tending to sustain any fact.

It is also insisted that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendant. These instructions were to the effect that Richards and Dempsey, the engineers, were fellow servants of the plaintiff; that, if defendant had exercised proper care in selecting them, and the plaintiff was injured through their negligence, they and the plaintiff being engaged in the same general business, the defendant was not liable. The facts did not justify such an instruction. E. E. Hendrick was superintendent and general manager of the corporation defendant. He testified that Richards "was an engineer, and had charge of the refrigerating machine under my direction when I was there, and had sole charge of running the refrigerating machine in my absence, and hired and discharged men under my direction." Mr. Hendrick had been at the works, directing the starting up of the refrigerating machine,—the generator of which exploded,—and was engaged about it until about half an hour before the explosion, when he left, and went up town for some fittings, and did not return until after the explosion. The testimony of Richards and Dempsey, the engineers, was not clear as to which called the plaintiff to do the work, but it is clear that Richards saw him and Richmond doing the work, and did not object; while the plaintiff testified that it was Richards who called them to do the work. Richards, therefore, had the same power to control the men in Hendrick's absence that Hendrick had when he was present.

The remaining instructions requested by defendant are fully covered by the general discussion, and were properly refused, and the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

THOMAS v. PACIFIC BEACH CO. (L. A. 111.)[1]

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. An action by a vendee against the vendor to recover the purchase price paid for land on failure of the vendor to convey as required by the written contract of sale is an action founded upon an instrument in writing, within Code Civ. Proc. § 337, and must be brought within four years.

2. Where the contract of sale requires a conveyance by the vendor "on demand," the statute does not begin to run against an action by the vendee for breach thereof by the vendor until after demand by the vendee for a conveyance.

Action by R. A. Thomas against the Pacific Beach Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McDonald & McDonald, for appellant. Mr. Hunsaker and Henry J. Stevens, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is a special assumpsit upon a contract by which defendant agreed to convey certain land to the plaintiff. The first count of the complaint, which was filed September 24, 1894, avers, in substance, that on the 12th day of December, 1887, in California, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract by the terms of which defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff lot 11 in block 358 of Pacific Beach for $500, with interest on deferred payments at 10 per cent. per annum, payable $167 at date of agreement, $166 and interest June 12, 1888, and $167 and interest December 12, 1888; and defendant further agreed that, "in consideration of plaintiff making such payments, to execute to him upon his demand a grant deed conveying to him the real property above described." The complaint then avers the payment by plaintiff of the sums at the times specified therefor, except that the last payment was made before due, viz. October 10, 1888, and that a discount of 5 per cent. was made on account of such sooner payment. Total amount paid, $512.90. That in September, 1891, plaintiff demanded a deed, which defendant neglected and refused to execute. On the 7th day of October, 1893, plaintiff demanded of defendant the repayment of the sum of $512.90 so paid, and offered to restore defendant everything of value received under the contract, which was refused by defendant. That plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $512.90 and interest from the respective times of payment. There are four other precisely similar counts or causes of action set out in the complaint, except that they arise on a precisely similar agreement to convey lots 12, 13, 14, and 15, in the same block of land. Defendant demurred to the complaint, averring in apt terms, among other things, that plaintiff's causes of action were barred by the provisions of sections 337, 339, 343, Code Civ. Proc. The demurrer was overruled, and thereupon defendant answered, setting up as a defense the bar of the causes of action by said several sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, as in the demurrer. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff upon the said five several causes of action, as prayed for in the complaint, except that interest was allowed only from October 7, 1893, the date when plaintiff demanded repayment. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The only point made on the appeal relates to the bar of the causes of action under the statute of limitations. We need not refer to the findings, for the reason that, while they are full and complete in favor of plaintiff upon the several pleas of the sections, respectively, of the statutes of limitations, the demurrer presents the whole question with equal clearness and perspicuity. The action, as before stated, is special assumpsit upon the written agreement. The contention of appellant is that this is not "an action upon any contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing executed in this state," but is an action of implied assumpsit, upon the defendant's breach of its contract to convey, to recover the purchase money paid; and consequently subject to the bar of subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civ. Proc.; in other words, that the action was barred within two years after the cause of action arose. What we term an implied assumpsit arises in all that class of cases in which money is due from the defendant to the plaintiff ex æquo et bono, and it may be recovered in an action for money had and received. In the large class of cases in which an action for money had and received will lie, no express promise need be averred or proven under our system of practice; but upon proof of the facts showing the duty to devolve upon the defendant to make payment, the law raises the implied promise to pay. The action is most frequently resorted to in actions ex contractu, where no recovery could be had upon the contract actually made, as, for instance, where money has been paid upon contracts void under the statute of frauds, in cases of the rescission of the contract, cases of the payment of money under a mistake of fact, etc. But in the present instance the liability of the defendant is founded upon the instrument in writing pleaded in the complaint, viz. the contract to convey the lots of land. The obligation of defendant is founded directly upon a breach of that contract, not remotely or ultimately, as in Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 131, but immediately, as a necessary sequence of the violation of the contract to convey, upon which plaintiff had paid his money. When defendant, upon payment by plaintiff of the purchase price, refused to convey the land as provided for in its contract, it was guilty of a breach of that contract, for which an action would lie in favor of plaintiff, either for a specific performance of the contract to convey, or in damages for the refusal. In the latter case plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages, under section 3306 of the Civil Code, the price paid, and interest thereon, together with his expenses properly incurred in examining the title, etc. Plaintiff counts upon the violation of the contract, and seeks to recover the price paid and interest. If this is not an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing, etc., within the purview of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would be difficult to name one that is. It follows that plaintiff had, under that section, four years within which to bring the action after the breach occurred.

2. When did plaintiff's cause of action accrue? In an ordinary agreement to convey land upon payment of the purchase price the obligation of the vendor to convey arises upon the payment by the vendee of the agreed price, and no demand of a conveyance is necessary. Chatfield v. Williams, 85 Cal. 518, 24 Pac. 839; Camp v. Morse, 5 Denio, 164. In such a case the statute of limitations begins to run from the date when the vendee was entitled to bring his action, viz. the date of the final payment. But that is not this case. The parties had a right to make such contract as they saw fit. They might have provided that a deed should have been executed and delivered 30 days, or at any other specified time, either before or after the final payment was made. What they did in fact agree upon in writing was, as is averred in the complaint, not denied by the answer, and found by the court, as follows: "And defendant further agreed, in consideration of plaintiff making such payments, to execute to him, upon his demand, a grant deed conveying to him the real property above described." Under this agreement a demand was a condition precedent to the duty of defendant to convey, and until it was made plaintiff's right of action was not complete. Bolles v. Stearns, 11 Cush. 320; Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 15; Rice v. Churchill, 2 Denio, 145. Under the wording of the contract the agreement to convey was not a dependent one, but an independent covenant that in consideration of payment defendant would thereafter, when demand was made, convey the property. The demand for a conveyance was made upon defendant in September, 1891. This demand set the statute of limitations in motion from that date, and, as the action was commenced within four years next thereafter, it was not barred. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

RALSTON et al. v. BANK OF CALIFORNIA. (No. 15,970.)

CONVERSION—REFUSAL OF CORPORATION TO TRANSFER STOCK—DAMAGES.

1. Refusal without right by a corporation to register a transfer of its stock constitutes a conversion thereof.

2. The measure of damages for conversion being declared by Civ. Code, § 3336, to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest, one cannot, in an action for conversion of corporate stock, consisting in the refusal of the corporation to register a transfer thereof, recover, as part of the damages, dividends which had been declared prior to the conversion; recovery of the dividends after demand therefor being a separate cause of action.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by A. J. Ralston and others, trustees, against the Bank of California. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellants. Allen & McAllister, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Defendant is a corporation engaged in the business of banking, and having a capital stock divided into 30,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. One J. Baum owned 60 shares of such stock, and held a certificate therefor which provided that no transfer of the stock described in the certificate would be made upon the books until payment of all indebtedness due to the bank from the person in whose name the stock might stand on such books. In 1881 Baum transferred said certificate, for value, to Peder Sather, who, on September 13, 1886, demanded of the bank the appropriate entry of the transfer on its books. Baum then being in failing circumstances, and indebted to the bank in a sum greatly exceeding the value of the stock, it refused compliance with Sather's demand. Soon afterwards Sather died, and in April, 1888, said shares and certificate were by decree of court distributed to the plaintiffs in trust under the will of said deceased. Meanwhile, on March 10, 1887, the bank sold and transferred to the firm of Greenebaum & Co., at a large discount, the indebtedness held by it against said Baum. On July 3, 1888, plaintiffs produced to the bank the proofs of their ownership of the stock as trustees under Sather's will, and demanded registry of the transfer on the books, which the bank refused unless plaintiffs would pay the balance of its claims against Baum above the amount received from Greenebaum & Co. The stock was then worth $200 per share, and dividends had been declared and had become due thereon since September 13, 1886, amounting to $1,110. Plaintiffs brought this action for the conversion of the stock and such dividends, laying their damages at $13,470. Afterwards, and before the trial, the value of the stock rose to $281 per share. These facts, among others, being found by the court, or admitted by the pleadings, the court held that there had been no conversion by defendant, and rendered judgment in its favor.

It appears from the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, accompanying the findings, that the judgment went upon the ground that, from the nature of corporate shares, there can be no actual conversion thereof; that the fiction of a constructive conversion of such property can be indulged only when, under the rules of law, the owner is entitled to consider himself deprived of the same; and that here the rules of law forbid such result, since the effect would be to vest the bank with the property in its own shares, contrary to the policy of the law. The argument in this court in support of the judgment follows quite similar lines. It is not claimed that defendant had the legal right to refuse plaintiffs' demand for registry of the transfer, its lien having been lost by the sale and transfer to Greenebaum & Co. We are not convinced that there is any fiction in ascribing the term "conversion" to the defendant's refusal; but, however this may be, there is at the present day no difficulty in applying the remedy which was afforded by the common-law action of trover to a case where the owner of corporate shares has been wrongfully deprived thereof, even though his possession of the certificate evidencing his title has not been disturbed. Payne v. Elliott, 54 Cal. 339. See People v. Williams, 60 Cal. 1; Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 405. "It may be stated as a rule," says an eminent author (though he dissents from its principle), "that, where a corporation refuses to allow a transfer of shares upon its books, the assignee may treat this as a conversion of his shares, and sue the company for their value." Mor. Priv. Corp. § 217. Such is the law as declared and enforced in this state. Kimball v. Water Co., 44 Cal. 173; Fromm v. Mining Co., 61 Cal. 629. A suit in equity, where registration of the transfer may be compelled, or damages recovered as an alternative, may be preferable, but it is not exclusive of the remedy invoked in this action. Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 216–221; Cook, Stock & S. §§ 289–292.

The argument that the corporation becomes the owner of the shares converted, and hence that its stock is reduced otherwise than in the manner provided by law (Civ. Code, § 359); and hence, further, that such conversion is legally impossible, because contravening the policy of the law, has no great force. If necessary to save itself from loss, the bank might have contracted for and have received the title to these shares in payment of Baum's debts to it, and the transaction would have been perfectly legal. Ex parte Holmes, 5 Cow. 426. With the same purpose in view, the bank, apparently in good faith and under claim of right, refused the registry, and this had the undesigned effect of converting the shares; and it is not perceived how acquisition of title by this means can, though wrongful as regards the plaintiffs, be more obnoxious to public policy than by contract in the case supposed. The authorized capital is not reduced, for the shares are not extinguished, but may be reissued. Cook, Stock & S. § 314; Mor. Priv. Corp. § 434; Bank v. Wickersham, 99 Cal. 655, 34 Pac. 444. Cases may arise when no conversion by the corporation should affect the status of a stockholder in his relations to creditors of the corporation, but no such consideration is here presented. 2 Thomp. Corp. 2055 et seq.

Baum being indebted to the bank at the time of Sather's demand for entry of the transfer in 1886, the bank's refusal at that time was justified. Jennings v. Bank, 79 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. 852. And there was no conversion until the similar demand on July 3, 1888. Several years elapsed between the commencement of the action and the trial, and there is no finding that the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence. The measure of damages for the conversion of the shares is therefore their value at that time, with interest. Civ. Code, § 3336. But we do not see how appellant can, in this action, recover the dividends prayed for. The theory of the complaint is that respondent, at a certain time, converted the stock. Appellant would therefore be entitled, upon his own averment, to recover the value of the stock at that time, with legal interest thereon since that date. Such is the measure of damages established in this state, except where, under certain circumstances, not existing here, the highest market value at any time between conversion and the verdict may be recovered. Civ. Code, § 3336. And it matters not what the rule may be elsewhere. Now, the value of the stock, as such, is alleged to have been at that date $206 per share, amounting to $12,360; and there is no provision for adding to the measure of damages for property converted, dividends, or other incidents. If, under the circumstances of this case, appellant could recover the dividends, as a separate cause of action, he could do so only after a demand made for the same, which was not averred. Bills v. Mining Co., 106 Cal. 9, 39 Pac. 43, opinions of Beatty, C. J., and Garoutte, J., and cases there cited.

There is no necessity for a new trial. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to render judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $12,360, with interest thereon from July 3, 1888.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment solely on the authority of previous decisions of this court, and particularly Kimball v. Water Co., 44 Cal. 173, and Fromm v. Mining Co., 61 Cal. 629. If the question were an open one, I would hold, with the court below, that the refusal of a corporation to make a transfer on its books of shares of stock from one stockholder to another is not a conversion of such stock by the corporation.

VAUGHAN v. KNOWLTON et al. (No. 19,584.)

SURVEY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to quiet title plaintiff alleged that a half section line was located in a certain place, and claimed title through a deed describing the land by section and subdivision. Defendant, an adjoining owner on the north, asserted that said line was situated south of that place, and south of the actual center of the section. It appeared that the section was not surveyed by the United States, but was within a confirmed Mexican grant. A surveyor, who had made a survey for a former proprietor, testified for plaintiff that at about the center and on the east line of the section he found stakes equidistant from the north line of the section, and that said stakes though different from the others in said section, were such as surveyors used. The line indicated by said stakes was coincident with the half section line claimed by plaintiff. There was no evidence that any other line had been run upon the ground than the one indicated by said stakes, nor that the survey was unauthorized. Held, that it was error to order a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence failed to show that the half-section line was not where plaintiff alleged that it was.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Trespass to try title by Charles Vaughan against William M. Knowlton and others. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. M. Hannah and J. W. Ballard, for appellant. Victor Montgomery, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action to quiet title. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence McChesney's motion for a nonsuit was granted, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment thereon, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The property in controversy is described in the complaint as the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 22, township 4 S., range 10 W., San Bernardino B. and M., containing 10 acres, more or less, and also by metes and bounds. The latter description will be noticed later. None of the defendants answered except McChesney. His answer denies plaintiff's ownership "of a strip of land 35.83 feet wide off the north side of the tract of land described in plaintiff's complaint," admits that he claims said strip, and alleges that he is the owner thereof, and entitled to its possession. He also denies plaintiff's description by metes and bounds, and alleges a different description. In his second defense McChesney describes his own land as the S. ½ of the S. E. ¼ of the S. E. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of the same section, and also describes it by metes and bounds, and alleges the area to be five acres more or less. Defendant's land lies north of and adjoins plaintiff's, and the only dispute is as to the location of the east and west half-section line, which separates the two lots; the defendant contending that it is 35.83 feet south of the line contended for by plaintiff. The true location of that line is the only question at issue between the parties as to which evidence was given. It was stipulated between the parties that both derived title from a common source, and that the deed from Alfred Robinson, trustee, to John J. Weglein, dated April 6, 1874, conveyed a fee simple title to the land described therein, viz. "the north half of the south half of section 22" of said township and range. Some further stipulations were made, which need not be noticed. Plaintiff put in evidence the several mesne conveyances from Robinson down to himself, each of which described plaintiff's land as the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 22, and several of these conveyances also added thereto: "Or known as lot seven of plat showing subdivision of north ½ of south half of section 22, surveyed and sworn to January 10, 1871, by George C. Knox, deputy county surveyor, as per map,"—the contents being stated at 10 acres.

The only witness examined was S. O. Wood, a civil engineer, who made a survey for A. W. Danforth in December, 1889. A plat of the section, made from the notes of said survey, was put in evidence by the plaintiff. Danforth's north line is also the same half-section line which separates plaintiff's and defendant's lots. This section was not surveyed by the United States, it having been within a confirmed Mexican grant. Mr. Wood testified that he found stakes at the southeast, the northeast, and northwest corners of the section. The section lines, measured from north to south, are 5,360.50 feet in length, showing an excess of 80.50 feet. The east and west half-section line shown upon said plat is 4.42 feet south of the actual center of the section. Plaintiff's description of his lot by metes and bounds commences at a point 1,993.5 feet north of the south line of the section (being the claimed southeast corner of his lot), and from that point runs north 682.33 feet to the center line of the section as located upon the plat; thus making said center line 2,675.83 feet from the south line of the section, and 2,684.67 feet from the north line. Defendant, in his description by metes and bounds, takes the same point on the south line of the section from which to measure, and places his south line 2,640 feet therefrom, thus placing the center line of the section 35.83 feet further south than the line contended for by the plaintiff, and 40.65 feet south of the actual center of the section. If, therefore, the evidence was such as to justify a finding that the half-section line is where the plaintiff claims it to be, or is at any place north of the line claimed by the defendant, the nonsuit should have been denied.

The south line of the section is necessarily established by the pleadings and evidence, since the defendant adopts the same line, as is conclusively shown by his admission in his answer that he claims the northerly 35.83 feet described in the plaintiff's complaint, and his measurements set out in his answer show that the south line of the section which he adopts as his starting point is identical with the south line of the section as found by the surveyor and adopted by the plaintiff. This section measures more than a mile north and south, but it is an interior section, and does not touch either the north or west lines of the township, and is therefore not a fractional section. It contains an excess of 9.98 acres, if we assume that it measures just one mile east and west. If no lines had ever been run upon the ground subdividing the section, all the parcels described in the several deeds and in the pleadings would have been capable of exact ascertainment, and hence would have been definite and sufficient; and in that case the evidence would have been quite sufficient to sustain plaintiff's case, since there could have been no conflict in the descriptions in their deeds, and the half-section line, when run, would have fixed the location of each without conflict; and in case the lines had never been run, or in any way established upon the ground, the east and west quarter line must have been run so as to divide the section in two equal parts, and that would have placed the line 4.42 feet north of the line claimed by plaintiff, the effect being to move both parties that much further north. Such, at least, is the requirement as to surveys made by the United States, and when surveys are extended over confirmed Mexican grants the intention is that they shall conform as nearly as possible to the government surveys. Section 2396 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that "the corners of half and quarter sections, not marked on the surveys, shall be placed as nearly as possible equi-distant from those two corners which stand on the same line." But where the subdivision line has been run and marked upon the ground, and can be identified, it must be adhered to. Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 697, 9 Sup. Ct. 203. If, then, there was no original subdivision of the section upon the ground, the claim of the plaintiff must have been sustained. There was evidence, however, tending to show that a survey had been made, not only of the exterior lines of the section, but of the half-section line in dispute. Not only was mention made of a map of a survey of the north half of the south half of the section (which was not put in evidence), but Mr. Wood testified that at the center of the section he found a stake (marked upon the plat put in evidence as "St. B., Old Stake"); and on the east line of the section he also found an old stake, marked upon the plat "Old Stake, St. C." These stakes are at the same distance from the south line of the section, viz. 2,675.83 feet, and also the same distance from the north line of the section, viz. 2,684.67 feet. He said the stake at B. was not a stake such as is usually set by the land company, and took particular pains to look around, and that there were no other stakes there. He then went to the northeast corner of the section, and found a surveyor's stake, "what is termed the 'Capt. Healey stake.'" The witness then followed down the east line of the section, and found one of the land company's stakes at the southeast corner of the section. His testimony as to his measurement on that line is somewhat confused, partly because once he referred to "this point" (pointing to map) without further designation of it, and in another place the word "to" is used, when it is evident the word "from" should have been used. But, read in connection with the plat, it is readily understood, though the distance from the northeast corner of the section down to the east and west line, which subdivides the north half of the section, is not given except upon the map. The distances covering the Danforth land, the Polhemus land, and from the latter to the southeast corner of the section, are readily understood, and correspond with the distances already stated and shown on the map. Then the witness went back to the northeast corner of the section, and measured west 2,640 feet (one-half mile), and found "a little stake set there by the land company." From that point he turned, "and ran down 1,320 feet south, and found a stake there,—what is known as the 'land company's stake'; from there I measured down and found this stake again which was found at station B, 1,364.67 feet, I found what corresponded to my measurement, and we then concluded it was the center of the section," though he said it did not "correspond exactly with the general outlines of the company, nor did it correspond exactly with the United States survey, because it is a rule of the United States survey that the posts shall be placed in the center of the section, and they were not, although very nearly in the center; and, these lines being parallel, and having this line at station B, I produced this line here, and turned my angle, and gave that as the line." The witness also gave the distance from B to the north and south lines of the section, as before stated. The stakes at B and C were similar, though different from the other stakes in that section. But this difference in the stakes strengthens, rather than weakens, the evidence tending to establish that line. The stakes at the corners of the section were recognized as Capt. Healey's stakes; but in some of the deeds in plaintiff's chain of title reference is made to a subdivision of the N. ½ of the S. ½ of the section by George C. Knox, deputy county surveyor, in 1871, and to this survey may be referred the old stakes B and C, which are different from Capt. Healey's stakes. At the time of this survey by the witness, in 1889, he and Mr. Danforth set a stake made from a railroad tie beside the old stake at B, and said: "I didn't allow the stake to be disturbed, because that was evidently a former stake." In March, 1894, the witness was at this point B again, and found the old stake gone, and the stake he had put beside it lay over on the ground, but right south of it, a distance of 34.13 feet was found one of the land company's stakes. "That was not there at the time I made the survey in 1889; that had been set subsequent to that time." The witness said he did not look for any stake between B and C; that he found no stake on the lines south of B in 1889; that the stake found south of B in 1894 "would correspond very closely to the map of the surveys which the Stearns Rancho Company claim, to the land company's subdivision."

The only ground of defendant's motion for nonsuit necessary to be noticed is that "the evidence fails to establish that the land described in the complaint is located in the south half of section 22." The motion for a nonsuit should have been denied. The stakes at B and C, though distinguishable from the land company's stakes, were such as surveyors use. The one at B was "centered with a nail." Both were precisely parallel to the north and south lines of the section, a circumstance that could not be reasonably accounted for upon any theory other than that they marked a survey. It must also be assumed as clearly proven that the stake found in 1894 was a recent one, and had no existence in 1889. No other stake is shown to correspond to it either to the east or west. There being no evidence tending to show that any different line had ever been run upon the ground than the one indicated by the old stakes found at B and C, and that line being approximately in the center of the section, it should be taken, in the absence of all other evidence, as the half-section line. There was no evidence of a different line ever having been run upon the ground, and, if the evidence was insufficient to show that any line had been run, the law would fix the line at the center of the section where it should have been. If it can be shown that the line was actually run at a different place from that indicated by the stakes found by the witness, and that place can be identified, such line must prevail. If it cannot, the line B C must prevail, unless it is shown to have been unauthorized; and, if no authorized survey can be established, the actual center of the section must be taken as the line. It is true, there was no direct evidence that the line contended for by plaintiff was an authorized survey; but the fact of its close correspondence to the actual center line of the section, and the presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the line, if run, was so run as to divide the section in two equal parts, is sufficient to require a reversal of the judgment. We come to this conclusion with the less hesitation because the question of boundaries of land are important, and should be fairly and finally settled and fixed, to the end that further disputes and litigation shall be avoided. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

MERRIAM v. BACHIONI et al. (L. A. 73.)

PUBLIC LANDS—CONTENDING CLAIMANTS—JUDGMENT OF STATE COURT—RES JUDICATA.

1. In an action in a state court for the possession of public land prior to the issue of a patent, on the ground that defendant in possession was an alien born, and had not declared her intention to become a citizen prior to her filing, the judgment did not conclude the action of the land office on the question of defendant's alienage and the claimant's rights to enter land, nor control the title evidenced by the patent subsequently issued.

2. After the filing of a pre-emption and the performance of those conditions necessary to perfect the claim, a subsequent homestead applicant cannot, by entry and fulfillment of the requirements of the law, obtain an equitable title against the pre-emptor.

Action by Frank B. Merriam against Maria Poggi Bachioni and Louis Bachioni to compel defendants to convey the legal title to lands to him as beneficiary of a constructive trust. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rippey & Nutt, for appellant. J. W. Hughes and S. S. Knoles, for respondents.

BRITT, C. On May 21, 1887, defendant Maria Poggi, now the wife of said Louis Bachioni, resided on a tract of public land in San Diego county, and on May 30th following she filed her declaratory statement in the local land office of the United States, claiming the right of pre-emption as to such land. On said May 21st the plaintiff, Merriam, filed in the same office his application to enter the land as a homestead under the federal laws relating to entries of that character, and obtained the usual receiver's duplicate receipt. In November, 1887, he entered into possession of the greater part of the land. The contest thus arising over the right to acquire title from the government was prosecuted to a final decision of the general land office in favor of said Maria, rendered in May, 1894. Merriam's homestead entry was rejected on the ground that the land was covered by her pre-emption entry, and accordingly the patent of the United States for the land was issued to her in August, 1894. In the year 1889, and while such contest was pending before the land department, Merriam brought an action against Maria Poggi in the superior court of said county, alleging in his complaint the circumstances of his homestead entry and possession thereunder; that she claimed the land in virtue of her pre-emption filing; that she was alien born, and had not declared her intention to become a citizen prior to her said filing, and that she was in possession of parts of the land in hostility to him. She resisted such action, but the court found the facts to be as alleged by Merriam, and gave judgment in his favor for the possession of the whole tract in dispute. This was in March, 1890. Shortly afterwards she was ejected from the land by the sheriff under such judgment, and Merriam has ever since had possession thereof. After the patent was issued, he instituted the present action to compel the Bachionis to convey the legal title to him, claiming that the effect of the patent to said Maria was to make her his trustee. It is not now alleged that she was incompetent, by reason of alienage or otherwise, to exercise the right of pre-emption, except in so far as that question was determined by said judgment of the superior court. The court below held that his complaint, which discloses the matters above stated, among others, does not state a cause of action, and rendered judgment dismissing his suit.

Plaintiff argues, first, that by fulfilling the requirements of the law concerning his homestead application he obtained an equitable title which the officers of the land department were bound to protect. But, conceding that such performance on his part is alleged in the complaint, yet it appears that the pre-emption of defendant Maria had its inception by her settlement on the land previous to his homestead entry, and the patent is evidence that she performed those things necessary to perfect her claim as a pre-emptor. Railroad Co. v. Purcell, 77 Cal. 69, 18 Pac. 886. Of course, as against such prior right, his performance of the conditions prescribed for acquiring title in the manner attempted by him was unavailing. Plummer v. Brown, 70 Cal. 544, 12 Pac. 464; Young v. Shinn, 48 Cal. 26. There are certain allegations of the complaint from which the inference may be drawn that Maria Poggi's notice of intention to make final proof in support of her entry, as provided by the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. 472), was defective in some particulars; but it is not shown that this circumstance was material in the controversy, or that Merriam had not actual notice of her intention to "prove up," or that the final decision of the land department was rendered in ignorance of the facts, or through any mistake of law in that behalf. The matter is not mentioned in the brief for the plaintiff here, and we allude to it only to show that it has not been overlooked.

Appellant's next point is that the judgment obtained by him in the superior court, pursuant to which Maria Poggi was ousted from the land, operates now as an estoppel against her, and causes the patent to inure to his benefit. This sounds like strange doctrine. If it be true, then the courts of the state may become the tribunals for determining all conflicting claims to the public lands, to the entire supersession of that established by congress for the purpose,—the land office of the United States. The state courts may, for some purposes, deal with the possession of public land prior to the issue of the patent, but they have no authority to give a judgment "in advance of the action of the government which would render its patents a nullity when issued. * * * It is impossible thus to transfer a title which is yet in the United States." Marquez v. Frisbie, 101 U. S. 475. The authorities to support the proposition that a court of ordinary jurisdiction cannot, by its judgment between contending claimants of the right to enter a tract of public land, forestall the action of the land department of the general government in such contest are well collected in Forbes v. Driscoll, 4 Dak. 336, 31 N. W. 633, and Adams v. Couch (Okl.) 26 Pac. 1010; and we have no doubt, whatever may have been the lawful effect of the former judgment on the mere possessory right of the parties, if it had any at all, that it yet could not conclude the action of the land office on the question of the defendant's alienage, and cannot operate to control the title evidenced by the patent subsequently issued. See Thrift v. Delaney, 69 Cal. 188, 10 Pac. 475, and cases cited. Appellant lays stress on Shinn v. Young, 57 Cal. 525, but there the parties claimed under different sources of title, and the controversy was primarily whether title had passed from the United States. Thrift v. Delaney, 69 Cal. 194, 10 Pac. 475. That it had so passed to one of the litigating parties being once adjudged, the determination was held conclusive on them in a subsequent action; while here the prior judgment, as construed by plaintiff, related to the right to obtain title still in the United States, which, as shown, was not then within the competence of the court to decide. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

O'CONOR v. CLARKE et al. (L. A. 11.)

BILLS — PARTIES — TRANSFER — FINDINGS — NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION.

1. A person writing his name on a bill before maturity, to enable the drawer to whose order it was drawn to negotiate the same, is liable as an indorser.

2. A bill drawn payable to the drawer's order, and indorsed by him in blank, before maturity, is transferable by delivery merely.

3. An indorsee of a note takes the same subject only to such defenses as would have been good against his indorser.

4. A finding that all the allegations in the complaint not specifically found on are true, and the allegations in defendant's answer not specifically found on are untrue, does not require a reversal, where it appears that specific findings, on the allegations not directly found upon, would have necessarily been adverse to appellant.

5. The refusal of a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence will only be reversed for abuse of discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Andrew J. O'Conor, receiver of the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, against W. H. Clarke and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Frank A. Kimball appeals. Affirmed.

Works & Works, for appellant. Jas. E. Wadham, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action upon a bill of exchange, and the material facts of the case are as follows: On August 12, 1890, Livingston, Clarke & Co. drew the said bill of exchange on the Pacific Hardware Company, payable to their own order 90 days after date; and on the 27th day of that month the same was accepted by the drawee, "payable at office Sather Banking Company, San Francisco, Calif." Thereafter, and before the maturity thereof, the defendants W. H. Clarke, Frank A. Kimball, Sidney Selover, and J. B. Livingston indorsed the said bill of exchange, to enable the drawers to negotiate the same and obtain money thereon; and thereupon Livingston, Clarke & Co. indorsed the said bill, and sold, assigned, and transferred the same to the Sather Banking Company. On November 8, 1890, the indorsers, Clarke, Kimball, Selover, and Livingston, by an instrument in writing, signed by them, waived demand, protest, and notice of protest of and upon the said bill of exchange; and thereafter, in January, 1891, the same was for value sold, assigned, and delivered by the Sather Banking Company to the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, which has ever since been the owner and holder thereof. Interest on the said bill of exchange was paid by the Pacific Hardware Company up to March 10, 1893, but no other payments of principal or interest have ever been made. On November 16, 1893, the plaintiff, as duly appointed and qualified receiver of the Consolidated National Bank, commenced this action against the drawers, drawee, and four indorsers of the said bill of exchange, to recover the principal and interest still due and unpaid on the same. All of the defendants were duly served with summons, but only the defendant Kimball appeared to contest the plaintiff's right to recover. He demurred to the complaint, and, his demurrer being overruled, answered, setting up several separate defenses to the action. At the commencement of the trial, the plaintiff moved the court to dismiss the action as to the defendants Livingston, Clarke & Co., and as to Livingston and Clarke individually; and the motion was granted, against the objection of defendant Kimball. And, at the conclusion of the trial, the court found upon all the issues raised in favor of the plaintiff, and gave judgment against the defendants the Pacific Hardware Company, Sidney Selover, and Frank A. Kimball, for the full amount due on the said bill of exchange. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant Kimball appeals.

1. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The pleading stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and there was no uncertainty in any of the particulars pointed out which would authorize a reversal.

2. We see no material error in any of the rulings complained of. The appellant wrote his name on the back of the instrument before its maturity, and before it was sold and delivered to the Sather Banking Company, to enable the drawers to negotiate it and obtain money thereon. He was therefore an indorser, and liable as such. Civ. Code, §§ 3108, 3117; Fisk v. Miller, 63 Cal. 367. The payees indorsed the instrument in blank before maturity, and transferred it to the banking company for value. It was thereafter payable to bearer, and transferable by mere delivery.

Counsel sought to prove that appellant had been released from his obligation as an indorser for various reasons, but none of the offered and rejected evidence would have affected that result. It is sufficient, therefore, to say, without detailing the evidence, that it was irrelevant and immaterial, and was properly excluded.

3. The court found that there was no change made in the terms of the said draft, and that there was no contract, understanding, agreement, or intention to change or alter the same. This finding is assailed as not justified by the evidence. But there was evidence—and it would seem a preponderance of it—clearly tending to support the finding; and the judgment cannot therefore be reversed on this ground.

4. Following the specific findings, there is a general finding to the effect that all allegations in the complaint "not specially found on are true," and all allegations in defendant's answer "not specially found on are untrue." This finding is also assailed as "a sort of blanket finding," and not justified by the evidence. It is urged that one of the allegations of the complaint is that appellant indorsed the bill "for a valuable consideration"; that this allegation is denied by the answer; and that the plaintiff offered no evidence in support of it. But the court had already found that appellant indorsed the bill before maturity, and to enable Livingston, Clarke & Co. to negotiate it. The correctness of this finding is not questioned, and, if the indorsement was made as stated, it imposed a binding obligation, and no further evidence as to the consideration therefor was necessary.

It is further urged that defendant alleged in his answer that he signed the paper at the solicitation of the drawers thereof, and upon their representation that the draft would be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the cargo of mahogany mentioned in the instrument, and that he proved the allegation, and plaintiff offered no evidence on the subject. Conceding this to be so, still the facts alleged, if found to be true, would constitute no defense as against the plaintiff. The Sather Banking Company purchased the draft in good faith and for value before maturity, and it therefore took it free from all equities and defenses which may have existed between the original parties to it. And the Consolidated National Bank took the same title that its transferror had, and subject only to such defenses as would have been good against the transferror.

The finding complained of, though a "blanket finding," must be sustained, the rule being that "where the findings made dispose of the issues sufficiently to support the judgment, and make it clear that, if more specific findings had been made, they must necessarily have been adverse to appellant, the judgment cannot be reversed for failure to find specifically upon each issue." Hulsman v. Todd, 96 Cal. 228, 31 Pac. 39.

5. One of the grounds on which the motion for new trial was made was newly-discovered evidence. In support of the motion, counsel for appellant read certain affidavits; but all the material facts stated in them were squarely contradicted by counter affidavits read for respondent. The granting of a new trial upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence is a matter which rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and its exercise will not be disturbed on appeal except in case of abuse clearly shown by the record. O'Rourke v, Vennekohl, 104 Cal. 254, 37 Pac. 930; Harralson v. Barrett, 99 Cal. 607, 34 Pac. 342; People v. Urquidas, 96 Cal. 239, 31 Pac. 52. In this case no abuse of discretion which would justify a reversal is shown.

It follows that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

EICH v. GREELY et al. (Sac. 1.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—ANSWER—IMMATERIAL AVERMENTS—STRIKING—DEMURRER.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 453, authorizing the striking of immaterial averments, an averment that the transfer of a note by the payee after maturity was fraudulent as to the makers is properly stricken from the answer in an action by the indorsee against the makers, where the answer admits the note and an amount due thereon exceeding the demand of the makers against the payee set up as a counterclaim.

2. A demurrer to the entire answer in an action on a note is improperly sustained, where a payment on the note is sufficiently pleaded, though the plea of the same payment as a counterclaim is fatally defective.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; E. A. Davis, Judge.

Action by John H. Eich against Justus Greely and J. R. Garrett on a note. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. G. Murphy, for appellants. McDaniel & Folsom, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action by the plaintiff as indorsee of a negotiable promissory note made by defendants, who are appellants here, for $3,000 and interest at 10 per cent. per annum from date of note, viz. July 7, 1893. The note fell due November 1, 1893. The complaint is in the usual form upon a promissory note. An answer was filed by defendants, to which plaintiff demurred, and also moved to strike out portions thereof. The motion to strike out was granted, and the demurrer sustained. Defendants declining to amend their answer, their default was entered, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in consonance with the prayer of his complaint. The appeal is from the final judgment, and the sufficiency or the answer as against the demurrer thereto, and the motion to strike out, are the only questions involved in the appeal.

We epitomize in part and quote the residue of the answer, as follows: (1) Defendants admit the making of the note to John Eich as payee. (2) Aver that it was indorsed after maturity. (3) Deny there was any consideration for the note beyond $2,000. (4) "The defendants aver that the payee of said note, John Eich, is and was, before the indorsement of said note, indebted to the defendants for and on account of said note, and the consideration thereof, and as an offset thereto, in the sum of $1,000, for money paid, laid out, and expended for and on account of said John Eich, payee of said note, by defendants, at his special instance and request, for labor done and performed for said John Eich while he was the owner and holder of said note, and before the same became due, and which sum of $1,000 was and is an offset and payment on account of said note; that the said John Eich has not paid the same, though demand has been made on him therefor." (5) Aver that they paid on account of said note $1,000 before the transfer thereof to plaintiff, of which said plaintiff had notice before he received the note. (6) The transfer to plaintiff was without consideration, and was made with the fraudulent intent on the part of the payee and plaintiff of defrauding the defendants out of said sum of $1,000. (7) The plaintiff is the son of John Eich, payee of said note. The following is the portion of the answer stricken out by the court: "That, for the further purpose of defrauding the defendants out of said sum of $1,000, the said John Eich has transferred all his other property to his daughters and the said son, the plaintiff, John H. Eich; that said John H. Eich, the plaintiff, was and is a party to all of said fraudulent transfers and transactions, was well aware of the fraudulent intent which induced said transfers,—all of which were done by said John Eich and the plaintiff with intent to defraud the defendants out of said $1,000; that said John Eich is now insolvent, by reason of said fraudulent transfers of his property, and is unable to respond in said sum of $1,000, and, unless the same be credited on said note, defendants will lose the same." We think the motion to strike out was properly granted.

1. The answer admitted the making of the note, and, on the showing of defendants themselves, there was an amount due thereon at least sufficient to cover all their cross demands. This being so, it was entirely immaterial to them, or to their case, whether or not plaintiff and the payee of the note had procured a fraudulent transfer of all or any part of the property of the latter. It was an irrelevant matter, having no office to fill, and hence no proper place in the pleading, and was therefore properly stricken out, under section 453 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. We are of opinion the demurrer was improperly sustained. It was to the whole answer. That portion of it constituting a counterclaim was fatally defective, and liable to all the objections urged against it by the demurrer, for the reason that it mingles together in one cause of action sundry causes which might have been severally pleaded under the practice permitting the common counts to be pleaded. Under the Hilary rules of the English courts, all of the common counts could be united in a single count, but such a practice is not permitted under our Code; and the result of the effort so to do, in the present case, leaves the pleading ambiguous, unintelligible and uncertain. Still, the plea of payment of $1,000 on the note before its indorsement to plaintiff, with notice thereof to the latter, coupled with the denial that it was indorsed before maturity, and the allegation that the transfer of the note was without consideration, constituted, pro tanto, a valid defense to the action. We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to the defendants to amend their answer if they shall be so advised.

SIMPSON v. FERGUSON. (No. 19,476.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—GROWING CROPS—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR IN.

1. Civ. Code, § 2955 et seq., providing the manner of mortgaging growing crops, is intended to be exclusive of other modes, and is a declaration of legislative intent that such property shall be regarded as a chattel.

2. While growing crops are sometimes, and for some purposes, a part of the realty, as between a mortgagor of the land and the mortgagee the mortgagor is the owner of the crops growing thereon, free from any lien of the mortgagee, and with full power to dispose of or mortgage the same, until he is divested of possession of the land by foreclosure proceedings, either by a receiver, or under final decree.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Simpson against Ferguson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

G. A. Skinner, for appellant. E. B. Stanton, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Upon consideration of this cause in bank, after a more full and thorough presentation thereof than was had in department, we are still satisfied that the conclusion reached by the department was correct, and should be adhered to.

It is urged that section 2955 and following of the Civil Code, providing for the manner of mortgaging growing crops, do not establish an exclusive method; that as this class of property may under some conditions be regarded as realty, and under other conditions as personalty, it must follow that under corresponding conditions the property may be the subject of a real-estate mortgage, or a chattel mortgage, according to the circumstances; and that plaintiff having a valid mortgage upon the land, with its rents, issues, and profits, this gives him a valid lien upon the growing crops, as effectually, to the same extent, for all purposes, as if executed with the formalities required in the case of a crop mortgage. We are unable to coincide in this view In the first place, we think it quite manifest, from the provisions of the Code in question, that the legislature intended thereby to provide an exclusive mode for the mortgaging of growing crops, and intended to declare that for such purposes this species of property shall be regarded as a chattel. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that it was not intended to cover every case of a mortgage given upon that class of property. In the second place, while it is perfectly true that growing crops may be either personal or real property, according to circumstances, and while, as suggested by respondent, a mortgage of the land gives a lien upon everything that would pass by a grant of the land, which includes crops growing thereon, it is nevertheless well established that such lien, so far as the growing crops are concerned, is limited in its effect to the crops growing upon and unsevered from the land at the time of foreclosure. It does not vest the mortgagee with a right to the crops grown intermediate the giving of the mortgage and the foreclosure thereof. Until the latter event, where, as in this state, the mortgage creates no estate in the mortgagee, but confers only a lien upon the property, the mortgagor is entitled to such crops, with the same absolute right and dominion over them as if the mortgage did not exist. This doctrine is thoroughly well settled, with no considerable diversity upon the subject among text writers or the courts. The general rule is well stated in Mr. Jones' work on Mortgages (5th Ed.) § 670, where it is said: "So long as the mortgagor is allowed to remain in possession, he is entitled to receive and apply to his own use the income and profits of the mortgaged estate. His contract is to pay interest, and not rent. Although the mortgagee may have the right to take possession upon a breach of the condition, if he does not exercise this right he cannot claim the profits. Upon a bill in equity to obtain foreclosure and sale, he may, in proper cases, apply for the appointment of a receiver to take for his benefit the earnings of the property. He is then confined to the rents and profits accruing during the pendency of the suit. If he neglects to apply for a receiver, the final decree, if silent upon this subject, does not affect the mortgagor's possession or right to the earnings in the meantime. It is only after sale under the decree, except where statutes provide otherwise, that the mortgagor is wholly divested of title, and consequently of right to possession. Unless restrained by the terms of the mortgage, the mortgagor in possession may work mines or quarries upon the mortgaged property, and whatever he severs from the realty becomes unincumbered personalty, and his own property. Even if the rents and profits of the mortgaged property are expressly pledged for the security of the mortgage debt, with the right in the mortgagee to take possession upon default, the mortgagee is not entitled to the rents and profits until he takes actual possession, or until possession is taken in his behalf by a receiver." In Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 4 Sup. Ct. 420, the authorities upon this subject are exhaustively reviewed, and it is there held (quoting from the syllabus): "A conveyance to a trustee, absolute on its face, but with an instrument of defeasance showing that it is to secure payment of a debt due to a third party, is a mortgage, and is subject to the rule that a mortgagee is not entitled to the rents and profits until he acquires actual possession. The rule that the mortgagee is not entitled to the rents and profits before actual possession applies even when the mortgagor covenants in the mortgage to surrender the mortgaged property on default in payment of the debt, and nevertheless refuses to deliver it after default, and drives the trustee to his action to enforce the trust." In that case the court, stating the doctrine as laid down in Gilman v. Telegraph Co., 91 U. S. 603, say: "It was declared by this court that where a railroad company executed a mortgage to trustees on its property and franchise, 'together with the tolls, rents, and profits to be had, gained or levied thereupon,' to secure the payment of bonds issued by it, the trustees in behalf of the creditors were not entitled to the tolls and profits of the road, even after condition broken and the filing of a bill to foreclose the mortgage, they not having taken possession or had a receiver appointed." Chancellor Kent states the rule thus: "The mortgagor has a right to lease, sell, and in every respect to deal with the mortgaged premises as owner, so long as he is permitted to remain in possession, and so long as it is understood and held that every person taking under him takes subject to all the rights of the mortgagee, unimpaired and unaffected. Nor is he liable for rents, and the mortgagee must recover possession by regular entry by suit, before he can treat the mortgagor, or the person holding under him, as a trespasser." 4 Kent, Comm. 157. In the case of Sexton v. Breese (N. Y. App.) 32 N. E. 133, where the mortgagor of the land, subsequent to the giving of the mortgage, but before it was due, sold a growing crop of wheat raised on the land, and, subsequently to such sale, delivered possession of the land to the mortgagee thereof, it was held that the vendee of the crop was entitled to the same, as against the mortgagee, and it is said: "If we assume that the plaintiff was in possession of the land as by an actual surrender from the mortgagor, his rights in its use were subject to the previous disposition made of the growing crop of grain by the owner of the land. He had planted the crop, and it was perfectly competent for him to dispose of it while he held the title to the land. Though, in a sense, a growing crop of grain is a part of the real estate, it nevertheless possesses the characteristics of a chattel, and is salable and transferable as other personal property is, and may be taken upon execution, and sold in discharge of a judgment debt." In West v. Conant, 100 Cal. 231, 34 Pac. 705, where the mortgagor remained in possession of the mortgaged land after the foreclosure sale, and received all the rents, issues, and profits therefrom, it was held that he was entitled to hold such premises until the expiration of the period of redemption, and that the purchaser at the sale was not entitled to a receiver to take possession of crops of hay and grain growing upon the land intermediate the sale and the expiration of the equity of redemption. In the recent case of Freeman v. Campbell, 42 Pac. 35, decided by this court, where the conveyance from Anderson, plaintiff's intestate, to defendant, was held to be a mortgage, and where defendant had taken possession of the land and received the rents thereof, it was held that the administrator of Anderson, the mortgagor, was entitled to recover the amount of the rents received by Campbell as money had and received, belonging to the estate, and it is there said: "The claim that the mortgage included the rents, as well as the land, does not aid the appellant, as under section 2927, Civ. Code, he had no right to the possession of the mortgaged security. His right to the rents was no greater than that to the land. A mortgage is a contract by which specific property is hypothecated (Civ. Code, § 2920), but such contract is independent of the fact of possession, and does not of itself confer the right of possession. If a receiver had been appointed to take possession of the mortgaged premises, the authority of that officer would have included the right to take possession of the rents, as well as the land, and the rents would then have been in the custody of the court, and subject to its direction; but, in the absence of some intervention by the court, the mortgagor has the right to these rents, even though they are included in the instrument of mortgage, and the mortgagee's right to them is limited to their disposition by the court in the judgment, or subsequent thereto." From the principles here declared, it follows that the mortgagor being in possession of the land, and entitled as of right to the crops grown thereon, it was competent for him to sell or mortgage, or otherwise dispose of, them, and convey good title thereto, as against the mortgagee of the land or his assigns, at any time prior to the foreclosure of the latter's mortgage.

It is claimed by respondent that the cases of Montgomery v. Merrill, 65 Cal. 432, 4 Pac. 414, and Treat v. Dorman, 100 Cal. 623, 35 Pac. 86, are in conflict with the doctrine that growing crops can only be mortgaged with the formalities prescribed for the execution of chattel mortgages. But we do not so regard them. In Montgomery v. Merrill no question, as between a mortgagee or vendee of the crop and the mortgagee of the land, arose. In the foreclosure proceedings a receiver was appointed, who took possession of the mortgaged premises and the growing crops thereon. Upon a sale of the land, it brought less than the amount of the mortgage; and it was held that the mortgage was a lien upon the crop then growing upon the premises, and that the proceeds of its sale should be applied to the payment of the deficiency. There is nothing in this inconsistent with what has been said above. The rights of the mortgagor and mortgagee of the land alone were involved. The crop being in the hands of the receiver, and not having been prior thereto sold or disposed of by the owner of the land, the case falls strictly within the limitation of the rule as above stated. In Treat v. Dorman the mortgagee of the crop was made a defendant in an action to foreclose a prior mortgage on the land. In its answer it made no claim of priority over the mortgage on the land, but prayed, in terms, that if any surplus remained from a sale of the crop, "after payment of any deficiency due the plaintiff" (the mortgagee of the land), that such surplus be applied in satisfaction of its chattel mortgage, thus conceding the priority of the real-estate mortgage. The decree gave appellant everything it asked, and the disposition of the case in this court would seem to have been largely influenced by that consideration, the court remarking, "It is not often that a party appeals from a judgment granting him all that he asks, and yet in this case just that thing has happened." The party's subsequent claim on the appeal to a priority of lien on the crop, and to a right to a different judgment, does not appear to have received very favorable or careful consideration, but apparently the case went off largely upon the theory that it had received all it asked in the court below. In what is said as to the respective rights of the two mortgagees, the court does not seem to have had in mind the provisions of the Civil Code here invoked, since no mention is made of them; and, while there are some expressions by the learned commissioner looking in favor of the contention now advanced by respondent, we do not regard them, in view of the record upon which the court was passing, as essential to the conclusion reached, or as binding authority. For these reasons, and what is said in the opinion of the department, we think the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to modify it in accordance with the motion of appellant. It is so ordered.

SHOOBERT et al. v. DE MOTTA. (Sac. 18.)[1]

MORTGAGE ON ANIMALS—INCREASE—RIGHT OF MORTGAGEE.

The mortgagee of sheep is not entitled to a lien on their increase, begotten after the execution of the mortgage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county.

Action by Shoobert and others against De Motta to recover possession of certain lambs. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dixon & Phillips, for appellants. Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. June 22, 1893, one Cascalia executed a mortgage to the plaintiffs' assignor upon a band of sheep which were then in Kings county, consisting of 1,700 ewes and 1,050 lambs. The sheep were afterwards removed to Tulare county, and in August, 1893, while they were in Tulare county, bucks were put with the ewes, and during the months of January and February, 1894, there were born, as the offspring of the ewes, 1,300 lambs. The court finds that the period of gestation in the case of sheep is about five months. April 18, 1894, Cascalia, in consideration of an indebtedness from him to the defendant, executed to the defendant a bill of sale of these 1,300 lambs; and on the 21st of April the lambs were delivered to the defendant, and taken away by him. The plaintiffs brought the present action to recover the possession of the lambs or their value. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

It has been held in some states that the lien of a mortgage of domestic animals extends to the increase of the animals during the life of the mortgage, whether the terms of the mortgage include such increase or not; and, following these decisions, such a rule is stated in text-books upon chattel mortgages. It will be found, however, upon examination of these cases, that the decisions therein are based upon the principle of the common law, which was in force in those states, that, by the mortgage, the mortgagee is vested with the title to the mortgaged property, and becomes the owner thereof; and that in the case of domestic animals, applying another rule of both the common and the civil law, that "the brood belongs to the owner of the dam or mother, partus sequitur ventrem" (2 Bl. Comm. 390), he thereby becomes the owner of such increase; and, being the owner, his title in any action at law must prevail. The earliest application of this rule was in the case of a mortgage of a female slave,—Hughes v. Graves, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 317,—which was decided in Kentucky in 1822, and was afterwards followed in Maryland in 1836, in the case of Evans v. Merriken, 8 Gill & J. 39, which also involved the offspring of a female slave that had been mortgaged; and these cases are cited as the authority upon which cases involving the same question have been decided in other states, in some instances referring also to the principle upon which the rule rests, and in others merely referring to the cases as an authority. Cahoon v. Miers, 67 Md. 573, 11 Atl. 278; Gundy v. Biteler, 6 Ill. App. 510; Ellis v. Reaves, 94 Tenn. 210, 28 S. W. 1098. The rule has also been stated in many other cases in which the question was neither involved nor decided. Kellogg v. Lovely, 46 Mich. 131, 8 N. W. 699; McCarty v. Blevins, 5 Yerg. 195; Gans v. Williams, 62 Ala. 41. And there is still another line of decisions in which it has been sought to uphold the propriety of the rule by holding that the increase which was in gestation at the execution of the mortgage was inferentially included therein, as a part of the mortgaged property. Funk v. Paul, 64 Wis. 35, 24 N. W. 419; Rogers v. Highland, 69 Iowa, 504, 29 N. W. 429; Edmonston v. Wilson, 49 Mo. App. 491. Another line of decisions limits this application of the rule, by holding that the increase is subject to the lien of the mortgage only for so long a time as the young are in a state of nurture from the mother. Rogers v. Gage, 59 Mo. App. 107; Darling v. Wilson, 60 N. H. 59; Forman v. Proctor, 9 B. Mon. 124. The want of logical sequence in this limitation has been felt by the courts, and some of them have sought to place their decision upon the fact that, while the young were following the mother, a purchaser from the mortgagor had notice by that fact that it was her offspring, and subject to the mortgage, and was thus prevented from claiming to be a purchaser in good faith. Placing the decision on this ground is, however, necessarily a repudiation of the principle upon which all the above cases rest; for, if the mortgagee is in fact the owner of the increase, the question of good faith in a purchase from the mortgagor is immaterial. Prior to 1873, the giving of a chattel mortgage in this state vested the mortgagee with the title to the property mortgaged (Heyland v. Badger, 35 Cal. 404); and, while this rule of law prevailed, the foregoing decisions would have been applicable. The Civil Code, however, went into effect at the beginning of that year; and under its provisions the mortgagor is not, by the execution of the chattel mortgage, divested of his title to the property, but still remains its owner, while the mortgagee has only a lien thereon. Civ. Code, § 2888; Bank v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, 39 Pac. 1071. Consequently, the foregoing decisions cannot be regarded as having authoritative force; but the rights of the parties must be determined upon the general principles controlling the relations between a mortgagor and mortgagee. In the absence of any express agreement upon the subject, the lien created by a mortgage is limited to the property which is described in the mortgage, and does not include other property of the same character which the mortgagor may have afterwards acquired and placed with the mortgaged property. Jones, Chat. Mortg. §§ 138, 154. If the mortgagor retains the possession of the mortgaged property, he is at liberty to deal with and use it as its owner; and whatever income or profit may be derived from such use belongs to him, and not to the mortgagee. See Simpson v. Ferguson (recently decided by this court) 44 Pac. 484. If, in the case of sheep, the use to which he puts the ewes is for breeding lambs, there can be no sufficient reason given why the lambs that are dropped by the ewes should belong to the mortgagee, any more than the wool which is sheared from their backs. We are aware that the supreme court of Texas, in First Nat. Bank of Austin v. Western Mortg. & Inv. Co., 86 Tex. 636, 26 S. W. 488, held that although, by the laws of that state, the mortgagor of personal property remains the owner thereof after the execution of the mortgage, the foregoing decisions control the right of the mortgagee to the increase of domestic animals; but the opinion in which the decision is given merely states the proposition, without presenting any reasoning in its support, and does not meet with our approval. We are not called upon to determine in the present case whether, if the lambs in question had been in gestation at the date of the mortgage, they would have been included as a part of the property mortgaged; but we hold that, inasmuch as they were begotten upon the ewes after the mortgage was executed, the mortgagee has no lien upon them, or right to their possession. The conclusion thus reached renders it unnecessary to consider the rulings of the court upon the offer of the plaintiffs to show that the defendant had knowledge of the mortgage at the time he purchased the lambs. The judgment and order are affirmed.

VENTURA COUNTY v. CLAY, County Treasurer. (L. A. 71.)

STATUTES — WHEN CONSTRUED AS PEREMPTORY — REFERENCE TO PREVIOUS ACT—REPEAL—DUTIES OF COUNTY TAX COLLECTOR — LICENSE TAX — POWER OF COUNTY TO EMPLOY LICENSE TAX COLLECTOR—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

1. Where a tax collector is authorized to receive license taxes, though by language merely permissive, the exercise of such power may be insisted on as a duty.

2. Where the legislature has defined the duties of an officer by referring to another existing statute, a subsequent repeal of the act so referred to does not affect the act referring to it.

3. County Government Act, § 154, providing that "the tax collector must perform such duties as are prescribed in title nine, part three, of the Political Code" (which requires such officer to receive and collect taxes on property), authorizes him to receive and collect all license taxes required to be paid to him by a valid ordinance of the board of county supervisors.

4. Since the legislature, by County Government Act, § 154, has authorized the county tax collector to receive and collect all license taxes required to be paid to him by valid county ordinance, the board of supervisors has no power to employ another person to perform such duties.

5. St. 1887, p. 208, adding a new section to the county government act, and making it the duty of the tax collector to collect all taxes and licenses imposed by county ordinances, "except where it is by the law otherwise expressly directed," did not, by implication, repeal section 154 of such act, which had already imposed that duty on the collector; and hence the subsequent repeal of the new section did not in any way affect his powers under the old.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action by the county of Ventura to enjoin Henry Clay, county treasurer, from paying an auditor's warrant in favor of C. H. Bradley. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. L. Poplin, for appellant. Blackstock & Ewing, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enjoin the treasurer of Ventura county from paying an auditor's warrant in favor of the defendant Bradley for $240, claimed to be due Bradley for his services in collecting license taxes under an alleged contract with that county, and allowed by the board of supervisors as a valid claim. This action was brought by the district attorney, who contended that the alleged contract of Bradley with the county, and the allowance of Bradley's claim by the board of supervisors, were unauthorized by law; and, therefore, that this action was authorized by section 8 of the county government act. The cause was tried by the court, whose findings and judgment were in favor of defendants; and plaintiff brings this appeal from the judgment on a bill of exceptions.

The material facts disclosed by the record are substantially as follows: On November 7, 1890, the board of supervisors passed an ordinance (No. 48) amending section 2 of a prior ordinance (No. 39) so as to make it read as follows: "Sec. 2. A license shall be granted to any person of good moral character who is a proper person to be entrusted in the business to sell vinous, spirituous, distilled, malt, mixed, or other intoxicating liquors, at any specified place in this county, upon the petition of such person to the board of supervisors. Upon such petition being made by any applicant the board shall consider the same and may hear evidence as to the character of the applicant and as to his being a fit and proper person to be entrusted in such business, and, if the board be satisfied that such applicant is a person of good moral character and a proper and worthy person to be entrusted in such business, such petition shall be granted, and the auditor of the county shall be directed to issue a license to such applicant for the period of one year, upon payment to the tax collector of the county the sum of six hundred dollars for such license, in advance." This ordinance was duly attested, certified, and published, so that it took effect on November 30, 1890, and is admitted by both parties to be a valid ordinance, though neither a copy nor the substance of the ordinance (No. 39) of which it is an amendment appears in the record. From the first Monday in January, 1892, until the trial of this action, A. J. Bell was the duly elected and qualified tax collector of Ventura county, whose salary was $2,000 per annum. On February 24, 1894, he appointed the defendant Bradley his "deputy tax and license collector" for said county; and on the same day Bradley qualified by taking the oath of office, and his appointment had not been revoked at the time this action was commenced. As tax collector, Bell received the liquor license taxes, according to Ordinance No. 48, from the time he took office (January, 1892) until about October 15, 1894, but thereafter refused to receive them, for the alleged reason that it was not his official duty to collect or receive license taxes. On November 9, 1894, the board of supervisors, at the request of the tax collector (Bell) and of Bradley's attorney, made and entered an order that Bradley be employed to collect the license taxes, and thereafter, on December 5, 1894, entered into and executed the following written agreement with Bradley: "Agreement of employment made this December 5, 1894, between the county of Ventura, a body politic and corporate, the party of the first part, and C. H. Bradley, of said county, the party of the second part, in pursuance of an order of the board of supervisors of said county made and entered on November 9, 1894, witnesseth: That said party of the first part does hereby hire and employ the party of the second part to collect for the party of the first part all liquor and other business license taxes due, and to become due, to the party of the first part under the ordinances thereof now in force, or hereafter, during the continuance of this agreement, to be passed, for a compensation or commission, to the party of the second part, of ten per cent. on all sums collected hereunder by him; and said party of the second part, in consideration of the premises and of such commission of ten per cent. upon all sums actually collected by him thereunder, does hereby promise and agree to and with the party of the first part faithfully and diligently to collect all such license taxes, and safely keep the same, and regularly deposit the same at least once in each month with the treasurer of said county; and the commission of ten per cent., above provided, shall be in full payment and satisfaction of the party of the second part for all services rendered by him hereunder. And, as part and parcel of this agreement, the said party of the second part promises and agrees to file with the board of supervisors, on the first day of their meeting in each month, a statement showing all license taxes collected by him hereunder, all moneys therefrom deposited with the county treasurer, and all moneys, if any, remaining in his custody. Compensation of said party of the second part shall not be paid or otherwise retained or allowed, except upon order of the board of supervisors of said county after claim therefor has been regularly presented, as in the case of other county claims. And it is further mutually understood and agreed that this agreement shall be, and is hereby made, terminable at the pleasure of the board of supervisors of said county, with or without notice to the party of the second part." On February 4, 1895, Bradley presented to the board of supervisors his itemized claim for 10 per cent. on $2,400, received by him as license taxes for which four liquor licenses had been issued, each for the term of one year. This claim was referred by the board to the district attorney, for his opinion as to whether it was a legal charge against the county; and he reported to the board that it was not a legal charge against the county for any amount. Nevertheless, the board allowed the claim, and ordered it paid.

The appellant contends that the alleged contract of the county with Bradley, the order of the board of supervisors allowing Bradley's claim as a valid charge against the county, and the auditor's warrant for the payment of said claim, were unauthorized by law. And it is not denied that they were so if it was an official duty of the tax collector to receive the money required to be paid to him by Ordinance No. 48, as a condition precedent to the issuance of a liquor license. Therefore the whole controversy on this appeal may be determined by a decision of the question whether or not it was an official duty of the tax collector to receive the liquor license taxes imposed by the Ordinance No. 48. It is not questioned, nor is it questionable, that the board of supervisors was authorized to impose such license taxes, "for the purposes of * * * revenue, * * * and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise" (County Government Act, § 25, subd. 27; Const. art. 11, §§ 11, 12; People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153; Ex parte Mirande 73 Cal. 365, 14 Pac. 888); and, although it had no power to create the office of license tax collector (El Dorado Co. v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 273, 34 Pac. 716; County of Los Angeles v. Lopez, 104 Cal. 257, 38 Pac. 42), it had power to order the liquor license taxes to which the ordinance (No. 48) related to be paid to a county officer having authority to receive them, since in this case the ordinance required nothing more of the tax collector than that he should receive those taxes when voluntarily tendered by applicants for liquor licenses. By no possibility could those taxes become delinquent; and therefore the supervisors properly omitted to provide any mode, "by suit or otherwise," to enforce payment of them. If the tax collector was authorized to receive those taxes when tendered, though only by language merely permissive, or even by implication, it was his official duty to receive them. "Where a public body or officer has been clothed by statute with power to do an act which concerns the public interest or the rights of third persons, the execution of the power may be insisted on as a duty, though the phraseology of the statute be permissive merely, and not peremptory. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 593.

The remaining question, therefore, is, do the statutes of this state authorize the tax collector to receive the license taxes to which the ordinance (No. 48) relates? It may be premised that the act of receiving or collecting license taxes of any kind for county revenue is an official function, to be performed only by county officers invested for that purpose with a part of the sovereign power of the state, derived directly from the legislature (see dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McKee, in People v. Ferguson, 65 Cal. 288, 4 Pac. 4, so far as adopted by this court in El Dorado Co. v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 273, 34 Pac. 716; also, Rowe v. Kern Co., 72 Cal. 353, 14 Pac. 11; and Mechem, Pub. Off. § 1); the legislature being prohibited by the constitution from delegating its power to create a county office, or to prescribe or regulate the salary or compensation of any county officer. From these premises, it would seem to follow that the board of supervisors of a county has no power to create the office of tax receiver or tax collector, nor to fix or regulate the compensation of the incumbent of such office, under any circumstances, even though the legislature should fail to create such an office; and this conclusion is not controverted by counsel for respondent. Yet they contend that the board of supervisors may by contract employ a person to perform the functions of tax receiver or tax collector, for a specified consideration or compensation, to be paid by the county in case the legislature fail to provide a county officer for that purpose. In what substantial respect does such employment differ from the creating of the office of tax collector, and the fixing of the compensation of the incumbent thereof? I perceive only a difference in words expressing the same meaning. In each case the functionary represents and exercises the same sovereign power of the state. The same thing that is called an "office" in one case is called "employment" in the other. The functionary who in one case is called "officer" is called "employé" in the other. That which, in one case, is called "salary" or "fees of office," is called "compensation of a servant" in the other. It is unnecessary, however, further to extend this line of argument, or to decide whether or not the supervisors of a county have power to supply delinquencies of the legislature in the matter of providing the necessary county officers, and prescribing their duties; since I think the legislature had created the office of tax collector for each county in the state by section 4103 of the Political Code, and, by section 4301 of the same Code had declared that "the tax collector must perform such duties as are prescribed in title IX, part III of this Code;" and the county government act of March 14, 1883, by section 57, had continued that office, and section 154 of the same act provides: "The tax-collector must perform such duties as are prescribed in title nine, part three of the Political Code," this section being a copy of section 4301 of the Political Code, above quoted. Under these sections of the Political Code and county government act, the tax collectors (or ex officio tax collectors, where the office was consolidated with that of sheriff) had collected all kinds of license taxes during a period of more than 20 years immediately prior to the refusal of the tax collector of Ventura county to receive the license taxes required to be paid to him by the ordinances of the supervisors of that county, without questioning their authority to do so; and even the present tax collector of Ventura county did not discover his want of authority to receive such taxes until after he had received them during a period of nearly three years, when he and the board of supervisors were advised that neither he nor any other county officer was authorized to receive license taxes; and thereupon, being careful not to transgress the bounds of his authority, he requested the board of supervisors to employ his then deputy tax collector, Bradley, to collect those taxes.

It is well settled that the legislature may define the duties of an officer by referring to another existing statute; and also that a subsequent repeal of the act so referred to does not affect or change the act referring to it. People v. Whipple, 47 Cal. 592. But it is claimed by counsel for respondent that title 9, pt. 3, of the Political Code, referred to by section 154, of the county government act, as defining the duties of tax collector, requires him to collect or receive only the taxes on property, and does not enjoin upon him the duty of collecting or receiving license taxes.

It is true that license taxes are not mentioned in title 9, part 3, of the Political Code; yet the only duties of the tax collector therein prescribed are those of receiving and collecting taxes, and paying them into the treasury; and section 154 of the county government act provides that "the tax collector must perform such duties" (not those duties), meaning duties "of that kind," and "of like kind," though not necessarily identical. For definitions of the word "such," see Webster's, Century, and Anderson's (Law) Dictionaries. The word "such" relates to and limits the word "duties" to that kind of duties enjoined in title 9, pt. 3, of the Political Code, but does not qualify the word "taxes," or restrict its application to any particular kind of taxes, the word "taxes" not being used in section 154 of the county government act. The kind of duties enjoined upon the tax collector by title 9, pt. 3, of the Political Code, is that of collecting taxes on property; and surely the duty to collect taxes on business (license taxes) is of a like kind, though the taxes collected in the latter case are not the identical taxes collected in the former.

In 1887 the legislature added a new section to the county government act, numbered 110½ (St. 1887, p. 208), as follows: "It shall be the duty of the tax-collector, except where it is by law otherwise expressly directed, to collect all taxes and licenses levied by law, or imposed by ordinance by the board of supervisors, in the manner and subject to the terms of the law or ordinance providing for the same." This new section was expressly repealed by the legislature of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 302); but section 154 of the county government act has never been repealed nor amended, and was re-enacted in the revised edition of that act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 330). Counsel for respondent contend that the enactment of this new section indicates that the legislature understood that section 154 of the act did not authorize the tax collector to collect license taxes; that the new section was intended merely to supply the deficiency, and had that effect; and that the repeal of the new section, in 1889, left the tax collector without authority to collect license taxes. As to the reason why the new section was enacted, counsel's theory, at first impression, seems plausible; but, if it was understood by the legislature of 1889 that section 154 of county government act did not authorize the tax collector to collect license taxes, why was the new section repealed without enacting a substitute authorizing some officer to collect the license taxes? Is it to be presumed that the legislature intentionally omitted to provide for the collection of those taxes? The only rational answer to these questions would seem to be that the new section was considered superfluous, because the tax collector was authorized to collect those taxes by section 154, and that for this reason alone the new section was repealed. Nor did the enactment of the new section repeal section 154 by implication; since it only purports to authorize the tax collector to collect such taxes as he was not otherwise by law expressly directed to collect, and therefore could not have been intended as a substitute for or revision of any theretofore existing law authorizing the collection of taxes.

From the foregoing considerations it follows: (1) That section 154 of the county government act has never been repealed; (2) that said section authorizes the county tax collector to receive and collect all license taxes required to be paid to him by a valid ordinance of the county board of supervisors; (3) that the employment of the defendant Bradley by the board of supervisors of Ventura county to collect the license taxes for that county was unauthorized by law, and is void; (4) that the claim of Bradley for his services in collecting license taxes under said employment was not a lawful charge against said county, and should not have been allowed by the board of supervisors; (5) that the judgment appealed from should be reversed and the court below directed to enjoin the defendant treasurer of said county, perpetually, from paying the auditor's warrant in favor of defendant Bradley, described in plaintiff's complaint, as prayed for by the plaintiff.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed, perpetually, to enjoin the treasurer of Ventura county, defendant herein, from paying the auditor's warrant in favor of the defendant Bradley, described in plaintiff's complaint, as prayed for by plaintiff.

SMILIE v. FRESNO COUNTY. (No. 18,434.)

COUNTIES — LIMIT OF INDEBTEDNESS — CONTRACTS PAYABLE IN INSTALLMENTS.

Where a county contracts for the erection of a building, the payment to be made in installments each year as the work progressed, the debt or liability created is not the aggregate amount of such installments, but only that which arises from year to year on the separate installments; and, if the installment is within the income each year it is not illegal, under the provisions of county government act of 1891 (sections 5, 36), forbidding counties to incur an indebtedness or liability exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for that year.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

This was an action on contract brought by Robert Smilie against the county of Fresno. From an order sustaining a demurrer to his complaint, plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

Frank H. Short and Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, for appellant. Firman Church, W. D. Tupper, and C. C. Merriam, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Certain persons, to whose rights plaintiff has succeeded by assignment, entered into a contract with the county of Fresno, whereby they agreed to build additions to the county courthouse and to complete the same within the space of 15 months from the date of the contract, which was December 14, 1891. The county on its part agreed to pay them therefor the sum of $99,387 "in gold coin or county warrants"; 75 per cent. thereof in monthly installments according to the stage of advancement of the work, and the remainder within 35 days after completion of the structure. The building was not finished until November 8, 1893, but this delay was within certain saving clauses of the contract, and was assented to by defendant, and on the day last mentioned the county accepted the work as fully completed in accordance with the contract. A balance of $6,708.62 remains unpaid on the said contract price, and to recover such balance is the object of this action. Plaintiff's complaint averred the facts above stated, and also set forth, among other matters, the following: "That the said defendant, by the execution of said contract, did not incur any indebtedness or liability exceeding in any year of the performance of the same the income and revenue provided for it for such year. That the income and revenue of said defendant provided for the year 1892 was sufficient to meet all payments under such contract as fell due in 1892 under the terms thereof, and all other obligations of said defendant falling due in 1892, and that the income and revenue of said defendant provided for the year 1893 was sufficient to meet all payments under said contract as fell due in 1893 under the terms thereof, and all other obligations of said defendant falling due in 1893." A demurrer to this complaint for want of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was sustained by the court, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment passed for defendant. No brief has been filed for respondent, and we are not informed of the particulars in which the complaint was held obnoxious to the demurrer. From the argument for appellant, however, we infer that the court considered the total indebtedness incurred on the part of the county by the execution of the contract to be in excess of the revenue and income of the county for each of the years 1892 and 1893 singly, and hence was void in virtue of the prohibition contained in section 18, art. 11, of the constitution, and the similar provisions of the county government act of 1891 (sections 5, 36), by which a county is forbidden to "incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year," etc. Whatever doubt may have formerly existed in this state regarding the effect of that clause of the constitution on such contracts has been removed by the late decision of this court in McBean v. City of Fresno (filed March 26, 1896) 44 Pac. 358, where the court, per Mr. Justice Henshaw, having in view its previous decisions and the course of adjudication elsewhere, declared the law to be "that at the time of entering into the contract no debt or liability is created for the aggregate amount of the installments to be paid under the contract, but that the sole debt or liability created is that which arises from year to year in separate amounts as the work is performed." In the present case the plaintiff has alleged that the income and revenue of the county provided for the years 1892 and 1893, respectively, was sufficient to meet the payments falling due under the terms of the contract in those years, and to discharge the other current obligations of the county. It is thus shown that each year's revenue was adequate to pay each year's indebtedness, and the case is brought within the principle of McBean v. City of Fresno. The judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

BERNSTEIN v. DOWNS. (L. A. 47.)[1]

ACTION FOR STREET IMPROVEMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—ASSIGNMENT OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against an abutting owner for the amount of an assessment for street improvements, the petition alleged that defendant appealed from the assessment to the board of trustees, claiming that the work was not done in compliance with the specifications, pending which he promised the contractors that, if they would do certain other work in addition to the work already done, he would waive all defects in the assessment, and pay them the full amount thereof; that the board dismissed the appeal, but ordered the contractors to make certain additions to the work; that the contractors did all the work which they agreed with defendant to do, and also that directed by the board to be done; and that defendant saw that the work was being done, and made no objection to it. The assessment was admitted to be void. Held, that the petition stated a cause of action, as against a general demurrer, though the value of the additional work done at defendant's instance was not alleged.

2. Defendant could not avoid the contract on the theory that the doing of the extra work was malicious mischief, under Pen. Code, § 602, because it would be "digging" in a street without proper license, and therefore unlawful, under Civ. Code, § 1667.

3. In an action against an abutting owner for the amount of a void street assessment, the complaint alleged that the work was done with defendant's knowledge and consent; that it directly benefited his property, and that he received the benefit thereof; that the sum assessed and sued for was the reasonable value of the work, and was also the "value of the said benefit to defendant's said property." Held, that a sufficient consideration for defendant's promise to pay the sum assessed was alleged.

4. In an action against an abutting owner for the amount of a void street assessment which he promised to pay the contractor, it was proper to admit in evidence the written assignment to plaintiff by the contractor of the assessment, as tending to show an assignment of the obligation sued on.

5. An exception "to the instructions asked for and allowed by the court on the part of the plaintiff" does not sufficiently specify the particulars in which the instructions are erroneous, within the meaning of the Code.

6. The complaint in an action for the amount of a void street assessment against an abutting owner, who agreed to pay the same, alleged that the contractors assigned to plaintiff the whole cause of action, including the personal obligation of defendant to pay the amount of the assessment, and was verified by one of the contractors, and, as subsequently amended, was verified by the other contractor. Held, that a judgment for plaintiff would not be reversed on account of failure to sufficiently prove the assignment of the obligation sued on.

7. In an action on a promise to pay money, there was no affirmative plea of payment, and all denials in the answer that any sum remained unpaid were coupled with denials that any sum ever was due; nor was any pretense made on the trial that defendant ever paid anything, but the defense was that there was never anything due. Held, that a judgment for plaintiff should not be reversed, whether or not proof of an existing indebtedness is sufficient to make a prima facie case of nonpayment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by Samuel Bernstein against John W. Downs. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. R. Gray, for appellant. Finlayson & Finlayson, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover $432.25 for work and material furnished by plaintiff's assignors in making improvements on the street and sidewalk in front of defendant's lot. This sum of money was the amount originally fixed as a street assessment; but the assessment, on account of a certain irregularity, became void, and the action is founded upon defendant's promise to pay the amount so assessed. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Appellant's main contention for a reversal is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause. This contention cannot be maintained. The complaint is a lengthy one, and has three counts; but the main facts stated are, briefly, these: Appellant owned a lot fronting on Second street, between D and E streets, in the city of San Bernardino; and he and certain other owners of lots on said Second street, between D and E, petitioned the board of trustees of said city to cause certain street work to be done on that part of said street. In response to said petition, the trustees duly adopted a resolution of intentions to order certain described work to be done on said Second street, from the east line of D street to the east line of E street; and such proceedings were regularly had that a contract was awarded to respondent's assignors, Ramish & Marsh, who did the work; and the assessment for work against appellant's lot was, in the first instance, $435.69, but upon appeal by appellant and others to the board of trustees, on account of some incidental expenses charged, to which they objected, the board reduced the total amount somewhat, so that the amount assessed against appellant's lot was $432.25. Appellant and the other said lot owners took another appeal to the board, in which they objected that the work was not well enough done, and not in compliance with the specifications, and also made some technical objections; as, for instance, that the contractors employed men on the basis of ten instead of eight hours as a day's work. While this appeal was pending before the board of trustees, the appellant and the other appealing lot owners and the contractors all went together to the part of said Second street where the work had been done, for the purpose of examining it. After the investigation, the defendant promised the said contractors that if they would do certain other described work, which consisted of certain alterations of and additions to the work already done, he would waive all defects in the assessment, and pay them the full amount of said assessment, of $432.25. The board dismissed the appeal, but made an order that the contractors make certain additions to the work; and said contractors, in consideration of said promise of appellant, did do all the work which they had agreed with appellant to do, and also the work ordered by said board to be done. The appellant knew of all these facts and circumstances, knew and saw that the work was being done, and made no objection except as hereinbefore stated. The cause of action was assigned by Ramish & Marsh to respondent. It is admitted that the assessment could not have been legally enforced, on account of some mishap in getting an order extending the time for the completion of the work.

The foregoing are the main facts averred in the first count of the complaint, although it contains many details not here given; and we think that it sufficiently shows a cause of action. A lot owner, without any order from the municipal government, can make a valid contract with another person to have the street and sidewalk in front of his premises improved, provided he can get permission to do so from the proper authorities; and when, as in the case at bar, he says to a person who for any reason had already done such work, "If you will now complete this work in a certain way, I will pay you for what you have already done," such promise to pay is a valid promise made upon sufficient consideration, and enforceable like any other legal obligation. The fact that the value of the additional work in money was not alleged does not make the complaint insufficient, particularly as against a general demurrer. Whatever its exact value (and the value was proven at the trial without objection), it was a detriment to the contractor, and a benefit to appellant, and therefore a valid consideration. Neither is there anything in the point that appellant can avoid his contract upon the theory that the doing of the extra work would be malicious mischief under section 602 of the Penal Code, because it would be "digging," etc., in a street without proper license, and therefore declared unlawful, under section 1667 of the Civil Code. The extra work contracted for was not within the enumeration of acts prohibited by the said section of the Penal Code. It was clearly not malicious. The facts show that the trustees permitted it; and, as the facts averred do not state an unlawful contract, its unlawfulness, if any, was a matter of defense.

As, however, there are three counts in the complaint, and the jury returned a general verdict for the amount prayed for, it is contended by appellant that the verdict and judgment cannot stand if any one of the counts is insufficient, because it cannot be known upon which count the verdict was rendered. This proposition seems to be violative of the principle that an appellant must affirmatively show error, and all intendments are in support of the judgment; but the general rule, as contended for by appellant, seems to have been announced by former decisions. Hunt v. San Francisco, 11 Cal. 258; Barron v. Frink, 30 Cal. 486. Whether or not this rule should be applied to a case like the one at bar, where it is apparent that each count is upon the same identical cause of action, it is not necessary to determine; for we think that each of the second and third counts is sufficient as a pleading against a general demurrer, and there is no special ground except that there is an improper uniting of two causes of action.

The objection urged against the second count is that it does not state a sufficient consideration for appellant's promise to pay the said amount of $432.25. But it is alleged that the work was done with appellant's knowledge and consent; that it directly benefited appellant's property, and appellant received the benefits thereof; that said sum of money was the reasonable value of said work, and was also "the value of the said benefit to defendant's said property." This was a sufficient consideration for appellant's alleged promise to pay said sum of money, under the principle stated in section 1606 of the Civil Code.

The two objections urged to the third count —that the value in money of the additional work is not stated, and that the contract was unlawful—are the same as those urged against the first count, and, as before stated, are not tenable.

With respect to alleged errors occurring at the trial, the court did not err in allowing in evidence the written assignment to respondent by the contractors Ramish & Marsh of the assessment hereinbefore mentioned. The contention is that as the action is founded upon a promise to pay, and not upon a valid assessment, therefore an assignment of the assessment, diagram, warrant, etc., was of no consequence, and was properly objected to "on the ground that it was incompetent." But this assessment was the thing which appellant promised to pay, and the assignment of it was certainly not incompetent as evidence, while it certainly tended in some degree to show an assignment of the obligation sued on.

Appellant contends that some of the instructions given to the jury were erroneous. They mostly involve those general features of the case which are noticed in other parts of this opinion; but the preliminary objection of respondent that there are no sufficient specifications of the particulars in which they are alleged to be erroneous must be sustained. The only exception shown in the record on the subject is the following statement by counsel for the defendant: "We except to the instructions asked for, and allowed by the court on the part of the plaintiff." This, upon its face, certainly does not "specify the particular upon which the party will rely," within the meaning of the Code. It does not specify any particular error. There are some decisions of this court founded on an expression in the opinion rendered in Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 425, in which more liberality is shown to exceptions to instructions given at the request of a party than to instructions given by the court on its own motion; but, taken altogether, they do not condone the extreme generality of the exception in the case at bar. There certainly should be at least an exception to each of the instructions by number or other designation; otherwise, the attention of the court is not called to any one particular alleged error. See cases cited at pages 948–951, 2 Enc. Pl. & Prac. The latest notice of the subject by this court to which our attention has been called was in Joyce v. White, 95 Cal. 239, 30 Pac. 524, in which it seems to have been held that an exception in these words, "The court erred in giving to the jury instructions asked by plaintiff," was not sufficient. Certainly, such an exception as the one at bar would be insufficient if any part of the instructions excepted to en masse is free from error.

It is contended that there was no sufficient proof of the assignment to respondent of the cause of action sued on. It is true that the written assignment of the "assessment" does not clearly express the intent of carrying with it the promise of appellant to pay it; but this assignment and the conduct of the assignors and assignee, together, show that such was the intent. Moreover, appellant is not now in a position to question respondent's character as assignee. There is no pretense that appellant has any defense which he might have made against the assignors which he cannot make with equal force against the respondent. In such a case, clear proof of the assignment is important to a defendant only in order that a judgment against him may be full protection against any suit that might be brought on the same demand by the assignor. In White v. The Mary Ann, 6 Cal. 471, where a similar defense was pleaded, the court said: "It is also beyond question that a recovery will bar another action for the same cause; and, whenever a defendant is thus protected, he has no right to make the objection which is here set up." In Burrows v. Stryker, 47 Iowa, 477, there was some question of the sufficiency of the assignment of the cause of action; but the plaintiff had, by an amendment to his complaint, brought in the assignor (a company), who had appeared and admitted the assignment, and the court said: "An admission of the assignment having been made of record by the company, and a decree against the company having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the appellant cannot now question the plaintiff's title." Now, in the case at bar, the assignors, Ramish & Marsh, are estopped by their acts of record from denying the assignment; and appellant is fully protected from any subsequent claim which they might set up to the cause of action sued on. In the complaint there is a complete averment that Ramish & Marsh assigned the whole cause of action, including the personal obligation of appellant to pay the amount of the assessment; and the complaint is verified by Ramish, who stated in his verification that the respondent was absent from the country, that all the facts alleged were within his (Ramish's) knowledge, and that they were true. Afterwards there were some amendments made to the complaint, and it was again verified by the other assignor, Marsh. In fact, it appears that, substantially, the action was brought and maintained by the assignors in the name of the assignee. Our conclusion upon this point is that the judgment should not be reversed on account of the alleged failure to sufficiently prove the assignment.

The only other contention of appellant necessary to be noticed is that there was not sufficient proof by respondent of nonpayment of the demand sued on. With respect to this point it is sufficient to say that there is no affirmative plea of payment in the answer, and that the denials that any sum remains unpaid are all coupled with denials that any sum was ever due; so that the denials might be true, upon appellant's theory of no indebtedness, although no payment had ever been made. Nor is there anything in the record (as claimed by appellant) showing that the case was tried upon the theory of a sufficient averment of payment, or a sufficient denial of nonpayment. In fact, there was no pretense that appellant ever paid anything. The defense was that there was never anything due. This makes it unnecessary to discuss the question whether proof of an existing indebtedness is not sufficient to make a prima facie case of nonpayment. The evidence upon all other issues was sufficient to justify the verdict. The judgment and order denying a new trial appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

RIVERSIDE WATER CO. v. SARGENT et al. (No. 19,427.)

IRRIGATION—ACTION TO DETERMINE WATER RIGHTS—JUDGMENT.

In an action against a ditch company, where the issue was the right of the defendant to take water from a river, the findings and judgment of the court must determine the quantity of water allowed to the party whose claim is paramount; and a finding that defendant is entitled to take water to the full capacity of its ditch, and, during the irrigating season, to the extent of all the water in the river, when only 1,000 inches is claimed in the pleadings, is erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from the superior court, San Bernardino county; John C. Campbell, Judge.

This action was brought by the Riverside Water Company against the Timber Ditch Water Company for diverting from the Santa Ana river, in San Bernardino county, water belonging to plaintiff company. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

Curtis, Oster & Curtis (R. E. Houghton, of counsel), for appellant. Chas. J. Perkins and Goodcell & Leonard, for respondents.

BRITT, C. This action concerns the relative rights of the plaintiff, a corporation, and the defendant Timber Ditch Water Company, also a corporation, to the use (acquired by appropriation) of water flowing in the Santa Ana river, in San Bernardino county. Each share of the stock of said Timber Ditch Company represents the right of the holder thereof to use, for a definite time, all the water owned or controlled by the company, and the interest of the other defendants arises from their ownership of shares of such stock, and consequent right to an apportionment of the water. It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff is the owner of all the water of the river at the point where defendants, by means of a dam and ditch, diverted therefrom "a large amount of water belonging to plaintiff, to wit, upward of one thousand inches, measured under a four-inch pressure." Defendants, by their answers, denied that plaintiff is the owner of all the water of the river, and averred a superior right in the Timber Ditch Company to divert such water, by means of said dam and ditch, "to the extent of one thousand inches measured under a four-inch pressure, in constant flow, for the use and benefit of its stockholders," and that any right of the plaintiff to the water is subject to such priority of the ditch company. It is thus apparent that the controversy is whether the ditch company has any right to take water from the river, and, if it has, how much. It was proved at the trial that above the head of said ditch the river is divided into two channels, called, respectively, the "North Channel" and the "South Channel," and that the ditch proceeds from the former of these, the South channel being at that point about half a mile distant. The court found that plaintiff is the owner of all the water flowing in the river at the point where the dam complained of was constructed, "except so much thereof as defendants are entitled to take and use, as hereinafter stated"; that the defendant the Timber Ditch Water Company had, for more than six years before the commencement of the action, continuously diverted water from the river by means of said dam and ditch, and has the right to take the water by those means "to the extent of the full capacity of said ditch, and * * * during the irrigating season, * * * to wit, from the 15th day of April to the 15th day of September of each year, * * * to the extent of all the water being and flowing in said river at the place of said diversion." The judgment was in substantial accord with said findings. Plaintiff appeals.

The decisions of this court establish that in cases like the present the findings and judgment must fix the extent of the superior right, viz. the quantity of water to be allowed to the party whose claim is paramount; otherwise, the judgment fails to attain the certainty necessary to an estoppel upon the main subject of the litigation. Dougherty v. Haggin, 56 Cal. 522; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 604, 605, 14 Pac. 379; Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 182, 22 Pac. 76; Barrows v. Fox, 98 Cal. 63, 32 Pac. 811; Lillis v. Ditch Co., 95 Cal. 553, 30 Pac. 1108. See, also, Stewart v. Taylor, 68 Cal. 7, 8 Pac. 605. In this instance the court has not found the disputed quantity, nor data from which it may be calculated. In view of the fact, well known, that the carrying capacity of a water ditch is subject to rapid changes, being affected by the nature of the soil through which it passes, the rapidity and consequent scouring force of its current, the care it receives, and other matters more casual, the finding here seems well devised, as said in Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 186, 22 Pac. 76, to "lead to future disputes and litigation." The finding that during the irrigating season the ditch company is entitled to all the water flowing in the river at the point of diversion does not obviate the difficulty. By their pleadings the defendants claim for the ditch company no more than 1,000 inches of water; and if the quantity flowing in the river during that season should exceed such amount, as sometimes it did, then the plaintiff is admittedly entitled to the excess, and the finding in that respect is unauthorized by the pleading. Again, since the court found, in effect, that the right of the ditch company exists in consequence of the diversion of the water by means of said ditch, and to the capacity of the ditch, it necessarily follows that the limit of the right is the carrying capacity of the ditch. Defendant could have no lawful claim to more water than it had means to divert. Then, for the time not included in the so-called "irrigating season" (April 15th to September 15th), no measure at all of the right of the ditch company is found, except the undetermined capacity of its ditch; and whether, under the clause of the judgment giving it, during the period mentioned, all the water flowing in the river at the place of diversion, it can claim the flow of both channels of the river, is a question upon which counsel for defendants themselves seem to differ. The pleadings make an issue upon the quantity of water appropriated by the ditch company measured by inches under four-inch pressure, and the objections we have noted could not have arisen had the findings and judgment been responsive to the pleadings in that particular.

Defendants suggest that the judgment may be so modified as to restrict the water awarded to the ditch company to 1,000 inches, and affirmed as modified; this on the strength, as we understand the argument, of the allegation in plaintiff's complaint that defendants, by means of said dam and ditch, have diverted that amount of water from the river, and the admission of such averment in the answers of the defendants, it being claimed that the pleadings thus fix the capacity of the ditch. But the water to which an appropriator is entitled is not the quantity he diverts, but the quantity which is or may be applied to a beneficial use, allowance being made for necessary loss in transit (Barrows v. Fox, 98 Cal. 63, 32 Pac. 811); and from the fact that a ditch has dimension to divert 1,000 inches from a stream it does not necessarily follow that it has dimension to carry that quantity, or any part of it, to the place of use.

The remaining matters discussed by counsel relate mainly to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings that all the water flowing into the ditch during the irrigating season is used and required for use upon the lands of the ditch company's shareholders. If the ditch supplies to them the quantity claimed by defendants, and the area of land irrigated is no greater than the record seems to show (less than 150 acres), then it would appear that the absorptive quality of the land is amazing, though, of course, not impossible. This circumstance, however, addresses itself chiefly as a monitory consideration to the trial court, which, no doubt, will take care that no unnecessary waste of the element is permitted. Barrows v. Fox, 98 Cal. 63, 32 Pac. 811; Milling Co. v. Morgan, 106 Cal. 409, 39 Pac. 802; Roeder v. Stein (Nev.) 42 Pac. 867. In this court, there being no finding fixing the extent of the appropriation and use, there is little advantage in considering the effect of testimony tending to show what the finding might have been. It should be said, however, that appellant mistakes in assuming, as it apparently does, that the ditch company can defend only for the interests of those of its shareholders who appear and make proof of their several claims. Its right, as trustee for all the shareholders, is to establish its claim to all the water owned and controlled by it for their benefit, whether the individuals to whom the water is apportionable are before the court or not.

We recommend that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

STOCKTON SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. PURVIS, Sheriff. (No. 18,368.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — LIEN ON CROPS FOR RENT—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS OF LESSEE.

Under an oral contract for lease of a farm at an annual cash rental, with the agreement that title to crops raised thereon should be in the landlord, that the crops should be stored in his name, and sold by him, and the proceeds applied first to pay the rent reserved, the surplus being paid over to the lessee, the landlord acquired merely a lien on the crops for the rent, and not title thereto as against creditors of the lessee.

In bank. On rehearing. Reversed.
For former report, see 42 Pac. 441.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff, as the owner of a certain tract of land, entered into a contract with one Dallas, whereby it let the said land to Dallas for the term of one year, upon the oral understanding and agreement that Dallas should during said year farm the same at an annual cash rental of $2,140; and it was understood and agreed between the parties that the title to said crops raised thereon during said term was to remain in said plaintiff, it being further understood and agreed that the said crop was to be hauled to the nearest warehouse, and stored in the name of plaintiff, and that from the sale of said crops plaintiff was to receive as rent aforesaid the sum of $2,140 cash, and the overplus, if any, was to go to and be the property of said Dallas, and that no part of such crop should be in any way subject to the disposal of said Dallas. Under the aforesaid contract Dallas entered into the possession of the land, and planted a crop of wheat thereon. While said wheat was growing, and prior to the harvesting thereof, Eppinger & Co., a creditor, attached the growing crop as the property of Dallas, and this action is brought by the plaintiff, the lessor, against the attaching officer, the sheriff, for the conversion of the property, plaintiff claiming under the aforesaid contract to be the owner of the entire crop.

The legal soundness of plaintiff's claims is wholly dependent upon the true construction of this contract of lease, and the general rules of law for the interpretation of contracts are applicable here. The fact that it is a contract between a lessor and a lessee of land for the farming thereof in no wise proves it an exception to the application of the general rules of interpretation; and the first and controlling rule for such interpretation is, what was the intention of the parties at the time of the making of the contract? Another rule of interpretation equally controlling and binding is that such intention must be gathered from the contract taken as a whole, considering all its provisions together, and not from any one clause considered as standing alone. Plaintiff insists that the title to this growing crop was in it, and points to the clause of the contract to support its contention, which provides: "It is understood and agreed between plaintiff herein and said Robert Dallas that the title to said crops raised thereon during such term is to remain in said plaintiff." Testing this contract by this clause alone, plaintiff's position is impregnable. Closing our eyes to all other provisions, we would be bound to hold the title to be in plaintiff. But this court is not authorized by the rules of law to measure the intentions of these contracting parties in any such manner. No clause in a contract in terms locating the title to the property forming the subject-matter of the contract in one of the parties is controlling upon a court, as against the provisions of the contract, taken as a whole, locating the title in the other party. There is nothing in the name given an instrument which will be in any way binding or controlling upon the court. Calling a contract a lease or a sale will not make it a lease or a sale. The agreement, whatever it may be, when coming before a court, will be named according to its provisions, and any technical christening of it by the parties cannot control its true interpretation. As was said in Parke & Lacy Co. v. White River Lumber Co., 101 Cal. 39, 35 Pac. 442, referring to a certain written instrument: "This paper was not a lease. Calling it a lease did not establish the fact. This is peculiarly a case where there is nothing in a name, for the contents of the paper determine its true character." Again, in Heryford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235, in speaking as to the true construction of a contract, the court said: "The answer to this question is not to be found in any name which the parties may have given to the instrument, not alone in any particular provision it contains, disconnected from all others, but in the ruling intention of the parties, gathered from all the language they have used. It is the legal effect of the whole which is to be sought for. The form of the instrument is of little account." In Putman v. Wise, 1 Hill, 246, the court quotes from Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, where the author says: "The most proper and authentic form of words may be overcome by a contrary intent appearing in the deed of demise." Keeping the foregoing principles in view, let us weigh and measure this contract by considering all its parts together. Plaintiff leased this land for a cash rent of $2,140. There was an express promise to pay this amount of money, and its payment was in no way dependent upon the raising of any crop. There was an independent personal liability. The crops may have proved a total failure, and still the money called for by the contract was a present binding liability. There is not even a provision in the contract that the title to the crops should return to the lessee upon the payment of the rent money. Under plaintiff's contention this money may have been paid within a few days after the execution of the lease, and still the crops would have remained the lessor's property. According to plaintiff's construction of the contract, it owned both the money demanded for the rent and the growing crop. It could have sold the demand for full value, and at the same time have mortgaged the crop, or even sold it, giving perfect title to both demand and crop. Plaintiff may have transferred or collected its claim, and still the crop of growing grain might have been sold under an attachment, and execution issued at the hands of its creditors. All these things could have happened if plaintiff's contention be true. We think that such was not the intention of the parties, certainly not the intention of the lessee. Where a person pays cash rent for the exclusive use of a tract of farming land, with the intention and for the express purpose of raising crops of grain thereon, it would seem that such crops would belong to the lessee. Certainly that should be the construction of the contract unless reasons for a different construction stand out in bold relief upon its face, and they do not present themselves here.

It further appears that the grain was to be hauled to a certain warehouse when harvested, and thereupon sold by plaintiff, and the proceeds applied first to the payment of its cash rent of $2,140, and the balance, if any, to go to the lessee. It would be a peculiar construction of this contract, and even an absurd one, to hold that plaintiff was to sell his own crop of grain, and apply the proceeds to the payment of a claim owned and held by it against its lessee. This clause of the contract plainly indicates an attempt by the lessor to hold the crop, when harvested, as security for the rent. Taking the whole contract together, it clearly indicates the purpose of these parties was to create a lien upon the growing crop to secure the payment of the cash rent; and any direct statement in the contract itself that such was not the purpose, or that the title to the crop was to remain in the lessor, must go down as against the plain intention of the parties, as evidenced by the entire contract when held before us, by its four corners for consideration. In the examination of the question here presented we are not at all loath to arrive at the conclusion reached. Under the law of this state there is no reason why a transaction of the character here presented should ever have been entered into. It was secret in every respect. It was not even in writing. As indicated by the amount of rent to be paid, the lessee was farming a large tract of plaintiff's land. It undoubtedly appeared to the public that he had an interest at least in the crops which he was cultivating. Under this contract of lease, as plaintiff asks to have it construed, the dealer who furnished the sacks to sack the grain, and the man who furnished the labor and machinery to harvest it, could not attach it for the labor and materials furnished. The public should not be dealt with in this way, and the law is not favorable to any such secret transactions. Again, there was no honest excuse for it, for the plaintiff could well have taken a chattel mortgage upon the growing crop to secure his rent, and thus the world would have had notice of the financial standing of the lessee, and could have dealt with him in the light of day with open eyes. By reason of the opportunities for fraud presented by this character of contract courts are inclined to scrutinize them closely, and, as we have stated, will not be concluded from such scrutiny by any name given the instrument, or by any single provision contained therein. It is the legal effect of the contract as an entirety that points our judgment. The language of this court in Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. 858, is full of meaning, and sheds a flood of light upon this question of construction. It is there said: "But in applying this rule it must be remembered in general that the policy of the law is against upholding secret liens and charges to the injury of innocent purchasers or incumbrancers for value, and in particular that mortgages of personal property are permitted only in certain specified cases, and then only upon the observance of certain formalities, designed to secure good faith, and to give notice to the world of the character of the transaction. These provisions as to mortgages cannot be evaded by any mere shuffling of words. When it is clear from the whole transaction that for all practical purposes the ownership of property was intended to be transferred, and that the seller only intended to reserve a security for the price, any characterization of the transaction by the parties, or any denial of its legal effect, will not be regarded. The question, it is true, is one of intention; but the intention must be collected from the whole transaction, and not from any particular feature of it." See, also, Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 63. For the foregoing reasons we conclude this contract was an attempt to obtain the advantages of a chattel mortgage without complying with the provisions of the statute upon that subject.

As a condition precedent to the beginning of this action plaintiff made a demand upon the attaching officer for the return of the property attached. It is now claimed by defendant that the demand was materially defective; but, without passing upon that question, we are able to say the written demand is pregnant with meaning, as showing the interest claimed by plaintiff in this grain. In that demand it is clearly shown what plaintiff considered the status of this property to be, and also the construction put upon this contract by it. In its demand upon the sheriff plaintiff did not even claim to be the owner of the property, but simply asserted a lien thereon. The demand asserts that said crops "were and are now subject to the lien of the Stockton Savings and Loan Society for rent reserved, to the amount of $2,140." Above every one else, the plaintiff should know what its own intentions were in entering into this contract. There are some cases which would seem to be opposed to the views here expressed, notably Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 461; Edson v. Colburn, 28 Vt. 631; and Andrew v. Newcomb, 32 N. Y. 417. With those cases we will not here deal. Possibly, to a large degree, those decisions were made from necessity, by reason of the absence of any chattel mortgage act; but we pass them by, and come to a consideration of the cases found in our own reports upon this question. The first and principal case in this state, and which at first glance seemingly looks the other way from the views we have expressed, is Howell v. Foster, 65 Cal. 169, 3 Pac. 647. The conclusion there arrived at is based upon the decisions we have cited from other states; but, whatever the court might do if another case with identical facts to those there shown was presented before it, it is unnecessary to say, for this case is different in material respects from Howell v. Foster. That was not a case of cash rent. Indeed, there is no agreement to pay any rent whatever. The word "rent," or its equivalent, is not found at any place in the contract. It is practically a contract for hiring, the wages of the man performing the labor and cultivating the land to be paid by three-fourths of the grain raised upon the land, delivered to him by the owner, after deducting certain moneys for advances previously made. Wentworth v. Miller, 53 Cal. 9; Sunol v. Molloy, 63 Cal. 369; and Blum v. McHugh, 92 Cal. 497, 28 Pac. 592,—which are cited in respondent's brief, are not in point upon the question here involved. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

REID v. REID. (Sac. 7.)

DIVORCE—CRUEL TREATMENT—EVIDENCE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—DISTRIBUTION—REVIEW—SEPARATE PROPERTY—JURISDICTION OVER.

1. In an action for divorce the uncorroborated testimony of one of the parties is insufficient to warrant a finding of cruel treatment.

2. In an action for divorce the court has no jurisdiction over the separate property of the wife.

3. All right to waters flowing from a well pass with a deed of land on which the well is located, unless reserved by the deed.

4. Funds belonging to either party individually on marriage, when commingled with community property, so that they cannot be traced and segregated therefrom, become community estate.

5. Under Civ. Code, § 148, authorizing the appellate court to revise the distribution of property made by the trial court in a divorce action, the distribution may be reversed without disturbing other portions of the judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Sarah A. Reid against William C. Reid for divorce, for cruelty and nonsupport. Defendant filed a cross complaint for divorce, for cruelty and for desertion. From a judgment for defendant on his cross complaint, and partitioning the property, plaintiff appeals. Divorce affirmed. Partition reversed.

John C. Duel and Frank H. Short, for appellant. E. D. Edwards, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action for a divorce, brought by the wife against the husband, upon the statutory grounds of extreme cruelty and willful neglect to provide the common necessaries of life. The defendant, in his answer, denied the material averments of the complaint, and, in a cross complaint, charged against the plaintiff willful desertion and extreme cruelty, and upon these grounds prayed for a decree of divorce in his favor against her. The court found against plaintiff's charges of extreme cruelty and neglect, and found that plaintiff was guilty of both desertion and extreme cruelty, decreed a divorce in his favor on both said grounds, awarded the custody of the children to him, and disposed of the community property as hereinafter mentioned. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The evidence shows some unamiable conduct on the part of both husband and wife, but it is not sufficient to show extreme cruelty by either. If the statements of appellant on the witness stand could, taken together, be considered as showing facts sufficient to constitute in law extreme cruelty, still it was entirely uncorroborated. What respondent testified to did not constitute extreme cruelty by appellant; and he, also, was uncorroborated. Therefore the finding that respondent was not guilty of extreme cruelty is sustained by the evidence, but there is no sufficient evidence to support the finding that appellant was guilty of extreme cruelty. There was no evidence sufficient to support appellant's charge of willful neglect, and therefore the finding against such neglect was right. There was, however, sufficient evidence to support the finding of willful desertion by appellant; and therefore, on that ground, the part of the judgment which decrees a divorce must be affirmed. We think, also, that under the circumstances shown by the evidence, which need not here be stated, the court did not abuse its discretion in awarding the custody of the children to respondent; and therefore that part of the judgment which awards such custody to respondent must be affirmed. But all that part of the judgment which purports to dispose of and partition the property of the parties must be reversed, and a new trial ordered on the whole subject of property and the issues thereto appertaining.

In the first place, it is not clear whether or not the court dealt with the subject upon the theory that, under the erroneous finding of extreme cruelty, it could assign the property to the parties "in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case and the condition of the parties, may deem just," under subdivision 1 of section 146 of the Civil Code. The judgment must stand upon the finding of desertion; and in such case "the community property shall be equally divided between the parties." In the second place, the only property awarded to the appellant was 20 acres of land which was her separate property, and as to it the court had no jurisdiction. This land had been conveyed by the respondent to appellant's father, and by the latter to the appellant, some time before the parties separated; and it was clearly her separate property. There was an artesian well on this 20 acres, and the court decreed that respondent should have three-fourths of all the water flowing from it; but there was no reservation whatever in the conveyance of the land by respondent, and the well went to appellant as part of the land. The court also decreed to respondent "a right of way 40 feet in width across the north end" of said 20 acres; and this was clearly beyond the power of the court to do. There was considerable community property, and none of that was awarded to appellant, while she should have been awarded one-half of it. Whether or not the division of the property sought to be made by the court would have been equitable and just if there had been power to make it, as in cases of extreme cruelty or adultery, is not a question before us.

That part of the judgment which deals with property rights will have to be reversed, and a new trial ordered on that subject; and it will be the duty of the trial court to determine, upon such proper evidence as may be offered, what community property the parties have, and to divide it equally between them. If partition is not practicable, the community property may be ordered sold, and the proceeds, after the satisfaction of any liens which may be on it, divided equally between the parties. Civ. Code, § 147. We observe that the court finds that certain described property is community property, "except twelve hundred dollars' worth, which amount defendant had in cash when he married plaintiff, and upon which defendant operated," etc. It also appears that after the trial of the case had closed, and it had been taken under advisement, appellant asked to have the case opened, so as to allow her to introduce evidence that she had advanced to respondent about $4,700, which she had received from her father, and which he had put into the property; and there are affidavits of herself and her father to the same effect introduced on the motion for a new trial. At another trial this evidence would, of course, be as admissible as would be evidence of respondent that he put $1,200 of his money into the common funds; but it is apparent that neither of these sums of money can be now considered as separate property, unless it can be in some way traced and segregated from the mass of community property as it now exists.

Under section 148 of the Civil Code,[1] this court can deal separately with that part of a decree in a divorce case which disposes of the community property, without disturbing other parts of the decree. We could modify the decree in the case at bar by a special direction to the court below to now amend its judgment so as to award one equal half of the community property to each of the parties, if the findings clearly showed what the community property is. Strozynski v. Strozynski, 97 Cal. 189, 31 Pac. 1130; Brown v. Brown, 60 Cal. 579; Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 62. But the findings are not clear on that subject, and it will be necessary for the court below to retry the issue as to community property (unless the parties can agree about it), determine definitely what the community property is, and amend the decree by adjudging that it be equally divided between the parties; and it will not be necessary to change any other part of the judgment.

It is ordered that all of the judgment and decree appealed from granting a divorce and the custody of the children to respondent, which includes all of said judgment from the first word thereof down to and including the words "be visited by said plaintiff at all reasonable and proper times," on page 28 of the printed transcript, be and the same is hereby, affirmed, and as to said part of said judgment the order denying a new trial is affirmed; and it is further ordered that all of said judgment which disposes of the property and property rights of the parties hereto, and which includes all of said judgment from the words above quoted on page 28 of the printed transcript, down to and including the words "be compelled to pay," which appear on page 30 of the printed transcript, be, and the same is hereby, reversed, and as to the said part of said judgment the order denying a new trial is reversed; and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to hear evidence, and dispose of the community property of the parties to this action in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: TEMPLE, J; HENSHAW, J.

LYNCH et al. (PLUNKETT et al., Interveners) v. ROONEY et al. (S. F. 228.)

VOLUNTARY TRUSTS—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. On distribution of intestate's estate, defendant was declared the distributee, as grantee of her mother, who was declared sole heir. Afterwards, in a letter written to an aunt, she stated that, "some time after [intestate's] property was deeded to me, I heard that P. [another heir] was still living; and I resolved that he should have half the estate, though the law does not compel the division. Still, I feel that, in justice, it belongs to both." Held, that under Civ. Code, § 2221, the letter created a voluntary trust in favor of P. and his heirs, as to an undivided share in intestate's property.

2. Upon the distribution of the estate of an intestate, defendant's grantor was, by decree, declared sole heir and distributee. An action having been brought by another heir to establish a voluntary trust, a third heir intervened, and sought to have established an involuntary trust, on the ground that the decree of distribution was erroneous, in declaring defendant's grantor the sole heir, when there were, in fact, other heirs. Held, that the intervention was in the nature of a collateral attack upon the decree of distribution, and, as such, could not be maintained.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

This action was brought by Margaret Lynch and others, as heirs of defendant's intestate, Bryan Lynch, against Mary Rooney and John Rooney, to establish a voluntary trust in land. Nancy Plunkett and others, also heirs of intestate, intervened, and sought to establish an involuntary trust in the land. There was a judgment for plaintiffs and interveners, and defendants appealed. Affirmed as to plaintiffs. Reversed as to interveners.

McKune & George (Chamberlain & Wheeler, of counsel), for appellants. T. Z. Blakeman, for respondents. J. H. G. Weaver, for interveners.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to establish a trust in certain land. A decree to that effect was rendered by the trial court, and an appeal has been taken to this court from that decree, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial. The facts may be briefly stated as follows: One Bryan Lynch, residing in Humboldt county, was the owner of certain land situated therein. He died intestate, leaving no wife or children, but leaving a sister, Catherine Clark, living in this state. At her request the court appointed the son of Mary Rooney, her daughter, administrator of the estate. During the administration, Catherine Clark conveyed the realty to Mary Rooney, in consideration of love and affection; and upon final distribution, the court having found as a fact that Catherine Clark was the only heir, the property was distributed to Mary Rooney, by virtue of the aforesaid deed. It may be conceded that the distributee, Mary Rooney, occupies no more advantageous position, as to this litigation, than would her grantor, her mother. Some time after the decree of distribution was had, and the estate settled, this action was brought by the children of one Patrick Lynch, a brother of Bryan Lynch, who was living in Ireland at the date of the distribution of the estate, but since deceased. The children of Nancy Plunkett, a deceased sister, who were living in Brooklyn, N. Y., at the date of distribution, intervened, and asked that one-third of the land be adjudged to be theirs, and that Mary Rooney be declared a trustee to that extent. The relief prayed for by the complaint, and also by the complaint in intervention, was granted; and Mary Rooney was adjudged to hold an undivided one-third of this land, each, respectively, as the trustee of the heirs of Patrick Lynch and Nancy Plunkett.

[1] Code Civ. Proc. § 148, authorizes the appellate court to revise the distribution of property made by the trial court in a divorce action.

Two grounds are put forth on the part of respondents to support the soundness of this decree of the trial court: (1) It is claimed that an express trust was declared and created in writing by Mary Rooney; and (2) that Mary Rooney was an involuntary trustee, to the extent of an undivided two-thirds of the land, by reason of a mistake of fact and law committed by her, the administrator of the estate, and the sister of Bryan Lynch, Catherine Clark, whereby the court was misled into finding as a fact, upon the hearing for distribution, that said Catherine Clark was the only heir of Bryan Lynch, deceased, and entitled to the whole of the estate. It is not contended by the interveners that any express trust stands in their favor, and, if there is any express trust existing in favor of plaintiffs, it was declared and created by a certain letter written by Mary Rooney to Margaret Lynch, of Ireland, widow of Patrick Lynch, deceased, after the distribution of the estate; and, if there is any express trust created or declared by this letter, it must be found in the following statements taken therefrom: "My Dear Aunt: I deeply regret that I did not write long before Uncle Patrick's death, because it would have been such a consolation to him and mother to hear directly from each other. Their deaths were not far apart. Mother died September 26, 1884. I have heard from you occasionally through our letters from Dublin. My chief object in writing now is to explain about Uncle Bryan's property, though I hope our correspondence will continue after that point is settled. Uncle Bryan died in the autumn of 1879, leaving no will. At that time, through some mistake, we thought that Uncle Patrick was dead. At mother's desire, my son was appointed administrator; and the court soon gave the property over to her, she being the nearest relative that presented a claim. Mother had been living with me some time, and shortly after she got the property she deeded it to me, not deeming it worth while to divide so little among all the heirs. Some time after Uncle Bryan's property was deeded to me I heard that Uncle Patrick was still living, and I resolved that he should have half of the estate, though the law does not compel the division. Still I feel that in justice it belongs to both of them. If the property was bringing an income, I would not have delayed writing so long, but it does not. Hence I do not feel that I have defrauded you of anything. * * * I have not sold my part, because I hoped my sons would make use of it some day. * * * I think I will likely rent my share in that way, in preference to having it idle and an expense. There are —— acres in the place, and I do not know if there is any difference in the land, with the exception of the seventeen acres that are cleared. You can talk over the matter among yourselves, and see what you wish to do. Anything that is in my power to do for you in regard to the matter I am willing to do, and any further information you wish I will give you as honestly as I can. * * * Your affectionate niece, Mary Rooney." This letter is a "written instrument" under section 852 of the Civil Code. The question then presents itself, was a trust created and declared by this writing? For, if a trust does exist, it was not only declared, but created, by this letter, as nothing went before it in any way creating any express trust. It is provided by section 2221 of the Civil Code: "Subject to the provisions of section 852 a voluntary trust is created as to the trustor and beneficiary by any words or acts of the trustor indicating with reasonable certainty: (1) An intention on the part of the trustor to create a trust; and (2) the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust." Upon a careful consideration of this letter, we are satisfied that an intention upon the part of Mary Rooney to create and declare a trust appears therefrom with reasonable certainty. The subject of the trust is disclosed by the letter to be the land. The purpose is to acknowledge an undivided interest therein in fee in the beneficiaries, and the beneficiaries are the heirs of Patrick Lynch, deceased. The only matter left in any uncertainty is as to the interest the heirs take under the trust. There is no question but that Mary Rooney is an honest woman. This is evidenced by every line of her letter, for from that letter it is apparent that she desired and intended to do what was fair and just towards her absent relatives. Those intentions are disclosed by the entire history of this litigation, and we think the differences arising between these parties could well have been amicably settled without invoking the aid of courts, by the exercise of a little diplomacy upon the part of the attorneys retained by the respective parties. As will be seen hereafter, mistakes of fact and law occurring at the time of the distribution of this estate were the first and primary cause of the present litigation; and, at the date of this letter, Mary Rooney still labored under the mistaken idea that Patrick Lynch and her mother were the sole heirs of Bryan Lynch at the date of his death, when in fact the interveners in this case were also heirs, being children of a deceased sister. When Mary Rooney wrote this letter she recognized the fact that a moral obligation rested upon her to give the heirs of Patrick Lynch that portion of the estate which would have gone to him by the decree of distribution, if Mary had known that he was then in life; and it was to satisfy this moral obligation resting upon her that, as an honest woman, she desired Patrick's heirs to have his interest in the estate. She declared this trust for that reason, and with that end in view; but when she made the writing she thought Patrick's interest was one-half of the estate, when, in truth and in fact, it was but one-third. Hence the moral duty which she desired and intended to perform was performed, and the moral obligation which she desired and intended by the letter to pay was paid, when these heirs were given a one-third interest in the property. Incidentally, by the letter, she described the interest as a one-half interest; but, as we have seen, this was occasioned by a mistake of fact upon her part, and those words are controlled and overthrown by her actual intention, which is clearly manifest from every other line of the letter. That intention was to give Patrick's heirs what the law should have given Patrick in the first instance, to wit, an undivided one-third interest in the realty. We therefore hold that the letter declares and creates a trust in the land in favor of the plaintiffs to that extent.

The interveners were not in the mind of Mary Rooney when she wrote the letter to her aunt in Ireland, and hence they get no relief from its terms. As to them, it is claimed that Mary Rooney is an involuntary trustee, holding an undivided one-third of the land for their benefit. And their contention is based upon the provisions of section 2224 of the Civil Code, which provide, "One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained for the benefit of the person, who would otherwise have had it." It is substantially claimed that upon Mary Rooney's evidence, given upon the hearing of the application for the decree of distribution, the court found as a fact that her mother was entitled to the whole estate, as the only heir; that Mary Rooney was mistaken as to the fact of her mother being the only heir, inasmuch as there were other heirs, and that by reason of her mistake of fact in so testifying the court rendered a wrong judgment; and that Mary Rooney thereby gained the entire estate by a mistake of fact, and should be declared to be an involuntary trustee of two-thirds thereof, as provided by the terms of the section just quoted. It is insisted that the interveners, in asking this relief, are not attacking the decree of distribution, but are seeking relief thereunder. Many cases are cited to support this contention, but they fall short of the mark, and present no question similar to the one here involved. The court, in hearing the petition for the distribution of the estate of Bryan Lynch, deceased, upon legal and proper notice to the entire world, took evidence as to who were the heirs of his estate, entitled to take the same, and thereupon made a finding of fact that Catherine Clark was a sister and the only heir, and, as a conclusion of law, held that said Catherine Clark was entitled to the entire estate. That decree has never been modified, nor even assailed, and, as far as any collateral attack is concerned, it must stand forever as binding and conclusive upon the question of heirship. Whatever counsel may say as recognizing the validity of the decree, and claiming under it, is not strictly true, for that decree declares, as a fact, that Catherine Clark is the only heir of Bryan Lynch; and, to give the interveners the relief here sought, that finding must be first set aside as untrue in fact, and that cannot be done in this action. If such a thing could be done, the stability of judgments and decrees would be a thing of the past. Decrees of distribution would be as unstable as the sands, for omitted heirs from such decrees would be seeking to have involuntary trusts declared thereon at most inopportune times, and in direct opposition to the law as declared by section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure, pertaining to the conclusiveness and finality of judgments and decrees. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order denying a new trial as to the plaintiffs are affirmed, and the judgment and order denying a new trial as to the interveners are reversed, and as to them the cause is remanded.

MECHANICS' LIENS—WHO ARE CONTRACTORS.

The seller, in a contract whereby he agrees to furnish the "purchaser" the electrical machinery for an electric power house under construction by the purchaser, who was to furnish the motive power and connections necessary to connect the electrical machinery with the motive power, title to the electrical machinery to remain in the seller until paid for, is not an "original contractor" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1184), but is merely a material man, though he is required to place the machinery in position, such work requiring the construction of foundations for the dynamos and other technical work necessary to the proper installation of the machinery; and one furnishing the seller with materials is entitled to no lien.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by the John A. Roebling's Sons Company against the Humboldt Electric Light & Power Company and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. N. Gillette, for appellants. Wall J. Tuska, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The contract between the Pacific Electrical Storage Company and the Humboldt Electric Light & Power Company did not constitute the former corporation an "original contractor" for the construction of the electric light works of the latter company, within the meaning of the provisions of the Code relating to liens of mechanics and others. That contract, in effect, simply provided for the furnishing and setting up, complete and ready for use, by the Pacific Electrical Storage Company, in a building to be provided by the purchaser, of certain specified "electrical apparatus and machinery" necessary to be used in the construction of such electric light works; this apparatus, consisting of dynamos, convertors, switch board, lamps, etc., with the necessary wiring and connections, constituting in technical parlance an "electrical plant." The Humboldt Electric Light & Power Company was itself constructing the works, and such machinery or plant was simply purchased by it for use therein. This is expressly contemplated by the contract, which provides by its terms that the last-named corporation, which is therein designated the "purchaser," shall erect the necessary building to receive such plant, build a power house, and furnish the required motive power, including all necessary shafting, belts, pulleys, etc., for connecting the power with such electrical machinery; and construct the pole line required in transmitting and distributing the light. And it also provides that the title to the plant shall not pass to the purchaser "until it is fully paid for as per contract." Under such a contract it is clear that the relation of the Pacific Electrical Storage Company was that of a material man, and nothing more. Hinckley v. Cracker Co., 91 Cal. 136, 27 Pac. 594; Sparks v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 392; Donahue v. Cromartie, 21 Cal. 80. In the first case above cited, where the party was employed under a contract not essentially different from the one before us to manufacture and furnish a steam plant consisting of boiler, engine, feed pipes, etc., and put such machinery in place in a building belonging to the purchaser for the purpose of converting the premises into a factory, it was held that the one so employed was a material man, and not a contractor, within the provisions of sections 1183 and 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The same principle is upheld by the other cases cited. The fact that the party furnishing the machinery and apparatus was to put in the foundation upon which to set the dynamos, and furnish the skilled labor necessary for that and the further purpose of setting up and connecting the machinery and installing the incandescent lamps, in no way alters the nature of the contract, or makes it any less one for furnishing materials. The only way the appliances and apparatus could be made available for use was to have them properly installed and set up, and the fact that certain technical work was required for that purpose did not change this contract into one for construction. As suggested in Hinckley v. Cracker Co., supra: "The work done by them on the premises of defendants in placing them in position was only the completion of their contract to deliver such finished machinery, and did not convert them into contractors for the erection of the factory, or any part of it, within the true intent of the statute. The contract was essentially one to furnish materials for the factory, and not a building contract." The plaintiff, who sold to the defendant Pacific Electrical Storage Company certain wire, part of which was used by the latter in fulfilling its contract to furnish said plant, and the balance of which the storage company sold to the electric light company to construct its pole line, has sued herein to enforce a lien claimed by it upon the premises and works of the defendant Humboldt Electric Light & Power Company for the value of such wire, upon the theory that its vendee was an original contractor for the construction of said electric light works, and plaintiff therefore entitled to a lien thereon as a material man; and this view was taken by the court below, and judgment given for plaintiff. But, as we have seen, the theory upon which plaintiff's case proceeds is erroneous; and, as the statute makes no provision for a lien in favor of one who simply sells materials to another who is himself but a material man, the plaintiff's case has no proper foundation upon which to rest. Sparks v. Mining Co., supra. While the court found in terms that the Pacific Electrical Storage Company was an original contractor, the findings disclose that this is but a conclusion drawn from an erroneous construction of the contract referred to, and, this being so, the conclusion must be held unsupported by the facts. The findings therefore do not warrant the judgment, and the latter cannot stand. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

In re CLARY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 150.)

ADMINISTRATORS—FAILURE TO DISTRIBUTE ASSETS—JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT—INTEREST—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1697, an administrator is not entitled to his final discharge until after payment and delivery of all the property of the estate to those entitled, and in the meantime the probate court has jurisdiction to compel him to comply with the order of distribution.

2. The probate court proceeds in accordance with the principles of equity, and, having jurisdiction of a cause for one purpose, may afford complete and adequate relief in the premises.

3. Where the petition states all the elements of a bill in equity for an accounting, and is answered on the merits, and without objection to the form of proceedings, the fact that it was entitled in an estate, instead of being in form an independent action, is immaterial.

4. Where, after the order of distribution, an administrator has wrongfully retained money belonging to a minor heir, and used it in his own business, and it is not found that a higher rate was realized from such use, legal interest should be awarded from the date of the appropriation, compounded annually.

5. An order of a judge granting an extension of time, after the expiration of the statutory period, within which to propose a bill of exceptions, is ineffectual and void.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Application, in the estate of John A. Clary, deceased, to require the administrator to pay over to one of the heirs her distributive share of the estate. From an order to pay over the amount, with interest, and from an order refusing to settle a bill of exceptions, the administrator appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Eastin, for appellant. Albert C. Aiken, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The administrator, upon distribution, took the share of the estate, consisting of money, distributed to an heir, and appropriated and used it in his own business through a series of years, concealing from the heir, a minor residing in his household, any knowledge that there was anything coming to her from the estate. In due time, after arriving at the age of majority, and discovering her rights, the heir applied to the probate court, the administrator not having been discharged of his trust, to require the latter to pay over to her such distributive share, with interest. The court ordered the administrator to pay over the amount, with legal interest from the date of its appropriation, compounded annually. From this order, and an order refusing to settle a bill of exceptions, the administrator appeals.

There is nothing in the point that the probate court lost jurisdiction in the premises upon the rendition of the decree of distribution, and that the only remedy of the heir was by civil action against the administrator. Jurisdiction by the probate court over an administrator or executor does not cease until his final discharge (McCrea v. Haraszthy, 51 Cal. 146; Dohs v. Dohs, 60 Cal. 255; Ex parte Smith, 53 Cal. 204); and it is only after the payment and delivery of all the property of the estate to those entitled, and production of satisfactory proof of the fact, that he is entitled to his final discharge. Code Civ. Proc. § 1697. Until such final discharge the probate court retains jurisdiction, not alone of the administrator, but of the property of the estate in his hands, and may compel the proper disposition of the latter, in accordance with its decree, by punishing the delinquent trustee, if necessary, as for contempt. Ex parte Smith, supra; Wheeler v. Bolton, 54 Cal. 302.

It is urged, however, that, even if the court could require the delivery of the property distributed, this power is limited to the specific property or amount awarded by the decree, and the court is without authority to take an accounting, or award interest according to equitable principles, as that can only be done in an action for an accounting. This position is not tenable. Jurisdiction being conceded for the one purpose, it follows necessarily for the other. The awarding of the interest is but an incident to the right to award the principal; and proceeding, as it does, in accordance with the principles of equity (Estate of Moore, 96 Cal. 522, 31 Pac. 584; In re Clos' Estate [Cal.] 42 Pac. 971), the probate court must be held to have jurisdiction to afford complete and adequate relief in the premises, since equity does nothing piecemeal. See Hyland v. Baxter, 98 N. Y. 610; Verdier v. Roach, 96 Cal. 478, 31 Pac. 554. If this were not true, however, the objection could not obtain in this case, within the principles stated in Re Thompson's Estate, 101 Cal. 349, 35 Pac. 991, and 36 Pac. 98, 508, and Re De Leon, 102 Cal. 537, 36 Pac. 864. As in those cases, the petition here states all the elements of a bill in equity for an accounting, and was answered on the merits, and without objection to the form of the proceeding. The fact, therefore, that it was entitled in the estate, instead of being in form an independent action, can make no difference. "The petition, under these circumstances, may be regarded as a petition in equity, addressed to the equitable powers of the superior court, and the form of its title is immaterial." In re Thompson's Estate, supra.

The other points require no particular notice. The basis upon which interest was allowed was the correct one in an instance such as this, where the trustee has used the funds in his own business, and it is not found that a higher rate of interest was realized from such use. Estate of Cousins (Cal.) 44 Pac. 182, and cases therein cited. There is no element of estoppel in the facts found, which facts, we think, are fully within the issues; and the statute of limitations, even if available, was not pleaded. The court below was clearly right in refusing to settle the proposed bill of exceptions, as it was not prepared within the time allowed by the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 650), or any authorized extension thereof, and the appellant's right to have it settled was thereby lost. Haynes, New Trials & App. 773. The order of the judge granting an extension of time after the expiration of the statutory period within which to propose a bill was ineffectual and void, and was properly ignored by the court as conferring no authority upon it to settle the bill. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

GEURKINK et al. v. CITY OF PETALUMA et al. (S. F. 250.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CHANGING COURSE OF NATURAL STREAM—LIABILITY—INJUNCTION—PARTIES—JOINDER.

1. A city is liable for damages to property caused by its changing the course of a natural stream flowing within its limits so as to make it flow along a public street on which the property abuts, in such a manner as to prevent free access to it.

2. A city will be enjoined from changing the course of a natural stream flowing within its limits so as to make it flow along a public street in such a manner as to impair free access to property abutting thereon, where compensation for damage to such property has not, as required by Const. art. 1, § 14, been first made or paid into court for the owners.

3. Owners of separate tracts of land which will be permanently injured by a contemplated public improvement may unite in an action to enjoin the improvement.

4. Owners of separate tracts of land must sue separately to recover damages to their respective tracts caused by the same public improvement.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by B. W. Geurkink and another against the city of Petaluma and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for appellants. J. P. Rogers (W. B. Haskell, of counsel), for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for a permanent injunction against the city of Petaluma, brought by two owners of lots abutting upon Eighth and G streets of that city, respectively. Relief was denied them in the trial court, and this appeal comes to us from the judgment, and also from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The facts material to a consideration of this question may be succinctly stated as follows: Edwards creek has been from time immemorial a natural water channel passing over Eighth street, and thence across the city to tide water. Some few years past the city blocked the channel of this stream where it crossed Eighth street, and attempted to take care of its waters by a sewer leading from this point down F street. During heavy rains this sewer proved entirely inadequate to carry the waters coming from the mountains via the stream, and F street was flooded as the result, the natural fall of the land tending that way. The plaintiffs' property was situated a block or more distant and east from the point of obstruction; Geurkink's lot being upon Eighth street, and facing north, and the lot of his co-plaintiff facing east upon G street. The land covered by Eighth street between F and G streets was higher than at the point where the sewer connected with the stream, and, if any water ever did pass over Eighth street to G street prior to the time when the work of the city here complained of was inaugurated, the amount was slight; for, as we have seen, the lay of the land forced it north down F street. Under the conditions just stated the city of Petaluma, by its board of trustees, adopted a scheme to take care of the waters coming from this creek which could not be carried away by the aforesaid sewer. This scheme included the enlargement of a culvert at F and Eighth streets, the digging of a large gutter or channel upon the south side of Eighth street to G street, a culvert across Eighth street at this point, and a gutter channel down G street upon the west side thereof to Seventh street. The work mapped out by this scheme was in active operation when the plaintiffs began the present litigation, and a temporary restraining order was issued. These facts cannot be disputed by the record, and neither can it be successfully disputed that from the evidence the completion of the scheme would result in great damage to plaintiff's property.

The facts being plainly outlined before us, the application of the law to these facts is not difficult, and at the outset of this investigation it must be borne in mind that the principles of law appertaining to waters in natural channels are different, to a considerable degree, from those applicable to the control of surface waters. That a city has much greater powers and less liabilities respecting surface waters than it has respecting highways of natural channels cannot be questioned. Reduced to its smallest compass, the fact is that the city of Petaluma is engaged in changing the natural course of the waters of Edwards creek, and such change, if made, will damage the property of these plaintiffs by preventing a free use of the same. Is defendant liable for such action upon its part, and is the proceeding of injunction by a court of equity the proper remedy? When this work has been completed, and the damage actually done, there can be no question but that a remedy at law for such damages could be invoked. Abutting owners have a right to the full use of the street for the purpose of coming and going to and from their property, and any unlawful interference with that use is a trespass upon the rights of such owners, whether that interference be occasioned by an individual, a corporation, or the municipality itself. It is said in Eachus v. Railway Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750: "The right of the owner of a city lot to the use of the street adjacent thereto is property, which cannot be taken from him for public use without compensation; and any act by which this right is impaired is to that extent a damage to his property. * * * Such easement is a right of property incident to the lot itself, and any damage sustained by the owner in its destruction or impairment is a damage peculiar to himself, and independent of any damage sustained by the public generally. For the purpose of determining this damage, it is immaterial whether he has a fee in the street, or only an easement for its use. In either case it is property, for an injury to which he is entitled to relief,"—citing cases. See, also, Bigelow v. Ballerino (Cal.) 44 Pac. 307.

Respondent also insists that compensation to an abutting owner by the city for an interference in the use of the street need not be made before the damage has taken place. But article 1, section 14, of the constitution expressly provides that compensation must be first made or paid into court for the owner; and in the Ballerino Case, last cited, this court said: "But, where there is no such benefit, the property owner may rest secure in the protection which the constitution affords him, that his property shall not be taken or damaged without compensation first made. It is not incumbent upon him to demand that the authorities shall respect his rights. The duty is theirs to work no unlawful invasion of them." And again: "It would matter little whether the authorities first compensated the property owners, and then declared the alley closed, or first declared it closed and then made compensation, provided it be distinctly understood that in the latter case, which is the case at bar, no rights attach or are lost, no invasion of the property rights of a nonconsenting owner may be worked, and no substantial impairment of his easement result, until compensation has been made to him in the constitutional mode."

It is also claimed that injunction is not the proper remedy, but, in view of what has already been said, that remedy fits the case. A threatened permanent injury to a party's realty may be enjoined, and such is this case, as disclosed by the record. In Brown v. City of Seattle, 5 Wash. 44, 31 Pac. 313, and 32 Pac. 214, it is held that injunction is the proper remedy in a like case; and the court, in speaking to that point, said: "We can foresee many difficulties, and perhaps much litigation, likely to ensue from the faithful enforcement of our constitutional requirement that damages be first paid; but we have no choice in the matter, and these difficulties, as well as many others, must be met and dealt with as they arise. It will not be every case in which the property owner deems himself likely to be injured that will justify an injunction, and the courts of the state will undoubtedly do their duty in this particular, and grant no preliminary restraining order or injunction until it is made to appear with legal probability or certainty that damages will be incurred by the grading of the streets." Until compensation was made the city had no right to damage the plaintiffs' property. Payment of such damage was a condition precedent to the creation of the right; and, until payment, the city was a trespasser. In such a case injunction is the plain, ordinary, and best remedy. See Schaufele v. Doyle, 86 Cal. 107, 24 Pac. 834.

A demurrer was filed to the complaint upon the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and misjoinder of causes of action. As the case is returned to the lower court for a new trial, it becomes proper to suggest that the demurrer should have been sustained. As to the relief sought by injunction, the plaintiffs were properly joined, but as to damages there was a misjoinder. If damages are sought for the acts of defendants, the plaintiffs must sue separately. Foreman v. Boyle, 88 Cal. 290, 26 Pac. 94. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint as they may see fit.

TAXES—PAYMENT UNDER PROTEST—SUITS TO RECOVER.

Pol. Code, § 3819 (St. 1893, p. 32), providing for actions against counties to recover illegal taxes paid under protest, does not authorize an action against a county for taxes collected by it for the use of a school district, and placed in the treasury to the credit of the school fund, as the county has no interest in or control over the fund.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by Mark Elberg against the county of San Luis Obispo. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Shipsey and Graves & Graves, for appellant. F. A. Dorn, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In the department opinion rendered in this case (41 Pac. 475) it was decided that the judgment appealed from entered after a general demurrer to the complaint had been sustained should be affirmed. This was upon the ground that no cause of action was stated against the defendant county, which was not a proper party defendant, and against which plaintiff had no claim or demand. The point, however, had not been presented in the briefs of counsel, and it was urged that the decision worked a hardship upon appellant, who had thus been given no opportunity to argue the question. The rehearing was therefore ordered. Upon a second examination we are satisfied with the department opinion. Appellant is in the unfortunate position of claiming a cause of action against B. which he seeks to prosecute against A. He has stated no cause of action against B., and could not amend to substitute A. for B. His only course would be to institute a new suit against the true defendant. The reasoning and authority in support of the conclusion that the county is not a proper defendant will be found set forth more at length in Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. San Diego Co. (No. 19,407; this day decided) 44 Pac. 571. The judgment is affirmed.

IONS v. HARBISON. (No. 19,590.)

ADMINISTRATOR—SALE OF HOMESTEAD—VALIDITY —GIVING OF BOND—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL.

1. The superior court having been given jurisdiction over the homestead of a deceased husband or wife for some purposes, by Code Civ. Proc. § 1475, a sale of the homestead of a deceased wife as a part of her estate, by order of the court, on application of the husband as administrator, and where the record did not disclose the homestead character of the property, though erroneous, is not void, and cannot be collaterally attacked by the husband or his subsequent grantee.

2. While Code Civ. Proc. § 1388, requires one to whom letters testamentary or of administration are directed to issue to execute a bond before receiving them, the failure of an administrator to give bond until after issuance of his letters will not invalidate his acts after his bond is filed and approved.

3. A husband who, as administrator of the estate of his deceased wife, asked and obtained an order for the sale of the wife's homestead as a part of her estate, and applied the proceeds to the payment of incumbrances on the property and other debts, though in reality the title to the homestead vested in him on his wife's death, and both he and the purchaser acted under a mistake of law, is estopped to recover the property without reimbursing the purchaser; and a grantee from him, with knowledge of the facts, stands in no better position.

Action by P. N. Ions against D. F. Harbison. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cassius Carter and Withington & Carter, for appellant. McNealy & Whitehead, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to quiet title. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial. The property in question is the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of section 35, township 14 S. of range 3 W., S. B. M., containing 40 acres, situated in San Diego county. On February 10, 1888, Charles U. Bell, being the owner of said premises, conveyed them to his wife, Mary E. Bell, by a grant deed duly executed, for the consideration of $850. On October 12, 1888, Bell and wife executed to one Flagg a mortgage upon said land, to secure their promissory note for $250, due six months after date, with interest at 2 per cent. per month. On January 28, 1890, said Mary E. Bell declared a homestead thereon for the benefit of herself and husband. C. U. Bell's title was by patent from the United States, dated November 24, 1890, and which inured to his wife under his prior grant. All these instruments were recorded at or about their date. Mary E. Bell died July 1, 1890, seised of said premises. The marriage relation continued to that date, and said land continued to be occupied by the husband and wife as a homestead. After the death of Mrs. Bell, Mr. Bell was appointed, and on September 10, 1890, qualified, as the administrator of her estate. In the inventory and appraisement of the estate returned on September 12, 1890, the only property alleged to belong to her estate was said land, appraised at $400, and $12 in money, received as rents therefrom. On September 22, 1891, the administrator petitioned the court for an order to sell said land at private sale, and set out in his petition the several items of liabilities, including said mortgaged debt, expenses of last sickness and funeral, and expenses of administration accrued and estimated, amounting in all to $737, and alleging that said land and money was the only property of said estate, that said mortgagee was threatening to foreclose said mortgage, that he could only realize from the sale of the land the sum of $700, and that a foreclosure of the mortgage would involve large additional costs and expenses. An order of sale was granted, and the land in question was sold to the defendant, Harbison, for said sum of $700. Said sale was confirmed on February 12, 1892, the money paid, and said mortgage satisfied, which then amounted, with interest, to $560, and the administrator conveyed the premises to the defendant, and his deed was recorded. On June 12, 1894, the plaintiff offered said Charles U. Bell $5 for his personal quitclaim deed of said land, and, that offer being declined, $10 was offered and accepted; and a quitclaim deed was thereupon executed and delivered to plaintiff, and this action was commenced June 14, 1894, to quiet plaintiff's title under said deed. The facts in the case were stipulated by the parties, and there is therefore no conflict in the evidence.

By the deed from Bell to his wife, she presumptively became seised of the land as of her separate estate (Taylor v. Opperman, 79 Cal. 468, 21 Pac. 869; Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. 715; Carter v. McQuade, 83 Cal. 274, 23 Pac. 348); and, she having filed thereon a declaration of homestead, upon her death the title thereto vested in her surviving husband, subject, however, to the mortgage to Flagg, which was executed by both to secure a promissory note, also executed by both prior to the declaration of homestead. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff contends that the property in question was not subject to administration, and that, therefore, the court "had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter administered upon." But section 1475, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "if the homestead selected and recorded, prior to the death of the decedent, be returned in the inventory appraised at not exceeding $5,000 in value, or was previously appraised as provided in the Civil Code, and such appraised value did not exceed that sum, the superior court must, by order, set it off to the persons in whom the title is vested by the preceding section," and also provides for the payment of existing liens thereon. It is therefore clear that the court has jurisdiction over the homestead for some purposes; and it seems to follow that if the court, from ignorance of the fact that it was a homestead, or by inadvertence, or mistake of law, made an order not authorized by the statute, its proceedings, however erroneous, would not be without jurisdiction, and hence would be valid as against a collateral attack. Indeed, the record of the probate proceedings does not disclose the fact that there ever was a declaration of homestead; and therefore, upon the face of the record, the superior court had jurisdiction. It follows that if the administrator, having failed to disclose his interest in the property under the declaration of homestead, had appealed to this court upon the record of that case, assuming that all other proceedings were sufficient, the jurisdiction of that court must have been affirmed; and, if so, he could not now question it.

But plaintiff (respondent here) further contends that there were jurisdictional defects in the proceedings prior to the petition for the sale of the land, and thereunder specifies several particulars. Only one of these need be noticed, as the sufficiency of the petition for letters of administration, and of the notice of hearing, are not attacked. That objection is that the letters were issued and the oath of office taken by the administrator on September 6th, while his bond was dated the 10th, and approved on the 11th. Section 1388, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "every person to whom letters testamentary or of administration are directed to issue must, before receiving them, execute a bond," etc. It is true, an administrator is not authorized to act until he has given bond, but the mere order of time in which the act of receiving the letters and the act of giving the bond are performed will not affect the validity of his appointment, nor of any act performed by him after giving the bond, especially where no official act was performed or attempted to be performed in the mean time. None of the cases cited by respondent sustain his contention that in such case new letters of administration must issue after the bond is given. It is not claimed that any official act was performed by Bell before his bond was made and approved.

It is also insisted that the petition for the sale of the land was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction to order the sale; that the order first made was vacated, and the order under which the land was sold was afterwards entered, without a new order to show cause, or any continuance entered; and that the bond required by the statute was given under the first order, and none under the second. It is not necessary to discuss the nature or source of the jurisdiction of the superior courts in such cases, nor to restate the requirements of section 1537, Code Civ. Proc., in reference to petitions for the sale of real estate by an administrator. These questions, as well as the other objections above specified, were fully considered and decided by this court in bank in the recent case of Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 Pac. 458; and, upon the authority of that case, the jurisdiction of the court in this case to order the sale must be sustained. There were many errors and irregularities in the proceeding, but as was said in Burris v. Kennedy, supra, "if the court had jurisdiction, errors in the exercise of it, however gross, would not render the decision invalid."

But conceding, for the sake of the argument, that the court had no jurisdiction, and that the sale was void, it would seem to be beyond question that Bell would have been estopped to claim title to the land as against the defendant; and, if so, the plaintiff, claiming under Bell, with knowledge of the facts, is equally estopped. Bell asserted in a solemn judicial proceeding that the title to the property was in the estate of his deceased wife, and not in himself. He received the purchase money, and applied it to the payment of the mortgage debt, which was a valid lien upon the land for which he, as well as the estate, was liable, and to the payment of the funeral expenses and costs of administration which he had incurred, and, having conveyed the property to the defendant, put him in possession. There was no surplus arising from the sale. He was the sole beneficiary, and, upon respondent's theory, the sole owner. To retain these benefits resulting from the payment of the purchase money by the defendant, and at the same time recover the property from him, would be a fraud which a court of equity will not permit. He had full knowledge of all the facts affecting his title. His mistake was one of law, as was that also of the defendant; but to permit Bell to retain the purchase money and the property too is to give him a very profitable relief from his mistake, while it would visit upon the defendant a severe penalty for the same mistake. It may be that, upon the discovery of his mistake, he could have rescinded the sale; but, if so, it could only have been upon full restoration of the purchase money.

It is conceded in the stipulation of facts that the defendant saw an abstract of title of the property, and therefore had the means of knowing the true state of the title; but he was not a lawyer, and his good faith is not questioned He knew that Bell had taken out letters of administration upon the estate of his deceased wife; that this was the only property claimed to belong to the estate; and that the court had recognized it as such in making the order of sale. Under these circumstances, it would be going far to say that he was guilty of negligence in relying upon what laymen would ordinarily regard as a judicial determination that the land in question was the property of the estate. Indeed, the court itself seems to have relied upon the solemn representation of Bell that it was the separate estate of his wife. Bell was not injured. There is no pretense that he did not receive the full value of the property, nor has either he or the plaintiff offered to return to the defendant the purchase money paid. It was not the receipt of the money under a mistake of law, but the retention of it while assuming to convey the land to another by Bell, and the assertion of title by the plaintiff with knowledge of the facts, that constitute the fraud upon the defendant and creates the estoppel. In Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, a tenant for life sold and conveyed the premises, the sale and conveyance purporting to pass the fee. It was held (page 434) that the alienation passed only the particular estate, and had no operation on the estate in remainder; but it was held that "if the remainder-men were adults, and accepted a part of the purchase money as compensation for the estate in remainder, they would in a court of equity be estopped from asserting their legal estate, and the court would compel them to convey to the purchaser, or bar them from asserting their legal title against him. The acceptance of a part of the purchase money as compensation for the remainder would be a ratification and adoption of the unauthorized alienation and conveyance. * * * It is a plain principle of justice, of right, and of law that a man cannot accept the benefits and reject the burdens of a transaction." A stronger case in some of its circumstances than the one at bar is that of Robertson v. Bradford, 73 Ala. 116. There the intestate died seised of the premises, leaving as his only heir at law a daughter, then a minor of tender years. The administrator obtained an order to sell, and sold the house and lot, and applied the proceeds to payment of the debts of the decedent and the maintenance of the child. The order directing the sale was void for want of jurisdiction. The daughter, while a minor, married, and by her husband, as next friend, brought an action of ejectment to recover the premises; whereupon the grantee of the purchaser, the daughter having then attained majority, filed a bill to enjoin the prosecution of the ejectment case. It was held that the sale was a nullity, but the purchaser having paid the value of the premises, and the proceeds having been applied to the payment of debts against the estate and the maintenance of the appellant in her helpless infancy, thus relieving the personal estate, and restitution not having been tendered, or intended, she was estopped in a court of equity from asserting her legal title, to the prejudice of the purchaser or his privies The court further said: "There is no principle of law better settled, or resting on wiser considerations of public policy and higher considerations of justice, than that no person who has received and retains the fruits of a judicial proceeding can be heard to assail it, either for irregularity or illegality, to the prejudice of others who have in good faith relied and acted upon it as valid. In the application of this principle, it is not of importance that the proceeding is void because of a want of jurisdiction in the court entertaining and sanctioning it. The foundation of the principle is that parties cannot act upon and adopt such parts of a transaction as may be favorable and beneficial to themselves, and at the same time repudiate it so far as it may involve them in corresponding duties to others who have yielded the right and advantage to them." In Deford v. Mercer, 24 Iowa, 118, it was held (Dillon, C. J., writing the opinion) that where heirs, after arriving of age, with full knowledge of all the facts, and in the absence of fraud or mistake of fact, receive and retain the purchase money arising from the sale by their guardian of their interest in certain lands, they are thereby estopped from questioning the validity of such sale, and that this principle is not limited to cases of voidable sales, but extends to those that are void. See, also, Freem. Jud. Sales, § 50, and cases there cited. These cases are clearly distinguishable from Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279, 368, and Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, cited and relied upon by respondent. There the effect, if the alleged estoppel had been sustained, would have been to deprive the party of his property without compensation, because of acts or declarations made in ignorance of their rights, and upon which the opposite party should not have relied. Those were cases of estoppel, strictly so called; while the case at bar and the other authorities before cited are treated of by Bigelow as "quasi estoppels"; or as stated by Mr. Justice Field, in Brant v. Iron Co., 93 U. S. 326, 336: "There are undoubtedly cases where a party may be concluded from asserting his original rights to property in consequence of his acts or conduct in which the presence of fraud, actual or constructive, is wanting, as, where one of two innocent persons must suffer from the negligence of another, he through whose agency the negligence was occasioned will be held to bear the loss; and, where one has received the fruits of a transaction, he is not permitted to deny its validity whilst retaining its benefits. But such cases are generally referable to other principles than that of equitable estoppel, although the same result is produced." The second of these cases, the learned justice says, "is the application of the doctrine of ratification or election."

That the plaintiff, having purchased with knowledge of the facts, is in no better situation than his grantor, requires neither discussion nor citation of authorities. He was expressly informed by Bell that the defendant had bought and paid for the property, and that he (Bell) would prefer to give him a deed if he knew where to find him. He was not a purchaser in good faith. The price paid for the quitclaim, though sufficient as a consideration between him and Bell, indicates very clearly that he was speculating in a small way upon the supposed misfortunes of another. He understood he was purchasing this lawsuit, which he commenced two days thereafter; and, having had such enjoyment as it afforded, he cannot reasonably complain if he gets no more.

The first finding is "that all and singular the allegations of the complaint are true." These allegations are that plaintiff is the owner, and that defendant's claim is without right. But all the facts were embodied in a stipulation; and, in the second finding, the court, by reference, adopted the stipulation as a finding. This stipulation set out the probate proceedings, and admitted that plaintiff had notice of all the facts alleged by the defendant, except as to personal representations as to title made to him by the administrator and his counsel. The first finding was therefore not justified by the evidence, if it be regarded as a finding of fact. But the facts being conceded by the plaintiff, and all embodied in the findings, the conclusions that the plaintiff is the owner, and that the defendant's claim is without right, are conclusions of law. For example, if a jury be called, and the parties, instead of calling witnesses to prove disputed facts, present a written stipulation containing all the facts, the jury would be dismissed, because there is no disputed fact to be determined by them; the sole question being one of law, arising upon the conceded facts. In Niles v. Edwards, 90 Cal. 10, 13, 27 Pac. 159, it was said: "There is a finding that defendant did not at any time convert the stock. This is evidently a conclusion of the court from the special facts found. If there had been no other finding, this would probably be regarded as the ultimate fact; but, in the connection in which it is here found, it is simply conclusion of law, and must be so held."

The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant upon the findings, enjoining the plaintiff from asserting title to the premises under his said quitclaim deed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant upon the findings, enjoining the plaintiff from asserting title to the premises under his said quitclaim deed.

ELLIS v. TULARE COUNTY. (Sac. 70.) [1]

COUNTIES—SUPERVISORS AS ROAD COMMISSIONERS—COMPENSATION.

By Pol. Code, §§ 2641, 2645, as amended by St. 1893, p. 113, county supervisors are made ex officio road commissioners in their respective districts, and their compensation for such services is therein fixed, "when not otherwise provided by law." By the county government act (St. 1891, p. 295, § 173, subsec. 15), the compensation of supervisors in counties of the eleventh class is fixed at six dollars per day for actual service, and certain mileage; and section 216 provides that the salaries and fees provided in the act shall be in full compensation for all services rendered, either as officers or ex officio officers. Held, that the compensation of supervisors in counties of the eleventh class, while acting as road commissioners, is provided for by the county government act, and fixed at six dollars per day, and is therefore not affected by the provisions of Code, § 2645.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Justin Jacobs, Judge.

Action by John G. Ellis against Tulare county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. B. Howard, for appellant. Lamberson & Middlecoff, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. During the year 1894, John G. Ellis, the plaintiff, was a supervisor and ex officio road commissioner for supervisor district No. 5 in Tulare county. As such road commissioner, he performed services in his district for payment of which he in January, 1895, presented a claim to the board of supervisors of the county for allowance. The claim was properly itemized and verified, and was for 117 days' services, at $6 per day. The board rejected the claim, and thereupon he commenced this action to recover the sum of $702, alleged to be due him for the services so rendered. The case was tried by the court, upon a stipulation as to the facts; and on June 25, 1895, the court rendered its decision, and ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. Judgment was accordingly so entered, and from it the defendant appeals, without any statement or bill of exceptions.

In 1894, Tulare county was a county of the eleventh class, and the only question is, was the plaintiff, under the law as it then stood, entitled to the compensation demanded for his services as road commissioner? Prior to 1891 the Political Code contained the following provisions: Section 2641 declared that "each supervisor shall be ex officio road commissioner of the several road districts in his supervisor district, * * * provided that no member of the board of supervisors shall receive any compensation for any services whatever performed by him, or required of him, under any of the provisions of this chapter, other than his salary or per diem and mileage as a supervisor." Section 2642 provided for the election or appointment in the several counties of the state of road overseers; and section 2645 prescribed the duties of road overseers, and the compensation to be paid for their services. In 1891 these sections were amended by an act of the legislature which was passed March 31st, and took effect on the Monday after the 1st day of January, 1893. St. 1891, p. 474. As amended, section 2641 omits the clause as to compensation. Section 2642 abolishes the office of road overseer; and section 2645 imposes upon the road commissioner the duties which had been performed by the road overseer, and provides that, "when not otherwise provided by law, he shall receive for his services as such road commissioner twenty cents per mile one way for all distances actually traveled by him in the performance of his duties, provided that he shall not in any one year receive more than three hundred dollars." In 1893 sections 2641 and 2645 were again amended by an act of the legislature, which was passed March 9th, and took effect from and after its passage. St. 1893, p. 113. These amendments consisted chiefly in the transfer from the last to the first named section of the provision as to compensation. On March 31, 1891, a county government act was passed, which took effect from and after its passage, "except as prohibited by the constitution," and was in force during the year 1894. St. 1891, p. 295. The act contained the following provisions: Section 173: "In counties of the eleventh class the county officers shall receive, as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their office, the following salaries, to wit: * * * (15) Supervisors, each six dollars per day for actual service, and forty cents per mile while traveling from his place of residence to the county seat: provided, that no more than one mileage in any one monthly term shall be allowed." Section 216: "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided." By this act the counties of the state were divided into 53 classes, and as to each class it was provided that "the county officers shall receive, as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their office, the following salaries, to wit." As to a few of the classes special provision was made for the compensation of the supervisors as such and as road commissioners. For example, the provision as to the fourth class was: "Supervisors, twelve hundred dollars each per annum, and five hundred dollars per annum as road commissioners." In the provision, however, as to most of the classes, no special mention was made of "road commissioners"; but the supervisors were allowed in some cases a gross sum, and in others a per diem and mileage.

It is contended for appellant that, as no special provision was made for the compensation of road commissioners in counties of the eleventh class, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for his services as such commissioner the per diem allowed supervisors, and that his right to recover was limited to the mileage provided for by section 2645 of the Political Code, as amended in 1891, and by section 2641, as amended in 1893. This contention cannot, in our opinion, be sustained. The plaintiff was a supervisor of the county, and there is no denial that the services for which he seeks to recover were actually performed by him as road commissioner. This being so, it must be assumed that the services were "required of him by law or by virtue of his office," and that he was entitled to the compensation which the statute provided a supervisor should receive in such case.

It is not necessary to consider the other questions discussed by counsel. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

CALKINS' ESTATE et al. v. CALKINS et al.

(No. 19,588.)

PROBATE—APPEAL—NOTICE—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE—DECLARATION OF TESTATOR—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An appeal from a judgment refusing to admit a will to probate will not be dismissed on motion of heirs at law of testatrix, who did not appear or become parties to the proceedings in the court below, for failure of appellant to serve them with notice of appeal.

2. In the contest of a will, on the ground of undue influence, declarations of testatrix as to statements and acts of those by whom it is alleged that she was induced to make the will are inadmissible to prove such statements or acts.

3. Declarations of testatrix after the execution of the will, showing her dissatisfaction therewith, and a desire to execute a new will, are inadmissible to show that the former was executed under undue influence.

4. Evidence that the person who was alleged to have exerted the undue influence was a penurious woman is inadmissible to show that she used such influence in favor of her son, the husband of testatrix.

5. In the contest of a will on the ground of undue influence, an instruction, discoursing on the difficulty of proving undue influence when resorted to by an adroit and crafty person, and stating that the more cunning the person exerting such influence, and the more helpless and secluded the testatrix, the less plainly defined are the badges which usually denote it, is erroneous; there being no evidence to show that the persons alleged to have exerted the undue influence were crafty, or that testatrix was secluded.

6. An abstract instruction, though correct, is misleading when there is no evidence in the case to warrant it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Contest of a will by De La Cuesta against J. W. Calkins and others. From a judgment for contestant, proponent and another appeal. Reversed.

Wright & Day, S. J. Parsons, William Gardner, and A. A. Oglesby, for appellants. Garber, Boalt & Bishop and Boyce, Taggart & Wheeler, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. A document purporting to be the last will and testament of Pilar Calkins, deceased, by which she gave all of her property to her husband, Albert C. Calkins, and appointed his father, J. W. Calkins, the executor thereof, was presented for probate to the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara by said J. W. Calkins. Prior to the day set for hearing the application for its probate, Eduardo De La Cuesta, a brother of the deceased, filed written grounds of opposition to its probate, to which the proponent made answer, and the issues presented by this contest were afterwards tried by a jury. When the cause came on for trial, upon motion of the contestant the names of Mrs. J. W. Calkins, Albert C. Calkins, and Mrs. Lily B. Parsons were added as defendants in the proceeding, the last two of whom filed a disclaimer of any interest therein. At the close of the testimony, all of the issues except those upon the claim of undue influence, menace, and fraud were waived by both parties, and the following special issue was submitted to the jury: "Did the said Pilar Calkins, at the time of signing the instrument here offered for probate, sign or acknowledge the same under undue influence, duress, or menace of the defendants, or any or either of them?" To this issue the jury replied in the affirmative. The court thereupon rendered its judgment denying probate to the will. A motion for a new trial was made by the proponent and the defendant, Albert C. Calkins; and, having been denied by the court, an appeal has been taken by them from both the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

1. The appeal from the judgment was not taken until more than 60 days after its entry, and for that reason must be dismissed. A motion has also been made on behalf of certain heirs at law of the deceased, who did not appear or become parties to the proceeding in the court below, to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial, upon the ground that no service of the appeal has been made upon them; but, upon the authority of Ryer's Estate (Cal.) 42 Pac. 1082, this motion must be denied.

2. We are of the opinion, however, that the evidence fails to sustain the verdict of the jury, and that the order denying a new trial must be reversed. We find in the record no evidence tending to show that the testatrix was subject to any menace, duress, fraud, or undue influence in the execution of her will, or that the document presented for probate is not in all respects the expression of her own volition. There is no evidence that any person ever spoke to her in reference to the manner in which she should make her will, or gave her any suggestions in reference thereto. The will was drawn by Mr. Wright, an attorney in Santa Barbara, at the request of the testatrix, and in accordance with instructions given him by her, and it does not appear that he had ever seen her before she came to his office for the purpose of having her will prepared.

On the day before it was executed, while she was on her way to his office for the express purpose of having him prepare it, she met him, and requested him to do so. Upon his asking her how she wished it prepared, she said to him that she desired to will all of her property to her husband, and gave him his name. An appointment for the execution of the will was then made between them for the next day. On the next day she visited his office, and the will was read to her, and her attention drawn to the fact that she had not designated any person as executor, and that a blank had been left in the draft of the will for his name. When Mr. Wright asked her whom she desired to have as executor, she asked him if her husband could be executor; and, as he started to write her husband's name in the will, she stopped him, and, after a moment's reflection, said, "I think I will have father Calkins for executor," and directed him to put in the name of J. W. Calkins. Mr. Wright then wrote the name of the proponent in the place left in the draft for that purpose, and the testatrix signed and executed the will in his presence and that of Mrs. Parsons, who thereupon signed their names as witnesses. Mrs. Parsons, the other witness to the will, is a sister of the testatrix's husband, and, at the time the will was prepared, was visiting at the house of her father, where the testatrix was then also visiting. In pursuance of an arrangement therefor, made at the instance of the testatrix on the previous evening, Mrs. Parsons took her to town in a buggy on the morning that she first saw Mr. Wright, and, while on the way to his office, they met him in the street. Mrs. Parsons then got out of the buggy, and withdrew from hearing until the testatrix and Mr. Wright had finished their interview. On their way home, the testatrix, of her own accord, and without any inquiry upon the subject, informed Mrs. Parsons that she had given directions that her husband should have her property, and requested Mrs. Parsons to be a witness to the will. On the next day, Mrs. Parsons accompanied the testatrix to Mr. Wright's office, where the will was executed. Mrs. Parsons testified that she said nothing to the testatrix in reference to the will, and had no conversation about it with her. After its execution the will was placed in an envelope by Mr. Wright, and given to the testatrix, and in the evening the testatrix gave the will to the proponent, and requested him to take care of it, and, at his direction, placed it in a drawer in his room. The will remained in his custody until after her death. He testified that she never spoke to him about making a will, and that he had never spoken to her upon the subject, and had never heard her say anything on the subject, or heard any one say anything to her in his presence, and that he did not know the contents of the document until after her death. Mrs. J. W. Calkins testified: "A few days before she went home, she said: 'Mother, I want to make a will. What lawyer had I better go to?' I said: 'I guess Judge Wright. He is a good man, and gentle. He won't tire you. Signify your want, and it will be sufficient.' She said nothing about the kind of a will she wanted to make. I did not ask her. She never after mentioned a will to me, or I to her. I never in any way sought to influence Pilar in the making of a will. She returned to Zaca ranch about May 6th, and the conversation was a few days before. She had spoken to me before that time. Just after Mrs. Bergeron was married, she said: 'Mother, I want to make a will. My sisters, after they were married, made their wills to their husbands, and I would like to.' I simply answered as far as politeness required. I made some general remarks on the subject of wills,—that some people felt nervous about a will; that they did not need to; and the subject dropped." There is no evidence of any attempt on the part of her husband to influence her in the disposition of her property, or that he had any knowledge of her purpose or of the fact of making the will, until long after its execution. The claim of the contestant that the testatrix had no affection for her husband would rebut any presumption of undue influence on his part, as would also the claim that the testatrix had a hearty dislike for Mrs. J. W. Calkins.

The respondent does not claim that there is any direct evidence in support of the verdict outside of the evidence of certain declarations of the testatrix. The evidence chiefly relied upon by him consists of certain declarations made by her, which were admitted in evidence over the objection of the proponent. To the extent that these declarations, at or prior to the making of the will, afforded any evidence bearing upon the state of the testatrix's mind at the time of the execution of the will,—her mental capacity, the condition of her mind towards the objects of her bounty, as well as towards the persons by whom she was surrounded, and the correspondence of her acts with the feelings and purposes entertained by her at the time she executed the will,—they were properly admitted, and were entitled to consideration by the jury; but to the extent that they purported to be declarations of the acts of others, or of her own acts, they were but matters of hearsay merely, whose truth rested in the veracity of the utterer, and upon which there was no opportunity of cross-examination or of explanation by the party who had uttered them, and were not entitled to any weight by the jury, and cannot be considered for the purpose of sustaining their verdict. Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Potter v. Baldwin, 133 Mass. 427; Bush v. Bush, 87 Mo. 480; Jones v. Roberts, 37 Mo. App. 163; Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; In re Palmateer, 78 Hun, 43, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1062; Griffith v. Diffenderffer, 50 Md. 466.

In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such undue influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator, by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires. The external facts constituting the exercise of undue influence must be established by other evidence than the declarations of the testator. His declarations are incompetent to show either that the influence was exercised, or that it affected his actions, and are inadmissible, except as they may illustrate his mental state and give a picture of the condition of his mind contemporaneous with the declarations themselves. Whenever the condition of the mind is a fact which it is desirable to prove, it may be established by such evidence as is competent for that purpose. The mental condition of an individual is made manifest to others by his statements, declarations, conversations, as well as by his conduct; and, when the state of a testator's mind at the time of executing the will is the fact to be shown, his contemporaneous declarations or statements furnish the most satisfactory evidence of that fact. His statement of the effect that an act or suggestion of another produced upon him at some previous time is, however, only hearsay; while his statement of his feeling or disposition at the time of making the statement is but the expression in words of his condition at that time, and, so far as it produces a picture thereof, is admissible. "Whenever the mental feelings of an individual are material to be proved, the usual expressions of such feelings, made at the time in question, are original evidence." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 102. This subject and the cases bearing upon it received an exhaustive examination in Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157; and the rule there laid down is that where a will is disputed on the ground of fraud, duress, imposition, or other like cause, not drawing into question the testator's mental capacity at the time of its execution, neither his prior nor subsequent declarations are competent evidence. The same principle is also stated in Marx v. McGlynn, supra; Griffith v. Diffenderffer, supra; and Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. Law, 274. There is no evidence in the present record that the testatrix was weak in mind, or unduly susceptible to the influence of others. On the contrary, the evidence in this respect shows her to have been possessed of full faculties, and capable of exercising her own will; and, by the consent of the parties, all contest upon the ground of mental incapacity was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury.

The court should not have permitted evidence to go to the jury of any declarations of testatrix regarding the statements or acts of those by whose influence it is alleged that she was induced to make the will. Her account of the circumstances attending the execution of the will, as well as her statement to Gates, about two weeks before her death, that Mrs. Calkins refused to let her go to the ranch until she had made her will, were incompetent for the purpose of showing the facts stated by her, and did not in any respect throw light upon her mental condition at the time of its execution, or the manner in which she wished to make disposition of her property. The most that could be claimed for it is that it showed her dissatisfaction with the will, but not that it had been made through any undue influence. A testator cannot, after the execution of his will, impeach its validity by any statements of facts connected therewith, any more than can the maker of any other instrument thus impeach its validity. Jackson v. Kniffen, 2 Johns. 31; Stevens v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262, Fed. Cas. No. 13,412; Mallery v. Young, 94 Ga. 804, 22 S. E. 142.

The court also erred in permitting the witness Mrs. Dudden to testify that, in her opinion, Mrs. J. W. Calkins was a penurious woman, and that she knew that she was penurious. The character of Mrs. Calkins in this particular was immaterial to the issue for the purpose of showing whether she had exercised any undue influence over the testatrix, and the only effect of the evidence would be to prejudice the jury against her in determining the issue they were called upon to decide. So, too, the reasons given by Eduardo for not carrying out the wishes of his sister when she asked him to prepare another will, and what he said to her about revoking her will, were irrelevant to the issues before the court, and should have been excluded. By permitting this testimony to be considered by the jury, the court would naturally lead the jury to think that a desire to change her will was evidence in support of the contestant's claim that it had been originally made through undue influence; whereas it may have resulted from a change of purpose formed at the time of the conversation. The declarations of the testatrix with reference to her husband's treatment of her were also improperly admitted, inasmuch as these declarations did not indicate her feelings in reference to him, except as the jury might be led by inference to conclude that such treatment ought to make her unfriendly to him.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "The exercise of undue influence need not be shown by direct proof. It may be inferred from circumstances, but the circumstances must be such as to lead justly to the inference that such undue influence was employed, and that the will did not express the real wishes of the testator." This instruction correctly embodies a rule for the application of evidence, but, as applied to the evidence in the present case, was misleading to the jury, and permitted them to substitute conjecture or suspicion for inference to be drawn from circumstances which were in evidence before them. The language used by Mr. Commissioner Temple, in Re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 33, 30 Pac. 101, is peculiarly applicable here: "Circumstantial evidence is sufficient. It must, however, do more than raise a suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator. I think there is nothing beyond suspicion shown here. There is no proof. Circumstances have been proven which accord with the theory of undue influence, none of which are inconsistent with the hypothesis, that the will was the free act of an intelligent mind. This does not amount to proof, and many circumstances are shown which are wholly inconsistent with the hypothesis of undue influence; and the presumption of law, in the absence of all proof in a contest, is in favor of the will."

The court also gave to the jury the following instruction: "Undue influence is that degree of importunity which deprives a testator of his free agency, which is such as he is too weak to resist, and will render the instrument not his free and unconstrained act. It is closely allied to actual fraud; and like the latter, when resorted to by an adroit and crafty person, its presence often becomes exceedingly difficult to detect. Indeed, the more skillful and cunning the accused, and the more helpless and secluded the victim, the less plainly defined are the badges which usually denote it. Under such conditions, the results accomplished, the divergence of those results from the course which would ordinarily be looked for, the situation of the party taking benefits under the will towards the one who has executed it, and their antecedent relations to each other, together with all the surrounding circumstances and the inferences legitimately deducible from them, furnish, in the absence of direct evidence, and often in the teeth of positive testimony to the contrary, ample ground for concluding that fraud or undue influence has been resorted to and successfully employed." This language of the court would be unobjectionable for the purpose of instruction in a treatise upon the various modes in which undue influence may be exerted, or the different conditions under which its exercise may be looked for; but it was not proper to be given to the jury in the present case, for the purpose of enabling them to render a correct verdict upon the evidence before them. There was no evidence before them from which they were authorized to find that any of the persons charged with exercising undue influence over the testatrix were adroit or crafty, or that the testatrix was helpless or secluded; and the court did not obviate the error in this instruction by afterwards saying to the jury that they were not to presume that the court suggested that such was the fact, but that whether any fact existed which was referred to in the instruction was a question for the jury alone. The concluding portion of this instruction, in which they were told: "Under such conditions, the results accomplished, the antecedent relation of the parties, the inferences legitimately deducible therefrom, furnish, in the absence of direct evidence, and in the teeth of positive evidence to the contrary, ample grounds for concluding that fraud and undue influence had been resorted to and successfully employed,"—in effect told the jury that they were at liberty, under the circumstances of this case, to find that the will under investigation had been executed by reason of undue influence, although there was no direct evidence of the fact, and in the teeth of positive evidence to the contrary. A court should adapt its instructions to the evidence which is to be considered by the jury, and, instead of giving to them definitions of abstract propositions of law, should so connect its instructions with the facts or evidence to which they are applicable as to lead them to make the proper application thereof. "In order to justify the submission of any question of fact to a jury, the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged. It must be such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists; and, when the evidence is not sufficient to justify such inference, the court should refuse to submit the question to the jury." Janin v. Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. 1100; Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28; Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289, 22 Pac. 848. The court should have pointed out to the jury the circumstances which would justify such conclusion, and left for them to determine whether that character of circumstances existed in the case.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. The order denying a new trial is reversed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. TEED. (S. F. 176.)[1]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REFUNDING INDEBTEDNESS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Pol. Code 1880, §§ 4445–4449, as amended in 1881, authorizing the board of trustees or municipal council of any city having an outstanding indebtedness on January 1, 1880, evidenced by bonds or warrants thereof, to fund or refund the same by a two-thirds vote of the members of such board or council, apply to all cities, whether organized before or after the adoption of the Codes.

2. Pol. Code 1880, §§ 4445–4449, as amended in 1881, authorizing the board of trustees or municipal council of any city having an outstanding indebtedness on January 1, 1880, evidenced by bonds or warrants, to fund or refund the same by a two-thirds vote of such board or council, are not in conflict with Const. art. 11, § 18, forbidding any city to incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, "without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose"; since to fund or refund an existing debt is not to incur an indebtedness or liability. Doon Tp. v. Cummins, 12 Sup. Ct. 220, 142 U. S. 366, disapproved.

3. Const. art. 11, § 18, forbidding any city to incur an indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors voting at an election to be held for that purpose, does not apply to the funding of any indebtedness existing at the time the constitution was adopted.

4. Act March 15, 1883 (St. 1883, p. 370), authorizing the governing body of every municipal corporation, "other than cities of the first class," to fund or refund "any" indebtedness of the corporation by a vote of four-fifths of their members, and the issue of bonds to be exchanged for any existing indebtedness, or to be sold for money to be applied to the payment of such indebtedness, does not violate the provision of the constitution against special legislation.

5. Nor is such act unconstitutional in failing to provide for submitting to voters the question whether the bonds shall be issued, where authority is expressly given by other statutes to hold such an election.

6. Act March 15, 1883 (St. 1883, p. 370), authorizes the governing body of every municipal corporation other than cities of the first class to fund or refund any indebtedness by a vote of four-fifths of their number, and the issue of bonds to be exchanged for any existing indebtedness, or to be sold for money to be applied to the payment of such indebtedness. Act March 1, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 59), amends such act by requiring in all cases a submission of the question to the voters, and one-fortieth instead of one-twentieth of the principal to be paid each year, and authorizes the bonds to be made payable either at the office of the city treasurer or at a bank in San Francisco, New York, Boston, or Chicago. Held, that the latter act was not invalid as special legislation.

7. But such act, in so far as it authorizes the bonds to be made payable at a place other than the city treasury, is in conflict with Const. art. 11, §§ 13, 16, providing that the legislature shall not delegate to any private corporation, company, or individual the right to interfere with or control any county, city, or municipal money, and that the public moneys shall be deposited with the treasurer.

Original application by the city of Los Angeles for a writ of mandate to require Freeman G. Teed, as president of the council of such city, to sign certain bonds alleged to have been authorized by such council and the voters of the city. Defendant demurs to the petition. Demurrer sustained, and writ dismissed.

W. E. Dunn and Albert Crutcher (Chas. H. McFarland and E. A. Meserve, of counsel), for plaintiff. John S. Chapman, for defendant. Francis J. Thomas, amicus curiæ.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandate to require the defendant, as president of the council of the city of Los Angeles, to sign certain bonds alleged to have been authorized by said council and the voters of the city. The defendant demurs to the petition, on the grounds that the acts of the legislature under which the bonds are attempted to be issued are unconstitutional; that the same have been repealed; and that the proceedings prescribed by law for the issuance of the bonds have not been taken by the council. The case has not been as fully argued as its importance requires; and some points, absolutely indispensable to a decision, have not been at all referred to by counsel. This is especially to be regretted, as the questions involved are of great public importance, which we ought not to be asked to examine without the fullest assistance from counsel. We have, nevertheless, given the matter careful consideration, and are of opinion that the demurrer must be sustained.

The facts alleged in the petition as amended are, in substance, these: On February 26, 1895, the city of Los Angeles had outstanding certain bonded indebtedness, amounting to $396,000, of which $76,000 would become due August 1, 1895, and the remainder was payable at any time at the option of the city. It does not appear distinctly when any of these bonds were issued, nor when any of the indebtedness thereby represented was incurred. No sinking or other fund sufficient to pay the bonds has been provided, and the amount necessary to pay or refund them is too large to be paid from the ordinary annual income or revenue of the city. The total indebtedness of the city is less than $2,000,000. On February 26, 1895, the city council adopted an ordinance calling an election of the qualified voters of the city, to be held on a day therein named, at which was to be submitted the question whether or not refunding bonds, to the amount of $396,000, should be issued. The ordinance provided that, in case two-thirds of the qualified electors voting should vote in favor of the issuing of said bonds, the same should be issued. The bonds were to be serial in character, one-fortieth of the whole amount to be paid each year, bearing interest at 4½ per cent. per annum (which was less than the rate borne by the outstanding bonds), and payable at the Chemical National Bank, in the city of New York. A sinking fund was, by the terms of the ordinance, provided for the payment of the principal and interest. The ordinance prescribed the manner of conducting the election, and named the voting precincts, polling places, and officers of election. It concluded as follows: "The city clerk shall certify to the passage of this ordinance, and cause the same to be published for ten days in the Los Angeles Evening Express, and thereupon and thereafter it shall take effect and be in force." The ordinance was accordingly published for 10 days; but, as the day fixed for the election was only 16 days from the approval of the ordinance, the last publication was less than 10 days before the election. The election was held, and much more than two-thirds of the qualified electors voting thereat voted in favor of issuing the proposed bonds. Thereupon a further ordinance was adopted, directing the issue of the bonds, and requiring the same to be signed by the president of the city council, who is the defendant here. The defendant refused to sign the bonds. It is further alleged that none of the holders of the outstanding bonds have refused to exchange the bonds held by them, nor have any of them deposited any of their bonds with any depositary for redemption, and the city has made no effort to exchange the proposed refunding bonds for the outstanding bonds.

Assuming an election by the voters to be necessary, the defendant contends that the 10-days notice of the election was not given as required by law. We do not think this objection well taken. The ordinance was, in terms, a notice of the election, containing everything necessary for such notice. The fact that it was to "take effect and be in force" only at the expiration of the 10-days publication did not lessen its effect as a notice. The manifest intention of the council was that the election should take place on the day named; and the language referred to, though not aptly chosen for the purpose, does not obscure that intention. It is sufficient that notice was given, and that at the time appointed for the election there was an ordinance in force authorizing it.

But the really serious questions to be determined are as to what statute governs the case, and as to the effect of the provisions of the constitution on the subject. The first legislation on the subject is contained in sections 4445 to 4449 of the Political Code, enacted in 1880, and amended in 1881. Those sections authorized "the board of trustees or municipal council of any city having an outstanding indebtedness on the first day of January, 1880, evidenced by bonds or warrants thereof," to fund or refund the same by a two-thirds vote of the members of such board or council. The effect of these sections has not been discussed by counsel, it being apparently assumed on both sides that under the decision in Ex parte Simpson, 47 Cal. 127, these sections are not applicable to cities organized before the adoption of the Codes. But we think that the rule laid down in that case does not apply to these sections, and that they are applicable to all cities. It is true that they are a part of title 3 of part 4 of the Political Code, and that it was held in that case that none of the sections of that title were applicable to any existing city. But the sections now in question were added to the Code long after that decision, and it is manifest from their terms that they were intended to apply to all cities, without exception. The officers therein mentioned are given designations not corresponding to those used in the "system or plan under which cities may," under the preceding sections, "be organized and governed." They are designated by general terms, studiously chosen, so as to include cities of diverse forms of government, and organized in a manner different from that provided for in the preceding sections of the title. The language so used unmistakably negatives any intention to confine the operation of those sections to cities organized under the Code. But, beyond this, these sections can have no effect whatever, unless they apply to cities formed before the adoption of the Code. These provisions relate only to cities having an outstanding indebtedness on January 1, 1880. We are bound to take judicial notice of the fact that no city was ever organized under the Code; and, as no such organization could take place except by act of the legislature (section 4356), we presume that the legislature was aware, when it enacted the sections in question, that no such organization had been had. We cannot suppose that the legislature intended to pass an act which never could have any effect whatever; and we must therefore hold that these sections apply to all cities, without exception.

The argument of counsel as to certain other statutes (to be presently referred to) raises the question whether these sections are not in conflict with section 18 of article 11 of the constitution, which forbids any city to "incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose." But we do not think there is any such conflict. It is true that the sections in question do not provide for obtaining the assent of the voters, but no such assent was necessary. The only indebtedness authorized by these provisions to be funded or refunded is such as existed prior to the time when the constitutional provision in question took effect; and merely to fund or refund an existing debt is not to "incur an indebtedness or liability." A bond is not an indebtedness or liability; it is only the evidence or representative of an indebtedness. And a mere change in the form of the evidence of indebtedness is not the creation of a new indebtedness within the meaning of the constitution. Opinion of Justices, 81 Me. 602, 18 Atl. 291; Hotchkiss v. Marion, 12 Mont. 218, 29 Pac. 821; Board of Com'rs v. Board of Com'rs, 26 Kan. 181, 201; City of Poughkeepsie v. Quintard, 65 Hun, 141, 19 N. Y. Supp. 944. The case of Doon Tp. v. Cummins, 142 U. S. 366, 12 Sup. Ct. 220, appears to be opposed to this view; but we are unable to assent to the reasoning of the majority of the court in that case, and think that the correct rule is stated in the dissenting opinion. Moreover, the state had no more power, by adopting a constitution, to impair the obligation of the contracts by which cities had previously incurred indebtedness than it had to impair it by a mere statute. It is true that to take away a remedy previously allowed does not always impair the obligation of a contract. But a reasonably efficient remedy must be left; and in a majority of cases the only way in which municipalities can pay their debts is by issuing funded bonds. Even then, if the state had power to forbid the funding of a prior indebtedness, except upon new and perhaps impossible conditions (a concession which we are not prepared to make), it certainly will not be presumed, in the absence of a clear and explicit declaration to that effect, that the framers of our state constitution intended such a result. The clause in question does not necessarily require such an interpretation; and we are of opinion that it does not apply to the funding of any then existing indebtedness. It follows that, as to any indebtedness of the city of Los Angeles outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1880, sections 4445 to 4449 of the Political Code provide the method to be pursued in funding or refunding the same. The petition in the present case, however, does not allege that any of the indebtedness in question was outstanding on that day; and we cannot presume, in favor of the pleader, that such was the fact. It is therefore necessary to inquire whether the bonds in question are authorized by any other statute.

On March 15, 1883, an act was passed (St. 1883, p. 370) authorizing the governing body of every municipal corporation, other than cities of the first class, to fund or refund any indebtedness of the corporation by a vote of four-fifths of their number. That act authorized the issue of bonds, to be exchanged for any existing indebtedness, or to be sold for money to be applied to the payment of such indebtedness.

It is contended that this act violates the provisions of the constitution against special legislation. But there can be no question that the act classifying municipal corporations is constitutional (Prichett v. Stanislaus Co., 73 Cal. 310, 14 Pac. 795), and that in matters pertaining to municipal organization the legislature may make different regulations for the different classes so created (City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 249, 27 Pac. 604). The subject-matter of the act in question (the funding of municipal indebtedness) is "peculiarly a matter pertaining to municipal organizations, and still more peculiarly a matter as to which cities of large population require different provision from that suitable to cities or towns of small population." The act is therefore not obnoxious to that objection.

It is also contended that the act is unconstitutional in failing to provide for submitting to voters the question whether the bonds shall be issued. It is true that as to any new indebtedness incurred after January 1, 1880, such a submission must be had; but it does not necessarily follow that any act of the legislature on that subject must contain that requirement. It is, we think, sufficient that, by any legislation, authority is given to the municipal government to call such an election, and that the election is actually called and held. Such authority is expressly given by sections 40, 197, 198, 199, and 200 of the charter of Los Angeles (St. 1889, p. 455); and, as we have seen, a valid election was actually called and held in this case. Indeed, it is probable that the constitutional provision requiring such election is, of itself, sufficient authority to the municipality for holding it, at least when read in connection with such an act as the one of 1883 here in question.

On March 1, 1893, an act was passed (St. 1893, p. 59) amending the act of 1883. By this amendment, a submission to the voters was required in all cases, one-fortieth (instead of one-twentieth) of the principal was required to be paid each year, and authority was given to make the bonds payable either at the office of the city treasurer or at a bank in San Francisco, New York, Boston, or Chicago.

It is contended that this act also is invalid, as special legislation; but what we have said as to the act of 1883 on this question applies equally to this act. It is also claimed that the legislature could not authorize a debt payable in 20 years to be refunded into a debt payable in 40 years; but we fail to discover any force in this contention, and no reason is suggested or authority referred to supporting it.

It is also contended that the provision authorizing payment of the bonds at a place other than the city treasury, and especially out of the state, is in contravention of sections 13 and 16 of article 11 of the constitution,[1] and therefore invalid. This provision, it is true, is severable, and its invalidity would not affect the rest of the act. But, as the bonds here in question are made payable at the Chemical National Bank in New York City, and as the ordinance authorizing them provides that they shall be so payable, it is necessary to examine that objection.

The sections of the constitution referred to were construed in Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. 767; and it was there held that the provision in the charter of that city authorizing the council to appoint a bank in that city, as a depositary of the public funds, was a violation of those sections, and wholly invalid. We are unable to distinguish that case from the present one, and we think the reasoning there employed applies with at least equal force to this case. If the principal and interest of these bonds is to be paid at a bank in the city of New York, that thing can be accomplished only in one of two ways,—either the city treasurer must go in person to New York, carrying the money with him, and there pay it out, or he must remit the money by express, draft, or some other mode to that bank, and authorize that bank to make the payment. There is certainly no law which authorizes the city treasurer to go to New York (in the present case semiannually), and take with him the public moneys; and, in the absence of such a law, he certainly has no such power. Even if it be conceded (which is not clear) that the legislature is competent to authorize any officer to perform any part of his duties without the state, it has not attempted to confer any such authority in this instance; and there is therefore no other alternative than to remit the money to the bank in New York, and make that bank the agent of the city to pay the bonds and coupons. But this is precisely what is forbidden by the constitution, and is, as we regard it, a graver infraction of its provisions than that considered in the Yarnell Case. We are therefore of opinion that the bonds in question, and the ordinance authorizing them, are clearly invalid, and that the defendant cannot be required to sign them.

[1] Const. art. 11, §§ 13, 16, provide as follows: "Sec. 13. The legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association or individual, any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with any county, city, town or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions whatever."

"Sec. 16. All moneys, assessments, and taxes belonging to or collected for the use of any county, city, town, or other public or municipal corporation, coming into the hands of any officer thereof, shall immediately be deposited with the treasurer, or other legal depositary, to the credit of such city, town, or other corporation respectively, for the benefit of the funds to which they respectively belong."

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the effect of the amendment of 1895 (St. 1895, p. 203) to section 1 of the act of 1893. The questions arising under that act are important, and have not been adequately presented by counsel; and we therefore leave them for consideration in some case in which they are properly involved.

The demurrer to the petition is, for the reasons suggested, sustained, and the writ dismissed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment, and also in that portion of the opinion of Mr. Justice VAN FLEET in which he discusses the effect of the provision in the ordinance making the interest upon the bonds payable out of the state. I am of the opinion, however, that the recitals in the ordinance of the bonds which are to be refunded sufficiently show that a portion thereof were issued prior to the year 1880, and another portion subsequent to that year. It is unnecessary, therefore, to determine whether section 4445 of the Political Code is still in force, as that section by its terms authorizes the issue of bonds for the sole purpose of refunding an indebtedness which existed on the 1st day of January, 1880, while the bonds sought to be issued by the proceedings under consideration are for the purpose of refunding an indebtedness of which the greater portion did not exist at that date. The act of 1883, as amended in 1893 (St. 1893, p. 59), and under which the proceedings were had, was again amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 203). The effect of this amendment was to deprive the city council of all power to issue refunding bonds, except in accordance with its terms; and the latter act is the sole authority by which to determine the power of a municipality to issue any refunding bonds, as well as the mode in which that power is to be exercised. This act was adopted March 27, 1895, and took effect immediately; and although the election by the voters of Los Angeles was held March 21, 1895, the vote was not canvassed until April 1st, and the ordinance for the issue of the bonds was not adopted until April 8th. As no contract had been entered into, and no vested right had accrued by reason of the steps that had been taken for the issuance of these bonds, the effect of the act of 1895 was to repeal all the provisions for their issuance that were not preserved in the amended act, and to render nugatory all the steps that had been taken by virtue of those provisions. Lamb v. Schottler, 54 Cal. 319. Under the act as thus amended, no election by the voters is required as a preliminary step, but the governing body of the city is empowered to refund the outstanding indebtedness, and issue bonds therefor, "by a vote of four-fifths of its members." The validity of the election is therefore not involved, and as the act confers no authority to sell the bonds when issued, except in special instances, there can be no additional liability created by the mere issue of the bonds.

To entitle the petitioner to the writ of mandate against the respondent, it was necessary to set forth in its petition all the facts which rendered it his duty to sign the bonds. This duty did not exist unless the ordinance for their issuance had been adopted by a vote of four-fifths of the members of the city council; and the petition should have so stated. As the adoption of an ordinance for the issuance of bonds would not give any validity to the bonds, or authorize their issuance, unless the ordinance was adopted by the requisite vote, the mere averment that the city council "adopted an ordinance providing for the issuance of said bonds" does not sufficiently show that the ordinance was passed in accordance with the requirements of the statute, or that it was incumbent upon the respondent to sign the same.

ROSE v. ROSE. (S. F. 278.)

DIVORCE — PLEADING — EVIDENCE — DIVISION OF PROPERTY.

1. The objection that the complaint is insufficient in its statement of the cause of action is waived by a failure to demur to it.

2. In an action for divorce, a paper signed by defendant, in which he offered to divide the property, and described it as community property, was admissible on the sole issue as to the character of the property, though the paper was an offer of compromise.

3. A division of the property between parties to a divorce case rests primarily with the trial court, and will not be disturbed except for a palpable abuse of discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Maria M. Rose against Manuel M. Rose for divorce. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying him a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Gibson and Welles Whitmore, for appellant. Dodge & Fry, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty and habitual intemperance. The decree was in favor of plaintiff, granting her a divorce on both grounds, and awarding her the larger share of the community property. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial.

A careful review of the record discloses no substantial merit in the points urged in behalf of appellant. The objection that the complaint is insufficient in its statement of the cause of action for intemperance is untenable. Assuming that it would be obnoxious to a special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty, no demurrer was interposed, and in its absence the pleading cannot be held bad. Reading v. Reading, 96 Cal. 4, 30 Pac. 803.

Nor is there any merit whatsoever in the point that the finding as to the habitual intoxication of defendant is unsupported by the evidence. Whatever may be said as to the apparent preponderance of the evidence on that issue, as disclosed by the record, it presents a very sharp and substantial conflict, and leaves no room for the claim that there was not evidence to sustain the view expressed in the finding of the court below.

The declarations of the wife, made to and in the presence of her husband and the witness, as to acts of ill treatment and cruelty towards her by her husband, and the latter's conduct and declarations in response thereto, were proper evidence on the issue of cruelty. 1 Rice, Ev. p. 424.

The court did not err in admitting, on the issue as to the character of the property, the paper signed by defendant, in which he offered to divide the property, and described it as community property. It was admitted solely on the question as to whether the property was community or separate, and for this purpose it was proper as a declaration by the defendant, even conceding that the paper is to be regarded as an offer of compromise. The declaration as to the community character of the property was not essential to the purposes of the compromise, and is therefore not to be regarded as a concession made for that purpose. While, therefore, it would not be competent to admit an offer of compromise, as such, the declaration therein of facts involved in the controversy which are not mere concessions made for the purpose of such offer, but are statements of independent facts, is admissible against the party making them. The rule is thus stated by Mr. Rice: "It is never the intention of the law to shut out the truth, but to repel any inference which may arise from a proposition made, not with a design to admit the existence of a fact, but merely to buy one's peace. If an admission, however, is made because it is a fact, the evidence to prove is competent, whatever motive may have prompted to the declaration. But if the party admits a particular item in an account, or any other fact, meaning to make the admission as being true, this is good evidence, although the object of the conversation was to compromise an existing controversy." The several other rulings on evidence, complained of, need not be discussed in detail. We have examined them, and are satisfied that they involved no error.

The complaint made as to the inequitable division of the property between the parties would appear, from all the evidence presented, to possess, possibly, some just foundation in fact, if the discretion rested primarily with us, since, to our minds, the defendant would seem to have been treated, perhaps, a little harshly by the court below. But it is a question committed to the justice and discretion of that court, whose opportunity to judge of the equities, by reason of seeing and hearing the witnesses, is superior to our own, and whose determination of the question we are not at liberty to disturb, except for a palpable abuse, which certainly the record before us does not enable us to declare. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY v. DAVIDSON et al. (No. 19,419.)

COUNTY RECORDER — FEES — RECORDING NOTICES OF MINING LOCATIONS.

A county recorder is not liable to the county for fees earned in recording notices of location of mining claims, the work being outside his official duties. Such records are not known to the statute, being regulated entirely by the mining districts; and a county recorder is not compelled to keep them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by the county of San Bernardino against Alonzo S. Davidson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank F. Oster, for appellant. Rolfe & Rolfe, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action on the official bond of defendant Davidson as county recorder of the county of San Bernardino. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court below, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was rendered for defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is right. By this action it is sought to hold Davidson and his bondsmen liable to the county for certain money paid to him during his term of office by miners for recording certain notices of locations of mining claims. But the statute concerning county recorders makes no provision for the recording of notices of locations of mining claims, and such recording is not within the purview of his official duties as county recorder. In certain mining districts there is a custom which requires a notice of location to be recorded with some one selected as a mining recorder, and in some of these districts the county recorder is so selected. The purpose of the recording is to show a compliance with the mining customs; but this purpose, and the whole scheme, is entirely distinct from the statutory system of recordation, by which parties are permitted to have transfers of property and certain other written instruments recorded in the county recorder's office, so as to give constructive notice thereof, and the county recorder is required to record the same, when presented, properly acknowledged or authenticated as provided by statute,—each kind of instrument to be recorded in a book to be kept for that purpose. A notice of a mining location in a recorder's book is "the original notice, not a record or copy of an independent original." Pralus v. Mining Co., 35 Cal. 36. A statutory county recorder could no more be required to record a miner's notice of location than he could be required to furnish a miner with a pick or shovel. If he chooses to do so, he may transcribe such notice of location in a book, or collection of sheets of paper, which he has procured for that purpose; but, if he do so, he does it, not as a county recorder elected by the people, but as a person selected by the miners to do an act not provided for by the recordation laws of the state; and any moneys which they may pay him for such services are not fees, for which he and his bondsmen are accountable to the county.

The cases of Placer Co. v. Astin, 8 Cal. 304, McKee v. Monterey Co., 51 Cal. 275, and People v. Bunker, 70 Cal. 215, 11 Pac. 703, are not in point. In the first of those cases a tax collector undertook to retain money, which he had received as such tax collector, upon the ground that the taxes had been illegally levied; in the second case the defendant, as treasurer of Monterey county, had received certain moneys by the allowance of the comptroller, and sought to retain them upon the ground that the comptroller had exceeded his authority in making the allowance; and in the third case it was held that a commissioner of irrigation, "having assumed to act under a statute of the state, and having collected moneys according to the letter of that statute, cannot be heard to say that the statute was in conflict with the constitution of the United States," and that, therefore, he was not bound to pay them over. In those cases the officers received the money as agents of the state or county, upon the assumption that it was money belonging to the state or county; and they were decided upon the principle that one to whom money has been paid by another for the use of a third person cannot, as against the third person, set up any illegality in the payment. But such was not the fact in the case at bar. The respondent did not receive the money upon the pretense that he was collecting it as the official agent of the county. He was not ex officio mining recorder, for there is no such officer created by the statute. And it is quite clear that the demurrer fully presents the question under review. The averment of the complaint is that, during Davidson's term of office, "there existed a general custom and rule among the miners of said county to file for record with the recorder of said county, notices of location of mining claims," and that he knew of such custom. This presents the whole question, and the averment that he received the fees "as such recorder" does not change either the fact or the law. The judgment is affirmed.

APPEAL—NOTICE—WHO ARE ADVERSE PARTIES—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

1. A person who is joined as a defendant, and answers without objection from other parties, and whose rights in the subject-matter of the action are favorably adjudicated by the decree, is an adverse party to any other party attacking such decree, either by motion for new trial or by appeal, and must in either case be served with notice, under section 659 or section 940, Code Civ. Proc., without regard to whether originally a proper party or not.

2. An appeal from an order overruling a motion for new trial will not be dismissed because of a failure to serve notice on a party to the action, but who was not a party to the motion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by A. H. Herriman and others against Stewart Menzies and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from the decree, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial. Appeal from decree dismissed. On appeal from order, affirmed.

H. N. Clement, for appellants. T. C. Coogan, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to dissolve a partnership known as the "Master Stevedores Association," and for an accounting. The association was composed of a number of firms and individuals, and among the firms was Allen & Young, of which Theodore H. Allen and Thomas Young were the sole members. The association was governed by a written agreement, by the terms of which it was to continue from July 1, 1886, to July 1, 1891. The several firms and individuals were to severally conduct the business of stevedoring, to charge therefor the prices fixed by the association, and to pay into the association the profits derived at stated periods, to be divided as in the agreement specified. Its business was settled in consonance with this agreement up to December, 1890, and this action was brought to compel a settlement for the remaining seven months, viz. from December, 1890, until the expiration of the term of the agreement, July 1, 1891. Theodore H. Allen, of the firm of Allen & Young, died testate February 28, 1891, and the defendant Emma J. Taylor is the duly-appointed executrix of his last will. As such executrix she is made a party defendant, and it is sought to have her account for the business done from said December 1, 1890, until the date of the death of Allen, viz. February 28, 1891. Young continued to carry on the same business up to July 1, 1891, and he was also made a party defendant. Said defendants Young and Emma J. Taylor filed separate answers. The answer of Emma J. Taylor, among other things, avers the interest of her testator in the association, the realization of profits, etc., and joins with the plaintiffs in demanding an accounting, not only with defendants, but between herself, as executrix, and the other defendants. An interlocutory decree was entered dissolving the association, and adjudging "that an account be taken of all of the stevedoring business done, and of all the dealings and transactions had in relation thereto, by plaintiffs and the defendants Menzies and McCracken, from the 1st day of July, 1890, to and including the 1st day of July, 1891, and by the defendant Young and one Theodore H. Allen, deceased, his successor in interest being defendant Emma J. Taylor, as executrix of his last will and testament, from the 1st day of December, 1890, to and including the 28th day of February, 1891 (the date of Allen's death), and by defendant Young from the date last above named to and including the 1st day of July, 1891." A referee was appointed to take an account, and reported, showing the amount of money in the hands of Young, collected from December 1, 1890, to February 28, 1891, to be $514.53. Thereupon the court made findings showing the amount of money in the hands of each of the defendants, except the defendant Taylor, concerning whom the court found as follows: "The defendant Emma J. Taylor, as executrix of the last will of Theodore H. Allen, deceased, has no money or property in her hands belonging to plaintiffs." The court also found that Theodore H. Allen died on the 28th day of February, 1891, and that the partnership of Allen & Young was then dissolved. A final decree was entered dissolving the association, and awarding judgment against the defendants severally for the sums of money found due from them to the plaintiffs. The name of defendant Emma J. Taylor does not appear in the decree. The appeal is by defendants Stewart Menzies, Arthur McCracken, and Thomas Young from the interlocutory decree, from the final decree, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Plaintiffs move the court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the notice thereof was not served upon the defendant Emma J. Taylor, executrix of the last will of Theodore H. Allen, or upon A. Heyneman, her attorney; that she is a respondent herein, an adverse party to appellants, interested in the judgment, and will be affected by the result of the appeal, etc. The motion is supported by the certificate of the clerk of the court below, and by affidavit showing that said defendant Emma J. Taylor appeared separately by said A. Heyneman, as her attorney, and that the notice of appeal was not served upon her or upon her said attorney. Defendants show, by counter affidavit, that the separate answer of defendant Taylor was not served upon them or their attorney, and that the interests of the firm of Allen & Young, were represented by Henry N. Clement, who was the attorney of all the defendants except Emma J. Taylor, and that said Taylor did not appear in the case except by answer. A notice of appeal must be served upon every "adverse party" (Code Civ. Proc. § 940), and adverse parties are those who are "interested in the judgment and would be affected by its reversal" (O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 319). "Every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to, or will be affected by, the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken, is, we think, an adverse party within the meaning of these provisions of the Code, irrespective of the question whether he appears upon the face of the record in the attitude of plaintiff or defendant or intervener." Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637. The above is taken literally from the opinion of McFarland, J., in Lancaster v. Maxwell, 103 Cal. 67, 36 Pac. 951. Butte Co. v. Boydstun, 68 Cal. 189, 8 Pac. 835, is to like effect. If the position of a party on the record makes him adverse, he must be so considered for the purposes of an appeal from the judgment thereon. Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 Pac. 1103. See, also, Williams v. Association, 66 Cal. 195, 5 Pac. 85, and In re Castle Dome Mining & Smelting Co., 79 Cal. 246, 21 Pac. 746.

It is urged by appellants that Emma J. Taylor, as executrix of the last will of Theodore H. Allen, deceased, was not a necessary or even proper party defendant in the action; that upon Thomas Young, the surviving partner of the firm of Allen & Young, devolved the sole duty of accounting with the association, etc. The answer is: Emma J. Taylor, as executrix, was made a party defendant, answered, and no objection was made to her as a proper party defendant. The interlocutory decree ordered an accounting from her and Young, and the court found that there was no money or property in her hands as executrix belonging to plaintiffs. The appeal is from the whole judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. If the judgment is reversed, non constat but that upon another trial it may be shown that the estate represented by her is indebted to the plaintiffs. To this extent she is interested, and an adverse party to the appellant, and hence should have been served with notice of appeal from the judgment.

Upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial, only the parties to the motion upon which the order was made are necessary parties to the appeal. Watson v. Sutro, 77 Cal. 609, 20 Pac. 88; In re Ryer's Estate (Cal.) 42 Pac. 1082. In the present case the plaintiffs did not serve their notice of intention to move for a new trial upon Mrs. Taylor, nor was she a party to the proceedings in the superior court upon that motion. The appeal from the order denying a new trial, therefore, cannot be dismissed for failure to serve her with the notice of appeal. Section 659, Code Civ. Proc., however, requires that the party intending to move for a new trial shall "serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention." The "adverse party" upon whom this notice is to be served is determined by the same rules as is the "adverse party" upon whom a notice of appeal is to be served, viz. every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the motion is adverse to or will be affected by the granting of the motion, or changing the former decision of the court; and a failure to serve such adverse party with the notice of an intention to move for the new trial will be attended with the same consequences as a failure to serve an adverse party with a notice of appeal from the judgment. The superior court can have no jurisdiction to re-examine an issue of fact that it has tried, and change its decision thereon, unless all the parties to the issue and former decisions are properly before it. In the present case the plaintiffs sought a recovery against Mrs. Taylor, and upon the trial of the issues involving her liability the court made certain findings of fact in her favor, and determined that she was under no liability to account for any moneys that she had received. The action is for an accounting by all of the defendants as partners in the enterprise, and it is evident that an adjustment of their several rights and obligations growing out of the partnership venture cannot be had unless all of the parties to the transactions are before the court. The effect of granting a new trial would be to vacate the former findings of fact, and compel Mrs. Taylor to again litigate a controversy which had been decided in her favor. A new trial of these issues cannot be had without affecting her interests, and, as she had not been brought before the superior court at the hearing of the motion for a new trial, that court had no jurisdiction to grant the motion, and its order denying the same was properly made.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

TULARE IRRIGATION DIST. v. KAWEAH CANAL & IRRIGATION CO.

(Sac. 66.)

CORPORATION — EFFECT OF PURCHASING ITS OWN STOCK—SALE OF ITS PROPERTY.

1. The purchase by a corporation of a part of its own stock, until it is reissued, in effect reduces its stock to that extent.

2. The sale by a corporation of all its property and franchises, except its corporate franchise, does not carry with it shares of its own stock, which it had bought in for delinquent assessments, and had not authorized to be reissued.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. Cross, Judge.

Action by the Tulare irrigation district against the Kaweah Canal & Irrigation Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Davis, for appellant. Bradley & Farnsworth and Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This cause was tried by the court, and findings and judgment were for the defendant; and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff is a corporation, organized under the act of the legislature known as the "Wright Act," for the purpose of supplying water for irrigating the lands within the district so organized. The defendant is a corporation organized under the general statute, and owned certain water rights, dams, canals, ditches, real estate, etc., from which the Tulare irrigation district could be supplied with water for the purposes for which it was organized. Under these circumstances plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby the defendant sold and conveyed said property to the plaintiff in consideration of the sum of $150,000, payable in the bonds of the plaintiff at par. The deed executed by the defendant to the plaintiff, after describing certain lands, water rights, canals, etc., as to which there is no controversy, concluded the description of property and rights conveyed, as follows: "Also all right, title, and interest of the first party (the defendant) in and to all dams, headgates, and drops used or maintained in connection with the ditch or ditches of the first party, or any of them; also all tools, scrapers, plows, implements, and personal property of the first party, except its office furniture, books, and papers; also all franchises, rights, and privileges now owned or enjoyed by the first party, except its corporate franchise to exist and transact business as a corporation in accordance with its articles of incorporation."

Prior to this sale the defendant purchased 35 shares of stock in its own corporation, at a sale thereof for a delinquent assessment, and which stock had been transferred to the defendant corporation upon its books, and had not been reissued. Twenty-five thousand dollars of the bonds received from the plaintiff were applied in part to the payment of an indebtedness to an individual, and in part as a commission for negotiating the sale. Another portion of the bonds was set aside to meet other liabilities of the defendant, and the remainder of the bonds were distributed to its stockholders as a dividend, the amount of the dividend being $200 per share. This action was brought by the plaintiff to compel the delivery to it of said 35 shares of stock in the defendant corporation, and to recover the dividend thereon of $200 per share, payable in the bonds received from the plaintiff, together with the interest paid by the plaintiff thereon, claiming that said stock was personal property belonging to the defendant at the time of the sale, which was not excepted therefrom, and which, by the sale, passed to it under the general clause of the conveyance above quoted.

The judgment for the defendant was right. Stock in a corporation of the character of the defendant represents an interest in the property of the corporation, and is evidence that the lawful holder is the owner of an interest in the property of the corporation in the proportion that his shares bear to the whole number of shares issued and held by the stockholders. The legal title to the property represented by the stock is vested in the corporation for the benefit of the stockholders. When these 35 shares were bought by the corporation for the unpaid assessment, the amount so paid was charged up as a liability, to be met by the remaining stockholders, and the remaining stock represented the entire property of the corporation. The 35 shares could not be liable for assessments, nor participate in dividends, nor be voted at elections. These shares were dormant, and could only be resuscitated by selling them and placing the selling price in the treasury for the benefit of the stockholders. Robinson v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 32, 13 Pac. 65. But, conceding that the defendant corporation could have sold these shares, it would require corporate action to authorize it, either by the stockholders or by the directors, and we see no evidence of any intention to do so; and appellant's contention, if carried to its practical result, demonstrates that it could not have been within the intention of either party.

Suppose the property which the defendant concedes was sold, conveyed, and delivered to the plaintiff was of the actual value of $150,000, no more and no less. If all the stock of the defendant corporation had been in the hands of individual stockholders, the plaintiff would have acquired no stock, but would have property the exact equivalent in value of the money or bonds paid. If we now suppose that, at the time of the purchase, one-half of the stock of the defendant corporation was in its treasury, having been purchased, as these 35 shares were, at sales for delinquent assessments, it would follow, upon plaintiff's theory, that, though it got, under its purchase, $150,000 worth of other property, it would also have acquired one-half its stock, and would be entitled to participate in a dividend of $200 per share, to be paid out of the identical bonds they paid for the property, thus getting back into plaintiff's treasury one-half of the purchase price paid, as well as property of the value of $150,000. In other words, they would practically get defendant's entire property and one-half its stock for $75,000, or one-half of that which it agreed to pay, and did in fact pay, while the individual stockholders, whose stock alone, at the time of the sale, represented all the property of the corporation, whether in the treasury or out of it, would realize from the sale but half its value. We find no evidence in the record which indicates that such a result was contemplated or intended by either party during their negotiations, nor does the language used in the conveyance permit such construction. "If a corporation has power to reduce its capital stock, it has been held it may do so by purchasing and retiring a portion of its shares." Cook, Stock & Stockh., § 282. But whether the defendant had power to permanently reduce its stock, or not, the effect of the purchase was to reduce its stock temporarily and until it should be regularly reissued. So long as it remains in the treasury, it represents no part of or interest in the property of the corporation. It was as though it had never been issued; and in Brewster v. Hartley, 37 Cal., 15, 30, it was said: "The capital stock of a corporation, previous to its being issued, cannot, in any proper sense, be called the property of the corporation." And that is true as to the stock in question here. It is true that "the language of a contract is to govern its interpretation, if the language is clear and explicit, and does not involve an absurdity." Civ. Code, § 1638. The appellant's contention, carried to its logical result, would involve an absurdity, inasmuch as its effect would be to return to it $7,000 of the money paid, with the right to participate in any future dividends that might be declared by the defendant.

It is also contended that defendant ratified the sale. The ratification of the sale is clear, but the ratification did not extend to anything not included in the conveyance, and therefore did not reach the stock. Appellant discusses several rulings of the court upon questions of evidence, but these alleged errors were not specified in its statement on motion for a new trial. However, we have examined them, but find therein no ground for a reversal. These questions went to the point whether during the negotiations any mention was made of these shares. Upon the face of the agreement and conveyance, we are obliged to hold that the stock in question did not pass, and the appellant, therefore, could not be prejudiced by evidence that no mention was made of it during the negotiations resulting in the sale. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 86.)

COMPLAINT AND INFORMATION—VARIANCE—DESIGNATION OF OWNERSHIP OF STOLEN PROPERTY—THEFT OF STEER — WHAT CONSTITUTES GRAND LARCENY.

1. Where the complaint before a magistrate charged the stealing of a steer "belonging to, and being owned by, the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased," and an information for grand larceny recited that the steer was "owned by Joseph Elledge and Mrs. M. J. Elledge, as executor and executrix of the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased," the variance was not fatal, since Code, § 956, provided that, where an offense for a private injury is described with sufficient certainty to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured is not material.

2. Pen. Code, § 487, subd. 3, making the felonious stealing and carrying away of a steer grand larceny, means a live steer; and if a third person killed the animal, and defendant did not believe it was the property of such person, but assisted in carrying away the meat, he was not guilty of grand larceny, unless the meat taken by him was of the value of $50.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county.

O. L. Smith was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Ruddock and W. G. Poage, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of grand larceny, committed in the county of Mendocino, in the month of December, 1894, by stealing a brindle steer, which "was then and there the personal property of another, belonging to and being then owned by Joseph Elledge and Mrs. M. J. Elledge, as executor and executrix of the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased." He was found guilty as charged, and the judgment was that he be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for the term of four years. From that judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he has appealed.

There was no error in denying the defendant's motion to set aside the information, or in overruling the demurrer interposed to it. The motion was based upon the theory that the defendant had not been legally held to answer for the offense charged, because in the complaint filed with the committing magistrate the steer alleged to have been stolen was described as "belonging to, and being owned by, the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased"; and in support of this theory the case of People v. Hall, 19 Cal. 425, is cited. But whatever may have been the law in 1861, when that case was decided, such a description cannot be held insufficient now, under the provisions of our Penal Code. Section 956 of that Code provides, "When an offense involves the commission of, or an attempt to commit, a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured or intended to be injured is not material." And in People v. Leong Quong, 60 Cal. 107, it is said: "The name of the owner of property stolen is not a material part of the offense charged. It is only required to identify the transaction so that the defendant, by proper plea, may protect himself against another prosecution for the same offense." The case of People v. Wallace, 94 Cal. 497, 29 Pac. 950, cited by appellant, is not in point. In that case the defendant was charged in the complaint filed before the magistrate with the larceny of "three certain steers, the property of Joseph Wright and E. J. Jones," while in the information he was charged with stealing "the personal property of one Joseph Wright, to wit, two certain steers." It was held that this variance was fatal, the court saying, "It is manifest that there is such a variance between the offense described in the complaint and that charged in the information that the one cannot be deemed the same as the other." In this case there was no substantial variance in the offense, as charged in the complaint and in the information. In each the offense was described with sufficient certainty to identify the act, and the alleged ownership was, in effect, the same, namely, in the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased. The demurrer was based upon the same grounds as the motion, and what has already been said sufficiently disposes of the objections to the ruling upon it.

At the trial one Andrew Spoerner was called as a witness for the prosecution, and his testimony was practically all that was given on that side of the case. He testified, in substance, as follows: Defendant was living, with his family, at Low Gap, in Mendocino county. He was occupying a piece of land for the purpose of securing it as a homestead. In December, 1894, witness went to defendant's place, and was asked by him to stay there a couple of months, and help put up a house and make some improvements. During the month of December, defendant told witness that he had some stock—good-sized heifers—running around, and he wanted witness to help him butcher one. On the third Sunday in the month they went out together; defendant packing a rifle, and witness an axe. After walking some time over the hills in company, defendant heard a bell, and said, "That's where the stock are running." He then went off, and the witness walked around to keep warm. After a while witness saw the cattle up the hill, crossing the ridge, with defendant after them. A little later, witness heard a shot, and then followed in the direction where he heard it, and found defendant with the steer shot and his throat cut. Witness helped defendant skin the steer and cut the meat out, and pack it home on a horse. They only packed a piece home that day. The next day it rained, and so they waited till Tuesday, when they got a horse and went again. Witness then cut the meat out, put it in a sack, and defendant packed it up the hill with the horse. They left the hide, as it was badly cut up. Defendant salted the meat down, and, when witness left his place, he had just begun smoking it. Witness guessed it was more than four miles, over a rough country, to the place where the steer was killed. In June, following, witness took two other parties to the place where the steer was killed, and showed them the bones. He further testified that he remained at defendant's place about four weeks after the steer was killed, and then left, and that he was friendly with him before, but not then. It was further proved that the animal killed belonged to the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased. For the defense, the defendant's wife, her son by a former marriage, then a little more than 10 years old, and the defendant, were called and examined as witnesses. Each witness testified that on the Sunday when the steer was shot the defendant was at home all day, and did not go out with Spoerner at all. Mrs. Smith testified, in substance, that on Saturday night Spoerner asked her husband to go hunting with him, and her husband told him he would not go; that the next morning, at breakfast, Spoerner again asked her husband to go hunting with him and the latter told him "No"; that, shortly after, Spoerner went away with an axe and gun on his shoulder, and that when he came back it was nearly dark, after she and her husband had had supper; that he had a piece of meat, which he threw down, and said, "Fry it for supper;" that she asked what it was, and he said, "Well, a big buck I shot;" that after that he told her husband, "You get Hill's horse, and go with me, and help me get that meat home. I have lots in the woods;" that it rained Monday and Tuesday, and on Wednesday he said the meat must be got in; that her husband then went and got Hill's horse, and they then went away, the boy going with them; that in the evening, about 6 o'clock, they came back, bringing three or four sacks of meat on the horse; that they took the meat out, and let it lie over night; that when she saw the meat she said, "Did you kill a beef?" and Spoerner said, "Yes;" that she told Spoerner, "You bring us all into trouble. Whose beef is that?" He said, "What the hell do you want to know about it? Any trouble that I bring on, I defend it, and you mind your own business;" that when Spoerner left he took a sackful of the meat, and "the rest he said we could keep for his board." "He gave the meat to me. My husband said we didn't want it at all, and the next time he come he should take some along. He said when he got his clothes he would take some of it along." Defendant testified: "On the Sunday this beef is alleged to have been killed I was at home. Mr. Spoerner was stopping with me at the time. He came there right after Thanksgiving. There was a sort of agreement between us that he was to help me, and I would return it next fall. I told him, before we went into this agreement, that grub was scarce; times were hard; it would be hard to get provisions. On the Saturday night previous to the alleged killing of this beef, he proposed to me to go out and get some pork. I told him I didn't want any pork. On Sunday morning, after breakfast, he went out, taking my rifle with him. He was gone all day. I did not go with him. I was at home all day, with my wife and boy. He came home about six o'clock on that Sunday evening, bringing a piece of meat —about thirty-five pounds—with him. He remarked to the boy that he had killed a big buck out in the woods. That evening he said he had a big beef in the woods, and wanted me to get a horse, and help him pack it in. I got Hill's horse, and we took the boy with us, went out and got the meat, brought it in, and salted it down. I smoked it afterwards. Spoerner left it at my house. He was to take it home when he came after his clothes. He took some when he left my house."

The court gave to the jury certain instructions asked by defendant, and then, of its own motion, charged them as follows: "Now, gentlemen, I charge you that if this defendant and that man Spoerner went out to the range, or any other place in the woods, and that the defendant killed the steer and helped carry it to his home, and he did it feloniously, then he is guilty. I charge you furthermore,—and bear this in mind,—if he did not kill it, if Spoerner killed it, and he did not believe really that it was Spoerner's property, and he feloniously helped to remove it from the place where it was killed by Spoerner, and he took it to his place, or carried it to any other place, for the purpose of depriving the owner of the property, he is guilty, notwithstanding he did not kill it himself. The killing of the steer or a hog on a man's premises is not larceny. That is not what he is charged with. He is charged with the asportation of the property; that is, taking it and carrying it away. While it lay on the premises there, shot down, it was yet the property of the estate of Elledge; and the man who feloniously took it from that place and carried it away, knowing it was not his own, with the intention of depriving the owner of it, is guilty of larceny."

By our statute, "larceny" is defined to be "the felonious stealing, taking, carrying or driving away the personal property of another." Pen. Code, § 484. The offense is divided into two degrees,—grand larceny and petit larceny. It is grand larceny (1) when the property taken is of a value exceeding $50; (2) when the property is taken from the person of another; (3) when the property taken is a horse, mare, gelding, cow, steer, etc. In all other cases it is petit larceny. Pen. Code, §§ 486–488. To make the stealing of one of the animals named, however, grand larceny, the animal must be a live one, and not a dead carcass. It is true, if one should kill one of the animals for the purpose of stealing it, and then take and carry away the whole or a part of the body, it would be grand larceny. But if one should go into a field and find a dead animal lying there, and should take and carry away the body, or a part of it, it would not be grand larceny, unless the part carried away was of the value of $50 or more. In Hunt v. State, 55 Ala. 138, the law upon this subject is very clearly and correctly stated. In that case the defendant was indicted for stealing a hog, and by the law of the state the stealing of a hog was declared to be grand larceny. The trial court instructed the jury "that if they should believe from the evidence that the defendant killed the hog accidentally, and put it in the swamp for concealment, and not with the felonious intent to convert it to his own use, or with intent to deprive the owner of his property therein, still, if they should believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he afterwards went to the place where he had carried the hog, and then feloniously took and carried away the same, or any part thereof, he would be guilty as charged in the indictment." On appeal this instruction was held to be erroneous, the court saying: "If the animal was not killed with the intent, then entertained, of stealing it or some part of its carcass, but the act was in truth done without any such purpose, though recklessly, the subsequent cutting and taking away by the defendant of a part of the body, in the course of the night following, or the next day, would not make him guilty of grand larceny, the whole hog being of the value of only six dollars. It is the live hog that he must intend to steal (which he may, of course, do by killing it and then taking it away), that constitutes grand larceny, in such a case. But if after it is killed, no matter by whom, if not done by the defendant, or some one with whom he is conspiring with intent to steal the body or some part of it, a purpose is afterwards formed, and carried into effect, of taking and carrying away a part of the meat, the person guilty of this is not guilty of grand larceny, or of stealing a 'hog,' within the meaning of the statute. The act of trespass and the felonious intent do not so coexist as to make the offender guilty of that crime;" citing Bish. Cr. Law (3d Ed.) § 366 (314), and cases cited in note. The instructions in this case were in clear conflict with the rule above declared. They, in effect, told the jury that if Spoerner killed the steer, and defendant did not believe it was his property, but feloniously assisted to asport the meat to his own house, he was guilty, and should be so found. This certainly cannot be sound law.

The point is made that, according to his own testimony, Spoerner was an accomplice, and that his testimony, being uncorroborated, was not sufficient to warrant a conviction; but that question need not be considered. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

LEE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY. (S. F. 429.)

ATTORNEYS—APPOINTMENT BY COURT—SUBSTITUTION.

1. Attorneys, appointed by the court in probate proceedings to defend the interests of absent heirs and legatees, are entitled, not only to reasonable compensation for their services, but to considerate treatment, and cannot be arbitrarily discharged.

2. The right of a party under Code Civ. Proc. § 284, to a substitution of attorneys on proper application therefor, is absolute, and the court has no power to refuse a motion by nonresident legatees, who are sui juris, for the substitution of an attorney of their own selection in place of one previously appointed by the court.

In bank. Petition by one Lee and others for a writ of mandamus to the superior court of San Joaquin county to compel a substitution of attorneys. Granted.

John A. Percy, for petitioner. F. D. Nicol, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to the superior court to compel a substitution of attorneys. The petitioners are legatees under the will of a deceased person, and reside out of the state of California. In the course of the probate proceedings the judge of the superior court appointed certain attorneys to represent the interests of petitioners. Subsequently petitioners appointed an attorney of their own selection, and moved that he be substituted in place of the attorney appointed by the court. This motion was denied by the court, principally upon the ground—as we infer from the answer—that the attorneys previously appointed had performed valuable services before the motion for substitution, and were still efficiently protecting the interests of the petitioners, while the personal relations of the attorney selected by them to the executor of the will were such as might prevent him from serving them equally well. We do not think that this or any of the grounds suggested in the answer or argument justify the refusal to make the substitution. It is eminently proper that the court should appoint attorneys to guard the interests of absent heirs and legatees, and such attorneys are entitled, not only to a reasonable compensation for their services, but to considerate treatment. The motion originally made to vacate their appointment and to discharge them was, therefore, properly denied; but, on the present motion for a substitution, the petitioners being sui juris, and insisting upon their right, the statute makes the granting of the order imperative. Code Civ. Proc. § 284. Peremptory writ granted.

PAIGE v. AKINS. (Sac. 59.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—INJUNCTION.

1. It appeared that defendant had been for several years foreman in charge of all plaintiff's lands, with authority to rent the same, and negotiate the purchase and sale of land; that, in 1891, a tract of 500 acres was subdivided for purposes of sale; that, prior to the subdivision, 350 acres of this tract had been leased for the planting of a crop in the winter of 1891, which would not mature till 1892, and that the tenant had summer-fallowed the same in the spring of 1891; that, at defendant's suggestion, plaintiff purchased the summer-fallow from the tenant; that, as plaintiff's foreman, defendant had authority to cultivate lands for plaintiff's benefit; that, November 21, 1891, defendant wrote plaintiff, "There is 350 acres of summer-fallow; * * * I will need seed wheat to put it in," and again, December 1st, "What shall I do with the summer-fallow?" that not till two months after he began seeding the land was there an intimation that defendant was putting it in on shares; that plaintiff paid for the labor employed in putting in the crop, and furnished the seed. Held, that the evidence was insufficient to establish the relation of landlord and tenant.

2. An agent can acquire rights in the property of his principal only through a personal contract with him.

3. The burden of showing such contract is on the agent, and it must appear to be fair, just, and reasonable.

4. A party to an instrument purporting to be a settlement in full cannot testify that it did not include a certain item, afterwards in controversy.

5. To entitle a landowner to an injunction restraining another from removing a crop from the land, absolute and complete insolvency of defendant need not be shown.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Injunction by Timothy Paige against S. L. Akins. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd and C. A. Stonesifer, for appellant. Easton & Griffin, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Suit to enjoin defendant from harvesting and removing a crop from plaintiff's land. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Certain special issues were submitted to a jury, and these being found in favor of the defendant were adopted by the court, and incorporated in the general findings, all of which, appellant contends, were not justified by the evidence; and he also specifies several particulars in which he alleges the court erred in its rulings upon matters of evidence.

During all the time covered by the evidence, the plaintiff resided in the city of San Francisco, and owned large quantities of land in the counties of Stanislaus and Merced. About ten years before the commencement of this action the defendant became a tenant, or cropper, upon a portion of plaintiff's land in Merced county known as the "Gardner Ranch," and farmed it two years upon shares. At the expiration of that time the defendant was employed as agent and foreman in charge of all plaintiff's lands in said counties, with authority to rent the same, collect the rents, and negotiate the purchase and sale of land. Afterwards, at defendant's suggestion, an arrangement was made between the parties by which the plaintiff purchased cattle, and furnished pasture for them, the defendant to take charge of them and pay "the running expenses," and, after deducting 1 per cent. per month interest on the purchase price of the cattle, was to receive one-half of the profits as compensation for his services and expenses. This relation between the parties as to the cattle, and the relation of principal and agent in reference to renting the land and defendant's control as foreman, continued until March 25, 1892, when the plaintiff discharged him. Whether the other relation, that of landlord and tenant, existed at that time, is the principal question in the case, the subject of the action being the ownership of a crop upon 500 acres of plaintiff's land which the defendant claims he put in as tenant, he to pay a share of the crop for the use of the land. Acting upon this claim the defendant began to cut and remove said crop, and plaintiff, claiming that the crop was not planted by the defendant upon shares, but that he did it as plaintiff's foreman, for plaintiff's benefit, and at plaintiff's expense, brought this action to enjoin him from cutting and removing said crop.

I think the evidence insufficient to justify the finding that defendant planted the crop under an agreement with the plaintiff that he should cultivate said land as tenant for a share of the crop. The crop in question was grown upon 500 acres of land, which was part of a larger tract containing about 1,400 acres. The whole tract was subdivided, in the summer of 1891, into lots or parcels of about 20 acres each for purposes of sale. Prior to the subdivision, 350 acres of the 500 upon which the crop in question was grown was let to a third party for the purpose of raising a crop thereon, to be planted in the winter of 1891, and harvested in 1892, and the tenant had summer-fallowed the same in the spring of 1891. When it was concluded to subdivide the land into colony lots, it was thought that the cultivation of the summer-fallow by said tenant might interfere with the sale of the lots included in the 350 acres already plowed by the tenant, and at defendant's suggestion the plaintiff purchased the summer-fallow from the tenant, paying therefor $2.50 per acre. This statement as to the situation and condition of the land, and of the relations existing between the parties, is essential to a just and true comprehension of the evidence upon the vital point of the controversy.

There is no controversy or conflict as to the fact that the defendant was the agent of plaintiff in renting his lands and collecting the rents. For these services, and for his services as foreman, he received a compensation of $50 per month. The record does not specify with any particularity the duties attached to the position of foreman, but we may assume that the word is used in its ordinary sense, denoting the chief or superintendent of employés, as one who has the general oversight and care of the property. All of these duties involve the relation of principal and agent, and it was not in the power of the defendant to contract, as the agent of the plaintiff, with himself as the other party to the contract. A tenancy, such as is claimed by the defendant to have existed as to this land and crop, could only be created by contract; and, if the contract were valid, it gave the tenant the exclusive right to the control and possession of the crop until it was harvested and divided, and vested in him the absolute ownership of the share to which he was entitled. That an agent cannot confer upon himself such rights and privileges in the lands and property of his principal is too well settled to require extended discussion or citation of authorities. It is only necessary to say that the absence of an intention on the part of the agent to injure his principal, or that the self-imposed terms of the tenancy were those usually made in renting to third persons, do not affect the question, and will not defeat the plaintiff's right to the remedy he has invoked. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 959, quoted and approved in Sterling v. Smith, 97 Cal. 343, 32 Pac. 320.

The only question of fact, therefore, which need be considered is whether the plaintiff personally leased the land to the defendant. The defendant was not only an agent for the purpose of leasing plaintiff's lands and collecting the rents, but was also plaintiff's foreman; and it is not questioned that, in the latter capacity, he had authority to cultivate the tract in question, and raise the crop in controversy, for the plaintiff's benefit, and at his expense; and, in the absence of evidence of an agreement that he should cultivate the land as tenant of the plaintiff, the presumption is that he did it as plaintiff's foreman, since he had authority to cultivate it as foreman; and, in the absence of a special agreement, he had no authority to cultivate it as tenant. The burden is therefore upon the defendant to show such an agreement as authorized him to cultivate it as tenant, and the proof of it must be clear.

It is true the defendant denied that he put in the crop as foreman for the plaintiff, but that is no evidence of an agreement between him and the plaintiff that he would put it in for a share of the crop. He testified, however, that when it was decided to purchase the summer-fallow, the plaintiff asked, "What will we do with the summer-fallow in case the land is not all sold?" and defendant replied, "Any that is remaining there I will put it in"; that plaintiff replied, "Very well," and, "pursuant to that understanding or conversation, I put in the crop." But, as already shown, he was authorized to put in the crop for the plaintiff as his foreman, and the language used was entirely consistent with his intention to do so, and gave no intimation of a purpose to cultivate the land on shares. Besides, in accordance with his advice, the plaintiff had just purchased the summer-fallow, because, if a tenant cultivated the land, he would desire, and would be entitled, to hold it until his crop was removed, and if the defendant entered into the same relation, and put in the crop on the same terms, his rights and interests would be as secure and sacred; and the plaintiff, upon that theory, gained nothing by buying off the former tenant at an expense of $875.

According to defendant's testimony, the foregoing was all that was said in regard to putting in the crop until in February, 1892, notwithstanding he commenced to put it in as early as December 14, 1891. As to the conversation in February, the defendant testified that plaintiff asked him "how he was putting it in,—what the conditions were?" The inquiry itself would appear remarkable if there had been an "agreement" in regard to it made long before. Defendant, however, replied, "Just the customary way,—the same as the others"; and that plaintiff did not dissent. Upon being asked what part of the crop he claimed for himself and what part for Mr. Paige, he replied: "Three-fourths for myself and one-fourth for Mr. Paige. That was never expressly mentioned between myself and Mr. Paige. Those are the usual conditions for putting in crops on the shares; that is, where the landowner furnishes nothing but the land. The seed that seeded this land came from Newman's warehouse. It was Mr. Paige's wheat. I do not know whether that was ever charged to me or not. I never drew an order on Mr. Paige for the wheat. I sent him a statement of the amount used, I think." He further testified that he had some talk about the seed, and plaintiff told him, if he could get some better seed than was in the warehouse, to buy it; that he thought he traded with Newman for part of the seed (traded Paige's wheat), and paid four bits or a dollar a ton difference. "The difference was charged, I presume, and Mr. Paige paid it." Upon further cross-examination defendant identified certain letters written by him to the plaintiff, from which certain passages are quoted as follows: November 21, 1891: "There is 350 acres of summer-fallow on the Montgomery ranch. I will need seed wheat to put it in." December 1, 1891: "What shall I do with the summer-fallow on the Montgomery land? It ought to be put in soon." December 11, 1891: "Newman has not got any wheat that is better than yours that is stored there, so I will sow it. I don't need an order for the wheat." December 14, 1891: "I am getting in the summer-fallow now. Running four six-horse harrows. Looks like rain. We are on it alone." December 17, 1891: "Summer-fallow is going in in good shape. The rain stopped me a day and a half, but have been working this afternoon. We had forty-seven hundredths of an inch of rain last storm. The weather is warm and grain will come quickly if the weather continues favorable." December 28, 1891: "I am plowing for barley. We had quite a nice rain yesterday, and it is now raining again and is warm. Vegetation is starting in early."

The foregoing synopsis of the testimony shows the material facts directly touching the crop here in question, as brought out on the examination of the defendant. It will be observed that, until some two months after he commenced seeding the land, there was no intimation that he was putting it in on shares; that, though the ground had been summer-fallowed at an expense to the plaintiff of $875, no provision was made for the repayment of that sum, and, while he claimed the benefit of furnishing the seed, it was furnished by the plaintiff without any agreement that it should be charged to him or repaid out of the crop. These circumstances are wholly inconsistent with defendant's claim, but are entirely consistent with the contention of plaintiff that he did the work as plaintiff's foreman. The plaintiff not only testified that the defendant put in the crop for him as his agent or foreman, that he paid him $50 per month for his services as such, but that "he [the defendant] employed the labor and I paid them. The seed used was mine. I had it stored at Mr. Newman's warehouse, and the seed was taken from there to put in this crop. The crop was put in upon summer-fallow. The former tenant had done the work of summer-fallowing. I paid that tenant $2.50 per acre for doing it,"—and expressly denied any arrangement or agreement that defendant should put it in on shares. The defendant did not deny plaintiff's express statement that he paid for the labor employed in putting in the crop, and admitted that he also paid for the summer-fallowing, and that the land was sown with plaintiff's wheat, and did not know whether it was charged to him or not.

There was much testimony as to the continuance of the relation of landlord and tenant after defendant became plaintiff's agent and foreman. The defendant insisted that he farmed portions of plaintiff's land almost, if not quite, every year; that, if he failed to find a tenant, and the season was well advanced, he would put in the crop himself; that "there might have been some seasons I made special contracts, and other seasons I would put it in without consulting him; just go ahead,—go right along just the same as I had done, perhaps, the year before." The plaintiff testified that there had been occasions when a special arrangement had been made with the defendant, either verbally or by letter, but that he did not otherwise raise crops upon the shares so far as he knew; that he might have done so without his knowledge, as he seldom knew the names of the tenants cultivating the land, the reports being usually made as to particular lands, and not as to particular tenants; and denied that the defendant was authorized to cultivate his lands on shares without special authority. It is not necessary to discuss this part of the evidence, nor to consider how far the custom of the parties can affect or enlarge or create the power of an agent to deal with himself as to his principal's property; for, though the agent may contract with his principal, yet the fact that a contract was made must be clearly shown, and the burden of showing it must rest upon the agent, and it must also appear to be fair, just, and reasonable, or the principal will not be bound. In no aspect, therefore, is the finding of the alleged cropping agreement justified by the evidence. Other findings intimately connected with the principal one above discussed must fall with it.

After the defendant was discharged by the plaintiff, a settlement was had between the parties, and the following paper was executed by defendant to plaintiff: "Newman, April 21, 1892. Received of Timothy Paige one hundred dollars in full satisfaction for all demands of every kind and nature to date, and for any interest I have in any of the mowers and wagons and tools of every kind on the ranch of said Paige. S. L. Akins." And plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant the following: "Newman, April 20. 1892. Received of S. L. Akins one hundred dollars in full of all notes and book accounts and all demands to date. Timothy Paige." Upon cross-examination plaintiff testified that he and the defendant met and agreed upon the terms of settlement; that he told defendant he preferred to settle all their matters rather than to have any litigation, and he said, he did, too; and, upon the examination in chief of defendant, he was asked by his counsel the following question: "I will ask you whether or not you have settled with Mr. Paige in a way to include that crop, and to transfer your rights to him in connection with other conditions you made in the settlement, whatever they were." Plaintiff's objection was overruled, and the witness answered: "No, sir; I would not." The court erred in overruling plaintiff's objection. It permitted the defendant to testify to the legal effect of a written instrument, and say to the court and jury that the receipt did not cover or include the crop in controversy. He could testify as to the situation of the parties, the surrounding circumstances, and to such matters of fact as would put the court as nearly as possible in the situation of the parties; but he could not be permitted to testify to his intentions, or to the meaning or legal effect of the writing.

Whether the instrument has or should be given the conclusive effect contended for by appellant need not be considered, in view of the conclusions reached upon other points. The evidence may be quite different upon another trial, and, as already stated, it must be read and construed in the light of surrounding circumstances disclosed by the evidence. This much may be said, however, that, if it be conceded that defendant put in the crop upon shares, and the effect of the settlement and receipts should be held to operate as a release of the defendant for the cost of the summer-fallow, or the value of the seed wheat which belonged to the plaintiff, or the expense of putting in the crop, the contention of the plaintiff that the defendant thereby released all claim to the crop should be sustained. Respondent, in his brief, says: "Anything charged to Akins for seed or feed was settled by the receipts, because this was a book account." But it must be evident that the defendant cannot shield himself behind the settlement from any liability connected with the crop, and at the same time insist that his right to the crop was not considered in or affected by the settlement. Putting such contention in plain English, the defendant would say: "The plaintiff furnished the land and the seed, advanced the cost of the summer-fallow, paid for the labor in putting in the crop, and paid me for superintending it, then released me from all these liabilities, and leaves me three-fourths of the crop for harvesting it."

The evidence of the inability of the defendant to respond in damages was sufficient. Absolute and complete insolvency need not be shown. The granting of injunctions are to some extent matters of discretion, and should be exercised in favor of the party most likely to be injured. Hicks v. Compton, 18 Cal. 206; Real Del Monte Consol. Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Pond Gold & Silver Min. Co., 23 Cal. 83, 85.

The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

STEVENS v. HOLMAN et ux. (No. 19,475.)

MORTGAGE ON HOMESTEAD—ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY WIFE—MISTAKE—REFORMATION.

1. The statute, requiring a mortgage on the homestead to be signed and acknowledged by the wife in the statutory form, relates merely to the execution of the instrument, and will not prevent the reformation of a mortgage on the homestead, properly signed and acknowledged, which, by mistake of the mortgagee, did not include all the land which the parties had agreed that it should cover, on the theory that the mortgage, as reformed, would not be so acknowledged by the wife.

2. Civ. Code, § 3399, providing for the reformation of written instruments which, by "mutual mistake of the parties or a mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected," applies to a mortgage on the homestead, which, by mistake of the mortgagee, but with the knowledge of the mortgagors, did not include all the land that the parties had agreed it should cover.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by William Stevens against one Holman and his wife to reform a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. McKinley, for appellants. J. D. Reymert, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action for the reformation of a mortgage executed to plaintiff by the defendants, Holman and wife, and to foreclose the same. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, bringing up the judgment roll alone.

Respondent had a former note and mortgage from appellants, and appellants, desiring further time, agreed to give a new note and a mortgage to secure it covering certain described land. Respondent consented, whereupon the old note and mortgage was canceled, and the note and mortgage now in suit was given. But the description in the new mortgage did not include all the land which appellants had agreed to mortgage. Respondent supposed that the description did include all such land, and accepted the mortgage under the mistaken notion that he was thereby getting a lien upon all the land which appellants had promised to mortgage. Appellants knew that the description did not embrace all said land, but they, and each of them, "knew that plaintiff believed that the mortgage, as executed by them to him, did include all the land they, and each of them, had agreed to mortgage as aforesaid, and that plaintiff was deceived in so believing, and took and accepted said mortgage with the mistaken belief that the same did embrace all the land said defendants had agreed to mortgage to him."

If the appellants were both men, and there were no question of homestead rights involved, there would be no plausible objection to the judgment. But the land constituted the homestead of the appellants, and their counsel contend that, as a homestead can be conveyed or incumbered only by an instrument signed and acknowledged by both husband and wife, the acknowledgment of the latter to be in the form provided for the acknowledgment of married women, therefore there could be no reformation of the mortgage by the court, because such reformation would not have the sanction of the wife's acknowledgment. But the provisions of the statute invoked merely prescribe the things which are requisite to the due execution of a written instrument by a married woman. It may be readily conceded that she is not bound by any instrument not executed by her in the manner prescribed by the statute. When, however, she has duly executed a contract, there is no reason why she does not bear the same relation to it, and to rights and remedies under it, as any other contractor. See Hamar v. Medsker, 60 Ind. 413, and Society v. Meeks, 66 Cal. 371, 5 Pac. 624. And in the case at bar the contract—the mortgage—was duly executed by the appellants, the wife having signed and acknowledged it with all the formalities prescribed by the Code. If, therefore, the mortgage could have been rightfully reformed as decreed by the court, in case neither of the mortgagors had been a married woman, the decree was right as against the appellants. The fact that the land was a homestead cuts no figure. Parties can contract as to their homestead as fully as to any other land, provided their contract be executed in the manner prescribed by statute. These views are sustained by the decision and opinion in Society v. Meeks, 66 Cal. 371, 5 Pac. 624. There the lower court had reformed a mortgage upon land which was the separate property of the wife, so as to make it describe the land intended to be mortgaged; and we see no difference in principle between that case and the one at bar. It was there contended that "the court erred in reforming the mortgage, because the mortgage, as reformed, was not the act and deed of the wife, as it was not acknowledged by her as required by law." But the court said: "It is merely carrying into effect the intention of the parties. No new right was conferred. The instrument was reformed, so as to express truly the intention of the parties. Hayford v. Kocher, 65 Cal. 389, 4 Pac. 350. If such mistakes could not be corrected, gross wrong and injustice would result. By the reformation of the instrument and the correction of the mistakes, the object and policy of the law as to the conveyance of the separate property of a married woman are not controverted or thwarted." In Hayford v. Kocher, 65 Cal. 389, 4 Pac. 350, Flavel Hayford had made a conveyance to Kocher in which certain premises were "intended to be, but by mutual mistake were not, included." Kocher afterwards, in an action against Flavel, had the conveyance reformed so as to include said premises. But before the reformation, Flavel's wife, Lydia Hayford, selected said premises as a statutory homestead. The two Hayfords then brought an action in ejectment to recover said premises, upon the theory that there could be no judicial reformation of a conveyance affecting a homestead. They were defeated in the lower court, and the judgment was affirmed here. But, if the homestead had existed at the time of the conveyance, and the wife had duly executed the conveyance in the manner as prescribed by the statute, must not the judgments in the suit for reformation and in the action of ejectment have been, upon principle, the same?

Counsel for appellants cite Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 14; Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52. The former case is not at all in point; for there it was merely held that the consent of a married woman to execute an instrument must be perfectly free, and that "it is not in the province of a court of equity to compel a married woman to correct an insufficient acknowledgment." Leonis v. Lazzarovich lends some support to appellants' contention; but that case, in the character of the action and the substance of the judgment, is different from the case at bar, and the form of the judgment was evidently the thing most prominent in the mind of the court when the opinion was delivered. That action was evidently not for the reformation of a conveyance which had been already properly executed by a married woman, but for a decree compelling her to execute another conveyance. The court, in its opinion, says: "Was it within the equitable powers and jurisdiction of the court below to decree, as it did, that the defendant should, within a certain time, fixed by the decree, execute to the plaintiff her deed conveying lands not described in any deed or other written instrument, and, in case she made default, that such deed should be executed by the clerk of the court? That is what the court did by its decree, and it is the correctness of such proceeding that we are now called upon to review." It is true that, in the opinion, there are some statements about the reformation of a married woman's deed which are inconsistent with Society v. Meeks; but they are mainly dicta, and, if any of them can be considered as forming a part of the decision, they must be held as overruled by the case last above mentioned. See, also, Banbury v. Arnold, 91 Cal. 610, 27 Pac. 934. When a conveyance, mortgage, or other contract of a married woman has been duly executed by her as provided by statute, it is subject to reformation in like manner as the contract of any other person. In such a case, she has no special license to insist upon a wrong caused by fraud or mistake.

Most of the adjudged cases upon the subject deal with mutual mistakes, but the Code provides expressly for the kind of mistake involved in this action. By section 3399 of the Civil Code it is enacted as follows: "When through fraud or a mutual mistake of the parties, or a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, a written instrument does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention, so far as it may be done without prejudice to rights acquired by third parties in good faith." There is no difference between a description which does not include all the property intended to be included, and a description which is defective in any other respect. In either instance, an action for a reformation lies. Hayford v. Kocher, supra, is an instance of the one kind. Society v. Meeks, supra, is an instance of the other.

We see nothing in the point that there is no averment in the complaint that the mortgage as mistakenly made is not sufficient security. Respondent was entitled to all the security for which he contracted. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.

TEMPLE, J. I dissent. The mortgage in question here was executed February 9, 1889, long before the provisions of the Code requiring conveyances of married women to be executed in a special mode were repealed. The complaint charges that certain parts of the homestead which defendants had agreed to mortgage were omitted by mutual mistakes. Defendants denied that they ever made such promise and that there was any mistake. The court found that plaintiff supposed that the mortgage was to include the certain homestead, and that defendants knew that such was his understanding, but they knew that it did not include the homestead, and did not intend that it should. In other words, the wife signed and acknowledged the mortgage after having it explained to her that it did not cover the entire homestead, and would not have executed it if it had included it, and now, on a finding that her husband practiced a fraud upon plaintiff, the court is asked to hold that she did execute such a mortgage, and acknowledged that she did so freely and voluntarily, and that, after being made acquainted with its contents, she did not wish to retract the execution of the same. To my mind the mere statement has the force of a demonstration, but the identical question was settled by this court in Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52. This decision has been frequently affirmed by this court. The finding that the defendants promised and agreed to mortgage to plaintiff the entire homestead is not supported by the evidence. No such agreement could be made except by an instrument signed and acknowledged by both husband and wife. The action is really to enforce specific performance of a parol contract to give a mortgage upon the homestead. To so decree is, in my opinion, to violate the law.

PEOPLE v. MARSHALL. (Cr. 77.)

MURDER—INSTRUCTION—BURDEN OF PROVING JUSTIFICATION OF KILLING—REVIEW.

1. An instruction, in the trial of a defendant for murder, that, when the act of killing has been proved, the burden of proving justification devolves on the defendant, and it must be established by a preponderance of the evidence, is erroneous.

2. Where an instruction was given erroneously imposing on the defendant the burden of proof on an issue, and there was evidence tending to support his defense on such issue, a reviewing court cannot weigh the evidence on the question, and determine therefrom that the error was not prejudicial.

3. An instruction erroneously imposing the burden of proof on a defendant to establish a defense is not cured by the giving of a general instruction correctly stating the law as to reasonable doubt.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Charles Marshall was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

R. E. Bledsoe and C. C. Haskell, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and takes this appeal from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial.

Appellant makes several points upon which a reversal is claimed; but, as I think a new trial must be had, and as most of the alleged errors are of a character not likely to be repeated, they need not be noticed. The homicide was practically admitted by the defendant, but he claimed that it was in necessary self-defense. At the request of the district attorney the court gave the instruction approved in People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 394, but which, upon mature consideration, was declared erroneous in People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549, and in People v. Lanagan, 81 Cal. 142, 22 Pac. 482. The instruction was as follows: "Up to the moment when the killing is proved, the prosecution must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt. When the killing is proved, it devolves upon the defendant to show any circumstance in mitigation, to excuse or justify, by a preponderance of evidence on his part; that is, the killing being proved, the defendant must make out his case in mitigation, to excuse or justify, by some proof stronger in some appreciable degree than the proof of the prosecution. The burden of proof changes. It must be in some appreciable degree, no matter how small, stronger than the proof of the prosecution on the other side." The attorney general admits that the instruction was erroneous, but claims that it was not injurious for two reasons:

1. There was no evidence in the case which tended to make a case of justifiable homicide, or which tended to reduce the grade of the offense. To show this he prints in his brief what purports to be an extract from the opinion of the trial judge in refusing a new trial. In this appears a statement of the facts in regard to the homicide, made for the purpose of showing that there was no possible claim that the killing was in necessary self-defense. That nearly every material fact in this statement was contradicted by the defendant as a witness is absolutely conclusive that the instruction was injurious. That the testimony of the defendant did tend to show justification is admitted by the judge in this statement, but he says his evidence was uncorroborated; and he says such was the case in People v. Smith, 59 Cal. 601, where it is held that a similar instruction was not injurious because there were no facts which tended to show justification. I do not so understand that case. On the contrary, the court said, as I read the case, that even the defendant testified to no fact which tended to justify the homicide. The defendant had a right to have his own testimony considered, and, if it was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors as to whether the killing was justifiable, he was entitled to an acquittal, though he was entirely uncorroborated.

The point made by the attorney general really is that the evidence against the defendant was so overwhelming that his uncorroborated testimony could not possibly be accepted by the jury, and, therefore, he is not injured. But this court cannot thus pass upon the evidence. This court has no jurisdiction in criminal cases, save on questions of law. The law has prescribed certain rules of pleading, practice, and evidence, in accordance with which persons accused of crimes must be tried. This court has appellate jurisdiction for the correction of errors in such cases. Evidently, the function of this court, on such an appeal, is to determine whether a defendant has been tried as the law prescribes. If he has not been, there is but one way to correct the error, and that is to grant a new trial. But a defendant would not be entitled to a new trial for any error which has not prejudiced his case. This rule prevails in civil, as well as criminal, cases. But this court cannot say that a defendant has not been injured because, notwithstanding the error, he must have been convicted anyway, as the evidence is very convincing. We cannot look at the evidence, except for the purpose of considering some questions of law which may be raised in regard to it. We can only regard persons guilty or innocent upon a verdict of a jury upon a trial according to law. If an appellant has been wrongly deprived of evidence, or has been required to make a stronger case than the law demanded, he has been injured.

2. The other ground upon which the attorney general claims that the instruction is not injurious is because the court gave other instructions of a contrary effect. For instance, the jury was told that the burden of proof always was upon the people, and that it was only necessary for the defense to create a reasonable doubt as to his guilt to entitle him to an acquittal. To give contradictory instructions must be to commit error, and it is almost always impossible in such cases to say that the jury has not followed the erroneous instruction rather than the correct one. If the court properly instructed the jury, for defendant, that it was only necessary to create a reasonable doubt to entitle him to an acquittal, and then instructed them that this rule only applied up to the time when it was proved that defendant killed the deceased, but from that time defendant must make his defense by a preponderance of proof, no one would doubt that the last instruction was injurious, notwithstanding the correct general proposition. In effect, that is exactly what was done here.

The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

SWINNERTON et al. v. ARGONAUT LAND & DEVELOPMENT CO. (Sac. 71.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — CONTRACT OF AGENT — IMPLIED PROMISE—INTEREST—EVIDENCE.

1. One who had been and was ostensibly the general agent of a corporation, employed plaintiffs to render certain professional services for the corporation. Plaintiffs had knowledge of such agency, and to the time of their employment and rendition of the services had no notice of a termination thereof. Held, that the corporation was liable for the services.

2. A finding of an express promise to pay for services rendered, unsupported by the evidence, is without prejudice where there is an implied promise to pay, and the value of the services is shown.

3. Where the amount due is not susceptible of ascertainment by computation or by reference to market rates, plaintiff is not entitled to interest prior to verdict or judgment.

4. One professing to be an agent authorized to employ counsel for his principal may be asked whether he employed the counsel for himself individually or for his principal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by J. G. Swinnerton and W. N. Rutherford, co-partners as Swinnerton & Rutherford, against the Argonaut Land & Development Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs against the defendant company, and an order denying a new trial, said defendant appeals. Modified.

Dudley & Buck, for appellant. Swinnerton & Rutherford in pro. per.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover by the plaintiffs, as co-partners, from the corporation defendant and certain others the sum of $575 for services rendered by plaintiffs in the year 1892, with interest thereon from January, 1893. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. A nonsuit was granted as to all the defendants except the corporation, against which judgment was entered for $500 and legal interest from January 1, 1893, amounting to $577.83. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The corporation defendant was the owner of a tract of land situate near Stockton in the county of San Joaquin. On the 12th day of September, 1888, the defendant entered into a written contract with George H. Fairbrother, by the terms of which the latter was employed by the former for a term of one year, to locate himself at Stockton, and act as the agent of the former in and about the land and business of the corporation; to negotiate leases of the land, collect rents, and generally to transact all its business in relation to said land and such other land as might be purchased in the vicinity. The agreement of agency provided that the agent should not bind the corporation (which was located at San Josê) to pay any money or assume any responsibility, unless such acts were ratified by the company. Fairbrother located in Stockton, took charge of the land, leased it to sundry parties, built levees, did dredging, constructed a wharf, and managed the property generally during the term of one year. He incurred obligations and contracted debts, all of which were met and paid by the company, so far as appears, without objection. In October, 1889, the corporation, by a resolution duly passed, declared the agency of Fairbrother vacant upon the expiration of the year. He continued, however, as before, to manage and attend to the property, and up to 1892 seems to have made leases, collected rents, etc. His general management and agency was known to plaintiffs, who knew nothing of the terms and conditions of the agency, or of its termination by act of the company. Fairbrother became president of the corporation, and served as such for one year. The precise time of such service does not clearly appear, but it is to be inferred that it was from April, 1890, to April, 1891. In August or September, 1892, he employed the plaintiffs to bring several suits to collect rents due from tenants upon the land. They collected some $2,500, and their services were at the trial admitted to be reasonably worth $500.

The question of fact involved on this appeal is this: Did Fairbrother, in August or September, 1892, have authority, either actual or ostensible, to bind the corporation defendant in the employment of the plaintiffs and respondents herein? The defendant introduced no evidence except such as was drawn from the witnesses of plaintiffs. The testimony is not as full and explicit on some points as could be wished, but is deemed sufficient to maintain the following propositions: (1) Fairbrother was the general agent of the corporation defendant. (2) Plaintiffs had knowledge of such agency. (3) Said plaintiffs never had any notice of the termination of the agency. (4) Said Fairbrother was the ostensible agent of defendant up to the date of the employment of plaintiffs and the rendition by them of the services for which a recovery was had. These propositions having evidence in their support, the court was warranted in concluding, as found by the first finding, that defendant was on the 1st day of January, 1892 (1893), indebted to plaintiffs, etc. The date 1892 is evidently a clerical error, and that 1893 was intended is apparent from the record. The last portion of the finding is as follows: "And it was agreed by said company that said services should be paid for on January 1, 1893." No evidence is found in the record supporting this finding of an express agreement to pay by defendant on the 1st of January, 1893, or at any other time. But, as the law implies a promise to pay by defendant upon the performance of the services for it, etc., and the showing of their value, it is not perceived that defendant was injured by the finding, except as it may serve as a predicate for allowing interest on the claim. The allowance of interest was error. In an action to recover the reasonable value of services performed by a plaintiff, the amount, character, and value of which can only be established by evidence in court, or by an accord between the parties, and which are not susceptible of ascertainment by computation or by reference to market rates, the plaintiff is not entitled to interest prior to verdict or judgment. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100; Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 239.

There was no error in the ruling of the court permitting plaintiffs' counsel to ask the witness Rutherford on whose behalf the plaintiffs were employed. The declarations of an alleged agent are not admissible to prove the fact of his agency, or the extent of his power as such agent. But the question whether one professing to be an agent employs another in his individual capacity or for another is quite a different question, —a question which goes to the character of the act, and not to his authority to perform it. An agent duly authorized to employ counsel for his principal would not bind such principal by employing such counsel for himself individually.

There are no other errors assigned calling for a consideration. We recommend that the cause be remanded, and the court below be directed to strike out from the judgment the sum of $77.83, and that, as thus amended, the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed, and that the appellant recover its costs on this appeal.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, and the court below directed to strike out from the judgment the sum of $77.83, and that, as thus amended, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, and that the appellant recover its costs on this appeal.

MERRILL v. SOUTHSIDE IRRIGATION CO. (L. A. 112.)

IRRIGATION—ACTION TO COMPEL FURNISHING OF WATER—IRRIGATION CORPORATION.

1. In an action against a corporation for a mandamus to compel the furnishing of water for irrigating purposes, an allegation that defendant was organized for such purpose, and a finding of such fact, are justified, although there are other purposes of its organization, not involved in the action, as to which neither allegations nor findings are made.

2. An allegation, in the answer of such company, that it has not sufficient water to supply the plaintiff, and all lands lying under its ditch that need water, states no defense, in the absence of an averment that others have demanded or have purchased it.

3. Neither does an allegation that defendant is likely to lose its supply of water at a future time state a defense.

4. Const. art. 14, § 1, providing for the regulation and control by the state of all water "appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution," applies to all water set apart for, or devoted to, such purposes, whether taken from public streams, or acquired from other sources.

5. The second clause of Civ. Code, § 552, providing that the owner of cultivated land within the flow of the ditch of a corporation, who has been furnished water for irrigation, shall be entitled to the continued use of water for that purpose, applies to all water and canal companies, and is not confined to those that have sold land to be irrigated, referred to in the first clause of the section.

Action by Mattie H. Merrill against the Southside Irrigation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, for appellant. John D. Pope, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Mandamus proceeding to compel the defendant, a corporation, to furnish to plaintiff water to irrigate plaintiff's land, to wit, the W. ½ of the S. E. ¼ of section 21, etc., to the extent of one-half the flow of a 22-inch round pipe, twice per month, for 36 hours each time, once on or about the 1st day of each month, and once on or about the 15th day of each month, upon tender by plaintiff to the defendant of the reasonable and customary charges for said water. Plaintiff had judgment in consonance with the prayer of her petition. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion of defendant for a new trial.

Defendant is a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of California. The objects of the corporation, as expressed in its articles of incorporation, are: "To care for and manage the water and sewage flowing through any or all of the sewers of Los Angeles city, and to enter into and make an agreement or contract with the city of Los Angeles relating to the care and management of the water and sewage flowing through any or all of the sewers of said city, and flowing in or through any ditch or zanja of said city, and to construct sewers, aqueducts, and other means of carrying the sewage of said city, or any water acquired by said city, or from any place, upon any lands, for the purposes of irrigation, and to distribute and sell the same for the purposes of irrigation, or any other purposes, and to acquire lands and rights of way, and do all other things necessary to be done to carry out the business aforesaid." Defendant admits that it procured a right of way by conveyance from plaintiff and one Fleming, across the land of plaintiff described herein, and constructed and placed thereon a pipe 22 inches in diameter and of a capacity of 450 inches, which pipe has sufficient capacity to supply water for the irrigation of plaintiff's land, but denies that it has the capacity, or that defendant has the water, to supply plaintiff and all the lands that lie under the flow of its ditch that need water for irrigation; that it has a steady supply of only 180 inches, to which it has occasionally added by purchase from the city zanjas, and that all its water has been sold to persons along the line needing water for irrigation during the irrigating season, and that it could not supply the demand of plaintiff without depriving others of needed water, etc., and that, if it had 450 inches of water it would all be needed by such other persons, etc.

The court found that the plaintiff and S. A. Fleming conveyed to defendant, on the 21st day of February, 1889, a right of way across the land in question for its water pipe, for a nominal consideration, but that the real inducement for such conveyance was an understanding (not in writing) that plaintiff could have water from defendant's pipe to irrigate her land; that defendant furnished her water for a time, and then extended its pipe, and sold its water to others, and refused to furnish plaintiff with needed water, though requested so to do. The court also found paragraphs 1, 2, 4, and 7 of plaintiff's amended complaint true.

The only specification of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings is: "That the third finding of the court is not sustained by the evidence, in so far as it finds that paragraph 1 of plaintiff's complaint is true, for the reason that the evidence shows that the defendant corporation was organized for the following purposes, viz.: [Then follow the purposes specified in the articles of incorporation, as hereinbefore quoted.]" Paragraph 1 of the complaint, thus found true, after averring that defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of California, with its principal place of business at Los Angeles, avers that it was so organized "for the purpose of selling, distributing, and delivering water for irrigating upon the lands along the line of pipes owned by said company and situated to the south of the city of Los Angeles." The purpose specified was certainly one of the purposes of the organization. As it was in the execution of this purpose that its duty to supply water to plaintiff, if such duty devolved upon it, arose, and as other purposes contemplated by the incorporation were either not involved, or only remotely so, it was not necessary to enumerate them in the complaint, or to find as to them. Had there been no allegation as to the objects of the corporation as expressed in its articles of incorporation, the fact that it was engaged in the business of conducting and selling water for irrigation from its pipe constructed for that purpose, would have been sufficient, under that branch of the case, to raise a presumption of authority so to do, and to impose upon it the legal liabilities arising therefrom. This question was raised in Price v. Irrigating Co., 56 Cal. 431, and decided against the contention of appellant.

Another error assigned is that the court failed to find upon the issue raised by the allegations contained in paragraph 5 of defendant's answer, and a like error is assigned upon the failure to find upon paragraph 6 of the answer. The fifth paragraph of the answer referred to is as follows: "Defendant admits that the pipe laid by defendant upon the right of way granted [by] plaintiff and Fleming is of the diameter of 22 inches, and admits that said pipe has sufficient capacity to supply water for the irrigation of the lands of the plaintiff, but denies that defendant has the capacity or the water to supply plaintiff and all the lands that lie under the flow of its ditch, that need water for irrigation, with water for irrigation." The paragraph is taken up with an admission of the allegations of the complaint,—which, of course, create no issue,—except the last clause, which denies that it has either the capacity or water to supply plaintiff and all others who need water for their land. There is no averment that persons other than the plaintiff have demanded water from defendant, or have purchased it, but only that it is needed. This raises no issue material to the case. The second finding of the court, however, throws light upon the question sought to be raised by the answer. It is as follows: "After defendant had supplied water for use on plaintiff's said land for a considerable time, defendant extended its pipe line beyond and below the lands of the plaintiff, and began, and has since continued, to sell and deliver water for lands along the extension of the said pipe line, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff desired and requested the defendant to continue to supply water for the irrigation of her said lands." The sixth paragraph of the answer, upon which it is claimed there should have been findings, is too long to be copied. It may be epitomized as follows: (1) Defendant was organized for handling the sewage water of Los Angeles, and so much other water as it was able to obtain, and, to carry out the project, constructed a pipe capable of carrying 450 inches along the line selected. (2) It only secured 180 inches, and was able to procure no more, except occasionally. (3) That it has been selling and distributing this 180 inches to people along the line of pipe, to persons who needed it for irrigation, and could not have supplied plaintiff without refusing others. (4) It will be the same in the future. (5) The land along defendant's pipe line needs 450 inches of water in the irrigating season. (6) Los Angeles is engaged in the construction of a system of sewage which defendant believes will be completed within six months, when defendant is informed and believes the city intends to resume control of the 180 inches of sewage water which it now supplies to it, and defendant is advised the city has a right so to do, notwithstanding its contract with defendant, and should it do so defendant would have no water for distribution. As to future deprivation of water, it is sufficient to say that, if the time arrives when it has no water, that fact will be an answer to any demand therefor under the judgment in this case. The residue of the paragraph is covered by the findings of the court upon the subject, to the effect that defendant has water which it was accustomed to furnish to the plaintiff, but which it took from her and sold to others.

If these facts do not render defendant liable, then this judgment is erroneous, and should be reversed. Do the facts, as found, warrant the relief asked and granted in the judgment? "The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law." Const. Cal. art. 15, § 1. Appellant contends that the word "appropriated," as used in the section of the constitution quoted above, only applies to water appropriated from streams upon the public lands, and has no application to water acquired by other means than an appropriation under the Civil Code. This construction is too narrow, and, we think, does violence to the evident intent of the framers of the constitution. There is no doubt but that, in a broad sense, to appropriate is to make one's own, to make it a subject of property, and it is often used in the sense of denoting the acquisition of property and a right of exclusive enjoyment in those things which before were without an owner or were publici juris. But it is also used in the sense of prescribing property or money to a particular use, as to appropriate money to a designated purpose, to appropriate land to grazing, or fruit, or other purpose. It is also used in the sense of "to distribute." And. Law Dict. When water is designed, set apart, and devoted to purposes of sale, rental, or distribution, it is appropriated to those uses, or some of them, and becomes subject to the public use declared by the constitution, without reference to the mode of its acquisition. A perusal of the latter part of section 1, from which we have quoted, will show that in all cities and counties, or cities, or towns of this state, it is made the duty of the governing bodies thereof to prescribe, by ordinance or otherwise, the rates to be charged for water supplied to such cities, etc. This is general, and applies to all parties supplying water, and not merely to those who have acquired the ownership thereof by appropriation of water upon the public lands. The evident intent of the framers of our constitution was to strike a blow at the monopolies which had grown up out of the sale, rental, and distribution of water, and, by declaring such use a public use to bring it within the control of the local authorities in municipalities where the burdens of the system were most onerous. To have made these provisions applicable only to the distributers of water acquired in a given manner, and not otherwise, would have defeated in most instances the paramount object in view. It is apparent that, in most of the cases in which this court has applied the doctrine enunciated in the constitution, the water which constituted the subject-matter in question was not the fruit of an appropriation in the sense contended for by appellant. See McCrary v. Beaudry, 67 Cal. 120, 7 Pac. 264; Price v. Irrigating Co., 56 Cal. 431; Fresno v. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co., 98 Cal. 179, 32 Pac. 943; People v. Stephens, 62 Cal. 209.

Counsel for appellant further contend that section 552 of the Civil Code, which, under the facts of this case, was evidently relied upon by the court below as establishing the duty of defendant to furnish water to plaintiff, is not applicable. That section reads as follows: "Whenever any corporation, organized under the laws of this state, furnishes water to irrigate lands which said corporation has sold, the right to the flow and use of said water is and shall remain a perpetual easement to the land so sold, at such rates and terms as may be established by said corporation in pursuance of law. And whenever any person who is cultivating land on the line and within the flow of any ditch owned by such corporation has been furnished water by it, with which to irrigate his land, such person shall be entitled to the continued use of said water, upon the same terms as those who have purchased their land of the corporation." The contention is that the section only applies to cases in which the corporation has sold and furnished water to irrigate, and that, as it does not appear that the corporation defendant has sold any land to any one, it is not one of the corporations specified in section 552, supra. Title 8, of which this section is a part, relates to water and canal corporations, and must be read with reference to the subject-matter under treatment. The section in question contains two distinct clauses applicable to this class of corporations, viz. to those organized under the laws of this state. The first clause relates to those cases in which the corporation furnishes water to irrigate land which it has sold, and it must continue to furnish such water to the land thus sold at the established rate. The second clause involves an independent proposition, and makes it the duty of such corporations,—water and canal corporations,—organized under the laws of the state, to continue to furnish water to those within the flow and on the line of their ditches, who are cultivating land which has been furnished with water for irrigation, and the latter are entitled to the continued use of water so supplied upon the same terms as those mentioned in the first clause of the section, "at such rates and terms as may be established by said corporation in pursuance of law." The object of the statute is quite evident. Water for irrigation is, in many pursuits, essential to the productiveness of land, and if, when it has been once furnished, the company so supplying it for such purpose may at will refuse such supply, the owner of irrigated land is at the mercy of the corporation, who may ruthlessly destroy the crops of the season, or, in case of orchards and vineyards, the result of many seasons' industry, by refusing to continue the supply of water. The use being a public use, the legislature may regulate it so as to promote the interests of the public, and at the same time do no injustice to the water company. The defendant, having supplied plaintiff with water for irrigation, and having sufficient on hand to continue such supply, was not at liberty, without good cause, to refuse to supply her, while she, on her part, was ready and willing to pay the established price therefor.

We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

EPPINGER et al. v. SCOTT, Sheriff. (No. 18,429.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EVIDENCE—RECEIPT OF TELEGRAM—RES GESTÆ.

1. In replevin for goods taken under execution, where plaintiff claimed under a bill of sale made by the execution debtor, which defendant alleged was made to defeat defendant's claim, and it appeared that the alleged sale was clandestinely made, and the goods hastily removed, it was admissible, as tending to show that the sale was made in consequence of an effort by defendant to collect his claim, to put in evidence a telegram sent by defendant to the debtor, the day before the sale, stating that unless the debt was paid suit would be commenced.

2. In the absence of any suggestion of non-receipt made on the trial, it will be presumed on appeal that a telegram introduced in evidence was prepaid, delivered to the telegraph company for transmission, and received by the person to whom it was addressed.

3. Statements made by the execution debtor as to his object in moving the property at the time of the alleged sale were admissible in evidence as part of the transaction.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by J. Eppinger and others against Jay Scott, as sheriff, to recover property taken by defendant under a writ of execution upon a judgment issued against Napoleon Vieu on behalf of Fon Kee. There was a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, which were reversed in department (42 Pac. 301), and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Terry & Williams and H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, for appellants. Geo. E. Church, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action of claim and delivery for recovering the possession of certain trays and sweat boxes. The plaintiffs claim the property by virtue of a bill of sale made to them by Napoleon Vieu; and the defendant, who is the sheriff of Fresno county, claims the same by virtue of a levy under a writ of execution upon a judgment issued against said Vieu in behalf of one Fon Kee. The controverted issues at the trial were whether there had been a sufficient change of possession to satisfy the statute of frauds, and whether the sale to the plaintiffs had been made with the express purpose on the part of Vieu to hinder and defraud his creditors, and particularly the plaintiff in the execution. The case was tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant. From the judgment thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs have appealed.

Upon the foregoing issues the evidence in behalf of the respective parties was decidedly conflicting, and the verdict of the jury thereon cannot be disturbed. For the purpose of sustaining the defendant's claim that the sale by Vieu to the plaintiffs was with the intent to defraud his creditors, evidence was introduced tending to show that the sale was made in consequence of an effort by Fon Kee to collect the amount of his claim; and a telegram, dated April 5, 1893, and directed to Vieu at Dixon, which Mr. Spencer, a witness on behalf of the defendant, testified that he wrote and sent for Fon Kee, was offered in evidence. This telegram is as follows: "April 5, 1893. N. Vieu, Dixon, Cal.: Your note is past due. You no pay me I commence suit. Fon Kee." The plaintiffs objected to the introduction of this telegram on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, incompetent, and could in no way bind them. Their objection was overruled, and the telegram admitted in evidence, and this ruling is now assigned as error. It had already been shown that Vieu made the bill of sale to the plaintiffs on the 6th day of April; that Eppinger, one of the plaintiffs, who resided at San Francisco, met Vieu at the ranch in Fresno on that day by previous appointment, and received the bill of sale, and commenced moving the property in the afternoon; that it was moved by persons who up to that time had been in the employ of Vieu; that they worked in moving the property during the whole of that night; that when they commenced to move it Vieu was asked to send the Chinamen to help them, and he replied that he did not want to let the Chinamen know anything about it. During the previous month Vieu had given his note to Fon Kee, and the judgment in favor of Fon Kee had been offered in evidence. Under this state of the testimony it was competent for the defendant to show that the sale by Vieu was with the intent to defraud Fon Kee, and the telegram was both relevant and material for that purpose. If, upon the receipt of the telegram, Vieu immediately went to Fresno, and clandestinely executed the bill of sale, and aided in removing the property, the jury would be justified in inferring that these acts were done in consequence of the telegram, and for the purpose of defeating the suit threatened therein by Fon Kee.

In the specifications of errors of law the plaintiffs assign the admission of this telegram in evidence "for the reasons assigned at the time, and for the reason it is not shown that plaintiffs had any knowledge whatever of any such action, or that said telegram was ever received by Napoleon Vieu." These latter objections were not made at the time it was offered, and, although the defendant stated to the court that he intended to show that the telegram had been received by Vieu, it was not necessary that any direct evidence of its receipt should be given. The rule has long been settled and is made statutory in this state (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 24) "that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail." The same rule has been extended to telegrams. Whart. Ev. § 1329; Greenl. Ev. § 40; Gray, Tel. § 136; Com. v. Jeffries, 7 Allen, 548; Steamship Co. v. Otis, 100 N. Y. 447, 3 N. E. 485. The presumption is one of fact, and is entitled to more or less weight according to the circumstances under which the telegram or letter was sent, and its receipt may be disproved; but the fact that it was sent is admissible evidence, and tends to show that it was received. The suggestion that it was not shown that the telegram was delivered to the telegraph company for transmission, or the rates therefor prepaid, in the absence of any objection of this nature at the time of its offer, or of any attempt to show these facts upon cross-examination of the witness, is not entitled to consideration. As was said upon a similar suggestion in Steamship Co. v. Otis, supra: "Norris swears that he sent the three letters written by him to Otis. In the absence of any proof to the contrary, or any inquiry as to the mode, we must understand this to mean that they were mailed in the usual manner. If there was doubt about that, the attention of Norris should have been drawn to it, and the manner of transmission challenged. It would be extremely critical to deny to the form of expression used by the witness its ordinary and usual interpretation, because it might have been more precise and explicit." The testimony given by Ah Loo, of statements made by Vieu of his object in moving the trays, was properly received. Burton had testified that Vieu was present during the moving of the trays; and Pourtett had testified that Vieu had directed him to move them, or help to move them, and these statements of Vieu were made before the sale had become complete by delivery, and while the trays were being moved. They were, therefore, a part of the transaction, and were admissible for the purpose of throwing light upon its character, and enabling the jury to determine whether the sale was bona fide, or with the express intent to defraud his creditors. The testimony of the witness Schleyer that she had made a statement at Vieu's request for Fon Kee, even if immaterial, could not have prejudiced the plaintiffs. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Ex parte HASKELL. (Cr. 112.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POWERS — LICENSING NONRESIDENT MERCHANTS—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCES.

1. A city ordinance providing that persons, excepting those conducting regular places of business, selling certain articles of merchandise to persons not regularly engaged in or carrying on such lines of business, whether by sample or otherwise, shall pay a license of $50 per quarter, is not void as being oppressive or unlawfully discriminating, in that regular merchants in those lines pay a less sum per quarter.

2. The provision of the constitution requiring that legislative acts shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, does not apply to city ordinances, there being no express provision making it thus applicable.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Petition for habeas corpus by one Haskell, who was arrested and held by the marshal of the city of Chico for selling wearing apparel without a license, in violation of the provisions of the city ordinance. Writ denied.

D. E. Alexander and Isaac Joseph, for petitioner. F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The city of Chico is a municipal corporation of the fifth class, having power, as such, to license, for purposes of regulation and revenue, all and every kind of business transacted or carried on in such city, and to fix rates of license tax upon the same, and provide for its collection. It has an ordinance which, among other provisions thereof relating to the revenue, has the following: "Persons, outside of those conducting regular places of business, selling different articles of apparel, dry goods, fancy goods, notions, jewelry, cutlery, groceries, harness, pianos, organs, machinery of all kinds, vehicles, hardware, tinware, mill products, or merchandise of any class or character, to persons not regularly engaged in or carrying on such lines of business, whether by sample or otherwise, shall pay a license of fifty dollars per quarter." Haskell, a traveling salesman for a shirt house in Oakland, was arrested and is held by the marshal of Chico upon a warrant issued from the recorder's court of said city, upon a complaint which charges Haskell with a misdemeanor, in vending within said city wearing apparel, to wit, shirts, by sample, without a license therefor, in violation of the provision of said ordinance above quoted. The petitioner asks that Haskell be discharged on habeas corpus, upon the ground that the ordinance is void and of no effect, for various alleged reasons, and so furnishes no competent authority for his detention.

It is urged, in effect, that the particular provision in question is unreasonable and oppressive, and that it is unequal and unlawfully discriminating. But we are unable to regard it as open to either or any of these objections. A municipal ordinance must be very clearly obnoxious to such objections as those made, or some one of them, before it will be declared invalid by the courts. Every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and all doubts resolved in a way to uphold the lawmaking power, and a contrary conclusion will never be reached upon light consideration. It is the province and right of the municipality to regulate its local affairs,—within the law, of course,—and it is the duty of the courts to uphold such regulations, except it manifestly appear that the ordinance or by-law transcends the power of the municipality, and contravenes rights secured to the citizen by the constitution, or laws made in pursuance thereof. That the ordinance in question violates any such right, we are unable to perceive.

It is said that the provision is unreasonable and oppressive, because the license charged against the business pursued by Haskell is so disproportionately great, in comparison with the rates charged against other classes of merchants, as to make it apparent that the amount was fixed with a view and purpose of prohibiting Haskell, and others pursuing the same calling, from doing business in the said city,—a result which is in restraint of trade, and against public policy. This contention is based upon the fact that elsewhere in the same article the ordinance provides for licensing those engaged in trade within said city, "who at a fixed place of business sell any goods, wares or merchandise," etc., of the same general character, and divides such into classes according to the amount of their monthly sales, and fixes rates of license based upon such classification, somewhat less, perhaps, in proportion than the license tax charged against the business as carried on by Haskell. But we cannot say that the ordinance is either oppressive or unreasonable by reason of this difference. The very power to license for purposes of regulation and revenue involves the right to make distinctions between different trades, and between essentially different methods of conducting the same general character of business or trade. And that is all that is done here. While it may be true, as suggested by petitioner, that Haskell is, in a sense, a merchant, equally with those having a fixed place of business, it is nevertheless true that the manner in which he conducts and carries on his business is so distinct from that of the merchant of the latter class as to make it essentially a different business. And we are not at liberty to say that this difference does not constitute a just ground for the discrimination which the ordinance makes between the two. The tax imposed is not, upon its face, necessarily unreasonable; and to say that it is so simply because the legislative body of the city has seen fit to impose a heavier license upon the business when so conducted, than where carried on in a different way, is, as suggested in Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 558, "to argue that because the common council, in fixing the rates for licenses, have discriminated between the several business pursuits which they were regulating, and have imposed a larger license tax upon one pursuit than upon any other, the ordinance is oppressive and unreasonable. But to argue thus is to forget that the authority of the common council to fix the rates of license is a branch of the taxing power,—which is in itself the power to discriminate as to the objects upon which burdens are to be imposed,—but which, not being taxation pure and simple, is as yet untouched by the constitutional requirement of uniformity." It may well be that, to the knowledge of the city council, the profits of such itinerant business, by reason of the fact that there are no rents, taxes, insurance, or other municipal charges to pay in its pursuit, are so much greater, proportionately, over the same amount of business done at a fixed place, as to fully justify the difference in the tax imposed. Indeed, the right to make such discriminating distinctions, based upon like grounds, is amply sustained by authority, and in many cases involving a much greater disparity between the rates charged than is exhibited here. In Borough of Warren v. Geer, 117 Pa. St. 211, 11 Atl. 415, where the town passed an ordinance requiring every person canvassing from house to house, soliciting orders for books, pictures, gentlemen's shirts, etc., to take out a license, and the license for selling shirts was $3 a day, it was held that this ordinance was not unreasonable, nor in conflict with the constitution of the United States or that of Pennsylvania, the court saying: "The effect of the ordinance would seem to be to subject persons who would otherwise pay no license for the privilege of doing business within the borough, to the duty of paying something for the privilege, when they undertook to exercise it without incurring the expense of a mercantile license. There is surely nothing unreasonable in such a requirement." In City of Cherokee v. Fox, 34 Kan. 16, 7 Pac. 625, it was held that an ordinance requiring itinerant hawkers, peddlers, etc., to pay a license fee of $2.50 per day is neither class legislation or unjust discrimination, nor partial or oppressive, nor inconsistent with public policy, as being in restraint of trade. The same principle is involved in Ex parte Heylman, 92 Cal. 492, 28 Pac. 675 (decided by this court), upholding a license passed by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for peddling meats or fish from wagons or baskets, where the license charged was $75 a quarter for a meat peddler, and only $10 a quarter for peddlers of fish, vegetables, fruit, game, or poultry, and where the amount charged for vending meat by this method was a different and higher license from that charged for selling meat at a fixed place of business. In that case it is said, "The validity of such an ordinance is not now an open question here." See, also, Amador County v. Kennedy, 70 Cal. 460, 11 Pac. 757; Ex parte Felchlin, 96 Cal. 360, 31 Pac. 224.

Nor is the provision in question unlawfully discriminating. It may be conceded that if it could be said to discriminate in favor of residents of the city of Chico, by requiring such license only from nonresidents engaged in the line of business pursued by Haskell, it would be bad; or if it discriminated against residents of the state, or against merchandise from without, or not the product of the state, that it would be void, as being, in effect, a regulation of interstate commerce,—something entirely within the power of congress. Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 484, 37 Pac. 402. But it does neither of these. In the contention that it does so discriminate against nonresidents of the municipality, counsel has evidently confused this provision with another in the same ordinance, relating to hawkers and peddlers who carry their goods with them, which last may be, in its terms, open to such objection. But the latter provision is a wholly independent one, relating to a different class, and in no way affects the construction of the feature under consideration. The fact that one portion of an ordinance, or a portion of the same section, may be void for any reason which does not necessarily affect the whole, does not invalidate another part, unless the two are so interblended or dependent that the vice of the one must be held to vitiate the other. Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 211, 24 Pac. 747. The provision here involved is general in terms, and applies alike to all—residents and nonresidents equally—who do not maintain "regular places of business" in the city, and who sell to "persons not regularly engaged in carrying on such lines of business." It in no way discriminates, as to the class against which it is directed, between those living within the city and those without, but is broad enough to include all of such class, wherever residing. It does put into a class by themselves those who prosecute their business by the method therein specified, and discriminates in the amount of license as between such class and merchants having their business located in the municipality, and also as between such class and persons "selling to the trade," as it is expressed, such as regular drummers and traveling salesmen for commercial houses, who go from place to place soliciting orders from merchants and traders. But such discrimination is lawful, and has been uniformly upheld, upon the principle that, although the different classes are engaged in the same general business of selling merchandise, it is in the several instances carried on under such different circumstances, and by methods so essentially dissimilar, and with such widely different facilities for profit, as to furnish just and reasonable ground for such discrimination. See cases cited above, and also City of East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 394; City of St. Louis v. Sterrberg, 69 Mo. 301; Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 679. There is nothing in Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal.

606, necessarily opposed to this view. In that case the attempted discrimination was made to depend, not upon the fact of any essential difference in the methods of carrying on the business, or the profits to be derived therefrom, but solely upon the question whether the merchandise, at the time of sale, was or was not within the corporate limits of the city, or in transit thereto. This was held to constitute no just or proper ground for the discriminating difference in amount of license imposed in the two instances, and as being, therefore, partial, unjust, and in restraint of trade.

Within the principles of Ex parte Miller, 89 Cal. 41, 26 Pac. 620, we discover no merit in the objection that the ordinance is void by reason of the penalty imposed, even if such objection can properly arise before conviction. See Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 Pac. 775. Nor is there anything in the further point that the ordinance is void because embracing more than one subject, and that not expressed in its title. The provision of the constitution as to the requirement, in that respect, of acts of the legislature, is not made applicable in terms to municipal ordinances, and was evidently not intended so to apply. Its application would practically put an end to the practice of many cities and towns in the state, prevailing before, at the time, and since the adoption of that instrument, of codifying the ordinances of the municipality, as in this instance, into compact and convenient form, in a single ordinance. A similar requirement of the constitution of Missouri was held not to apply to city ordinances, in the absence of an express provision of the statute making it so. City of Tarkio v. Cook, 120 Mo. 1, 25 S. W. 202.

We discover nothing in the provision of the ordinance under consideration which renders it invalid under the objections made. The writ is denied, and the prisoner remanded.

DELLAPIAZZA v. FOLEY et al. (Sac. 80.)

PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—NOTICE TO EMPLOYE—LIABILITY OF PARTNER FOR WAGES—PAYMENT.

1. Civ. Code, § 2453, providing that the liability of a general partner for the acts of his copartners continues, even after a dissolution of the co-partnership, in favor of persons who have had dealings with, and given credit to, the partnership, during its existence, until they have had personal notice of the dissolution, etc., applies to mining partnerships.

2. One who was employed by a mining firm, and who had no notice of a deed of the mining property to a corporation, can recover of the partners for services rendered after the execution of the deed, though he admitted that he heard that a corporation had taken charge of the mine; it appearing that one of said partners continued to act as superintendent of the mine, and that he stated that he did not remember that he had ever notified such employé of the change in the ownership of the mine.

3. When a mining partnership conveys all its property to a corporation, such partnership is thereby necessarily and wholly dissolved.

4. The individual note of one of a firm, given to an employé for wages due, did not operate as a payment of the demand for said wages, it appearing that there was no intention to give or accept the note as such.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by Francisco Dellapiazza against Patrick Foley and Michael Bohannan for wages alleged to be due. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Michael Bohannan appeals. Affirmed.

F. T. Nilon (Sullivan & Sullivan, of counsel), for appellant. C. W. Kitts, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover from defendants, as co-partners in the business of mining, a balance of $815.70 alleged to be due plaintiff for labor performed for defendants, at their request, between the 25th day of December, 1890, and November 15, 1891. The plaintiff had judgment for the full amount of his demand. As to defendant Foley, the judgment was by default, in that he failed to answer. Bohannan alone appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial. It is not questioned that plaintiff was employed by defendants and performed the labor as alleged, nor that there was a balance of $815.70 due him for such labor on November 15, 1891; and it was admitted by appellant on the trial that defendants were mining co-partners when plaintiff was employed, and so continued until July 2, 1891. It was found by the court that, on July 2, 1891, defendants sold and conveyed, by deed, the mine on which they had theretofore worked as co-partners, to a corporation, which thereafter had control of the mine and the work therein, and that the deed to the corporation was duly recorded July 10, 1891.

1. It is contended for appellant that, upon the sale of his entire interest in the mine, he ceased to be a partner, and consequently ceased to be responsible to plaintiff for the labor thereafter performed, which appears to have been more than one-half of all the labor performed by plaintiff. In answer to this the respondent relies upon section 2453 of the Civil Code, as applied to the further findings of the court to the effect that plaintiff had no notice of the sale of the mine to the corporation, nor that either of the defendants had withdrawn from the co-partnership, nor that the corporation had assumed control or management of the mine; that Foley continued to act as superintendent of the mine and work after the sale, precisely as he had done at all times before the sale; that appellant resided in San Francisco, and never personally participated in the working or management of the mine, but had intrusted the superintendency and management of the mine and the work to Foley, who employed the plaintiff; and that no payment had been made to plaintiff for any part of said work before November 12, 1891, when Foley, for the first time, audited and allowed plaintiff's account, without notifying him that any part of the labor had been performed for the corporation, or that the corporation was responsible to him for any part thereof. The finding of these facts is justified by the evidence, and, if section 2453 is applicable to mining co-partnerships, the facts found warrant the conclusion of law that the defendants were jointly bound to pay plaintiff's whole demand. The following is a copy of section 2453 of the Civil Code: "The liability of a general partner for the acts of his co-partners continues, even after a dissolution of the co-partnership, in favor of persons who have had dealings with and given credit to the partnership during its existence, until they have had personal notice of the dissolution; and in favor of other persons until such dissolution has been advertised in a newspaper published in every county where the partnership at the time of its dissolution had a place of business, if a newspaper is there published, to the extent in either case to which persons part with value in good faith, and in the belief that such partner is still a member of the firm." Counsel for appellant contends, however, that this section is not applicable to mining co-partnerships; but in this, I think, he is mistaken. The law governing general co-partnerships, with a few well-defined exceptions, applies to mining co-partnerships. Therefore a mining co-partner, who claims exemption from the general law of partnerships, must show his case to be within some one of those exceptions. This counsel has failed to do, and I see no just reason for excepting the case of appellant from the full operation and effect of the above-cited section of the Civil Code; it being a part of the general law of partnerships, and its application to this case not being inconsistent with any exception heretofore recognized in favor of mining partnerships. Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; Stuart v. Adams, 89 Cal. 367, 26 Pac. 970. As to the "personal notice of the dissolution" required by the Code section cited, see Johnson v. Totten, 3 Cal. 343, and Williams v. Bowers, 15 Cal. 321. The notice must have been actual. The deed to the corporation was not even constructive notice to plaintiff of the sale. The plaintiff testified that he had no notice of the sale before November 15, 1891, though he admitted that he had heard around the mine, in the summer of 1891, that the corporation had taken charge of the mine. If this admission tended to prove actual notice that appellant had parted with his entire interest in the mine, it only created a slight conflict with the evidence of a contrary tendency, namely, the positive testimony of plaintiff that he had no notice, corroborated by the circumstances that Foley had continued to act as superintendent and manager, and had audited and allowed plaintiff's account up to November 12, 1891, without notifying him of the sale, or intimating that Foley had withdrawn from the partnership, and that the labor performed by plaintiff was principally, if not entirely, that of cutting wood and timbers, necessarily at considerable distance from the mine. Besides, Foley testified that he did not remember that he had ever notified plaintiff of the sale, or of any change in the partnership. In this state of the evidence, the finding of the court that plaintiff had no notice must be taken as conclusive. It is further contended that the Code section quoted applies only in case of a dissolution of a partnership, and not to the case of a mining partnership which is not wholly dissolved by a sale of the interest of one member of the firm. But I think the sale of his entire interest by a mining co-partner does effect a dissolution as to him. It dissolves his connection with the concern, and the necessity of notice of such dissolution to third persons dealing with the firm is the same, if not greater, than in case of the dissolution of an ordinary partnership. Besides, when, as in this case, a mining co-partnership conveys all its property to a corporation, such partnership is thereby necessarily and wholly dissolved, in the sense of ceasing to exist.

2. No payment having been made to plaintiff, he on November 12, 1891, demanded of Foley a settlement and payment. A settlement was then made for the whole work performed by plaintiff, without distinguishing between that done before and that done after the sale to the corporation, whereupon there was found to be due plaintiff for such work the sum of $1,415.70. Foley then told plaintiff that he could not then pay the whole debt; that the best he could do was to pay $600, and give his promissory note for the balance of $815.70. Plaintiff asked for an indorser of the note, but, failing to get one, consented to take, and did take, the proffered $600, and Foley's note for the balance, and then gave Foley the following receipt: "Received from P. Foley fourteen hundred 70-100 dollars for timbers supplied for Gaston Ridge Mine." The taking of Foley's note and the giving of this receipt were pleaded by the appellant as payment in full of plaintiff's demand, and also, as a release of the appellant, although no part of the debt for which the note was given had been paid, and plaintiff had duly offered to surrender the note. The court found that the note was not given, accepted, or intended as payment of any part of the $815.70 therein mentioned; that no part of said sum had been paid, although duly demanded after maturity of said note; that Foley was unable to pay his debts in full at the time he made said note, and was wholly insolvent at the time this action was commenced; and that plaintiff never released appellant from his obligation to pay the debt for which said note was given. These findings are justified by the evidence, and support the conclusions of law deduced therefrom by the lower court. Without the intention, and an express agreement of the parties, that the making and acceptance of the note should operate as payment or satisfaction of the original debt to secure which it was given, it did not so operate, though it may have suspended the right of recovery until the maturity of the note. Nor does the transaction, as found in this case, constitute a novation. Haubert v. Mausshardt, 89 Cal. 433, 26 Pac. 899. PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PORTER v. MULLER et al. (Sac. 47.)[1]

INDIVIDUAL MORTGAGE BY TENANT IN COMMON—JOINT MORTGAGE—CONVEYANCE TO MORTGAGEE—RELEASE OF ONE TENANT—EFFECT—SALE BY MORTGAGEE—APPLICATION OF PROCEEDS—ORAL PROMISE TO PAY MORTGAGE.

1. K., one of two tenants in common, executed a mortgage on his undivided half interest to secure his individual debt. Afterwards, K. and M., his co-tenant, executed a mortgage to the same mortgagee, to raise money to discharge a prior lien on the land. Thereafter K. conveyed his entire interest in the land to the mortgagee, pursuant to an agreement that, in consideration of such conveyance, said mortgagee should release said prior mortgage. At the time of said conveyance, K. was insolvent. Said undivided interest was afterwards sold by said mortgagee to another; the deed containing a covenant that the land conveyed should be free from the lien of the joint mortgage executed by said tenants; the mortgagee receiving for said conveyance a sum in excess of what was due on K.'s prior mortgage. Held, in an action to foreclose the mortgage executed by the tenants jointly, that a judgment foreclosing the same against the land of M. only was erroneous, as the surplus, if any, remaining after the discharge of K.'s individual prior mortgage should be applied to the subsequent joint mortgage.

2. The excess received by said mortgagee over the amount of the first mortgage executed by K. should have been credited on the subsequent joint mortgage, and, if the value of the land purchased by the mortgagee from K. was greater or less than the amount of K.'s prior mortgage, the credit should be correspondingly increased or diminished.

3. It having been determined on a former appeal in this case, for the guidance of the lower court on a new trial, that M.'s oral agreement to pay said joint note, and that his interest in the land should bear the mortgage in suit, would have been of no effect, such decision became the law of the case, though its determination was not absolutely necessary on the former appeal; and the application of said ruling was not affected by an additional finding on said new trial that M. consented to the compromise agreement, and verbally undertook, in consideration of the benefit he was to receive under said arrangement, and in recognition of his duty and legal obligation in the premises, that he would himself pay the whole of the joint note, and that his undivided half of the land should stand security for the payment of the whole of said note,—particularly as it did not appear that M. received any benefit from said arrangement, or that any claim on his alleged oral agreement was made to his administratrix after his decease.

Action by Mary Porter, executrix of David Porter, deceased, against Charlotte Muller, administratrix of Christian Muller, deceased, and others, to foreclose a mortgage. From the decree rendered, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. H. & J. E. Budd, for appellants. E. S. Pillsbury, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was commenced September 15, 1877, by David Porter against Christian Muller, to foreclose a mortgage executed by Christian Muller and George Kroeckel on two adjoining quarter sections of land, of which they were equal owners, as tenants in common, to wit, N. W. ¼ of section 28, and N. E. ¼ of section 29, township 2 N., range 8 E., M. D. M., to secure their joint debt of $3,000 and interest. Upon the death of each original party pending the action, his legal representative was substituted. The case has been before this court on two former appeals, in each of which a judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed. 53 Cal. 677, and 65 Cal. 512, 4 Pac. 531. The record on the present appeal presents the following undisputed facts: Muller and Kroeckel had purchased the land above described from G. H. Tarr for the price of $8,000; paying one-half in cash, and executing their mortgage to Tarr to secure the balance, of $4,000. Thereafter, February 28, 1874, Kroeckel mortgaged his undivided half of the land to David Porter (plaintiff) to secure his individual indebtedness to Porter in the sum of $4,000, and interest to accrue thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable quarter-yearly. On September 2, 1875, Muller and Kroeckel, having paid $1,000 and all interest on their mortgage debt to Tarr, borrowed $3,000 from Porter, and paid the same to Tarr in full satisfaction of their mortgage to him, and at the same time, to secure Porter for said loan, made their joint note to him for $3,000, payable two years after date, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, and, to secure this note, executed the mortgage in suit. Thereafter, on July 13, 1876, Kroeckel again mortgaged his undivided interest in the land to Porter, to secure his individual debt to the latter in the sum of $1,404.25; this debt being additional to his debt of $4,000 secured by said mortgage of February 28, 1874. On September 30, 1876, Porter commenced an action against Kroeckel to foreclose the $4,000 mortgage of February 28, 1874, on Kroeckel's undivided half of the land. While the last-mentioned action was pending, to wit, on November 9, 1876, a compromise agreement was made between Porter and Kroeckel to the effect that Kroeckel should convey to Porter all right, title, and interest of the former in and to the two quarter sections above described; that, in consideration of such conveyance, Porter should release and discharge the $4,000 mortgage and debt (which debt, with interest, then amounted to $4,080), and dismiss the action to foreclose that mortgage at his own costs, and should also release and discharge the subsequent mortgage of July 13, 1876, and the debt of $1,404.25 thereby secured. This agreement was then (November 9, 1876) completely executed by both parties thereto. At that time, Kroeckel was considered insolvent, and the court found that he died in August, 1877, leaving no estate, real or personal. Thereafter, on December 15, 1876, Porter, by deed, granted to Hiram H. Jones the undivided half of said land which had been conveyed to the former by Kroeckel as aforesaid; the deed to Jones reciting a consideration of $5,600, and containing a covenant on the part of Porter that the land conveyed should be forever free from the lien of the $3,000 mortgage of September 2, 1875, executed to Porter by Muller and Kroeckel as aforesaid. It is admitted by respondent that the consideration paid by Jones to Porter was $5,600, as recited in the deed, whereas appellant contends that it was $5,700. On April 7, 1887, Muller and Jones partitioned said land, by making conveyances to each other, the effect of which was to give the quarter of section 28 to Jones, and quarter of section 29 to Muller. Since the commencement of this action, Jones conveyed the quarter of section 28 to the defendant, Charles Grupe. The object of this action is to enforce the $3,000 mortgage of September 2, 1875, executed by Muller and Kroeckel on both quarter sections, against the interest of Muller alone, as changed by said partition, to wit, against the northeast quarter of section 29, and also to obtain a judgment against Muller's administratrix, alone, for any deficiency after application of the proceeds of the sale of said northeast quarter of section 29. Fifteen days before the action was commenced, to wit, on August 31, 1877, Muller tendered to plaintiff, Porter, $1,680,—that being one-half of the amount then due for principal and interest on the mortgage note,—as full payment of the proportion which he (Muller) was liable to pay, and kept the tender good. Plaintiff then refused to accept the tender as full payment, but afterwards, on October 5, 1878, accepted it as a credit on the mortgage debt. Jones, who purchased from Porter the Kroeckel interest in the land, and Grupe, who purchased the quarter of section 28 from Jones, were made parties defendant, but both failed to answer, and their defaults were entered. On July 14, 1884, Muller conveyed the northeast quarter of section 29 to his wife, Charlotte Muller. She was therefore made a party defendant individually, as well as in her character of administratrix; and in both capacities she answered plaintiff's complaint, and also filed a cross complaint, with the object of clearing her title to the northeast quarter of section 29 from the cloud cast upon it by the mortgage in suit. The cross complaint was answered by plaintiff, though the facts therein alleged, so far as material, were legitimate matters of defense.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The court found the facts hereinabove stated, with others claimed by respondent to be material (which will be considered hereafter), and therefrom deduced the following conclusions of law: "As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds that the plaintiff is entitled to have and recover from the defendant Charlotte Muller, as administratrix of the estate of Christian Muller, deceased, the amount due and unpaid upon the note mentioned in finding 5, to wit, for the principal sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000), with interest thereon from the 2d day of September, A. D. 1876, at the rate of one per cent. per month, less a credit of the sum of sixteen hundred and eighty dollars ($1,680) as paid October 5, 1878, said principal and interest to be paid in gold coin of the United States, together with the plaintiff's costs of this action, and the sum of three hundred dollars ($300), in like gold coin, as her attorney's fee; and that the mortgage mentioned in finding 5 is a lien upon the northeast quarter of section twenty-nine (29), township two (2) north, range eight (8) east, Mount Diablo meridian, to secure the payment of the said amounts found to be due to the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff is entitled to have the said mortgage foreclosed, and the said northeast quarter of the said section twenty-nine (29) sold by an officer of this court, and the proceeds applied in paying the said amounts found due to the plaintiff." The judgment is in strict accordance with the conclusions of law, being a judgment against Charlotte Muller, as administratrix of the estate of Christian Muller, deceased, for the sum of $6,599.58 in gold coin, to be paid in due course of administration, to which is added an order and decree that the N. E. ¼ of section 29, township 2 N., range 8 E., M. D. M., be sold, and that from the proceeds of the sale, less the costs and expenses thereof, the sheriff "pay to plaintiff or her attorney the sum of $6,599.58 in gold coin of the United States [that being the amount of said judgment], with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date of this decree, or so much thereof as the said proceeds of sale will pay." The defendant Charlotte Muller, as administratrix, and individually, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

On the facts thus far stated, it seems clear that the judgment is erroneous. Plaintiff's $4,000 mortgage of February 28, 1874, was the prior lien on Kroeckel's interest, and, if necessary, might have exhausted that interest, and thereby have thrown the whole burden of the $3,000 mortgage of September 2, 1875, upon Muller's half of the land; but, if the value of Kroeckel's half of the land was more than sufficient to satisfy his prior individual mortgage thereon, then the surplus should have been applied to the subsequent joint mortgage of Kroeckel and Muller, to the extent of one-half of the joint mortgage debt for the payment of which Kroeckel was legally and equitably bound, unless such application of the surplus could not have been made consistently with the rights of plaintiff. "Equity requires equality in support of a common burden;" and, as between Kroeckel and Muller, their joint mortgage to plaintiff was a common and equal burden, the equality of which the plaintiff, having notice thereof, was not at liberty to disregard or disturb as he did by discharging that mortgage as to Kroeckel's half of the mortgaged land, and attempting to enforce it against Muller's half alone, when he necessarily had notice of the mutual rights and equities of Kroeckel and Muller. Stevens v. Cooper, 1 Johns. Ch. 425; Cheeseborough v. Millard, Id. 415; Parkman v. Welch, 19 Pick. 238; Ingalls v. Morgan, 10 N. Y. 188; Denman v. Prince, 40 Barb. 217; Stuyvesant v. Hone, 1 Sandf. Ch. 429; Birnie v. Main, 29 Ark. 591; Webb v. Meloy, 32 Wis. 319. In Stevens v. Cooper, supra, Chancellor Kent said: "(2) The next and only remaining point in this case is whether the release by the mortgage, on the 24th of October, 1797, of four of the lots included in the mortgage, does not, in equity, ratably reduce the power of the mortgage upon the remaining lots, inasmuch as it deprives the owners of those lots of their right of contribution as against the lots so released. It is a doctrine well established that, when land is charged with a burden, the charge ought to be equal, and one part ought not to bear more than its due proportion, and equity will preserve this equality by compelling the owner of each part to a just contribution. Harbert's Case, 3 Coke, 14; Harris v. Ingledew, 3 P. Wms. 98, 99. I need not go at large into this doctrine. It is perfectly well understood, and I had occasion recently to examine it in the case of Cheesebrough and Others v. Van Schaick and Others. The court will likewise compel the creditor to aid this right of contribution by assigning his bonds and securities to the debtor, or surety, or owner of the land, whom he charges with his whole demand, and they will not permit him, voluntarily, to defeat this right. He owes a duty to his debtors not to impair their rights as against each other. But here the mortgagee has deprived the owners of lot No. 72 and 82 of this recourse, by previously discharging the other lots; and he ought not then, in equity, to charge them with a greater burden than they would have been subject to, upon the principle of contribution, if no such discharge had taken place. This is a clear and fundamental rule of justice, which must strike at once every discerning mind, and which Pothier has illustrated in his treatise on Obligations,—a work which is founded on sound ethics, as well as upon the basis of the civil law. Traite des Oblig. No. 275, 520." In Webb v. Meloy, supra, the defendant, being prior mortgagee, purchased the mortgagor's title or equity of redemption, for which he paid $125, and also paid two years back taxes. Four months thereafter he conveyed the mortgaged premises to Blain for a sum sufficient to satisfy his prior mortgages, repay the sums he had paid for the equity of redemption and for taxes, and also to satisfy plaintiff's subsequent mortgage, to foreclose which the suit was brought. The lower court decreed a foreclosure of plaintiff's subsequent mortgage, and ordered that it be first satisfied from the proceeds of the foreclosure sale; and the supreme court affirmed the judgment, saying among other things: "What difference can it make that, instead of foreclosing, Meloy purchased the equity of redemption, and then sold the premises at private sale for a sum sufficient to pay off and discharge all of the incumbrances? We can perceive no difference in principle in the two methods, and we think that the circuit judge held correctly that equity will, under the circumstances of this case, regard the sale to Blain for $2,025 as equivalent to the sale of the premises for the same sum on a foreclosure of the prior mortgages. This principle seems so manifestly just and equitable that argument is scarcely needed in support of it. * * * The substance of the whole matter is that Meloy has received money, or its equivalent, which equitably he ought to apply in payment of plaintiff's mortgage. * * *" The substance of the whole matter in the case at bar is that Porter has received money (about $1,500) in excess of what was due him on his prior $4,000 mortgage, which excess he ought to have applied as a payment by Kroeckel on the mortgage in suit. That excess is admitted to have been received by him on the 15th day of December, 1876 (nine months before this action was commenced), and should be credited on the subsequent joint mortgage of Kroeckel and Muller (the mortgage in suit), not later than that date. If, however, the land purchased by Porter from Kroeckel was of greater or less value than $5,600, the credit should be correspondingly increased or diminished. Cheeseborough v. Millard, 1 Johns. Ch. 415. But according to the case of Webb v. Meloy, supra, the credit, in the absence of proof of greater or less value, should equal the price actually paid to plaintiff by Jones. The pleadings raise an issue as to the value of Kroeckel's half of the mortgaged premises, and there was considerable evidence applicable to that issue, but no finding upon it by the court.

I do not understand that counsel for respondent controverts either the facts or the law as above stated, but he claims that the court below found material additional facts, which, together with those above stated, support and justify the judgment. The only additional findings upon which it is claimed that the judgment may stand are, in substance, that, at the time of the compromise agreement between Porter and Kroeckel (November 9, 1876), Muller consented thereto, and then verbally "undertook and promised, in consideration of the benefit he was to receive by and under the said mutual arrangement, and in recognition of his duty and legal obligation in the premises, that he would himself pay the whole of the note mentioned in finding five (joint mortgage note of Kroeckel and Muller), and that his undivided one-half of the said land should stand security for the payment of the whole of the said note; * * *" that Porter, though at first unwilling to make the compromise with Kroeckel, "finally consented to accept such a deed [from Kroeckel] and dismiss the said foreclosure proceedings [on Kroeckel's $4,000 mortgage] only because he relied upon the said representations of Muller; that his [Porter's] rights under the note and mortgage mentioned in finding five would not and should not be affected or prejudiced by his accepting such a deed from Kroeckel, and that the said Muller would himself be bound to pay the same in full"; and that, but for such representations and promises of Muller, "Porter would not have dismissed the said foreclosure proceedings, but would have prosecuted the same to a final judgment and decree, and would have caused the interest of said Kroeckel in said tract of land to be sold thereunder, and the proceeds applied in satisfaction of said individual indebtedness of said Kroeckel." Though the findings cover 20 pages of the printed transcript, a comparison of the foregoing with the findings contained in the transcript on the last former appeal will show all that is materially peculiar to the findings on this appeal, or, in other words, all that is materially different from those on the last former appeal; and the only substantial difference is that on the present appeal it is found that "in consideration of the benefit he was to receive by and under the said mutual arrangement, and in recognition of his duty and legal obligation in the premises," Muller verbally undertook and promised that he would pay the whole of said note, whereas the ultimate fact of such undertaking or promise was not expressed, and was held not to be implied, in the findings on the former appeal. See 65 Cal. 516, 4 Pac. 531. In all other respects the findings on this appeal relating to the oral agreement are substantially the same as they were on the former appeal. On the former appeal it was, in effect, decided that the legal effect of the mortgage of Muller and Kroeckel to Porter was not, and could not have been, changed to the prejudice of Muller by any merely oral agreement between Muller and Porter. On the second former appeal it was contended by respondent that the findings on that appeal were to the effect that Muller had assumed and agreed to pay the whole mortgage debt; but the court, after concluding that the findings could not be so construed, added, "If he had expressly agreed, orally, that his co-tenant's share of the land should be relieved of the mortgage, and that his own should bear the whole burden, such oral agreement would have been of no effect" (citing Civ. Code, § 2922); that is to say, at least, that such agreement could not have had the effect to place upon Muller's share of the mortgaged land any burden additional to that imposed upon it by the written terms of the mortgage. As the oral agreement was pleaded, and claimed to have been proved and found as a fact, the question of law as to its legal effect, as well as the question as to whether it had been found as a fact by the court, was properly presented for decision; and the court having concluded that the agreement had not been found as an ultimate fact, and that a new trial should be granted, it decided the question of law as to the legal effect of the agreement, for the guidance of the lower court on the new trial, thereby preventing the necessity of another appeal to settle that question. Therefore the decision that the alleged oral agreement, even if proved and found as a fact, "would have been of no effect," is to be deemed the law of the case on this appeal, even though the decision of that question was not absolutely necessary on the former appeal. Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 21 Cal. 549; Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 388; Gwinn v. Hamilton, 75 Cal. 265, 17 Pac. 212. Furthermore, it is not at all clear that the oral promise or agreement, as found on the last trial, purports to add anything to the pre-existing "legal obligation" "in recognition" of which it is found to have been made. His recognition of a greater obligation than that imposed by the note and mortgage could not have enlarged or changed the obligations created by those instruments. As said by this court on the former appeal, "If he was informed and understood that he would become liable for the whole three thousand dollar note, as the consequence of facts from which no such liability arose, such information and understanding did not make him liable." Besides, if

Muller received any benefit "by and under said arrangement" (between Porter and Kroeckel) not necessarily and merely incidental thereto, or from his lease from Porter, and, in consideration of such benefit, he orally promised to do or pay anything which the note and mortgage did not oblige him to do or pay, any obligation thereby created was entirely distinct from those arising from the note and mortgage, and, being merely oral, could not have been secured by the mortgage; and, so far as the ground of such additional obligation is alleged in the complaint, it is therein stated as a distinct promise of Muller, made in consideration that Porter should pay the taxes on his own half of the land purchased by him from Kroeckel, for the then current year, and should lease his said half of the land to Muller during the ensuing cropping season at the rental of one-fourth of the crop. But it is not clearly apparent that Muller received any benefit, or that Porter suffered any detriment, from "said arrangement," lease, or payment of taxes which can be deemed a valuable consideration for Muller's distinct oral promise to pay the whole debt, since Porter was bound to pay the taxes on his undivided half of the land, and the stated terms of the lease imposed upon Muller no other obligation than to pay the stipulated rent. Again, it is not alleged, and does not appear, that any claim on this distinct oral agreement was ever presented for allowance to the administratrix of Muller's estate, although it is alleged in the amended supplemental complaint that the plaintiff's claim founded on the note and mortgage was, in due form, so presented on July 6, 1886, and is further alleged "that the said claim so presented arose and was founded upon the contract, to wit, the note and mortgage set forth in plaintiff's original complaint herein." On this branch of the case my conclusion is that the alleged oral agreement does not change nor affect the rights of the parties in this action, and should be excluded from consideration as a factor in the case.

I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial on the following issues only: (1) As to the value of Kroeckel's undivided half of the mortgaged premises on the 9th day of November, 1876, when plaintiff purchased that half; (2) as to the amount of costs paid by plaintiff on his dismissal of his action against Kroeckel to foreclose the prior $4,000 mortgage; (3) as to the amount of taxes paid by plaintiff on Kroeckel's half of the land after his purchase thereof, which were a lien upon the land at the time of the purchase; (4) as to the amount of principal and interest due and unpaid on the prior $4,000 mortgage on November 9, 1876. These being found, the sum of the last three, namely, said costs, taxes, and amount of principal and interest due on the $4,000 mortgage, should be subtracted from the value (as found) of Kroeckel's half of the land on November 9, 1876, and the remainder of such value, if any, to the amount of one-half of the mortgage debt, should be credited on the mortgage note in suit, as of November 9, 1876. The $1,680 tendered by Muller on August 31, 1877, and afterwards accepted by plaintiff, should be credited on the note in suit as of the date of such tender. If, after allowing these two credits, there shall be found any unpaid balance due plaintiff on the note and mortgage in suit, he will be entitled to a judgment of foreclosure for such unpaid balance, and no more.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order and judgment appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial in accordance with, and as limited in, said opinion.

SANTA ROSA CITY R. CO. v. CENTRAL ST. RY. CO. (No. 15,202.)

APPEAL—DIVIDED COURT—AFFIRMANCE.

Where one of the justices of the supreme court is disqualified, and the six others are equally divided in opinion as to the merits of a case twice argued, the judgment will be affirmed, in the absence of probability of any immediate change in the personnel of the court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by the Santa Rosa City Railroad (a corporation) against the Central Street Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Barham & Bolton and Van R. Paterson, for appellant. W. F. Russell and Rutledge & Pressley, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. In this cause it is impossible for a majority of the court to arrive at a conclusion upon the merits of the case, for the reason that the CHIEF JUSTICE is disqualified, and, of the six associates, Justices VAN FLEET, GAROUTTE, and McFARLAND think that the judgment of the lower court should be reversed for the reasons given in the former opinion of Justice VAN FLEET (38 Pac. 986), and Justices HENSHAW, HARRISON, and TEMPLE think that said judgment should be affirmed. The case has been twice argued in bank, orally and by briefs, and frequent consultations have demonstrated that the differences of opinion among the said justices are permanent. Moreover, there is no probability of immediate change in the personnel of the court. Under these circumstances we think that, upon the authority of Frankel v. Deidesheimer, 93 Cal. 73, 28 Pac. 794, and Luco v. De Toro, 88 Cal. 26, 25 Pac. 983, the judgment should be affirmed. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J., being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing.

In re BURDICK'S ESTATE. (No. 15,869.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — COMMUNITY PROPERTY—SUCCESSION—DECREE SETTLING FINAL ACCOUNT—APPEAL.

1. A decree settling the final accounts of an executor, and determining the amount in his hands for distribution, fixes the character of the fund; and an objection that part of it does not belong to the estate cannot be urged on an appeal from the decree of distribution.

2. Civ. Code, § 1274, provides that all property "to which heirs, husband, widow, or next of kin might succeed, may be disposed of by will, except as otherwise provided" in sections 1401 and 1402. Section 1401 gives the entire community property to the husband on the death of the wife, "without administration." Section 1402 provides that, on the death of the husband, "one-half of the community property goes to the surviving wife," and the other half, in absence of testamentary disposition, "goes to his descendants," and that "the entire community property is equally subject to [decedent's] debts, the family allowance, and the charges and expenses of administration." Held that, as to the community property, the widow is within section 1383, defining "succession" as "the coming in of another to take the property of one who dies without disposing of it by will," and that therefore the entire community property should be administered as the estate of the husband.

3. Trustees claiming part of an estate as a trust fund, but who are not named in the will, and claim no rights under it, and have presented no claim against the estate, cannot appeal from a decree of the probate court settling the final accounts of the executor and ordering distribution.

4. An order refusing to postpone the decree of final distribution is not appealable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Stephen Powell Burdick, deceased. The executor filed his final account, and a decree was entered settling his accounts and ordering a distribution. From this decree, or a part thereof, the executor, A. W. Burdick and A. M. Sutton as trustees, and A. W. Burdick in his own right, appeal. Dismissed as to trustees, and as to other appellants affirmed.

J. H. Craddock and R. S. Gray, for appellants. Clarken & Ross, for respondent. Rodgers & Paterson, amici curiæ.

TEMPLE, J. December 12, 1892, the executor of the above estate filed his final account, and prayed for a settlement thereof and for a distribution. The bill of exceptions stated "that by said final account it appeared that, after payment in full of all claims against the said deceased and said estate, the expenses of the last sickness, and all funeral charges, and all accrued expenses and charges of the administration of said estate, there remained in the hands of said executor a balance in money of $1,855.41, from which said executor asked to be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court, together with such further expenses of administration as might thereafter accrue, and that the balance be distributed to the parties entitled thereto." The bill of exceptions then proceeds to give an extract from the petition accompany the final account, in which, among other things, it is stated, in substance, that the executor found a deposit in a certain bank to the credit of Stephen Powell Burdick, as attorney, $5,000 of which was claimed by Arthur W. Burdick and A. M. Sutton, as trustees; that the bank, upon demand, refused to pay the same to the executor; that thereafter the claimants executed a certain paper, the contents of which are given, and then the executor was permitted to take the money. A decree was entered settling the final accounts of the executor, and finding that he had in his hands, subject to distribution, the sum of $1,657.94. A decree was thereupon entered distributing said money as community property, one-half to Alice H. Burdick, widow of the deceased, and one-half to Arthur W. Burdick, who was sole legatee of deceased, or, rather, at the request of said Arthur W. Burdick, to certain trustees for his benefit. Appeals are taken from the decree by the executor, by Burdick and Sutton as trustees, and by A. W. Burdick individually.

The executor appeals, as he states in his notice, from the whole of the decree, "except so much of said decree as settles the account of said executor, from which last-named portion he does not appeal." The claim of the trustees to the $5,000 was set out by the executor in the petition accompanying his final account, but, so far as the bill of exceptions shows, no action was asked in regard thereto. But, if action had been solicited in regard to it, I do not see how it could affect the matter here, for the executor has not appealed from the decree which settles his final account and determines how much remains in the hands of the executor belonging to the estate. This determination was clearly within the jurisdiction of the court. That decree is not before us on this appeal, and, whatever errors we may suppose were committed by the probate court in reaching the conclusion, we cannot interfere with it. To attempt to do so would be an arbitrary proceeding without authority. The probate court has jurisdiction, as between the executor and those claiming the estate, to determine what belongs to the estate. This is implied in the power to settle the final account, and by its decree determine what remains in the hands of the executor to be distributed. Still, since the probate court has no jurisdiction to determine the rights of those claiming adversely to the estate, if serious questions upon such claims arise, the duty of the court might be to delay the final decree until such claims can be determined in another forum. Where there is in the hands of the executor money which the executor claims does not belong to the estate, he should himself take steps to test the right, if serious question exists; and, if he is improperly charged, his remedy is to appeal from the decree settling his final account. I know of no other way in which it can be reached. His counsel says the probate court exceeded its jurisdiction in determining that this money belonged to the estate. I do not think so; but, if it did, the decree affected by the error was the decree settling the final account of the executor, and determining that he had in his hands $1,600 belonging to the estate after full administration. Since we cannot change or modify that decree on this appeal, no relief in that direction can be afforded. If we could here determine that the money belonged to the trustees, it would only establish another claim against the executor. It would not vacate the finding that he also has $1,600 belonging to the estate which must be distributed to the heirs or legatees. The executor had an opportunity to test the right of the estate to the money in question. He claimed that it was assets of the estate, and the trustees that it was not. It was his duty, if he deemed his claim just, to get it for the estate; and he had no right to compromise the claim of the estate by consenting that the trustees should have it, provided they would pay the debts and the expenses of administration out of it. I do not think such is really the effect or meaning of the agreement of compromise. But such is the claim of the trustees. Having been permitted to inventory it as assets of the estate, and administer it as such, the executor could not return the surplus to the trustees. To do so would be to assume the responsibility of maintaining the title of the trustees against the estate. The executor was not at liberty to assume such a position.

But appellant contends that the claim of the wife to a share of the funds, as community property, is a claim adverse to the estate, and that the probate court has no power to distribute her share of the community property, since, as he claims, she does not take by succession, but as survivor of the community. Counsel argue correctly that the probate court, in the matter of the administration of estates, has jurisdiction of the estates of dead men, and can distribute only to heirs, devisees, or legatees, or to those claiming through them. And the decree of distribution is conclusive only as to the succession or testamentary rights. Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081. The probate court, therefore, has no jurisdiction or power to deal with the wife's portion of the community property at all, unless she takes, upon the death of the husband, as heir. It could not, then, determine what is community property or what is separate property, and could not authorize a valid sale of community property to pay debts. The fact that the proposition is so novel and so startling raises a very strong presumption against it. To hold with the appellant would upset titles all over the state. A proposition more destructive of property rights could not be imagined. Fortunately, it has not sufficient plausibility to excite alarm. The estate of the wife in the community property is a creature of the statute, and is, of course, just what the statute has made it. It has always been pretty much what it now is, though formerly, upon the dissolution of the community by the death of the wife, one-half of the property descended to her heirs. Even then, however, it was held that the title was in the husband, and the wife's interest in it was a mere expectancy. In Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 525, it was said: "It is true the wife is a member of the community, and entitled to an equal share of the acquests and gains; but, so long as the community exists, her interest is a mere expectancy, and possesses none of the attributes of an estate either at law or in equity." The legal title to the community property is in the husband. He has the absolute dominion and control of it, and the wife has no right or title of any kind in any specific property, but a possible interest in whatever remains upon a dissolution of the community otherwise than by her own death. This cannot be classified as any species of estate known to the law. Civ. Code, § 700. Part 4 of the Civil Code treats of the acquisition of property, and section 1000 defines five modes in which property is acquired: (1) Occupancy; (2) accession; (3) transfer; (4) will; or (5) succession. Each of these modes is treated under a title specifically devoted to the subject, laying down rules for the acquisition of property in the particular mode treated of. The last two relate to the acquisition of property from deceased owners. Title 6 treats of the acquisition of such property through testamentary disposition. The next is title 7, which treats of succession. The first section under this title is section 1383: "Succession is the coming in of another to take the property of one who dies without disposing of it by will."

The learned amici curiæ, who, by permission, presented an argument upon this subject, argues, from this section, that only property which the deceased owner might have disposed of by will can be inherited. But this is an unauthorized addition to the statute. Property which belonged to a decedent, which he could not dispose of by will, is property not disposed of by will, and within the words of the statute. Suppose the previous provisions in regard to testamentary disposition of property had limited the right to one-half of a testator's estate, and this section had remained as it now is; would not the moiety, which he could not dispose of by will, pass by succession? Infants and insane people die owning property, and they cannot exercise the testamentary power. The section follows the provisions in regard to wills, and means that the only other mode of coming to the estate of a deceased owner is by succession, and must be construed as applying to all cases which the language is broad enough to cover. Section 1400 provides that the preceding sections as to the inheritance of husband and wife from each other only apply to separate property. This clearly implies other succeeding sections which apply to property of husband and wife which is not their separate property. Otherwise, instead of "preceding sections," the language would have been "of this title." The next section gives the entire community property to the husband on the death of the wife, "without administration." What was the necessity of this provision, "without administration," if it does not go by succession? The following section (1402) disposes of the community property upon the death of the husband. As to the disposition of one-half of it, no one disputes that it is succession; but the language is the same in regard to the moiety given to the wife. It "goes" to her just as it "goes" to the descendants. This section is referred to in section 1274, Civ. Code, and it seems to be there expressly determined that both husband and wife take some interest in the community property by succession. All property, "to which heirs, husband, widow, or next of kin might succeed, may be disposed of by will, except as otherwise provided in sections 1401 and 1402." This is an express legislative declaration that the disposition of the community property made in sections 1401 and 1402 is succession. Another consideration makes this equally clear so far as the succession of the wife is concerned. In section 1402 it is provided that, upon the death of the husband, her share is equally subject to his debts, the family allowance, and the charges and expenses of administration. In the Code of Civil Procedure ample provision is made for the payment of all these charges from the estate of the deceased. There is no provision for calling upon the widow to contribute. Estates composed of what was community property in whole or in part are certainly common. If it had not been intended that the entire community property should be administered as estate of the husband, so important a matter could not be overlooked. Yet the probate laws only authorize the administrator to take charge of the property of the deceased (sections 1443, 1581), and the final settlement of the accounts of the administrator is conclusive only upon those interested in the estate, and the decree of distribution only upon heirs, legatees, or devisees. The Codes are in pari materia and must be construed as one. This plain intent that the title of the wife to one-half of the community property shall be administered as part of the estate of the husband, added to the continuous and uniform practice of near half a century, must place this matter beyond all doubt. The suggestion that the husband takes from the wife her share of the community property upon her death by succession may seem inconsistent with the proposition that, during her life, she had no estate of any kind in the property. That she had no estate in the community property, vested or contingent, was held by this court, when the law was that, upon her death, one-half of the community property was inherited by her next of kin. The change was made by amendments which are codified in sections 1401 and 1402, Civ. Code, and which merely change the succession. It was competent for the legislature to provide the mode in which the wife's expectancy should pass to the husband. It might have done this by creating a right by survivorship as an incident to the estate, but it has done this by providing for a succession. Since the wife could not incumber it or contract with reference to it, there can be no essential difference.

A. W. Burdick and A. M. Sutton as trustees, and A. W. Burdick in his own right, have taken appeals from the entire decree. Obviously, the appeal taken by the trustees must be dismissed. They are not named in the will and claim no rights under it, and have presented no claim against the estate. They are not, and could not have been, aggrieved persons. The order refusing to postpone the decree of final distribution was not appealable. The application was to "suspend the order of final distribution," because it was claimed that the money belonged to a trust fund. A. W. Burdick, as legatee under the will of Steven Powell Burdick, had no interest in such a contention, and, as legatee, was not injured. As trustee he cannot be heard here. The court found the money in the hands of the executor to be community property, and distributed it accordingly. There is no evidence in the record which tends to show that the finding of the court was erroneous, and the bill does not show that it contains all the evidence which was before the probate court

The appeal of the trustees is dismissed, and as to the other appellants the decree is affirmed.

HARRISON, J. (concurring). The wife's interest in the community property upon the death of the husband has many incidents similar to those of an heir, but I do not think that, under the language and spirit of the laws of this state, she can be said to be his heir to her share of that property, or that her interest therein comes to her by virtue of a "succession" to the property of her husband. The property that is acquired by the labor of the wife during the marriage, equally with that acquired by the labor of the husband, becomes community property; and, although section 172, Civ. Code, gives to the husband the management and control of the community property,—that acquired by her labor as well as that acquired by his,—yet by the terms of the same section he cannot give away, or convey without valuable consideration, any portion of this property, unless she gives her written consent thereto. While a voluntary or fraudulent conveyance is binding upon his heirs, and, in the absence of creditors, cannot be questioned by the administrator of his estate, yet he cannot by such act deprive the wife of her share of the community property. Only one-half of the community property is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband, and, if the bonds of their marriage are dissolved by a judicial decree which makes no mention of property, the wife becomes the absolute owner of one-half thereof, as co-tenant with the husband. De Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 157. It was said in this case: "The theory upon which the right of the wife is founded is that the common property was acquired by the joint efforts of the husband and wife, and should be divided between them if the marriage tie is dissolved either by the death of the husband or by the decree of the court. Her mere right in the community property is as well defined and ascertained in contemplation of law, even during the marriage, as is that of the husband. It is true that the law confers upon the latter the authority to manage and control it during the existence of the marriage, and the power to sell it for the benefit of the community, but not, as we have seen, so as to defraud the community of it. In the case at bar, then, the right of the respondent to a share of the property in question, if it be proven to be community property, is clear. It accrued to her as having been acquired in part by her own efforts before the decree of divorce was rendered. That decree, as rendered, did not deprive her of it." Although this interest of the wife in the community property may not fall within the common-law definition of an "estate," it is not to be classed as a "mere possibility," like the expectancy of an heir. It is true that, in Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 311, it was, by way of illustration, termed a "mere expectancy," and this illustration was again used in Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 525; but, as was said in De Godey v. Godey, supra: "While, perhaps, no other technical designation would so nearly define its character, it is at the same time an interest so vested in her as that the husband cannot deprive her of it by his will, nor voluntarily alienate it for the mere purpose of divesting her of her claims to it." That her interest in the community property is more than a mere possibility is also shown by section 167, Civ. Code, by which the community property is exempted from liability from the contracts of the wife made after marriage; but it is not exempt, by the Code, from liability for her contracts made before marriage.

It is a misapplication of terms to say that the property which the wife has "acquired," during the marriage, by her skill or labor, and of which her husband had not in his lifetime any power of voluntary conveyance, except with her consent, or of testamentary disposition, is inherited from him; and to refer her rights in the community property to "succession," under the language of section 1383, Civ. Code, begs the entire question. "Succession," by the terms of that section, can be applied only to a case where the property succeeded to belonged to the decedent, whereas the entire provisions of the Civil Code are at variance with treating the husband as the owner of the community property. If he were the owner, he would have the absolute dominion over it, with the right to use it or dispose of it according to his pleasure (Civ. Code, § 679); but, as above seen, these attributes of ownership are denied him. Section 682, Civ. Code, specifies the community interest of husband and wife as one species of property which is owned by several persons. The necessary implication therefrom is that the husband and the wife are the "several persons" in whom is vested this ownership of the community property. This ownership is not absolute in either, but in each of them is qualified by reason of its being shared with the other. Civ. Code, § 680. This interest of the surviving wife in the community property, instead of being adverse to the administrator of the estate of her husband, is subordinate thereto for all purposes of administration, and is subject to the supervision and control of the court in which the administration is pending. By section 1452, Code Civ. Proc., the executor or administrator is entitled to the possession of all the real and personal estate of the decedent, and to receive the rents and profits of the real estate during the administration; and section 1402, Civ. Code, declares: "In case of the dissolution of the community by the death of the husband, the entire community property is equally subject to his debts, the family allowance, and the charges and expenses of administration." Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447, and kindred cases have, therefore, no application, as the property involved in those cases was held not to be subject to the administration or to the debts of the decedent. The husband has the sole management and control of the community property in his lifetime, and alone can render that property chargeable with debts. Upon his death the entire community property, as well as his separate property, is subject to the control of the court for the purposes of administration of his estate, and is taken into the possession and management of his administrator for these purposes, and at the close of the administration the wife receives, at the hand of the court, in the same manner and at the same time as does the heir, her share of the community property,—the one-half of the surplus after paying the debts and expenses of administration. She receives it, however, not as the heir of her husband, but in her own right, as her half of the property which was acquired by herself and her husband during the marriage, but freed from all restrictions in its use and enjoyment, and with the same title as if the marriage had been dissolved by a decree of divorce.

As the court which had control of the administration, and of the community property for that purpose, is also authorized to determine what charges, debts, and expenses are to be paid out of this property, and the amount thereof, it must follow that the judgment of that court, determining the amount of the property which she is entitled to receive at the close of the administration, is binding upon her, and may also be invoked by her as a determination of her right to the same. Whether this be called a decree of distribution, or a judgment or order fixing the amount or extent of her interest in the estate and her right to receive the same from the administrator, is immaterial. It is the final determination of the court upon a subject within its jurisdiction, and is as binding upon her as if she had been specifically named in section 1666, Code Civ. Proc. If a court has jurisdiction to take the management and control of property, and to determine the amount of charges thereon, and direct their payment out of the property, and return the surplus to the parties entitled thereto, its judgment in determining the amount of such surplus, and designating the persons to whom it is to be given, is necessarily conclusive upon them; and they take their portions of the sulplus under and by virtue of the judgment, and not adversely thereto.

Upon the other questions discussed by Mr. Justice TEMPLE in his opinion I concur with him, and I also concur in the judgment.

I concur: GAROUTTE, J.

GOODNOW v. PARKER et al. (No. 18,340.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 16, 1896.)

EQUITY—POSSESSION OF REAL PROPERTY—RECOVERY—APPEAL—EXECUTION OF VERBAL AGREEMENT—LIMITATIONS.

1. Alleged error in overruling a demurrer to a complaint cannot be urged on an appeal from an order denying a new trial.

2. A motion to strike out evidence because it appeared therefrom that "the action was barred by the statute of limitations as set out in the defendant's answer" did not go to the sufficiency of the complaint, but to the effect of the evidence.

3. An action to compel a conveyance in accordance with an agreement to partition lands is not barred after two years by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, because not in writing, where the agreement was in fact executed by a proper division of the land according to the intention of the parties.

4. T. and P. were tenants in common of certain land, described as lot 2 of a grant which by the calls contained 667 acres, but from which, after survey by the United States, 60 acres were excluded. They agreed to partition the lands by an east and west line; and, when the surveyor pointed out to them the mistake in the grant, a line was run, marked partly by a fence and partly by a furrow, dividing the land into equal parts of 303½ acres each. Deeds of partition had already been executed, however, deeding to T. the south half, and P. the north half, of original lot 2. Shortly afterwards, T. deeded to plaintiff the south half, following the description of the partition deed; but the true dividing line was pointed out by T., and plaintiff bought and paid for 303½ acres south of that line. The 60 acres which had been excluded by the government survey were taken largely from the south half of the original grant. Plaintiff cultivated his land to the true division line for two years. P. then entered on the strip between the partition line and the line intersecting the original grant, and, within four years thereafter, plaintiff sued to compel a conveyance of the strip by P. Held, that the action was not simply to correct a mistake in the partition deeds, but, in equity, to recover possession of land, the legal title to which was in P., and therefore within Code Civ. Proc. § 318, barring an action to recover real property or the possession thereof, unless, within five years before the commencement of the action, plaintiff or those under whom he claims had been seized or in possession of the property in question.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by J. P. Goodnow against O. E. Parker and others to compel a conveyance and to quiet title. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Parker appeals. Affirmed.

R. Clark, for appellant. J. C. Ball and J. W. Armstrong, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to compel a conveyance and to quiet title. The land in controversy is within "block or lot No. 2 of Wm. Gordon's subdivision of the Rancho Canada De Capay, as laid down on the map recorded December 12, 1871, Records of Yolo County, Book M of Deeds, p. 2." At the time this subdivision was made, the grant had not been finally surveyed by the United States; but, by such final survey, a portion of the lands included in said block 2, as subdivided and platted by Gordon, was excluded from the grant. The precise date of the segregation of the grant does not appear, but from the testimony of Mr. Nurse it was as early as 1872. On June 4, 1872, Gordon conveyed said block 2 to William H. Troop by the above description, including the reference to the recorded plat, containing 667 acres. On October 11, 1872, Troop conveyed an undivided one-half of said block to R. H. Newton, by the same description, and on September 5, 1876, Newton conveyed his said undivided one-half to the defendant Parker. On December 14, 1876, Troop and Parker, in pursuance of a verbal agreement to partition the lands owned by them as tenants in common by an east and west line which should give to each an equal number of acres, executed to each other deeds by which Parker acquired the north half and Troop the south half; but these deeds each followed the description above given, and referred to the recorded plat of Gordon's subdivision, each deed stating the number of acres to be 333½, while said block contained but 607 acres after excluding the lands outside of the grant as finally surveyed and patented, the lands thus excluded being public lands of the United States, in which neither party had any interest, and to which they had no title, though they were included in the conveyance from Gordon to Troop. Troop and Parker employed Mr. Nurse, a surveyor, to run the line separating their respective portions; and this was so done as to give each an equal number of acres of the land included in that part of block 2 which was within the grant as finally confirmed and surveyed, viz. 303½ acres each. On February 13, 1877, Troop conveyed the south half of said land to the plaintiff, Goodnow, but this deed followed the description contained in all the preceding deeds, and purported to convey the south half of block 2 according to the map of Gordon's subdivision, and therefore the public lands above mentioned were included in the description. The court found that the description in these several conveyances, including the partition deeds, so far as they included lands outside of the grant, was the result of mutual mistake, and that, as to the partition deeds, it was the intention of both parties to divide only so much of block 2 as was within the grant as finally surveyed, the division to be so made as to give each an equal number of acres; that if the lands, as described in the deeds, and as delineated on Gordon's recorded map, were divided by an east and west line so as to leave an equal number of acres on each side of it, nearly or quite all of the public lands included in Gordon's survey would fall to the south half, so that Parker would have 333½ acres, and Troop would have but 273½ acres, after deducting the public lands, while an equal division of the lot, after excluding the public lands, would give each 303½ acres. The court further found that the line made by Nurse equally divided the land within the grant. Troop and Parker built a fence upon part of the line (the remainder being marked by a furrow), and entered into possession of their respective portions according to said division. In addition to a general denial, which put in issue all the allegations of the complaint, the defendant pleaded in bar a judgment rendered in 1880, in an action wherein said Goodnow was plaintiff and said Parker was defendant, and alleged that all the matters at issue in this action were fully adjudged and determined adversely to the plantiff. He also pleaded several statutes of limitation, specifying section 318, subdivision 4 of section 338, subdivision 1 of section 339, and section 343, of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, as another defense, alleged that the partition agreement was not in writing, and was therefore invalid, under subdivision 5 of section 1624, Civ. Code. These issues were also found against the defendant. The appeal from the judgment was taken too late, and is not pressed. Upon defendant's motion for a new trial, several rulings upon evidence are specified as being erroneous, and the specifications of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings include nearly, if not quite, all the facts found.

The first point made by appellant is that the complaint does not state a cause of action; and one of his specifications of error is that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the complaint. But that question is not reviewable upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Ashley v. Olmstead, 54 Cal. 616; Hayne, New Trials, p. 24, § 1, and cases there cited. It is said, however, that "objection was made at the trial to the introduction of any evidence on the pleading, for that it appeared from the evidence that more than three years had elapsed since the discovery of the mistake before suit was commenced." At the folio to which counsel refers, there appears to have been a motion made by defendant to strike out all of Mr. Troop's testimony, "on the ground that it appeared that the action was barred by the statute of limitations as set out in the defendant's answer, and that the action was res adjudicata." This motion was denied, and defendant excepted. The motion did not go to the sufficiency of the complaint, but to the effect of the evidence, and was properly denied; but, if the objection had gone to the sufficiency of the complaint, the ruling would still have been right.

Defendant's specification of particulars wherein he claims the findings are not justified by the evidence are very numerous, and cover almost every fact found. The general facts hereinbefore stated were found by the court, and are amply sustained by the evidence, and only some special points stated in appellant's brief need be noticed.

It is claimed that the evidence does not justify the finding that Troop and Parker intended to divide only the land within the grant. It is clear that they owned no land outside of the grant as surveyed and patented and the presumption is that they intended to divide only that which they owned. The defendant expressly testified that that was their intention. It does not affect the question that, when they agreed to make the partition, they supposed they owned all within the calls of their deeds. The surveyor discovered and informed them of their error, and made the corrected line dividing equally that part of lot 2 within the grant, and that line was marked upon the ground with the knowledge and apparent consent of the defendant by participating in the erection of the fence. The fact that they supposed they owned all within the Gordon survey, when in fact it included about 60 acres of government land, is conclusive of appellant's further contention that there is no evidence of a mutual mistake as to what they owned.

It is also claimed by appellant that there is no evidence that the line indicated by the notes of Nurse's survey is the line claimed by plaintiff. We see no controversy upon that point except that arising upon the testimony of Troop, Sr., who testified that he was present when the line was run, and drove the stakes; but his evidence clearly discloses the fact that the line which he staked was the "trial line," which was about 100 feet south of the corrected line. The witness afterwards saw the fence and furrow, and erroneously supposed that was the line upon which he had driven the stakes. It is not material whether Troop or Goodnow ever demanded of Parker that he execute a deed for the disputed ground, or whether a deed was tendered to him for execution.

It is further contended by appellant that plaintiff never bought the land in question, and therefore cannot be the owner. The evidence is positive that, when he was negotiating the purchase, Troop showed him the fence and furrow as the line; that he bought and paid for 303½ acres, which was the quantity shown by Nurse's survey; that, when he went into possession, he plowed and sowed his land up to the line marked by the furrow, and occupied to that line for about two years, when the defendant took his crop.

No other specification of insufficiency of the evidence need be specially noticed, except that made to the finding that plaintiff's action is not barred by the statutes of limitation.

That plaintiff's action is not barred by the provisions of either section 318 or 319, Code Civ. Proc., is clearly justified by the evidence. Troop conveyed to the plaintiff on February 13, 1877, and he summer-fallowed up to the Nurse line, and occupied to that line for nearly two years, or at least until the harvest of 1878, and this action was commenced January 26, 1882. Those sections require seisin or possession within five years before the commencement of the action.

Appellant's contention that plaintiff's action is barred by section 339, Code Civ. Proc., is grounded upon the fact that the agreement to partition the land was not in writing. The agreement was in fact executed, however, by a proper division of the land according to their intention, the error being only in the conveyances. Section 343, Code Civ. Proc., provides as follows: "An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." This section does not apply, as the case must be governed by section 318, or by section 338, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure; and the question as to which of them applies must be determined by the true nature and purpose of the action. If section 318 applies, the action is not barred, as already stated; but, if subdivision 4 of said section 338 should be given the construction and application contended for by appellant, the action is barred. Said section prescribes a limitation of three years, and said subdivision reads as follows: "(4) An action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake. The cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." There seems to be no controversy that the parties to the partition, Troop and Parker, first became aware that the partition deeds included in the description lands not owned by them, or by either of them, when Nurse made the survey. These deeds were executed before the line of partition was surveyed by Nurse. That line was accepted and treated by both parties, for a time at least, as the true line. The defendant admitted upon cross-examination that the intention in running that line was to divide the lands "owned" by the parties. But it is also reasonably clear that, when the corrected line was made by the surveyor,—the one upon which the fence and furrow were made,—it was discovered that the description contained in all the deeds included land which belonged to the United States; and the mistake in the description, which was clearly mutual, was then discovered. The date of that discovery is not precisely fixed, but it was after December 14, 1876, the date of the partition deeds, and prior to February 13, 1877, when Troop conveyed to the plaintiff. If, therefore, subdivision 4 of said section governs this case, it is barred.

But I think it is not an action for relief upon the ground of fraud or mistake, within the meaning of that section, but that it is an action for the recovery of real property, and that the correction of the mistake in the deeds is merely incidental to that action. Troop was the actual owner of all the land within the grant lying in block 2 south of the true dividing line established by Nurse, and Parker was the owner of all on the north side. By mutual mistake, Parker acquired the legal title, but not the ownership, of a part of the land lying south of the line. If the plaintiff had had the legal title to the disputed portion, having been ousted from its possession, he could have recovered the possession in ejectment; but without the legal title his only remedy was in equity, not only to obtain possession, but to recover the property; and these were the objects and purposes of the suit, and that section of the Code which relates to actions for those purposes is the one to which we must look. Chapter 2 of the title relating to the time of commencing civil actions relates to the time of commencing actions for the recovery of real property; and section 318, Code Civ. Proc., found in that chapter, is as follows: "No action for the recovery of real property, or for the recovery of the possession thereof, can be maintained unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seized or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action." This section distinguishes between actions "for the recovery of real property" and actions "for the recovery of the possession thereof." Either of these actions may be maintained at any time within five years, not necessarily from the inception of the right of ownership or of possession, but, if the plaintiff, or his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, "was seized or possessed" within five years before the commencement of the action, an action for either of these purposes may be maintained. The limitation is not from the date when the fraud or mistake occurred, nor from the date of the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake, but from the time when the plaintiff lost the seisin or possession, though such loss of seisin or possession resulted from the advantage taken by the defendant of such fraud or mistake. If the plaintiff had been permitted to peaceably occupy to the line of division for the space of five years after the line was run, the mistake could not affect his right to the possession of the disputed land; but, upon defendant's theory, he might have acquiesced in the line of division, and permitted the plaintiff to quietly and peaceably occupy to that line for three years, and then oust the plaintiff, refuse to correct the mistake, and cut off all right of the plaintiff to recover either the property or the possession, notwithstanding he had lost the possession but a week or a day before he brought his action. In Smith v. Matthews, 81 Cal. 120, 22 Pac. 409, the plaintiff's grantor made a conveyance to the defendant's grantor, and, by a mistake in locating one of the monuments, too much land was included in the deed; but the land thus improperly included remained in the actual possession of plaintiff and his grantors. The court said: "The right of the plaintiffs to have their title to the land quieted, as against a claim asserted by the defendant under this deed, was not barred, and could not be while the plaintiffs and their grantors remained in the actual possession of the land, claiming to be the owners thereof, and the actual owners, as against the defendant, of all interest therein except the mere naked title."

What has been said upon this point is greatly strengthened by reference to chapter 3 of said title, in which section 338, Code Civ. Proc., is found. This chapter opens with section 335, which is as follows: "The periods prescribed for the commencement of actions other than for the recovery of real property are as follows." This section, as well as the title of the chapter, clearly shows that the limitations therein fixed do not apply to actions where the effect would be to cut off any portion of the limitation of five years. In City of Oakland v. Carpentier, 13 Cal. 540, 552, the court considered section 17 (Wood, Dig. 47), which is the same as subdivision 4, § 338, Code Civ. Proc., except that the words "or mistake" have been inserted after the word "fraud." That was an action to set aside or cancel a deed upon the ground of fraud, to which was pleaded said statute of limitations. The court said: "We think that this provision has no relation to an equitable proceeding to set aside a fraudulent deed of real estate when the effect of it is to restore the possession of the premises to the defrauded party. In such a case the action is substantially an action for the recovery of the real estate; indeed, it is literally." In Stewart v. Thompson, 32 Cal. 261, the action was to cancel certain conveyances alleged to be clouds upon plaintiff's title. The court, by Sanderson, J., said: "We consider that the limitation of three years does not apply to an action of this character. It is true that the clouds in question have their inception in fraud; but fraud is not a universal characteristic of the cause of action, and cannot therefore be adopted as a test of the true nature of the action, when its position in the various categories presented by the statute of limitation comes to be considered. We so held, in effect, in Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 60. * * * If fraud exists, it does so merely as a feature in the case, and not as a test of the true nature of the cause of action, within the meaning of the statute." A similar principle was laid down in Clausen v. Meister, 93 Cal. 555, 557, 29 Pac. 232. There are cases affecting real estate, however, where the statute under consideration has its proper application, and where, but for this provision, the plaintiff would be remediless. The case of Duff v. Duff, 71 Cal. 513, 12 Pac. 570, is an illustration. There, William Duff, who resided in the state of Michigan, and owned real estate in this state, gave a power of attorney to his brother Richard, who resided here, authorizing him to sell and convey said real property. Richard conveyed portions of it to each of two other brothers, without consideration, but concealed from his principal the fact of such conveyances; and William died in Michigan, without knowledge of the fact. These conveyances were made at different dates, extending from July, 1866, to April, 1872. William's widow first learned of the facts concerning these conveyances in April, 1879, and brought her action within three years thereafter; and it was held that the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and this notwithstanding the conveyances were made more than five years before. In Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 20, the statute of five years was pleaded by the defendant, and the plaintiff replied the discovery of the fraud within three years. The judgment in favor of the defendant was reversed. In Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 89, the plaintiff was induced by fraud and imposition to execute certain conveyances without consideration, by which she conveyed away all her interest in the property of her deceased husband. These deeds were executed in November, 1871, and the fraud was not discovered until October, 1877, and her action was commenced within three years thereafter. The form of the action does not appear from the case as reported. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court below, and judgment entered for defendants. This court reversed the judgment. People v. Blankenship, 52 Cal. 619, cited by appellant, was an action brought by the state to cancel a patent issued to the defendant for state lands, upon the ground that the patent was fraudulently procured. No other relief was sought, and no other relief was pertinent or necessary under the complaint. The reported facts are meager, and the opinion of the court is brief, and no authorities are cited. The question arose upon demurrer to the complaint, based upon the statute of limitations here under consideration. The effect of a cancellation of the patent would appear to be the same as the cancellation of the deed in City of Oakland v. Carpentier, supra, viz. to restore the land to the rightful owner, and that hence it was an action to recover the property, to which the three-years limitation did not apply. The court, however, regarded it as an action for relief upon the ground of fraud. From the fact, however, that none of the earlier cases we have cited are mentioned or referred to, we infer that they were not called to the attention of the court, and that the question here under discussion was not considered, and that, therefore, it should not be held to have overruled the prior cases, and especially since the construction we have adopted in this case is supported by the later cases above cited.

We think the findings upon the issue of the several statutes of limitation pleaded by the defendant are justified by the evidence, and that plaintiff's action is not barred.

If we are right in our conclusion that plaintiff's action is not barred by the statute of limitations, it is immaterial whether Troop or the plaintiff had the means of discovering the mistake in the deeds or not, and therefore the question of laches need not be considered.

The plea of a former adjudication, interposed by the defendant, is not sustained. The action there was ejectment, brought by the present plaintiff against the present defendant, to recover possession of the same land involved in this action. The complaint alleged ownership in fee, ouster, etc. The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were: First, that the plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession; second, that the allegations of the complaint alleging the ouster and withholding were untrue; and that defendant have judgment for his costs. And judgment was entered accordingly, on May 27, 1878. It therefore appears from the judgment roll in the former case, put in evidence by the defendant in this case, that the fact of ownership and right of possession were adjudicated in favor of the plaintiff, and that the defendant had judgment, because it was further found that he did not enter upon or oust the plaintiff from the land in question, and did not withhold it from him. If, therefore, the defendant subsequently entered and took possession of the same land, it is obvious that the former adjudication could not aid him; while it would appear to be conclusive against him upon the fact of ownership, and of plaintiff's possession at the date of the judgment.

The motion of defendant to strike out the testimony of the witness Sargent was properly denied. His testimony tended to show that the line of Gordon's survey and of the United States survey, on the eastern end of block 2, did not correspond. The fact that his testimony was not conclusive, that he testified from recollection as to his observations at the time of the survey, that in many respects it was weak, and entitled to little weight, did not make it either incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial.

Appellant also contends that plaintiff did not accept his deed from Troop under a mistake, but that he knew he was getting the one-half of the block according to the Gordon survey. It is true, he was told that the grant was short, and there was some talk about the liability of Gordon or his heirs for the shortage; but it is quite evident that he did not comprehend the description contained in the deed, or its effect. The evidence is clear that Troop showed him the Nurse line; that he paid only for the land within the grant south of that line; that the line was marked upon the ground; that he helped to build the fence through the clover field upon it, and plowed and cultivated the land to the line thus marked. He may have understood that his deed included land which did not belong to the grant, but it seems to be evident that he understood and believed that it included all the land south of the line shown him, and up to which he cultivated it. These acts of the parties at the time of the transaction are more reliable as evidence of the understanding and intentions of the parties than the recollection of witnesses as to conversations occurring 14 or 15 years before the trial. We think the court rightly found upon this point; but, if it be conceded that there is a conflict of evidence, that fact would not aid appellant.

It was not necessary that the judgment should have directed a conveyance from Troop to the plaintiff, as the legal title was not in him, but was in Parker alone. Nor is the liability of Parker affected by the fact that he conveyed to Helen M. Griswold, she having reconveyed to Parker before this action was commenced. The court found that she took with notice of the error in the conveyance, but whether she did so or not does not affect Parker's liability.

No other questions need be noticed. We find no error which would justify a reversal of the order denying a new trial, and advise that it be affirmed, and that the appeal from the judgment be dismissed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

In re McKINNEY'S ESTATE. (Sac. 48.)

CONTEST OF WILL—TAXATION OF COSTS.

1. Where the probate of a will is contested before the executors have been appointed, they have no power to deal with the assets, or make any contracts with attorneys, as executors; and whether the costs shall be paid by the parties, or out of the assets of the estate, is discretionary with the superior court, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1720.

2. By Code Civ. Proc. § 1332, it is provided that, in contests after probate, if the probate is revoked, the costs must be paid by the party who resisted the revocation, or out of the property of the decedent, as the court shall direct; and where it was found that the will revoked was obtained through the undue influence of one of the executors, an order taxing the costs to the executors was properly entered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. K. Law, Judge.

Proceedings to contest the will of Joseph McKinney, deceased. The probate was revoked, and from an order settling the account of the executors, in so far as it disallowed specified items, the executors, Douglass Luce and Joseph Brichetto, appeal. Affirmed.

Nicoll & Orr and James A. Louttit, for appellants. J. H. & J. E. Budd and Kile & Plummer, for respondent. Baldwin & Thompson, for respondent administrator.

BELCHER, C. Joseph McKinney died in San Joaquin county, leaving an estate therein of the value of about $40,000, and also leaving an alleged last will, in which Douglass Luce and Joseph Brichetto were named as executors. The will was presented for probate, and was contested by a woman who claimed to be the widow of the decedent. The case was tried, and the decision and judgment were against the contestant. The will was then admitted to probate, and the persons named as executors were appointed as such, and entered upon the discharge of their duties. Shortly thereafter another contest was instituted, by a brother and other heirs of the decedent, upon the ground, among others, that the execution of the will was procured by the undue influence of the said Douglass Luce. The trial upon the issues raised in this contest resulted in an order revoking the probate of the will and setting the same aside. Thereupon a special administrator of the estate was appointed, and the discharged executors were required to render a full account of their receipts and disbursements for and on account of the said estate. An account was accordingly rendered, showing receipts by the executors of sums of money aggregating $7,597.19, and disbursements of sums aggregating $7,588.03. To the allowance of numerous items of these alleged disbursements the special administrator and one of the brothers of the decedent filed objections, upon the ground that the said items were improper charges against the said estate, and were expenses incurred, if incurred at all, in an attempt to uphold, as the last will and testament of said deceased, a writing procured by the artifice and undue and fraudulent influence of one of the said executors, and not in any legitimate or proper administration of the affairs of said estate. The matter of settling the account came on regularly to be heard by the court, and in its order, subsequently made, it was recited that, "it satisfactorily appearing that numerous items of expenditure incurred by the said executors in attempting to establish a certain paper writing as the last will and testament of Joseph McKinney, deceased, which paper writing has been adjudged and declared to be not the last will of said deceased, but to have been obtained through the undue influence of at least one of the said executors, it is therefore ordered that all of the items so expended, being unnecessary expenditures in the administration of said estate, in the attempt to establish said paper writing so obtained as the last will of Joseph McKinney, deceased, be disallowed, as follows, to wit,"—then setting out a list of the items disallowed, aggregating about $2,000. The order further recited that, "it appearing to the court that the executors of said estate have employed attorneys in the administration of said estate, the sum of $500 is hereby allowed to said executors to be paid for such services rendered in the administration of said estate, but no sum is allowed as attorney's fees for services rendered by any attorney in behalf of the executors in either contest of the alleged will of Joseph McKinney, deceased." From this order, in so far as it disallowed the specified items of their account, the said Luce and Brichetto appeal.

The items disallowed consisted of witness fees, jury fees, reporter's fees for taking down testimony and transcribing his report, and money paid for services as detectives, on the first contest; and witness fees and a special shorthand reporter's fees for taking down the testimony and transcribing his report, on the second contest; and attorneys' fees for their services from the commencement of the proceedings to probate the will. The item for services of detectives was $200, marked paid to White & Dunlap. As to this item, Mr. Brichetto testified that, on the first contest, they had a jury trial, and had to employ detectives then to hunt up the record of the contestant, so as to prove that she was no widow. And Mr. Dunlap testified that the $200 was paid to him "for the services of Officer Carroll and Officer Klench of this city, and a detective named Howland that they employed in Oakland," and that "it was through the services of these officers and detectives principally that we were able to secure the testimony to show the falsity of the claim of the bogus widow." The item for special shorthand reporter's fees was $120, marked paid to F. D. Nicoll, and the item for transscribing was $36, marked paid to Edward Hood. As to the $120 Mr. Brichetto testified that the money was paid C. E. Doan, who took the testimony during the trial of the last contest, 12 days, at $10 per day. And Mr. Nicoll testified that Mr. Doan's services were rendered to the estate in taking the testimony: "He was employed by the executors, by myself and Mr. Louttit, as attorneys for the executors, for that purpose. We considered his services necessary. We recognized the fact that the lady reporter was somewhat inexperienced, and in a contest involving so long a trial we know it necessary on behalf of the estate to have another reporter, whose notes would act as a check in conjunction with the official reporter. Mr. Doan was also used by the attorneys for the contestants during the examination, and was frequently called to read the testimony for them. We found, as we had anticipated, that, by reason of inexperience, the official reporter, along in the trial, at times, was unable to readily read her notes, and it was really necessary that we should have the assistance that we had by the employment of Mr. Doan." And as to the $32 marked paid to Mr. Hood, the witness testified that it was "for the transcription of some testimony ordered by Mr. Louttit, as attorney for the executors." The items for attorneys' fees were $600 marked paid to J. A. Louttit, and $500 marked paid to Nicoll & Orr. As to these items it was proved that Mr. Louttit, at the commencement of the probate proceedings, was employed by the executors to act as their attorney in managing the business of the estate, and that he continued to do so up to the end of the last contest, and that Mr. Nicoll was employed as an attorney in the case during the first contest, but did not appear therein, but did appear and take part in the last contest, and that from the time of his employment he assisted in transacting the legal business of the estate.

The Code of Civil Procedure contains the following provisions: Section 1616: An executor or administrator "shall be allowed all necessary expenses in the care, management and settlement of the estate, including reasonable fees paid to attorneys for conducting the necessary proceedings or suits in courts." Section 1720: The supreme court "may in its discretion, order costs to be paid by any party to the proceedings, or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require." Section 1332: "The fees and expenses must be paid by the party contesting the validity or probate of the will, if the will in probate is confirmed. If the probate is revoked, the costs must be paid by the party who resisted the revocation, or out of the property of the decedent, as the court directs."

In Estate of Simmons, 43 Cal. 543, it was held that the employment of an attorney for the mere purpose of procuring letters of administration is a contract made in advance of any authority on the part of the client to deal with the assets of the estate in any wise, and, whether the application be successful or not, the estate is not to be charged with the fees of the attorney for the applicant. In Henry v. Superior Court, 93 Cal. 569, 29 Pac. 230, it appeared that a woman died leaving a last will in which one McKay was named as executor. The will was presented for probate, and a special administrator was appointed. Before the day set for hearing a contest was instituted, and thereafter McKay applied to the court for an order, which was granted, directing the special administrator to pay to the attorneys of McKay, out of the funds of the estate in his hands, a sum of money for counsel fees, witness fees, and other expenses to be incurred in the trial of the issues pending. It was said by this court: "It is safe to assume that parties interested as devisees and legatees will always take the necessary steps and provide necessary funds to procure the attendance of witnesses to establish the validity of the will, if it is worthy of probate. Our conclusion is that, until the will has been admitted to probate, the court has no power to appropriate the funds of the estate to aid either the proponent or contestant."

When the first contest in this case was tried, the appellants had not been appointed executors of the will, and had no power to deal with the assets of the estate, or make any contract with attorneys or otherwise, as such. And, after they were appointed, as executors, the court was authorized, under section 1720 of the Code, supra, in its discretion, to order the costs to be paid by the parties, or out of the assets of the estate. The court exercised its discretion and refused to order the costs of the first contest to be paid out of the assets of the estate, and in this we see no such abuse of discretion as would authorize a reversal. After a will has been admitted to probate, and executors appointed, it undoubtedly is their duty to defend and uphold the will. In re Whetton's Estate, 98 Cal. 203, 32 Pac. 970. But by section 1332 of the Code, supra, which relates to contests after probate, it is expressly provided that, if the probate is revoked, the costs must be paid by the party who resisted the revocation, or out of the property of the decedent, as the court directs. Here the appellants resisted the revocation, and the law made it the duty of the court to determine whether the costs should be paid by them or out of the assets of the estate. The court exercised its discretion, and determined that the costs should not be paid by the estate; and, in view of the finding that the will was obtained through the undue influence of one of the executors, we do not think that it can be said that its discretion was abused. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS. C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

AUSTIN v. PULSCHEN et al. (No. 15,835.)

VENDOR'S LIEN—MORTGAGE—PRIORITIES.

Plaintiff, who was in possession of land under a contract of sale, agreed to sell the same on condition that the vendee discharge a lien thereon for the purchase price, which plaintiff's vendor had not fully paid, and pay an additional sum to plaintiff, a part thereof in cash and the rest in notes, and that the latter should retain possession of the premises as security until the notes were paid. The vendee borrowed money from another, whom he already owed, giving him a mortgage on the land for the entire amount, and, after paying off the lien of the original vendors, and the cash payment agreed to be made to plaintiff, received deeds from the latter and from the parties whose liens he had paid, the mortgage and deeds being all delivered on the same day, plaintiff having no knowledge of the mortgage, and the mortgagee being unaware that his mortgagor had not paid plaintiff in full. Held, that such mortgagee was an incumbrancer in good faith, without notice, and his mortgage superior to any lien which plaintiff might have for the payment of the purchase money by her vendee. McFarland, J., dissenting. 42 Pac. 306, affirmed.

On rehearing. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 42 Pac. 306.

TEMPLE, J. Action to foreclose a vendor's lien. Judgment was entered for plaintiff foreclosing the lien, but subject to a mortgage in favor of defendant McDonald for $4,500. The land was owned by Bruce and Kent. Henderson contracted to purchase from them, and paid a portion of the purchase price, but left $5,000 unpaid. Henderson sold one-half to plaintiff for $5,000, one-half paid in cash. A deed was to be made by Bruce and Kent upon payment of the other half with interest. March 28, 1891, plaintiff agreed to sell the property to Pulschen for $5,300, of which $2,700 was to be paid to Bruce and Kent in satisfaction of their claim upon the land. Three hundred dollars was to be paid to plaintiff in cash upon the delivery of a deed from her to Pulschen, and $2,300 according to the terms of two promissory notes then executed by Pulschen. It was expressly agreed that plaintiff should retain possession of the premises as security until all the purchase money was paid. The contract between plaintiff and Pulschen does not appear to have been in writing. Pulschen applied to defendant McDonald for the money which would enable him to carry out the agreement with plaintiff. It seems he already owed McDonald $1,500. He required $3,000 more for immediate use in his agreement. McDonald referred the matter to his attorneys, Dorn & Dorn, who, after having examined the records, advised him that he could safely take the mortgage if Pulschen would first procure deeds from Bruce and Kent and from Mrs. Austin. Proceedings were then taken to procure those deeds. Bruce and Kent signed and acknowledged a deed April 11th. This was, however, not delivered until April 17th, when the plaintiff also signed it. And on that day the money was paid by Pulschen, which he thus obtained from McDonald, as follows: To Bruce and Kent, as principal, $2,500, and as interest, $200. To plaintiff, $300, which was in pursuance of the agreement between herself and Pulschen. On the same day Pulschen acknowledged and delivered a mortgage to McDonald upon the premises for $4,500. It is found that at the time McDonald did not know that Pulschen had not paid plaintiff in full, and plaintiff did not know that Pulschen had mortgaged, or was about to mortgage, the property to McDonald.

Under such circumstances, is McDonald an incumbrancer in good faith and without notice? The transactions, it will be seen, were practically simultaneous. The deeds, it is true, bore a different date, but the findings conclusively show that the mortgage and the deeds were all delivered on the 17th of April. Indeed, it fairly appears that McDonald, or his attorneys for him, paid the money to Bruce and Kent and to Mrs. Austin, for McDonald was advised that he could not safely loan the money until deeds were obtained from them; and he did not until such deeds were had, and they were procured by the use of the money which he advanced. It is claimed that the fact that plaintiff was in possession of the premises was sufficient to put McDonald upon inquiry. So it did, and to protect himself against any claim she might have he insisted upon getting, and did get, her deed. When one in possession of land makes an absolute conveyance of it, the presumption is that he did so on an adequate consideration. Unless there is some circumstance which indicates the contrary, persons may deal with the grantee on that supposition, and are not under obligation to inquire. That a grantor should be in possession when he makes his deed is the natural and usual condition of things. If he remains in possession afterwards, that fact gives rise to a different inquiry. Here, when McDonald took his mortgage, plaintiff had not remained in possession after her deed, for they were practically simultaneous. Whether the fact that a grantor remains in possession after the execution of his deed has the effect of putting parties dealing with the grantee on inquiry is a mooted question. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 617. In this state, where a deed absolute on its face may be shown to be a mortgage by parol, the courts will probably feel themselves bound to hold that it does have that effect. Still I cannot see how one could be put on inquiry until the possession has continued long enough to indicate to one who knows only the fact of possession that the grantor has remained in possession.

But for still another reason plaintiff cannot enforce her lien upon the premises. On the 18th day of May, 1891, Pulschen made a deed of the premises to defendant Rosencrantz. On the 14th day of July, 1891, Rosencrantz paid plaintiff $270 for certain personal effects and for possession of the premises. She then delivered the premises to him, and executed and delivered to him two unacknowledged deeds to said premises. And it is found that Rosencranz entered into possession of the premises, and has ever since remained in possession. Of course, if Mrs.

Austin ever had a vendor's lien she can assert no such claim after making those two conveyances. It is suggested that the finding does not say that plaintiff executed conveyances to Rosencrantz. The finding is that she executed and delivered deeds to said premises. The same word is used in the same sense in two other findings in this case, and in these cases the use has not been criticised. But the criticism is unfounded. A contract under seal is not a deed in this state. The only use of the word here is the popular sense, meaning a conveyance of land, and in that sense its use has become common by lawyers and laymen. As used in the findings, it is not ambiguous.

I have discussed the case as though Mrs. Austin had once a vendor's lien, but in my opinion she was never entitled to the vendor's lien, which is the creation of courts of equity to secure to a vendor his purchase money. The title to the land was never in her, and by her agreement with Pulschen was never to come to her. It was agreed that she was to be secured by being left in possession until she was paid. She had then other security, and was therefore never entitled to a vendor's lien. As no defendant has appealed, the judgment in plaintiff's favor will not be disturbed.

The alleged erroneous rulings in regard to the introduction of testimony were upon immaterial matters and are correct.

In regard to the motion to set aside the order granting a rehearing and for a remittitur, it is sufficient to refer for a consideration of the question raised to In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 466, 21 Pac. 976, and 22 Pac. 742, 1028. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: VAN FLEET, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and adhere to the opinion heretofore rendered by the court in bank after the first rehearing (42 Pac. 306), which approved the opinion of Commissioner Vanclief (39 Pac. 799). Heretofore, those who favored the contention of respondent McDonald only went so far as to hold that he ought to be subrogated to the position of Bruce and Kent (see dissenting opinion, 42 Pac. 307); but now it is to be held that the judgment be affirmed, which makes the whole amount of his mortgage, including the old personal debt to him from Pulschen, superior to the lien for the debt of the latter to appellant for the purchase money of the very land out of which McDonald is now to receive his old and apparently worthless claim. Respondents' side of the case has assumed from time to time many new phases; but under none of them can appellant, in my opinion, be compelled to lose her purchase money and her lien therefor. She sold to Pulschen in the faith that he would pay the $2,300 evidenced by his two notes. The representations of Pulschen that he could and would pay them were, as the court found, "false, and were made with intention to deceive plaintiff." When McDonald took his mortgage from Pulschen, as the court found, "said Pulschen on said date informed said McDonald that he was about to purchase said described premises from said plaintiff." She was then in possession, and her contract from her grantor was of record; and McDonald was bound to know the condition of the purchase money on the sale from her to Pulschen. She paid at least $2,500 for this land to Henderson. How much more she paid does not appear, although it appears that the $2,500 was for a "balance." Of this amount she has received only $300, and will probably receive no more; for, if the property were sufficient to pay all, this litigation would hardly have occurred. It is said now that appellant never had a vendor's lien, because she never had the legal title, and retained possession as security. But she had, under any view, an equitable title, was in possession, and sold to Pulschen; and under these circumstances had full right to a vendor's lien. "One who sells an equitable right to land retains a lien on it for the consideration whenever, under the same circumstances, the vendor of the legal title would hold an equitable lien. The same principle and reason apply to both cases." Stewart v. Hutton, 3 J. J. Marsh. 179. Also other cases cited in note to 2 Sugd. Vend. (7th Am. Ed.) p. 857. Moreover, substantially, and in legal effect, she had the legal title, and conveyed it to Pulschen; for, as found by the court, "at the request of said plaintiff" the legal title was conveyed to him by Bruce and Kent. If Bruce and Kent had conveyed to her, and she had immediately conveyed to Pulschen, so that there would have been two deeds instead of one, would not the effect have been the same? Pulschen contracted with appellant for the legal title, and got it; and McDonald's counsel advised him that it would be necessary to get a deed from her, and she also joined in the conveyance. Therefore, Pulschen, for the purpose of avoiding a vendor's lien, could not deny her title, and his successors with notice would be in the same position. I cannot see how appellant lost her vendor's lien by retaining possession of the land. By so doing she did not take any security other than her vendor's lien; and her possession was simply notice of her lien to all the world, for when the vendor retains possession of the land subsequent purchasers from the vendee are put on inquiry as to whether the purchase money has been paid. Hopkins v. Garrard, 7 B. Mon. 312. And the court finds that appellant was in possession "ever since said 25th day of October, 1889, to the 14th day of July, 1891,"—the latter date being nearly three months subsequent to the date of McDonald's mortgage, which was April 16, 1891.

As to the finding that appellant afterwards, on July 14, 1891, "signed and delivered" to one Rosencrantz "two unacknowledged deeds to said premises," it is not necessary to say more than was said in the opinion of the court to be found in 42 Pac. 306. What the nature of those "deeds" thus blindly mentioned in the findings were does not appear; but the court below attached no importance to them, for it found that appellant did not thereby "waive any lien," and that Rosencrantz was a mere mortgagee of Pulschen to the extent of $600.

It was contended in the petition for rehearing that McDonald should be subrogated to the lien of Bruce and Kent for $2,700. Now, in the first place, the judgment does not go upon any theory of subrogation. It gives McDonald a priority as to the whole of his mortgage for $4,500 and interest, and makes no attempt to segregate the amount of the Bruce and Kent claim. In the next place, the answer of McDonald sets up no right of subrogation. It makes no reference whatever to the claim of Bruce and Kent, and intimates no right to be put in their place. It denies that appellant had any claim of any kind to the premises; denies that Pulschen ever purchased from appellant; avers that at the time Pulschen mortgaged to him Pulschen owned the property "free and clear from any and all liens, incumbrances, claims thereto or thereon of any kind, name, and nature whatever"; and stands upon his mortgage as the first and only lien on the premises. Clearly, therefore, if there is to be a subrogation the present judgment should be reversed; and McDonald, if he chooses now to rely on subrogation, should amend his pleading so as to present that issue. Moreover, for another reason, the pleadings and findings should be different if the theory of subrogation is to be adopted. So far as the facts upon which subrogation could be awarded can be gathered from the present findings, they are these: The claim of Bruce and Kent for a balance of $2,500 purchase money arose upon a bond given by them to convey to Henderson a tract of land consisting of 20 acres. Now, the appellant bought from Henderson the undivided one-half of that tract, with the privilege of selecting either the north or south half in severalty, and she did select the south half, "and entered into possession of said south half of said lot, and ever since said 25th day of October, 1889, to the 14th day of July, 1891, continued in the possession of the same"; and this south half constitutes "the premises" upon which she seeks to enforce her vendor's lien, and which is involved in this action. Now, would equity allow respondent to enforce the whole of the old claim of Bruce and Kent against appellant's one-half of the property? It is, I think, quite apparent that the matter of subrogation could not be equitably disposed of without amended pleadings and specific findings upon issues thus raised. Under any view, therefore, the judgment should be reversed.

KENDALL v. EARL et al. (No. 18,392.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RATIFICATION—NEGLECT TO DISAVOW AGENT'S ACTS.

Plaintiff consigned goods to defendants, with instructions not to sell below a certain price without first advising him. Defendants sold at a price lower than that named, and without consulting plaintiff, but notified him immediately after the sale. Plaintiff was absent from home when defendants' letter arrived, but, after his return, made no objection to the sale, until several months had elapsed. Held, that plaintiff's failure to disavow defendants' acts immediately on the learning of the facts of the sale was a ratification precluding recovery of damages therefor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by William S. Kendall against Joseph Earl and others to recover damages for breach of contract. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson and A. M. Johnson, for appellant. C. H. Oatman, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff resides at Sacramento, Cal., and grows fruit in that county. The defendants are commission merchants doing business at Chicago, Ill. On October 9, 1889, plaintiff shipped to defendants 22,758 pounds of dried French prunes, and 3,937 pounds of soft-shell almonds, under the terms stated in the following contract:

"Sacramento, Cal., October 9, 1889. Earl Bros. Co., Chicago, Illinois—Gentlemen: I shipped you per S. P. and U. P. R. R., in C. P. car 1282, 22,980 lbs. dried French prunes, and 4,000 lbs. of soft-shell almonds, to be sold by you on commission, at 4 per cent. to you. On said consignment I have received an advance, per check of George Dietrich, of $1,200.00, on which advance you are to charge me interest, after thirty days, at 7 per cent. per annum. This consignment you are not to sell, unless at the following prices: For the prunes, 9 cts.; for the almonds, 14½ cts. per pound,—without advising me of the offers made for these goods at figures below those named, and I instruct you to accept a less sum than the figures named above, after receiving such advice from you. W. S. Kendall.

"This is correct, and we agree thereto. Milton Brown."

Milton Brown was an agent of defendants, and no question is made as to the validity of the contract. In November, 1889, the defendants sold the prunes for 6½ cents per pound, and the almonds at 11 cents, without communicating with the plaintiff; making a difference against the plaintiff of $678.47, to recover which sum plaintiff brought this suit. A jury trial was waived, and the court made the following finding: "That all the facts alleged in the complaint are true, but that, after the sales by the defendants of the prunes and almonds as alleged in the complaint, the plaintiff ratified, approved, and confirmed the acts of the defendants in making such sales." Judgment was entered for the defendants, and this appeal is from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and the only question is whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the finding that plaintiff ratified the sale made by defendants. There is no appeal from the judgment.

The sale of the almonds, with the price at which they were sold, was reported by the defendants to the plaintiff by letter dated at Chicago, November 15, 1889; and the sale of the prunes was in like manner reported, under date of November 25, 1889. The almonds were sold November 14th, and the prunes November 21st, and the prices at which they were sold were the market prices at the dates of sale. The evidence tended to show that from the time these sales were made the market remained about the same, or at least with slight fluctuations, until in March, when there was a slight improvement; but as to whether, in that month, the prices named in the contract could have been realized, the evidence was materially conflicting. Several other shipments were made by plaintiff to defendants of prunes and other fruits, and almonds, upon which defendants also made advancements. As before stated, defendants informed plaintiff of the sale of the almonds by letter dated November 15th, and of the sale of the prunes by letter dated November 25th. On November 28th the receipt of both of said letters was acknowledged by plaintiff's clerk, in which defendants were informed that Mr. Kendall was out of town, and would reply more fully in person, when press of business would allow, as no one else understood it. The plaintiff testified that at the time these letters were received he was at Los Angeles, "and was gone a good while"; that he did not remember what time he came back; that he was in Pasadena on Christmas day, and returned some time between that and January 2, 1890, and on that day wrote the defendants, without any mention of the defendants' letters received in his absence, as follows: "If you can dispose of my prunes held by you at 7½ cts. per pound, or over, please do so. Your markets seem to range a trifle higher, but I had rather let them go. So, if you can do so at the figures named, close out the entire lot, and make returns at once, and oblige, yours, W. S. Kendall." On March 8th defendants sent plaintiff an account of sales, and a check for $1,856.69, and on March 17th plaintiff replied thereto; and in that letter he made the first reference to the sale of the prunes and almonds mentioned in the contract of October 9th, and made an account of the loss thereon, amounting to $706.74, and demanded payment thereof. Concerning his delay in protesting against the sales in violation of the contract under which the said prunes and almonds were shipped, the plaintiff testified that, when he returned and learned of defendants' letters of November 15th and 25th, he saw Mr. Brown, and asked him how the defendants came to sell the goods in violation of the contract, and told him he thought it was not right; that Brown said he could not understand it, and he did not think it was right, and that he "would notify the defendants of the matter,—would communicate with them about it." He further testified that he had at that time six or seven thousand dollars' worth of his goods in defendants' hands, "and was not in a position to raise a row about it." On the part of the defendants, the evidence was to the effect that the goods in question were sold, at the time they were sold, by an oversight, in not noting upon the books that they were to be held. Mr. Earl, one of the defendants, and who testified that he was more familiar with the facts than any of the other members of the firm, testified that he had no recollection of receiving, through Mr. Brown, any notice that plaintiff objected to the sale, or that he would hold defendants responsible. It does not appear that Mr. Brown had any other connection with the defendants than an agency to solicit consignments, nor is there any evidence tending to show that he did communicate to defendants the fact of plaintiff's dissatisfaction, other than the following reference in defendants' letter of March 27, 1890, in reply to plaintiff's demand for the payment of said difference, viz.: "At the time the almonds were sold, our Mr. Brown saw you in Sacramento, and, we believe, showed you the letter he had received from us, and you did not say anything to him then, only that you did not think we ought to have sold them; but otherwise you made no claim at all, and we thought you were reasonably well satisfied, or you would have said more to Mr. Brown about it at the time."

In applying the principle of ratification to the unauthorized acts of an agent, a distinction is made between those cases where third persons may be injured by the delay of the principal to disavow the unauthorized act, and those cases where only the principal and agent are affected by the transaction. Where innocent third persons are, or may be, injured, reasonable promptness in repudiating the transaction, after full knowledge of the facts, is more imperative; and the same rule applies where the principal, with like knowledge, receives a direct benefit from the unauthorized act of his agent. So, too, the character of the transaction,—whether it be of a mercantile character, or an isolated transaction, not affected by the usages of trade,—has been considered, in determining what is a "reasonable time" within which the transaction must be disavowed. Story, in his work on Agency (section 258), says: "In respect to silence, whether it operates as presumptive proof of ratification may essentially depend upon the particular relations between the parties, and the habits of business and the usages of trade. In the ordinary course of business between merchants and their correspondents, it is understood to be the duty of the one party receiving a letter from the other to answer the same within a reasonable time; and, if he does not, it is presumed that he admits the propriety of the acts of his correspondent, and confirms and adopts them. This presumption seems now, in favor of commerce, to be universally acted upon. And, therefore, if the principal, having received information, by a letter from his agent, of his acts touching the business of his principal, does not, within a reasonable time, express his dissent, to his agent, he is deemed to approve his acts, and his silence amounts to a ratification of them. Nor is this principle peculiar to our jurisprudence. It has received the sanction of the Roman law, and has also been fully recognized by modern commercial jurists on the continent of Europe." To the same effect, see Whart. Ag. § 86. In Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 303, 32 Pac. 243, quoting from Ward v. Williams, 26 Ill. 447, the court said: "In general, where an agent is authorized to do an act, and he transcends his authority, it is the duty of the principal to repudiate the act as soon as he is fully informed of what has been thus done in his name; * * * else he will be bound by the act, as having ratified it by implication." See, also, Searing v. Butler, 69 Ill. 575; Prince v. Clark, 1 Barn. & C. 186, 8 E. C. L. 80; and Gold Min. Co. v. National Bank, 96 U. S. 640, 644. Appellant cites sections 964 and 965 of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence. The learned author there treats, in the first of these sections, of express confirmation or ratification, and, in the latter, of "acquiescence and lapse of time"; but he is treating the subject very broadly, and in relation to equitable actions of a widely different character, as shown by the two California citations in note 1, p. 1404, viz. Borland v. Thornton, 12 Cal. 440, and Phelps v. Peabody, 7 Cal. 50, both of which were actions to enjoin the collection of judgments. Nevertheless, the principles laid down in the latter section, on page 1404, in no wise conflict with the authorities above cited. Appellant also cites Whittemore v. Hamilton, 51 Conn. 153, in which the court, referring to the section we have cited from Story on Agency, say: "But we think it must be understood that the principle was intended to apply only to those cases where the alleged principal receives a direct benefit from the act of the alleged agent, or where the latter appears to have been prejudiced by the neglect of the former to give him notice of dissent." The case there was very different, and did not involve the relations or principles involved in this case. There, Hamilton released a mortgage owned by Whittemore (and which was assigned to Hamilton as collateral security), to enable the mortgagor to complete a building upon the mortgaged premises, Hamilton relying upon his verbal promise to execute a new mortgage for the same amount as soon as the building should be completed. The mortgagor failed, and the promised mortgage was never executed. The court, immediately following the passage above quoted from the opinion, stated the true ground of the decision as follows: "If one holding property pledged to secure a debt should destroy it, or convert it to his own use, or give it away to another, whereby it becomes lost to the owner, does he ratify the act by mere neglect to give notice to the wrongdoer of his dissent? As well might the principle be applied to a trespass, or any other tort."

It is also urged by appellant that defendants did not render an account of sales until March 8th, and that he made his formal claim for the deficiency on the 17th. He was, however, notified of the sales, and the prices received, in November, and must have known that he was credited with the proceeds. He had received an advance of $1,200 upon the prunes and almonds in question, upon which he was to be charged interest, after 30 days, at 7 per centum per annum, and upon another shipment, made November 7th, he had received an advancement of $3,000. Whether the plaintiff received any other payments prior to March does not appear, but he must have known that defendants would retain at least the $1,200 advanced, and thereby interest would be stopped thereon, and this fact furnishes an additional reason why he should have promptly disavowed the sale. The reason given by plaintiff for not expressing dissent earlier, viz. that he had $6,000 or $7,000 worth of his goods in their hands, and that he was in no position to make complaint, is not sufficient to excuse the delay, but is suggestive of a purpose or intention to delay the expression of any disavowal of the unauthorized sales. The order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

TULARE BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. COLEMAN et al. (Sac. 75.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—PLEADING—DILATORY PRACTICE.

In foreclosure, after a demurrer to the petition had been overruled, defendants were granted 15 days to answer, and on their motion were given 5 days more. They filed an answer May 2, 1895, which plaintiff moved to strike out because unverified. Defendants confessed the motion, and asked leave to file an amended answer, purporting to have been verified April 3, 1895, by a defendant, who claimed no interest in the premises. There was no showing why the verified answer, which stated no defense, was not filed in the first instance, it being an exact copy of the other. Held, that the court did not err in denying leave to file the amended answer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Action by the Tulare Building & Loan Association against Harry E. Coleman and others, in foreclosure. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lamberson & Middlecoff, for appellants. Davis & Allen, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendant Henry E. Coleman, to secure his promissory note for the sum of $2,000, and interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable to the plaintiff (a corporation) eight years after date, but provided that, if default be made in the payment of any part of said interest as it became due and payable, then the principal and interest should immediately become due at the option of the holder, and that such option might be exercised without notice. The complaint was duly verified. On March 18, 1895, the defendants appeared, and filed a general demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled on April 12, 1895, and defendants were allowed 15 days to answer. On April 27, 1895, the court, on motion of defendants, granted five days' additional time in which to answer. On May 2, 1895, the defendants served and filed an unverified answer. Thereafter, on due notice, plaintiff's attorneys moved the court to strike out the answer, on the ground that it was not verified. Thereupon defendants' attorneys consented to the striking out of the answer, and at the same time produced and asked leave to file what they denominated an "amended answer," which purported to have been verified by the defendant Witkowski, on April 3, 1895, 24 days prior to the filing of the unverified answer. The so-called "amended answer" was an exact copy of the unverified answer which had been filed, except that the word "amended" was added thereto. The court ordered the unverified answer to be struck out, but denied leave to file the proffered amended answer, on the ground of inexcusable negligence on the part of defendants; there being no showing nor pretense of any excuse for not having filed the verified answer, instead of the other, in the first instance. After hearing evidence for plaintiff, the court gave judgment in its favor, from which the defendants bring this appeal on a bill of exceptions, and contend that the court erred in denying their motion for leave to file the so-called "amended answer."

For the following reasons, I think the court did not exceed a proper exercise of its discretionary power in denying the motion:

1. By what the court was justified in regarding as mere dilatory tactics, the defendants had secured a delay of a month and a half.

2. The proffered amended answer appears to have been verified in San Francisco on April 3, 1895, and there is no pretense that it might not have been filed long before the unverified answer was filed; and that it was not so filed, instead of the latter, is evidence of a degree of negligence indicating bad faith.

3. Witkowski, who verified the answer, was made a party defendant, on the ground that he had or claimed some interest or claim upon the mortgaged premises; but in the answer he makes no claim of any interest in or lien upon the premises, and no reason appears why the answer was not verified by an interested party.

4. The proffered verified answer does not deny the execution of the note or mortgage, nor that defendant had failed to pay the interest, installments, and fines, as alleged in the complaint, but alleges as an affirmative defense that plaintiff had agreed with defendants to collect certain rent to become due to them "upon property situated in the city of Tulare, California, and to credit the amount of said rents" upon the interest and installments as they became due; but that plaintiff "neglected and failed to collect said rents, and neglected to apply any of the same" as per agreement; that, at all times after making said agreement, "defendants were out of said county of Tulare, and at a great distance from the city of Tulare," and were not notified by plaintiff that it had neglected to collect and apply said rents; and "that, by reason of said plaintiff's neglect to perform its contract herein mentioned, these defendants have been damaged in the sum of $231.07"; and that defendant Coleman "is entitled to have said amount of $231.07 offset against any claim of said plaintiff against him for any fines and interest that plaintiff may be entitled to charge upon said sum of $92.03 of installments and interest, as aforesaid."

The leased property from which rents were to be collected by plaintiff is not described except as above; nor are any lessees named; nor is it alleged that the lessees were either able or willing to pay rent, nor that Coleman had not collected the rent before the commencement of this action; nor is it alleged where or how far distant from the city of Tulare the defendants were during the time the rent should have been collected, nor even that they did not have notice during their absence that the rents were not paid. It is not claimed that the judgment is for a greater amount than was due and unpaid according to the terms and legal effect of the note and mortgage. Therefore, besides the inexcusable negligence, it is too plain to admit of argument that the proffered answer stated no defense, and that the court did not err in denying leave to file it. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

KENNEDY v. CONROY. (Sac. 58.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE — CHANGE OF POSSESSION — CONSIDERATION — CANCELLATION OF DEBT—PREFERENCE BY INSOLVENT.

1. A stepfather delivered to his stepson, who had been living with him on his ranch, a lease thereof, reserving two rooms in the house thereon for himself, and at the same time gave him, for value, a bill of sale of sheep and hogs running on the ranch. The lease was never recorded, and they continued to live together on the ranch without any change in their relations or in the possession being manifest to the world. Held, that the bill of sale was void, under Civ. Code, § 3440, declaring all sales of personal property void as to creditors where there is not actual and continued change of possession.

2. Cancellation of a pre-existing debt is a valuable consideration.

3. A preference of creditors by an insolvent is valid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by James P. Kennedy against W. C. Conroy. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Fulweiler and F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. B. F. Myres and Ben. P. Tabor, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to recover damages for the conversion by defendant of certain sheep and hogs alleged to be the property of the plaintiff. The defendant justifies the taking of the property upon the ground that he was sheriff of the county of Placer, and as such seized and sold the property under an execution against C. Quinn, whose property he alleged it was at the time of such seizure. On the 12th day of August, 1893, Quinn executed and delivered to plaintiff a lease demising to him a farm in Placer county for the term of two years and two months, and on the same day made and delivered to plaintiff a bill of sale of live stock and other personal property then on said farm, including the sheep and hogs in question. The consideration named in the bill of sale is $2,600, and the testimony tends to show that Quinn was indebted to plaintiff at the time the bill of sale was executed (though in what amount does not appear), and that the cancellation of the pre-existing debt was the consideration for the sale. These instruments were executed and delivered to plaintiff at the town of Lincoln, and plaintiff (who is the stepson of Quinn) testified: "When I received this bill of sale, Mr. Quinn turned the stock over to me on the ranch in the presence of witnesses. He turned the stock over to me on the ranch. The witnesses were Cornelius Kennedy and Owen Corcoran. No, it was not on the ranch that he turned the stock over to me; it was in the town of Lincoln. The stock was not in Lincoln, but that is where the witnesses were when they witnessed it. They witnessed the bill of sale, No, it was not witnessed by them. They were witnesses to the stock. Statements were made in their presence by him to me in Lincoln." In the lease of the farm Quinn reserved from its operation two rooms in the farm-house for the use and occupation of himself and his wife as a home and residence, and Quinn was there when the defendant seized the animals. There is nothing in the record to show how many rooms there were in the house, nor whether the rooms so reserved by Quinn were the same rooms that he and his wife had previously occupied. The lease was not recorded. Plaintiff was 26 years old, had lived with Quinn since his boyhood, and worked on the farm, having charge of the sheep and hogs, which were on the place before the execution of the bill of sale. After the making of the bill of sale, plaintiff had charge in the same way. The hogs and sheep remained on the ranch in the same condition that they had been in before he took the bill of sale. There was no change in the manner of using or keeping them. One witness testified that he went to work on the Quinn ranch about the 24th of August, 1893, and worked there two months; that he was employed by plaintiff, who paid him for his work. Another witness testified that he had seen the hogs and sheep on the ranch of Mr. Quinn; that plaintiff was working on the ranch prior to August 1, 1893, and shortly after that, on the ranch, witness heard Quinn say that he delivered and sold all this stock to plaintiff; that plaintiff seemed to be in charge; that Mr. Quinn was not doing anything at all, except little chores around home. On the 23d day of November, 1893, the defendant levied upon the property. On the 28th day of November, 1893, the plaintiff served a notice upon defendant that the property levied upon was his property, forbidding defendant to sell it, and demanding its immediate return. But said notice was not verified by the oath of the claimant, or any other person, nor did it state the matters pertaining to the right of possession or grounds of title required by section 689, Code Civ. Proc., as amended March 2, 1891. It was admitted that the defendant was, on the 22d day of November, 1893, and thence hitherto continued to be, the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of the county of Placer, Cal. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the defendant and denied plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The appeal is from the judgment, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that there was an actual change of possession from Quinn to appellant on the 12th day of August, 1893, which continued until the property was taken by the respondent, in November, 1893, and cites a number of California cases in support of such contention. But a careful reading of those cases discloses the fact that in each of them there are some circumstances which in a marked manner differentiate it from the case in hand. Thus, in Montgomery v. Hunt, 5 Cal. 366, from which appellant quotes in his points and authorities, the court said: "The cattle remaining on the ranch followed the actual possession of it by Meacham, and were no longer in the possession of Weston." The presence of Meacham on the ranch was sufficient to put the world upon notice of the changed condition of affairs respecting the cattle. In this case Quinn remained on the farm after the bill of sale was executed, and there was no change in the conditions apparent. The rule laid down in Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503, and ever since adhered to in this state, requires that the change of possession shall be so manifest "as to give evidence to the world of the claims of the new owner." The court below held that the sale to appellant was void, under section 3440 of the Civil Code, for want of the necessary change of possession; and I am satisfied that such conclusion was warranted by the evidence. See Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 467; Regli v. McClure, 47 Cal. 612; Gray v. Corey, 48 Cal. 211; Grum v. Barney, 55 Cal. 254; Merrill v. Hurlburt, 63 Cal. 494; Bell v. McClellan, 67 Cal. 283, 7 Pac. 699; Ruddle v. Givens, 76 Cal. 457, 18 Pac. 421; Bunting v. Saltz, 84 Cal. 170, 24 Pac. 167; Pearce v. Boggs, 99 Cal. 340, 33 Pac. 906; Howe v. Johnson, 107 Cal. 67, 40 Pac. 42. It may be conceded that the consideration for the sale was sufficient. The cancellation of a pre-existing debt has been held to be a valuable consideration. Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. 659. So, too, it has been held that a debtor, though insolvent, may make a payment to a creditor which will have the effect of defeating the collection of other debts against him. Ross v. Sedgwick, 69 Cal. 250, 10 Pac. 400; Dana v. Stanfords, 10 Cal. 278. But, although the transaction between Quinn and appellant may have been entirely honest, with a view to the payment of Quinn's debt, and without the intention of hindering or defrauding creditors of Quinn, yet, if the transaction falls within the inhibition of section 3440 of the Civil Code, it must be governed by it. As was said in Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 479: "If in fact there was not an actual and continued change of possession given, the statute pronounces the transfer fraudulent as to creditors, and the courts have no right to seek to evade its force and effect. No excuse or explanation for want of an actual and continued change of possession can be entertained." Some exceptions were taken at the trial to the rejection and admission of evidence, but I think the court did not err in any of its rulings. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order and judgment are affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. ALLEN. (No. 15,714.)

RAILROAD-GRANT LANDS—CONTRACT TO CONVEY—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

1. A contract of sale of unpatented railroad-grant lands required the vendee to pay one-fifth cash, and balance on a future day certain, with interest on deferred payments, and provided that after performance of all conditions he was to receive a deed, which the vendor agreed to make, on demand, after it had received patents, and then, after reciting that the vendor frequently failed to receive patents to its grant lands, provided that, if it was finally determined that patents would not be issued to it, the vendor was then to repay, without interest, all moneys paid on the contract. Held, that on nonpayment by the vendee of the balance of the price on the date fixed for payment, though the issuance of a patent was still undetermined, the vendor was entitled to recover the same. Henshaw and Temple, JJ., dissenting. 40 Pac. 752, reversed.

2. A contract for conveyance of railroad-grant lands, when a patent is obtained, for an agreed price, payable within a certain time,—all moneys paid on the contract to be repaid, without interest, on final determination that no patent will issue for the lands,—is not void for lack of mutuality of consideration. 40 Pac. 752, affirmed.

3. Where a contract of sale of land required payment of part of the price in cash, and balance within five years, with interest on deferred payments, payable annually in advance, the vendor, by suing to recover interest due on deferred payments before expiration of the time allowed for payment of the price, did not rescind the contract.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Darwin C. Allen. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Heard in bank after reversal in department. 40 Pac. 752. Affirmed.

Robert Harrison, for appellant. Wm. F. Herrin and Jos. D. Redding, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an appeal from the judgment, upon the judgment roll. The action is to compel the payment of moneys alleged to be due under contracts for the purchase of lands, and, in default of payment, to foreclose defendant's rights under the contracts, and for general relief. The action is on more than one contract, but they are alike in terms, and one will serve as a type of all. Plaintiff agreed to sell, and defendant to buy, a certain piece of land. At the date of the contract, defendant paid one-fifth of the purchase price, and one year's interest upon the unpaid portion, and agreed to pay the same interest annually in advance until the completion of the purchase, or the termination of the contract, together with all taxes and assessments levied upon the land, and to pay the remainder of the purchase price "on or before the 1st day of February, 1893." Defendant is given the right of immediate possession of the land, and, upon the performance of all the conditions of his contract, is to receive a deed for the land, which deed plaintiff agrees to make, upon demand, "after the receipt of a patent therefor from the United States." The contract proceeds: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the party of the first part claims all the tracts hereinbefore described, as part of a grant of lands to it by the congress of the United States; that patent has not yet issued to it for said tracts; that it will use ordinary diligence to procure patents for them; that, in consequence of circumstances beyond its control, it sometimes fails to obtain patents for lands that seem to be legally a portion of its said grant; therefore nothing in this instrument shall be considered as a guaranty or assurance that patent or title will be procured; that, in case it be finally determined that patent shall not issue to said party of the first part for all or any of the tracts herein described, it will, upon demand, repay, without interest, to the party of the second part, all moneys that may have been paid to it by him on account of any such tracts as it shall fail to procure patent for, the amount of repayment to be calculated at the rate and price per acre fixed at this date for such tracts by said party of the first part, as per schedule on page three hereof; that, said lands being unpatented, the party of the first part does not guaranty the possession of them to the party of the second part, and will not be responsible to him for damages or cost in case of his failure to obtain and keep such possession."

This action was brought upon default of defendant in paying the second, third, and fourth years' installments of interest. It was commenced before the expiration of the five-years limitation for the payment of the balance of the purchase money, but was brought to trial and decided after the lapse of that period. Defendant, by answer, denied title in plaintiff, and, by cross complaint, alleged false representations by plaintiff of its title, injury to himself therefrom, and concluded with an offer of rescission, and demand for a return of the moneys paid by him. The findings are in favor of plaintiff, except as to the fact of possession by defendant of the lands described in the complaint, and against the answer and cross complaint; and the decree requires defendant to pay within six months the amount found due as unpaid interest, or be debarred and foreclosed of all right and interest in and to said lands, and in and under the contracts.

The only question really involved in the case is as to the construction of the contracts sued upon. It is contended by the defendant that he was under no obligation to purchase the land, or to pay the remainder of the purchase price, unless the plaintiff should, within the five years, obtain a patent for the land, and that as the plaintiff had failed to obtain a patent within that time, and as the action was not tried until after the expiration of that time, the defendant was entitled to a rescission of the contract. But, clearly, the contracts will not bear any such construction. The defendant contracted, unconditionally, to pay the remainder of the purchase price "on or before" a certain day named, and to pay interest annually in advance on the remainder; but the plaintiff contracted to convey to defendant only "upon the receipt of a patent," and was to repay the money only "in case it be finally determined that patent shall not issue." The defendant, therefore, was not entitled to terminate the contract, or to require a repayment of the moneys paid, until the question of the issue of a patent to the plaintiff should be "finally determined." The findings state that proceedings are now pending in the United States land department for the issue of patent to the plaintiff, and that it has not been finally determined that such patent shall not issue. At the time, therefore, at which defendant contracted to pay the balance of the purchase price, plaintiff was not in default, nor was it in default at the time of the trial. It will thus be seen that under these contracts the times fixed for the payment by defendant of the balance of the purchase price, and the installments of interest on that balance, might all arrive before the happening of the event upon which plaintiff agreed to convey, or before the happening of the event upon which plaintiff agreed to return the money paid. A certain day was appointed for the payment of the balance of the purchase price, and the interest thereon in advance. But the issuance of the patent to plaintiff, or the final determination that such patent should not issue, were events, the time of the occurrence of which was uncertain, and which might take place long after the expiration of the five years. The case is therefore strictly within the well-established rule that "if a day be appointed for payment of money, or a part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or the act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act, before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent." Donovan v. Judson, 81 Cal. 334, 22 Pac. 682; Railroad Co. v. Butler, 50 Cal. 574; Platt v. Gilchrist, 3 Sandf. 125; Loud v. Water Co., 153 U. S. 564, 576, 14 Sup. Ct. 928; Coleman v. Rowe, 5 How. (Miss.) 460; Couch v. Ingersoll, 2 Pick. 301; Bean v. Atwater, 4 Conn. 10; Edgar v. Boies, 11 Serg. & R. 450. The whole framework of the contracts shows that both parties understood that the question whether or not patents would issue was one of uncertainty, and that it was impossible to know in advance when that question would be "finally determined." Defendant, with full knowledge of that fact, contracted to make his payments at all events, and within certain specified times; merely reserving the right to a repayment of the money in case the particular title contracted for should fail. Under these circumstances, the obtaining of patents could not be a condition precedent to his obligation to make the deferred payments.

The defendant further contends that the contracts were void, ab initio, for want of mutuality or consideration, or amounted, at most, to mere offers to purchase on his part. This contention cannot be sustained. Plaintiff claimed title to these lands, but its title had not been perfected by patent. Defendant had the same opportunity as plaintiff of knowing the nature and probable validity of that claim. Under these circumstances, plaintiff agreed to convey to defendant when it should obtain a patent, and to permit defendant to enter into possession of the land at once. In consideration of these promises, defendant agreed to purchase when a patent should be issued, paid at once one-fifth of the purchase price and one year's interest on the balance, and agreed to pay the remainder (with interest thereon annually in advance) on or before a given date, with the right to a repayment, without interest, in the event of an ultimate failure to obtain a patent. These promises were strictly mutual, and each constituted a sufficient consideration for the other. Plaintiff, by its contract, surrendered its right to contract with or sell to any one else, and yielded to defendant the present right to possession which it claimed. These concessions were clearly a detriment to plaintiff, and, in a legal sense, an advantage to defendant, and they, therefore, furnished a consideration for defendant's promise to pay.

Defendant also claims that the bringing of this action was a rescission of the contracts, which entitled him to a return of the money already paid. But since, under the contract, plaintiff was entitled absolutely to receive the money at the times agreed upon, and to have the benefit of its use until the final determination of the question of the issuance of patent, it was entitled to enforce the collection of the money by this action, and, in the event of a failure to pay, to have defendant foreclosed of his rights under the contracts. Keller v. Lewis, 53 Cal. 118; Fairchild v. Mullan, 90 Cal. 194, 27 Pac. 201; Hansbrough v. Peck, 5 Wall. 506. The decree gave the defendant the alternative of paying within six months, or suffering foreclosure, and this was in accordance with equity. It may be, in view of the fact that the action was tried after the expiration of the time for the payment of the last installment of the purchase price, that the decree should have required the defendant to pay the balance of the principal, as well as the unpaid installments of interest; but the error, if any, in that particular, is in favor of defendant, and cannot be considered on his appeal. It follows from these considerations that plaintiff is entitled to the relief granted by the court below, and that the judgment must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

HENSHAW, J. I dissent, under the conviction that the interpretation given to this contract in the opinion rendered by department 2 is proper and sound. It was there said (Railroad Co. v. Allen, 40 Pac. 752): "Plaintiff agreed to sell, and defendant to buy, a certain piece of land. At the date of the contract, defendant paid one-fifth of the purchase price, and one year's interest upon the unpaid portion, and agreed to pay the same interest annually in advance until the completion of the purchase, or the termination of the contract. The time of payment for the unpaid part of the purchase price was 'on or before the first day of February, 1893'; that is to say, within five years from the execution of the contract. Upon performance by defendant of the conditions of his contract, he was entitled—First, to take and hold possession of the land; and, second, to receive a deed for the same, upon demand, and after payment of the remaining four-fifths of the purchase price, which deed plaintiff agreed to make 'after the receipt of a patent therefor from the United States.' The contract proceeds: 'It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the party of the first part claims all the tracts hereinbefore described as part of a grant of lands to it by the congress of the United States; that patent has not yet issued to it for said tracts; that it will use ordinary diligence to procure patents for them; that, in consequence of circumstances beyond its control, it sometimes fails to obtain patent for lands that seem to be legally a portion of its said grant; therefore nothing in this instrument shall be considered a guaranty or assurance that that patent or title will be procured; that, in case it be finally determined that patent shall not issue to said party of the first part for all or any of the tracts herein described, it will, upon demand, repay, without interest, to the party of the second part, all moneys that may have been paid to it by him on account of any such tracts as it shall fail to procure patent for, the amount of repayment to be calculated at the rate and price per acre fixed at this date for such tracts by said party of the first part, as per schedule on page 3 hereof; that, said lands being unpatented, the party of the first part does not guaranty the possession of them to the party of the second part, and will not be responsible to him for damages or costs in case of his failure to obtain and keep such possession.' * * * Under such circumstances, defendant agreed to buy and pay for these lands at any time within five years, should plaintiff's claim ripen into a perfect title by the issuance of a patent. Plaintiff agreed, as the consideration flowing from it—First, to convey to defendant, and thus to forego its right to contract with or sell to any one else; second, to yield to the defendant in the meantime such possession, use, and enjoyment of the lands as would otherwise belong to it. Defendant, to secure these advantages to himself, paid one-fifth of the purchase price, and agreed to pay interest upon the remainder of it. If, at any time within five years, plaintiff's title was perfected, defendant had the right, upon payment, to compel a conveyance of it to himself. If, at the expiration of five years, the result had not been reached, defendant was entitled to repayment of his moneys, without interest, while plaintiff, for foregoing its right to make other contracts, and for yielding to defendant its right to the occupancy and enjoyment of the lands, was to be compensated by the use, without payment of interest, of the defendant's moneys held by it. It is true, these terms are not explicitly declared in the contract, as here set forth, but they fairly state the expressed agreement of the parties."

There is no doubt but that, in a contract for the sale of land, the covenant to convey and the covenant to pay may be made independent, but there is likewise no doubt but that the general rules of interpretation require these covenants to be construed as interdependent, unless the contrary is made clearly to appear upon the face of the contract; and, where doubt arises as to the intent of the parties, that doubt should be resolved by a construction holding them to be interdependent—First, as expressing the meaning most probably intended by the parties; and, second, as being the interpretation consonant with the spirit of equity and fair dealing. The seller ought not to be compelled to part with his property without receiving the consideration, nor the purchaser to part with his money without an equivalent in return. In Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 656, this court said: "It is very correctly said in Bank v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455, that 'in contracts of this description the undertakings of the respective parties are always considered dependent, unless a contrary intention clearly appears'; and the reason assigned, as well as the rule, would be applicable here, were the words of the covenant of doubtful import. 'A different construction would in many cases lead to the greatest injustice, and a purchaser might have payment of the purchase money enforced upon him, and yet be disabled from procuring the property for which he paid it.' The authorities in support of these principles are very numerous, and there is a greater degree of uniformity among them than is usual on a question presented, as this has been, in so many different aspects." A man purchases real property for purposes of improvement and permanent ownership, or for barter and sale. He may, and frequently does, pay the purchase money in speculation, whether or not the title he receives shall prove a good title, but he at least buys something. No case has been called to our attention, and none is cited in the prevailing opinion, in which he pays the purchase price upon a speculation as to whether the vendor shall give him something or nothing. For it will be noted that the plaintiff does not agree at any fixed time, or at all, to convey to defendant such title as it has, or may then have, but merely to convey to it its title when perfected by the issuance of a patent. If it obtains no patent, it conveys nothing. In all the cases which are cited, and in which the question of land sales is considered, it was some interest in land, or claim of title, which the vendee was purchasing, and which he agreed to pay for in advance. Here it is quite otherwise, and it may be instructive to see just what effects must logically follow the interpretation given by the prevailing opinion. Allen, at the end of five years, has paid the full purchase price for the land, with interest. He has been permitted to take possession of it, but has not been secured or warranted even in that. He has no title to the land whatsoever. He cannot compel a conveyance to him of the company's claim or interest in the land. There is no definite future time fixed, upon the arrival of which he may recover either his money or the land. He has parted with his money and the use of it for 10, 20, 30, or 50 years, until it "shall be finally determined that a patent is not to issue." Meanwhile he has no interest to sell, so that it is impossible for him to retrieve himself. He dare not improve the land, because he is not secured in possession or improvements, and he cannot even sell or assign his rights under the contract itself, for that is forbidden by its terms. At the end of an undetermined time, if plaintiff, who is called upon to use only ordinary diligence, fails to obtain a patent, defendant receives nothing but the principal of the purchase price. If that time covered a number of years, as it well might, the use of the money of which defendant was deprived, and which plaintiff has gained, would equal or exceed the principal itself, and yet for this loss defendant receives nothing. It is not easy to believe that a sane man would so contract, and, if this be the true interpretation, the contract is one without parallel. Upon the other hand, it may be readily gathered from the contract itself that the parties assumed that the question of the issuance of the patent would be determined within five years, and that, if determined by or within that time, the corresponding rights and liabilities of the parties to it would attach. If not then determined, the transaction should be at an end, and plaintiff would have had the use of the full purchase price (or its equivalent in interest) for its agreement to sell to defendant, and to yield him possession, while for these considerations defendant would have paid this money, with the right to the return of the principal sum at the end of five years,—a time long enough in which to bring the contract to an end in one or another way. The lapse of five years without issuance of a patent is intended to be, so far as the rights of the parties to this contract are concerned, in and of itself, a final determination that the patent is not to issue. So construed, the covenants are clearly dependent. The one interpretation manifestly exposes the defendant to such untoward danger and loss that it is inconceivable that a man of ordinary intelligence would have bound himself by it. The other expresses a fair business contract, such as any two individuals might enter into. In the prevailing opinion, it is said that the contract clearly will not bear the latter construction. That it is the equitable construction is not, and cannot be, questioned. Upon the other hand, there should be the clearest and most satisfying language in the contract, to warrant the interpretation given it. That language I am unable to find, and if there be an existing doubt, under all the authorities, and under the law of this court above quoted, the doubt should be resolved against the contention that the covenants are independent.

TEMPLE, J., concurs

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent, but upon a different ground from that stated by Justice HENSHAW. As to the construction of the contract, I concur in the views of the majority; but I do not think that the breach of this particular kind of a contract of sale gives the vendor the right to go into equity to claim specific performance, or to foreclose the right of the purchaser. In ordinary contracts for the sale of land the vendor has the right either to rescind, or to foreclose, for failure of the vendee to make deferred payments, because in ordinary contracts of sale the vendor is able to perform the contract on his part by making a conveyance. But when, as in this case, the vendor is not ready to convey, and may never be able to do so, I think he should be limited to rescission, or to his action to recover the installments due, and that he has no right to claim the relief awarded by this judgment.

EASTERBROOK v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 187.)

SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—PAYMENT UNDER PROTEST—ACTION TO RECOVER.

Pol. Code, § 3819 (Laws 1893, p. 32), authorizing actions against counties to recover taxes paid under protest, does not apply to special assessments levied by the city and county of San Francisco, for a specific purpose, in a designated district, to be collected in proportion to benefits, and, when collected, placed in a special fund, over which the city and county have no control, and which can only be used in payment of the principal and interest of bonds for which the city and county are not liable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by D. E. Easterbrook against the city and county of San Francisco to recover back money paid under protest for special assessments levied for the widening of Dupont street, in the city of San Francisco. From a judgment in favor of defendant, on refusal of plaintiff to plead further after demurrer to the complaint was sustained, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haven & Haven, for appellant. H. T. Creswell, W. C. Belcher, and Freeman & Bates, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action brought by the appellant to recover from the respondent money paid under protest for Dupont street taxes, levied under authority of the act of March 23, 1876, entitled "An act to authorize the widening of Dupont street, in the city of San Francisco" (St. 1875–76, p. 433). A demurrer was interposed to the complaint by defendant, which was sustained by the court; and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered in favor of defendant, from which judgment plaintiff appeals. The cause comes up on the judgment roll, and the sufficiency of the complaint constitutes the sole question for consideration.

The action is prosecuted under section 3819 of the Political Code, adopted February 27, 1893, which is in part as follows: "At any time after the duplicate assessment book has been received by the tax collector, and the taxes have become payable, the owner of any property assessed therein, who may claim that the assessment is void in whole or in part, may pay the same to the tax collector under protest, which protest shall be in writing, and shall specify whether the whole assessment is claimed to be void, or, if a part only, what portion, and in either case the grounds upon which such claim is founded; and when so paid under protest the payment shall in no case be regarded as a voluntary payment, and such owner may at any time within six months after such payment bring an action against the county in the superior court to recover back the tax so paid under protest," etc. The residue of the section provides that if a judgment be recovered against the county in such a case, and a portion of the tax has been paid over to the state treasury, the treasurer shall be allowed therefor, and the amount so paid over deducted in the next settlement of the county treasurer with the controller, as provided in section 3871 of the Political Code.

Plaintiff filed a written protest, averring that the entire tax was void; and, within six months after paying the tax, brought this action, to recover the tax so paid from the city and county. The question in the court below seems to have turned, not upon the validity of the tax, but upon the liability of the defendant, if the invalidity be conceded. The statute under which the tax was levied provided for the widening of Dupont street (now Grant avenue), in the city and county of San Francisco. The act provided that the value of the land taken for the widening of the street, and the damages to improvements thereon, or adjacent thereto, injured thereby, and all expenses whatsoever incident to the widening of said street, shall be held to be the cost of widening the street, and shall be assessed upon a described and limited district adjacent to the street to be benefited by such widening. The mayor of the city and county of San Francisco, the auditor and county surveyor of said city and county, and their successors in office, were constituted a "Board of Dupont Street Commissioners," with power, among other things, to determine the damages sustained by the several owners on account of property taken and damaged; also, to determine the benefits to be derived by the several lot owners within the district described in the statute, by reason of the improvement, "relatively to the benefits accruing to other lots of land within the said designated district." The expenses were to be met by issuing 20-year coupon interest-bearing bonds of the city and county of San Francisco (interest, 7 per cent. per annum, etc.), to be designated as the "Dupont Street Bonds," to be delivered to the persons in whose favor damages were awarded; or, upon their refusal to accept such bonds, they were to be sold, and cash payments made to the persons so damaged. The liability of the city and county was guarded against by section 22 of the act, as follows: "The completion of the work described in this act shall be deemed an absolute acceptance by the owners of all lands affected by this act, and by their successors in interest, of the lien created by this act, upon the several lots so affected, and it shall operate as an absolute waiver of all claim in the future upon the city and county of San Francisco for any part of the debt created by the bonds authorized to be issued by this act, and their successors in interest. This shall be regarded as a contract between said owners and the holders of said bonds and said city and county, and this provision shall be stated on the face of the bonds." These bonds and the accruing interest thereon were to be met by the levy of an annual tax upon the lands in the designated district, to be adjusted and distributed according to the enhanced values of the respective parcels of land as fixed by the commissioners. The taxes, when collected, were to be paid over to the treasurer of the city and county, and to "constitute a part of the 'Dupont Street Fund,' and to be paid out by said treasurer only in payment of the coupons attached to said bonds, as the same from time to time become due"; and the sums collected to meet the principal were to be received, treated, and paid out in like manner.

From these brief references to the statute, it is apparent (1) that what is termed the "tax" is a special assessment, levied for a specific purpose, upon a designated district, to be collected in proportion to benefits; (2) that, when collected, it is placed in a special fund, and can only be used in payment of the principal and interest of the bonds provided for in the statute; (3) that the city and county is not liable for the payment of the bonds, and has no control over the specific fund raised for their liquidation. Under these circumstances, we do not see that the city and county can be held liable in this action. The case is, we think, brought within the spirit of the rule enunciated by the United States circuit court in Liebman v. City and County of San Francisco, 11 Sawy. 147, 24 Fed. 705, and in Elberg v. San Luis Obispo Co. (decided by department 2 of this court, August 3, 1895) 41 Pac. 475, and Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. San Diego Co. (decided August 21, 1895) Id. 423. A rehearing was granted in the last two cases above mentioned; and, after mature consideration by the court in bank, the conclusion reached by the department has been approved. We recommend that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MYERS v. NELSON et al. (Sac. 31.)

HIGHWAYS—OBSTRUCTION.

Where owners of land adjacent to a highway construct a system of artificial ditches, converging at a culvert crossing such highway, so as to discharge an unnatural quantity of water on the lower lands on the opposite side of such highway, the owner of such lower lands cannot dam the culvert on the highway for the purpose of protecting her lands from such overflow.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Myers against J. M. Nelson and J. C. Richardson to enjoin defendants, who are, respectively, road supervisor and his employé, from digging up and removing earth which plaintiff had placed across a culvert crossing a highway, for the purpose of preventing the flow of water through such culvert on her land, in which a preliminary injunction was allowed. From an order dissolving such injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin and M. E. Sanborn, for appellant. H. V. Reardon, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Defendant Nelson is a member of the board of supervisors of Butte county and ex officio road commissioner in and for his supervisor district. Under the direction of said board, it is his duty to take charge of the highways in his district, keep them clear from obstructions and in good repair, and employ the help necessary for that purpose. Pol. Code, §§ 2641, 2645. Defendant Richardson is employed by Nelson in caring for the highways of the district, and it is admitted that in the matters laid to their charge here they acted officially, and under the instructions of the board of supervisors. There is a highway under the superintendency of said Nelson running from east to west along the line between sections 10 and 15 of a certain congressional township, which highway has existed as such for more than five years, regularly laid out and constructed by order of said board. It occupies a strip of land four rods in width along the boundary between said sections, two rods in each section, it seems; and the roadway or traveled portion thereof has been graded and elevated about eighteen inches above the surface of the surrounding soil; this being necessary to its use during the rainy season. Such elevation was effected by taking the earth from either side of the roadway, and within said strip four rods wide, leaving upon each side of the roadway a depression or gutter lower than the adjacent surfaces. The country for some miles around slopes gently from northeast to southwest. At the lowest point on said section line is a culvert through and under said roadway for the purpose of carrying off surface water accumulating in the highway. The bottom of such culvert was on a level with the bottom of the gutters on the sides of the roadway, and we may infer that the result of this arrangement was to allow any water accumulating on the north side of the roadway to flow through the culvert to the south side thereof, where, if not further obstructed, it would find its way to the somewhat lower land to the south in section 15. This land—480 acres in area—is the property of plaintiff, but the right of way for said highway along the said northern boundary of the same was granted by her predecessors in interest to said county. The surface of the land of plaintiff, and also that of several sections lying north and northeasterly therefrom, is marked with low ridges and shallow depressions or "sinks," which cause the natural drainage of the same to be "slow, gradual, and incomplete." Within a period of five years next before the commencement of the action (which was November 26, 1894), divers persons, owners and occupants of said lands lying north and northeasterly of plaintiff's, have from time to time constructed ditches, "with many lateral connections, and with a slight and even fall of grade in a general southerly and westerly course," converging to a point on said section 10 near the north end of said culvert. The effect of such system of ditches, as claimed by plaintiff, is to collect the surface water from the land, and discharge it in unnatural volume and greatly accelerated flow at said point of convergence; and none of it, she alleges, would reach that point naturally, or at all, except by such system of artificial ditches. In order it seems, to prevent the passage of the water brought down by means of such ditches through said culvert and upon her land, plaintiff entered upon the highway at the north end of the culvert, and, by means of earth, filled in the gutter on the north side of the roadway to a level with the surrounding soil, so that the water which would naturally flow in said gutter accumulates and overflows the roadway, and travel thereon is impeded. The defendants, for the "protection, benefit, and maintenance of said public highway," were about to dig up and remove the earth with which plaintiff had caused such gutter and culvert to be obstructed as aforesaid, when plaintiff brought this action to enjoin them from so doing, claiming that the effect of their intended acts would be to cause all of the waters carried through said system of ditches to be precipitated upon her land, and flood the same, to her irreparable injury. A preliminary injunction was allowed, which, on motion of defendants, heard upon the complaint and answer, was dissolved by the court. The order of dissolution is the subject of the present appeal.

Upon the papers before it, the court might fairly have found the facts to be as we have stated; and we think they warranted its action dissolving the injunction. Plaintiff invokes the doctrine, which we have no inclination to deny, that highway officers may not collect in artificial channels mere surface water precipitated by rain over large districts, and throw it upon the property of another (Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 49, 7 Pac. 41; Gould, Waters, §§ 261, 272); but here the plaintiff does not claim that either the gutters along the sides of the highway or the culvert have the effect to collect surface water in its natural flow in such manner as to occasion any injury to her. On the contrary, it clearly appears from her complaint that the surface water from the lands above her own would not reach said culvert in any harmful quantity but for the system of artificial ditches constructed for the more rapid drainage of their lands by her neighbors. Defendants are not shown to be in any way responsible for the ditch system which, in point of time, followed the construction of the highway. To restrain the water brought down "through the medium of said system of artificial ditches" (the phrase of the complaint) from reaching her land, plaintiff claims, virtually, that she may use the roadway as a dam, closing up the inlet to the culvert to make the stoppage effectual, to the impairment of the highway and hindrance of public travel. If a herd of cattle had been unlawfully turned loose, so that, by traversing the highway, they might enter on her land, we suppose that she would have no right to impound them in the road, or to enjoin the road commissioner from removing structures she might erect there for that purpose, and that the responsibility for the damage the cattle might do would be upon the persons who set them at large, and not upon the roadmaster. The case put seems not much different from the case at bar. "If the owner of the upper ground wrongfully direct an unnatural quantity of water upon the ground of a lower neighbor, by collecting several streams together, and discharging them at one place, or by any other means, the neighbor below may have an action against him; but he cannot justify the erection of an embankment to stop the water if thereby the water is improperly forced upon another owner." Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. St. 415, 417. See, also, Mathews v. Kinsell, 41 Cal. 512; Amick v. Tharp, 13 Grat. 564. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte JENTZSCH. (Cr. 97.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—POLICE POWER.

1. Pen. Code 1895, § 310½, making it a criminal offense for barbers to conduct their business on Sundays or holidays after 12 o'clock m., is not a proper exercise of the police power of the state.

2. Said act is in violation of Const. art. 4, § 25, subsecs. 2, 33, prohibiting local or special laws for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors in all cases where a general law can be made applicable.

In bank. Petition by Leo Jentzsch for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his discharge from custody under a conviction for violation of Penal Code, § 310½, prohibiting barbers from keeping open their places of business or working at their trade on Sundays after 12 o'clock m. Petitioner discharged.

Henry E. Highton and Darwin C. Allen, for petitioner. H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner was convicted under section 310½ of the Penal Code, which is a new section, enacted in 1895, and which provides as follows: "Every person who as proprietor, manager, lessee, employé or agent keeps open or conducts, or causes to be kept open or conducted, any barber shop, bath house and barber shop, barber shop of a bathing establishment, or hair-dressing establishment, or any place for shaving or hair-dressing used and conducted in connection with any other place of business or resort, or who engages at work or labor as a barber in any such shop or establishment on Sunday, or on a legal holiday, after the hour of twelve o'clock m. of said day, is guilty of a misdemeanor." It is contended that the section is in violation of the following constitutional provisions:

Article 1, § 1: "All men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing and protecting property; and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness."

Article 1, § 21: "No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked or repealed by the legislature; nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens."

Article 4, § 25, subsecs. 2, 33: "The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: Second. For the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors." "In all cases where a general law can be made applicable."

In construing so-called "Sunday Laws" courts have variously regarded them, some from a religious view, others from a secular, and still others from an anomalous commingling of both. In this state they have never been upheld from a religious standpoint. Under a constitution which guaranties to all equal liberty of religion and conscience, any law which forbids an act not in itself contra bonos mores, because that act is repugnant to the beliefs of one religious sect, of necessity interferes with the liberty of those who hold to other beliefs or to none at all. Liberty of conscience and belief is preserved alike to the followers of Christ, to Buddhist, and Mohammedan, to all who think that their tenets alone are illumined by the light of divine truth; but it is equally preserved to the skeptic, agnostic, atheist, and infidel, who says in his heart, "There is no God." So it has come to be the established rule in this state to view and construe such laws as civil and secular enactments. Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 678; Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 177. Thus construed, these laws, when decreed valid, are upheld as a proper exercise of the police power, as an exercise of the legislative prerogative to regulate the relations, contracts, intercourse, and business of society at large, and its particular members with respect to each other. Herein it is held that the legislature may pass laws for the preservation of health and the promotion of good morals, —propositions which are indisputable.

Says Mr. Justice Field in Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 518: "Labor is a necessity, imposed by the condition of our race, and to protect labor is the highest office of our laws." It is this language which respondent quotes and relies upon in support of the validity of this penal statute. Upon the question thus presented of the proper limits of the police power much might be written, and much, indeed, will have to be written, ere just bounds are set to its exercise. But in this case neither time permits nor necessity demands the consideration. Still it may be suggested in passing that our government was not designed to be paternal in form. We are a self-governing people, and our just pride is that our laws are made by us as well as for us. Every individual citizen is to be allowed so much liberty as may exist without impairment of the equal rights of his fellows. Our institutions are founded upon the conviction that we are not only capable of self-government as a community, but, what is the logical necessity, that we are capable, to a great extent, of individual self-government. If this conviction shall prove ill founded, we have built our house upon sand. The spirit of a system such as ours is therefore at total variance with that which, more or less veiled, still shows in the paternalism of other nations. It may be injurious to health to eat bread before it is 24 hours old, yet it would strike us with surprise to see the legislature making a crime of the sale of fresh bread. We look with disfavor upon such legislation as we do upon the enactment of sumptuary laws. We do not even punish a man for his vices, unless they be practiced openly, so as to lead to the spread of corruption, or to breaches of the peace, or to public scandal. In brief, we give to the individual the utmost possible amount of personal liberty, and, with that guarantied him, he is treated as a person of responsible judgment, not as a child in his nonage, and is left free to work out his destiny as impulse, education, training, heredity, and environment direct him. So, while the police power is one whose proper use makes most potently for good, in its undefined scope and inordinate exercise lurks no small danger to the republic; for the difficulty which is experienced in defining its just limits and bounds affords a temptation to the legislature to encroach upon the rights of citizens with experimental laws none the less dangerous because well meant. We think the act under consideration gives plain evidence of such encroachment. It is sought to be upheld by the argument that it is a police regulation; that it seeks to protect labor against the oppression of capital. The people have passed the law; let not the courts interefere with it. If the people are dissatisfied, they may amend or repeal it.

It is not easy to see where or how this law protects labor from the unjust exactions of capital. A man's constitutional liberty means more than his personal freedom. It means, with many other rights, his right freely to labor, and to own the fruits of his toil. It is a curious law for the protection of labor which punishes the laborer for working. Yet that is precisely what this law does. The laboring barber, engaged in a most respectable, useful, and cleanly pursuit, is singled out from the thousands of his fellows in other employments, and told that, willy nilly, he shall not work upon holidays and Sundays after 12 o'clock noon. His wishes, tastes, or necessities are not consulted. If he labors, he is a criminal. Such protection to labor, carried a little further, would send him from the jail to the poorhouse. How comes it that the legislative eye was so keen to discern the needs of the oppressed barber, and yet was blind to his toiling brethren in other vocations? Steam car and street car operatives toil through long and weary Sunday hours; so do mill and factory hands. There is no Sunday period of rest, and no protection for the overworked employés of our daily papers. Do these not need rest and protection? The bare suggestion of these considerations shows the injustice and inequality of this law. In brief, whether or not a general law to promote rest from labor in all business vocations may be upheld as within the due exercise of the police power as imposing for its welfare a needed period of repose upon the whole community, a law such as this certainly cannot. A law is not always general because it operates upon all within a class. There must be back of that a substantial reason why it is made to operate only upon a class, and not generally upon all. As was said in Pasadena v. Simpson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604: "The conclusion is that, although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." And in Darcy v. City of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500: "The classification, however, must be founded upon differences which are either defined by the constitution or natural, and which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity of legislation." In the case of our cities the constitution itself decrees a classification by population, and the differing exigencies of municipal government require that laws operating upon any class should be held general; otherwise the constitutional scheme itself is overthrown. But in a law such as this no reason has been or can be shown why the followers of one useful and unobjectionable employment should be debarred from the right to labor upon certain days, and others in like classes of employment be not so debarred. If it be constitutional to single out one such class, and debar its members from the right to labor on one day in the week, it would be constitutional to prohibit them from following their vocation upon six days of the week. When any one such class is singled out and put under the criminal ban of a law such as this, the law not only is special, unjust, and unreasonable in its operation, but it works an invasion of individual liberty,—the liberty of free labor, which it pretends to protect. Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, in no wise conflicts with these views. There was an additional vice in that law. While the classification was in itself arbitrary, as in this case, the law did not include all who came within the arbitrary classification thus made. It was this ground only which was discussed, and upon which the law was overthrown. Here, however, the designated class is based upon no distinction, and, as is said by Judge Cooley: "Every one has a right to demand that he be governed by general rules; and a special statute that singles his case out as one to be regulated by a different law from that which is applied in all similar cases would not be legitimate legislation, but an arbitrary mandate, unrecognized by the law." The prisoner is discharged.

SUTTON v. NICOLAISEN et al. (Sac. 56.)

HIGHWAYS—WHAT CONSTITUTES—USER—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. Occasional travel on a road across government land, which has never been laid out, recorded, or worked as a public road, will not constitute it a highway.

2. The provision of Pol. Code, 1876, § 2619, as originally enacted, that "all roads used as such for a period of five years are highways," was repealed by Act March 30, 1874, as to all counties, though the amendment was in terms made applicable to certain counties only. Huffman v. Hall, 36 Pac. 417, 102 Cal. 26, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Richard T. Sutton against Christian Nicolaisen and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ben P. Tabor, for appellants. A. K. Robinson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for trespasses committed by defendants by entering on his land, and tearing down about 30 feet of his boundary line fence, and digging up the soil, and destroying the grass and vegetation growing thereon, and also to obtain an injunction restraining defendants from repeating the said trespasses, and from constructing, as they threatened to do, an open road through and across plaintiff's said land. The defendants, by their answer, denied that they had committed, or threatened to commit, any trespasses upon the land of the plaintiff, or that he had been damaged in any sum whatever; and they alleged that for more than 30 years there had been a public highway, 40 feet wide, the line of which was specifically described, over and across the land of plaintiff, which had been continuously used by the traveling public during all of said time; that defendants were residents and taxpayers in the county in which the road is situated, and were accustomed to pass on foot and with vehicles over the same to their post office and market place; "that on or about the 3d day of April, 1894, said open traveled way was, by some person, obstructed by a wire fence constructed across the same, and by trees felled across and bowlders rolled into said road or way, totally preventing the defendants from traversing the same; that defendants carefully, and with as little injury as possible, removed said obstructions from said road or way; and that said acts are and constitute the pretended trespass complained of by plaintiff." The case was tried without a jury, and the court found that all the averments of the complaint, except as to the amount of damages sustained, were true, and that all the denials and averments in the answer were untrue; that plaintiff had been damaged by the wrongful and unlawful acts of defendants in the sum of $20; "that said defendants, if not restrained, will do plaintiff irreparable injury, and plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law"; "that the land described in defendants' answer is not a public highway"; and "that the defendants, or either of them, have no interest, easements, or right of way therein." Judgment was accordingly entered, awarding the plaintiff damages in the sum of $20 and a perpetual injunction, as prayed for. From this judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal. In support of the appeal, it is earnestly contended that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and that the judgment should therefore be reversed.

The principal question involved in the case and presented for decision is: Was or was not the strip of land described in the answer shown by the evidence to be a public highway? It was proved that respondent settled upon his land in 1881, and obtained a United States patent therefor in December, 1893. In behalf of appellants, it was proved that one of their number laid out a road over the said strip of land in 1874, and that he and a few other persons occasionally used it thereafter, up to near the time of the alleged trespass, for hauling wood, lumber, and some other freights, for driving live stock, and for passing over it on foot and in vehicles. It does not appear that any road across respondent's land was ever laid out and recorded as a highway; and, in rebuttal, it was proved that the alleged road was only from seven to nine feet wide, and that the road masters of the district in which it is situated had never done any work upon it as a public road. To sustain their theory that the road was a public highway, counsel for appellants rely upon section 2477 of the United States Revised Statutes, and upon section 2619 of the Political Code, as it was originally enacted. The first section above named provides: "The right of way for the construction of highways over the public lands, not reserved for public use, is hereby granted." This section simply grants a right of way for roads, but the question whether a road has been so constructed as to make it a public highway is one that can be solved only by a consideration of the laws of the state. The second section above named provided: "Roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of supervisors, and all roads used as such for a period of five years, are highways." This section was amended by an act passed March 30, 1874, by striking out the words "and all roads used as such for a period of five years"; and, as thus amended, it remained in force until 1883, when the whole chapter upon the subject was repealed. It was provided, however, by the amendatory act, that it should apply only to certain named counties, of which Placer county, in which the road in question is situated, was not one. In Gloster v. Wade, 78 Cal. 407, 21 Pac. 6, the question was raised whether the said amendatory act had the effect to repeal the amended section of the Code as to counties to which the act was not declared applicable. It was held that it did not have that effect, but that, as to all counties not named, the section as originally enacted remained in full force, notwithstanding the amendment. In Huffman v. Hall, 102 Cal. 26, 36 Pac. 417, in which the same question was again raised, a different conclusion was reached, and Gloster v. Wade was expressly overruled. And in Cooper v. Monterey Co., 104 Cal. 437, 38 Pac. 106, the decision in the Huffman Case was approved and followed. Counsel for appellants contend that the decision in Gloster v. Wade was a correct exposition of the law, and should be upheld, and that the two later decisions to the contrary should be overruled. This contention cannot be sustained. It appears that the question involved was very fully considered and ably discussed in the opinion rendered in the Huffman Case, and that the decision was by the court in bank, five justices concurring. It also appears that the decision in the Cooper Case was made by department 1 of the court, and that a rehearing in bank was asked for and denied. These decisions must therefore be accepted as the well-considered and latest expressions of the views of the court upon the question in hand, and as correct expositions of the law upon the subject. It follows that the court below was justified in finding that the strip of land described in the answer was not a public highway, and that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

WORMOUTH v. GARDNER et al. (S. F. 157.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTEES—PURCHASE RIGHT—LAND OFFICE—DECISIONS—REVIEW.

Under Act July 23, 1866, § 7 (14 Stat. 220), providing that bona fide purchasers of lands held under Mexican grants subsequently rejected or excluded on final survey of the grant, who have taken actual possession and improved according to the lines of the original survey, shall have, where no adverse title except that of the United States exists, the right to purchase on proof of the above facts, it was error, in an action for possession of land under a homestead entry, to sustain a demurrer to an answer and cross complaint which alleged that defendants claimed the land as grantees of bona fide purchasers, prior to plaintiff's entry, of heirs of Mexican grantees; that defendants and their grantees had held continuous possession of, and had improved, the land; that proof of all these facts was made before the land department on application of their grantor to purchase; but that the department, basing its decision on such proof, decided that he was not, as matter of law, entitled to purchase, and denied his application.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by one Wormouth against one Gardner and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hepburn Wilkins, for appellants. E. B. Mahon, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Upon the former appeal in this case (105 Cal. 149, 38 Pac. 646), the plaintiff's right of recovery was based upon a homestead entry, and the receipt of the receiver of the United States land office for the cash payment thereof. The trial of the cause below, from which that appeal was taken, was had in the year 1892; and, intermediate the decision upon that trial and the decision of this court upon the appeal, a patent for the land described in the complaint was issued to the plaintiff by the United States; and, upon the going down of the remittitur, the defendants filed a supplemental answer and a cross complaint, setting forth this issuance of the patent to the plaintiff, and alleging other facts by virtue of which they claimed that the plaintiff holds the patent in trust for them, and asked that the court decree that he execute to them a conveyance of the said land. To this supplemental answer, and to the cross complaint, the plaintiff filed a general demurrer, which was sustained; and, the defendants declining to amend, judgment was thereafter rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment, the defendants have appealed.

The facts alleged by the defendants in support of their claim are that in the year 1834 the Mexican government granted to Juan Reed a tract of land called the "Rancho Corte De Madera Del Presidio," which included the demanded premises within its exterior limits; that the said grant was confirmed, and in the year 1885 a patent therefor was issued by the United States to the heirs of said Reed (he having died in 1843); that after the confirmation of the grant, and while proceedings were pending in the land department to ascertain its boundaries, and before the final survey thereof had been made, the grantors of the defendants purchased from said heirs of Reed, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, a tract of land which included the lands described in the complaint, in the belief that the said tract of land was a part of said Mexican grant; that the final survey upon which the patent was issued was made in 1874, and by it the lands so purchased were excluded from the grant; that in January, 1875, one Throckmorton, who had succeeded to the interests of the aforesaid purchasers, made an application to the register and receiver of the United States land office at San Francisco for the purchase of said lands, under section 7 of the act of congress entitled "An act to quiet titles in California," approved July 23, 1866, and that the plaintiff herein was a party defendant upon said application, and contested the same; that Throckmorton's application was rejected by the register and receiver, and also, upon appeals therefrom, by the commissioner of the general land office, and by the secretary of the interior, and that thereafter a patent was issued to the plaintiff for the lands described in the complaint; that, after the institution of the proceedings before the register and receiver, Throckmorton died; and that the defendants herein have succeeded to his interests in the premises.

It is an established rule of law that, upon the issuance of a patent by the United States, the decision of the officers of the land department upon all of the facts necessary to the issuance of such patent is, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or imposition, conclusive; but that if, in making this decision, they have erred in the construction of the law applicable to the facts, or by any mistake of law have given to one the land which, upon undisputed facts, should have been given to his contestant, a court of equity will grant relief against such mistake by disregarding their erroneous rulings of law, and will decree that the person who has received the patent holds the same in trust for the one to whom it should have been issued. Errors of judgment, however, in reference to the weight of evidence or the credibility of witnesses, as well as the inferences or conclusions which the officers may draw from the testimony before them in contested questions of fact, are conclusive upon courts. Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330; Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530; Rector v. Gibbon, 111 U. S. 276, 4 Sup. Ct. 605; Lee v. Johnson, 116 U. S. 48, 6 Sup. Ct. 249; Rutledge v. Murphy, 51 Cal. 388; Buckley v. Howe, 86 Cal. 596, 25 Pac. 132. See, also, cases cited under Gould & Tucker's Notes to section 2273, Rev. St. U. S. The parties to this appeal do not either of them controvert this proposition, but differ as to its application to the case before the court; the appellant relying upon the former part of the rule, while the respondent contends that the latter portion controls the case.

Section 7 of the act of July 23, 1866 (14 Stat. 220), provides "that where persons in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, have purchased lands of Mexican grantees or assigns, which grants have subsequently been rejected, or where the lands so purchased have been excluded from the final survey of any Mexican grant, and have used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the same, as according to the lines of their original purchase, and where no valid, adverse right or title (except of the United States) exists, such purchasers may purchase the same, after having such lands surveyed under existing laws, at the minimum price established by law, upon first making proof of the facts as required in this section, under regulations to be provided by the commissioner of the general land office." Under the provisions of this section, Throckmorton made his application for the purchase of the lands that had been conveyed to him, and contested with the plaintiff the right to receive a patent for the lands in question; and, under the above authorities, the decision of the officers before whom the contest was had is conclusive upon all questions of fact presented to them. It is alleged, however, in the answer and cross complaint of the defendants herein, that the grantees under the heirs of Reed purchased the lands described in their deeds "in good faith, and for a valuable consideration"; and that they "used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the said lands," including those described in the complaint, "according to the lines of their original purchases"; and that from February 1, 1871, to July 17, 1890, Throckmorton, and, after his death, his executrix, "used and improved and continued in the actual possession" of the lands described in the deeds from the heirs, "substantially according to the lines of said deeds": and that Throckmorton, at the time of his said purchase, believed in good faith that all of said lands were included within the Mexican grant to said Reed, and in good faith entertained such belief until the date of his death; and that the said Mexican grant did purport to grant and convey all of the said lands described in said deeds; and that on July 17, 1890, the defendant Jacob Gardner succeeded to the interest of Throckmorton, and has since that date been in the possession of a certain portion of the land described in the complaint. It is also alleged that, at the hearing before the officers of the land department, all of these facts were established by competent evidence; and that there was no conflict in said evidence, and no evidence which contradicted any part of said evidence; and that the said evidence was true; but that, notwithstanding the same, the register and receiver, and also the commissioner of the general land office and the secretary of the interior, "basing their decision upon the evidence aforesaid, and resting the same upon the proposition of law that under the evidence and facts introduced before them on said application, as aforesaid, the said Throckmorton was not in law or under the law entitled to purchase the said land, denied the application of said Throckmorton to purchase the said land"; and that a patent for said lands was issued to the plaintiff by reason of said erroneous construction of the law.

Upon these facts, it is evident that Throckmorton brought himself within the provisions of section 7 of the act of July 23, 1866, aforesaid, and was entitled to receive a patent for the land; and the demurrer to the answer and cross complaint of the defendants concedes the truth of these averments. The answer and cross complaint do not set forth the facts which were determined by the secretary of the interior, nor does it appear that he made any special findings of fact, or gave any conclusion with reference to the above facts; but upon the allegation that the purchase was in fact made in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, and that competent and uncontradicted evidence of such facts, as well as of the other facts, was presented to that officer upon the application for the patent, we must assume that his findings were in accordance with the evidence, and that his refusal to issue the patent to Throckmorton was by reason of his construction of the law that he was not entitled thereto. Whether Throckmorton did in fact purchase the land for a valuable consideration, or whether, after his purchase, he used and improved and continued in the actual possession of the same, according to the lines of his purchase, were questions of fact to be determined by the secretary of the interior. The good faith of Throckmorton in making the purchase, as well as his belief that the land he purchased was included within the original limits of the Mexican grant, were also facts to be determined by that officer from all the circumstances under which the purchase was made. Whether that officer properly considered the weight to which the evidence before him was entitled, or whether he drew correct conclusions from that evidence, his determination with reference to these facts, whether correct or erroneous, is conclusive upon the judicial tribunals. These tribunals cannot exercise a revisory jurisdiction over him in matters which are within the scope of the authority conferred upon him; but if, upon the undisputed facts, he made an erroneous application of the law pertinent to those facts, his action is open to review. The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to overrule the demurrers, with permission to the plaintiff to answer the cross complaint, if he shall be so advised.

In re WILLIAMS' ESTATE. (Sac. 32.)

WILLS—LEGACIES—WHEN DUE—INTEREST—RESIDUARY LEGATEE.

1. Where a will provides that executors shall not be required to pay legacies "until such time as it may be practicable to do so, having regard to beneficial management of my said estate," the legacies become due, without regard to the provision, at the end of one year after the testator's death, by Civ. Code, § 1368, and draw interest thereafter by section 1369.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1357, subd. 4, "a residuary legacy embraces only that which remains after all the (other) bequests of the will are discharged," and a specific legacy, payable out of the residue after other legacies are paid, is not a residuary legacy, where the gift of the residuum is to another.

3. Legacies become due by the provisions of Civ. Code, § 1368, without an order of the court that they be paid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt. F. Johnson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Lewellyn Williams it was sought to charge the residuum with interest on a certain legacy. From a decree disallowing interest, the legatee appeals. Modified.

Garrett W. McEnerney and Stanley, Hayes, McEnerney & Bradley, for appellants. McKune & George and A. C. Freeman, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. The question involved in this appeal is whether appellant, Mrs. Harvey, is entitled to interest upon a legacy of $10,000 given her by the will of the deceased. Williams died May 6, 1891. By his will, as first executed, he gave in trust for his adopted daughter, Mrs. Auzerais, and her children, $100,000; to Hannah B. Fuller, $10,000; Sophia G. Cutter, $10,000; Mrs. Clinton Hardy, $10,000; Mary Green, $10,000; for a monument, $1,000; lodge of Masons, $1,000; and to Mrs. Auzerais the residue of the estate. The will contained the following provision: "My said executors shall not be required to pay the legacies herein to said Fuller, Hardy, and Green until such time as it may be practicable to do so, having regard to beneficial management of my said estate. The said bequest of one hundred thousand dollars to my said daughter Lucy is not to be reduced or diminished under any circumstances," etc. By a codicil the testator gave additional legacies as follows: To Sarah W. Woart, $20,000, from the residue of his estate; to Hannah B. Fuller, $10,000 additional; to Sophia G. Cutter, $10,000 additional; to Mrs. J. Downey Harvey, $10,000 out of the residue of the estate; to Harriet E. Mowe, $5,000; to Gee Foo, $500; to Charlie, $500; and to Sophia G. Cutter, $2,500, for a monument. The will was probated May 29, 1891. The estate was appraised at $314,645.11. The time for presentation of claims against the estate expired March 29, 1892. The claims presented aggregated $1,579.55, and were all paid prior to May 6, 1892.

It is provided by section 1368, Civ. Code, that legacies are due and deliverable at the expiration of one year after the testator's decease; by section 1369, that they bear interest from the time they are due and payable; and by section 1370, that these provisions are in all cases to be controlled by the testator's express intentions.

The judgment of the probate court refusing interest is defended on various grounds. First. It is contended that the above direction that the executors need not pay certain named legatees their legacies until it is practicable, having regard to the beneficial management of his estate, is an express declaration that the legacies were not due and payable until the executors shall deem, or the court shall find, that such payment is practicable, having regard to the beneficial management of the estate. The first answer to this is obviously that the legacy due appellant is not one of those mentioned, and which it may be claimed may be withheld for the advantage of the estate. To prevent the application of the statutory rule, the intention of the testator must be expressed in the will. But I think that it would not matter if it were admitted that this provision of the will includes all legacies. The Code rule is the common-law rule, which was induced partly by reason of public policy. A pecuniary legacy is a debt due from the estate; not a claim against the testator which must be proved and paid in due course of administration, but a claim against the estate imposed by the will. One year is allowed to the estate, during which time the executors ought to be able to collect and realize the assets and be in readiness to discharge the obligations imposed upon the estate by the will. It would be difficult and impracticable to determine in every case when it would be convenient to pay the legacies, and so a general rule has been adopted which cuts the knot by doing what in general cases is convenient, though in particular cases both convenience and justice would be disappointed. Sitwell v. Bernard, 6 Ves. 520. So, too, it is presumed that the money is earning something for the estate, which the residuary legatee ought not to be able to get at the expense of the special legatee. To allow this would often involve delay in the administration of estates in the interest of the residuary. It is therefore held, in the face of such provisions, that it will be practicable or convenient to pay at the end of one year. This is held even where administration was prevented by contests of the will, or in regard to right to administer. Powell v. Drake, 19 D. C. 334; Kent v. Dunham, 106 Mass. 586; Welch v. Adams, 152 Mass. 86, 25 N. E. 34; In re McGowan, 124 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 1098. In Vernet v. Williams, 3 Dem. Sur. 340, the matter is discussed at length, and numerous authorities cited and commented upon. The conclusion is that such words in a will do not affect the rule. The court will conclude that it is practicable and convenient to pay at the end of the year, and not before. In fact, the words may be held to refer to the rule, for it has been uniformly held that "as soon as possible," or "when practicable," means at the end of the year. Rogers v. Rogers, 2 Redf. 27. In Ingraham v. Postell, 1 McCord, Eq. 94, it was said: "It seems to be settled, as a general rule, that the legacy shall carry interest after a year from the date of the death of the testator, even though it appears that it could not by any diligence be collected within that time, because, in contemplation of law, it might have been done." I conclude, upon this branch of the case, that the legacy of appellant is not within the qualification in the will, and, if it were, still it would bear interest. The rule prevailing in courts of chancery and adopted in the Code declares that it is convenient and practicable to pay the same at the end of the year.

Second. It is contended that the legacy to Mrs. Harvey is a residuary legacy, and therefore cannot be paid until the residuum is ascertained. If the legacy is really residuary, we need inquire no further. The suggestion of interest upon a residuary legacy is an absurdity, for there can be no fund from which the interest could be paid. Interest allowed on particular legacies always comes from the residuum, and when the money is retained by the estate its use is presumably to the advantage of the residuary. But nothing can be more certain than that the legacy is not residuary. "A residuary legacy embraces only that which remains after all the (other) bequests of the will are discharged. Civ. Code, § 1357, subd. 4. There can be but one such residuum, and in the codicil containing the legacy to appellant the testator mentions the gift of such residuum to Mrs. Auzerais after all the gifts in the will are fulfilled. This is the residuary legacy, and the only one provided for in the will. The provision that the legacy should be paid out of the residue did not make the legacy residuary. The intent was, doubtless, that the bequests not so qualified should be first paid, and not be held liable for contribution until the qualified legacies were exhausted. In that sense all the bequests are residuary, as to the first in trust for Mrs. Auzerais, and all might have been expressly made so. Suppose, for instance, a will should provide for a legacy to A. of $10,000, and out of the residue to B. a legacy of $10,000, and after the payment of the legacy to B. the residue to C. If there was anything in the estate for C., he would be the only residuary legatee. No other would come within the language of the statute. And no other would come within the reason of the rule as to interest, for presumably the retention of the money by the executor has increased his legacy and diminished that of the other legatees. It is shown and admitted that Mrs. Auzerais received $150,000 as residuary legatee.

Third. It is contended that a legacy is not due and payable until it has been ordered paid by the probate court. The existence of sections 1368, 1369, Civ. Code, is a sufficient answer to this contention. No special statute would be required to inform us that a legacy would be payable at least when it has been ordered paid by the probate court. Section 1646, Code Civ. Proc., referred to, authorizes the executor to retain money in certain cases without paying debts or legacies. Yet the debts are undoubtedly due. Indeed, the purpose of the provision is to authorize the executor to refuse payment of debts and legacies when due, and it is because they were due that it was necessary so to provide. There was no attempt to show that it was in fact impracticable, having regard to the beneficial management of the estate, to pay the legacy to appellant at the end of the year. On the contrary, it plainly appeared that it was practicable, for June 6, 1892, Mrs. Auzerais filed her petition asking the payment to her out of the residuum of $75,000. She showed that there were plenty of assets in the estate to warrant the payment of that large sum to her as residuary legatee. The executor answered, admitting the allegation, and the court made the order authorizing it, and that sum was paid. Of course, the claims of the particular legatees were prior to hers. The court below is directed to modify the decree appealed from by allowing interest on the legacy of appellant as claimed by her.

BURLING et al. v. NEWLANDS et al. (No. 14,592.)

Trust for Creditors — Rights of Creditors — Fraud of Trustee—Demurrer—Deed of Trust Construed — Liability of Estate for Torts of Trustee.

1. One who borrows money for the use of another, giving his own notes therefor, becomes a creditor of the beneficiary for the amount, and where, in such case, after the debtor's death, the trustee of his estate, by false representations as to the insolvency of such estate, induces the creditor to pay a sum of money, and to assign his claim against the estate, in consideration of being protected from further liability on the notes given for such borrowed money, the creditor may, on discovery of the fraud, and that the estate is solvent (provided the trust on which it is held is for the benefit of creditors), repudiate the transaction, and recover from the estate the amount of which it was thereby defrauded.

2. The fact that in such transaction such creditor made and verified a claim against the estate for the full amount of the outstanding notes, and assigned the same to the trustee individually, would not constitute complicity in an attempt to defraud the trust estate, it being done with the understanding that such estate was insolvent, and that the trustee would pay a large part of the indebtedness from his own funds, and he having the right as trustee to charge his estate only with the amount actually paid out.

3. Nor is it a defense to such action that such creditor has not rescinded the agreement by which the trustee assumed payment of the outstanding notes, it being shown that he had ample funds of the trust estate for their payment, and that he had in fact, prior to the making of such agreement, taken up the notes with such funds.

4. A demurrer does not confess a conclusion of law pleaded, nor the construction of a written instrument which is set out in terms, with the circumstances surrounding its execution.

5. A conveyance of all the grantor's property recited that it was made to the grantee "in trust, to collect and receive the rents, issues, incomes, and profits thereof, and every part thereof, and to sell and dispose of the same on such terms and prices as he deems best, and to apply the same, and the proceeds thereof, and of the property hereby conveyed, to such purposes and uses as the said [trustee] may, in his judgment, deem best for our joint and several interests." Held, that such instrument did not create a trust in favor of creditors of the grantor, but in favor of the grantor himself.

6. A trust created in writing cannot be varied by subsequent declarations of the trustee.

7. Where the trustee of an estate not held for the benefit of creditors, and who, as trustee, stands in no fiduciary relation to creditors of the grantor in the trust deed, wrongfully obtains money from one of such creditors, such creditor has a right of action therefor against the trustee personally, but not against the trust estate, except to the extent that he can identify the money and trace it to the trust property.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 39 Pac. 49.

Action by Leonide H. Burling and others against Frank G. Newlands and Frederick W. Sharon, as successors of William Sharon, trustee of the estate of William C. Ralston, deceased. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph M. Nougues, for appellants. James M. Allen and Wm. F. Herrin, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action against the trustees of the estate of William Sharon, deceased, to compel an accounting of the trust estate of W. C. Ralston, deceased, of which estate said William Sharon was trustee in his lifetime, and which, it is alleged, has come into the hands of these defendants, as volunteers, and with notice of the trust. In the superior court a demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained without leave further to amend, and judgment thereupon entered in favor of defendants, from which plaintiffs appeal.

The principal ground of demurrer was that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, as we understand, this was the ground upon which it was sustained, and leave to amend refused. It is also the ground upon which the respondents have mainly relied in their oral and printed arguments in this court. It is essential, therefore, to ascertain at the outset what the allegations of the complaint are. The great length of the complaint renders this task somewhat difficult, and the difficulty is enhanced by the manner in which it commingles allegations of fact with legal conclusions, matters of evidence, and inferences not always justified by the facts alleged. I shall endeavor to state the general nature of the case first, and afterwards, in discussing the more specific grounds of the demurrer, to give the full effect of the allegations claimed by defendants to be insufficient.

It is alleged that William Sharon and W. C. Ralston were, for a number of years prior to the death of Ralston, partners under the firm name of William Sharon & Co., and as such jointly interested in various corporations and business enterprises, and owners of large interests in real and personal property. Prior to 1873, Ralston was cashier of the Bank of California at San Francisco, and Sharon its agent at Virginia City, Nev. In July, 1873, Ralston became president of the bank, and Sharon, having removed to San Francisco, became a director. Both prior and subsequent to this time, according to the allegations of the complaint, the affairs of the bank were grossly misconducted by its directors and other officers, and on the 26th day of August, 1875, it failed, and on the next day Ralston was accidentally drowned. Just prior to his death he executed and delivered to Sharon a deed in the following terms: "William C. Ralston to William Sharon. Know all men by these presents: That I, William C. Ralston, of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in consideration of the sum of ——— dollars, gold coin of the United States, to me in hand paid by William Sharon, of the same place, and other good and valuable considerations, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby give, grant, convey, and transfer unto the said William Sharon, his heirs and assigns, all and singular my property, both real and personal, in the city and county of San Francisco, the county of San Mateo, and elsewhere, and wheresoever or howsoever situated, in trust to collect and receive the rents, issues, incomes, and profits thereof, and every part thereof, and to sell and dispose of the same on such terms and prices as he deems best, and to apply the same, and the proceeds thereof, and of the property hereby conveyed, to such purposes and uses as the said William Sharon may, in his judgment, deem best for our joint and several interests. To have and to hold, all and singular, the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said Wm. Sharon, his heirs and assigns, forever. In witness whereof I have, on this twenty-seventh day of August, 1875, hereunto set my hand and seal. [Seal.] W. C. Ralston." It is of the trust created by this deed that the plaintiffs seek an accounting, basing their claim upon the theory that it was an express trust to pay the debts of Ralston, and that their testator and assignor were creditors.

The facts alleged in support of the claim that they were creditors are that Ralston, prior to 1872, employed William Burling, a broker, to borrow money for him to a large amount, Burling giving his own notes to the lenders, and Ralston furnishing the necessary collaterals, consisting principally of stock of the Bank of California, estimated, apparently for the purpose of security, at $100 per share. In 1872, William Burling and James W. Burling became partners under the firm name of Burling & Bro., after which time moneys were procured for Ralston by said firm in the same manner that William Burling had procured them before. When Ralston died there were outstanding notes of this character given by William Burling to the amount of $155,000, and notes of Burling & Bro. to the amount of $1,613,000; in all, $1,768,000; secured to the extent of $1,253,000 by 12,530 shares of the stock of the Bank of California, and to the extent of $515,000, by stocks and bonds of the Spring Valley Water Company and stocks of certain mining companies. Neither of the Burling brothers ever knew or sought to know for whom they were borrowing these moneys. They dealt exclusively with Ralston, and delivered the proceeds of all loans to him, but received from him no evidence of indebtedness. These are all the material facts bearing upon the question whether the Burlings were creditors of Ralston at the date of his death and of the execution of the trust deed to Sharon. The plaintiffs in this action sue as executor and executrix of William Burling, who died in 1877, and as assignee of James W. Burling, who subsequently became an insolvent debtor. The partnership affairs of Burling & Bro. were wound up and settled in 1879. Relief is sought upon the ground of fraud, alleged to have been practiced by Sharon as follows: On the 27th of August, 1875,—the day of the execution of the trust deed and of Ralston's death,—Sharon called on the Burlings for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of their promissory notes outstanding for moneys supplied to Ralston as above detailed, and was furnished with a schedule of the notes and securities. On the following day he called on them again, and informed them that all the shares of the stock of the Bank of California pledged as collateral for their notes were false and fictitious, having been fraudulently overissued by Ralston, and stated that they would be compelled to pay the full amount of all notes so secured. To this they replied, among other things, that they would dispose of the other stocks and bonds deposited as security for the other notes, and, after applying any surplus of their proceeds to the payment of the notes secured by the bank stock, they would pay or settle the deficiency, and resort to the estate of Ralston for the balance of their claims, including their commissions for brokerage, etc. Sharon thereupon informed them that the stock and bonds of the Spring Valley Water Company and of the said mining companies, held as security for the other notes, had been surreptitiously abstracted from the Bank of California by Ralston, and that, as against the owners, they could not be held except as security for the particular notes for which they were pledged. He further assured them that Ralston had died entirely and hopelessly bankrupt, that his estate was of no value, and that they could not expect to be reimbursed therefrom for any considerable part of the money they would be compelled to pay to the holders of their notes. In answer to their inquiry he denied that he was or had ever been a partner of Ralston, and stated that their joint operations had been all closed in which Ralston had beaten and wronged him to the extent of between two and three millions of dollars. He further stated that Ralston had stolen and embezzled almost the entire paid-up capital of the Bank of California, amounting to nearly $5,000,000.

It is to be inferred from the allegations of the complaint, but is not clearly stated, that at the time of this interview the Burlings knew of the trust deed to Sharon, and of its terms, as well as the circumstances surrounding its execution so far as they affected its construction, and their rights under it. Having made these representations as to the amount of Ralston's indebtedness, the condition of his estate, and the criminal practices in which he had been engaged, Sharon proposed to the Burlings that if they would give him $500,000 he would have D. O. Mills join him in assuming and paying their outstanding notes, but if they would not accede to this proposition they would themselves be compelled to pay whatever deficiency might remain after application of the proceeds of the securities (which he represented as generally worthless), and this, as he pointed out to them, would result in their bankruptcy and ruin. All these statements of Sharon were believed by the Burlings to be true. He was a man prominent in business, reputed to be very wealthy, a director of the Bank of California, and fully entitled to credit in such matters. They knew, moreover, that he had been long and intimately associated in business with Ralston, and that no man living had had equal opportunities to learn the true condition of Ralston's affairs, while they themselves had no knowledge of the condition of Ralston's estate, or means of discovering it. They were, therefore, inclined to make the arrangement suggested, but, in order to obtain better terms, carried on a negotiation lasting nearly four months, during which they had frequent interviews with Sharon. During these various interviews he repeated, reiterated, and amplified his original statements, and these statements were indorsed by D. O. Mills, the president of the Bank of California, by its cashier, and by a number of its directors. Induced by their belief in these representations, the Burlings, on the 24th day of December, 1875, finally agreed to pay to Sharon the sum of $200,000, and to assign to him a verified claim against the estate of Ralston for the amount of their outstanding notes, in consideration of which Sharon agreed that he and D. O. Mills would unite in assuming payment of the Burlings' notes, and would relieve them of all liability arising therefrom. In pursuance of this agreement said sum of $200,000 was paid to Sharon on said date as follows: William Burling, on account of his individual notes for $155,000, paid the sum of $17,533.94, and Burling & Bro. on account of the firm notes for $1,613,000, paid the sum of $182,466.06; and they did make and verify claims against the estate of W. C. Ralston for the full amount of all their promissory notes, and assigned the same to Sharon. It is alleged that all the representations of Sharon by which the Burlings were induced to make this payment were false, and made by Sharon with full knowledge of their falsity, for the purpose of defrauding the Burlings out of the sum demanded by Sharon as a condition of his assumption of their obligations. It is alleged that Ralston's individual indebtedness was comparatively small; that he was a partner of Sharon; that the money borrowed through the Burlings was borrowed principally for the firm of William Sharon & Co.; that Sharon was largely indebted to the firm, and liable for most of Ralston's apparent indebtedness; that the firm had assets of great value, and, in short, that during the whole period of the negotiations between Sharon and the Burlings he had in his hands property justly applicable to the payment of Ralston's debts more than sufficient for the purpose. It is further shown that during these negotiations he was also negotiating with the holders of the Burlings' notes, and that before the payment of the said $200,000 he had actually, as trustee of Ralston, and out of the proceeds of his trust estate, paid off or compromised and settled the last dollar of their said indebtedness, and had had assigned to him all of said notes, with their securities; so that without their knowledge they were, at the date of said payment, absolutely free from the liability from which they were seeking relief.

These are in general terms the facts constituting the fraud alleged to have been consummated by Sharon on the 24th day of December, 1875, on account of which the plaintiffs are seeking relief in this action. But the action was not commenced until October, 1886, nearly 11 years after the cause of action arose, and a large part of the complaint is composed of allegations excusing the failure of the Burlings and their successors to make an earlier discovery of the fraud, and thereby to escape the effect of the statute of limitations and the doctrine of laches. The substance of the general allegations under this head is that neither William nor James W. Burling, nor their successors and representatives, the plaintiffs in this action, ever had any knowledge of the falsity of Sharon's representations, or of any fact to arouse their suspicions, or put them upon inquiry, or supplying any clue to the ascertainment of the truth, until within one year prior to the commencement of the action; that Sharon continued from the date of the settlement of their indebtedness until the day of his death, in November, 1885, by active misrepresentation, and by suppression and concealment of books, documents, and other evidence to lull their suspicions, and to make it impossible for them to discover the true condition of Ralston's estate, and the actual extent of his liabilities. In support of these general averments the plaintiffs detail the discoveries that they have made, the manner in which they were made, and the reasons they were not made sooner.

In order to charge these defendants it is alleged that Sharon, in his lifetime, conveyed all his property to them in trust, to collect the income, pay his debts, and afterwards to distribute, first the income, and finally the body of the estate, to his children and certain other beneficiaries designated in the deed; that under said conveyance the defendants have taken into their possession as part of the Sharon estate a surplus of some millions, belonging to the trust estate of Ralston, which they hold upon the same trust with which it was charged in the hands of Sharon. The prayer is for an accounting of the Ralston estate, and for a decree that defendants pay to the plaintiff out of any surplus thereof the sum of $200,000, with interest from December, 1875. The theory of plaintiffs' action, as disclosed by the whole frame and tenor of their complaint, as well as by the repeated declarations of counsel in the course of the argument, is simply this: That on the 27th day of August, 1875, they were creditors of Ralston in the sum of $1,768,000, and so continued until December 24, 1875; that by Ralston's deed to Sharon of August 27, 1875, all of Ralston's estate was transferred to Sharon for the benefit of Ralston's creditors, or, in other words, that Sharon, by accepting the deed and transfer, became the trustee of an express trust, of which all of Ralston's creditors, including William and James Burling, were the beneficiaries with a vested interest in the trust estate; that their claims to the extent of $200,000, with interest from December 24, 1875, remain unpaid, and therefore that they are entitled to an accounting by the successors of Sharon in the trust, and to full payment out of the trust funds remaining in the hands of the trustees, if sufficient for that purpose, and, if not sufficient, then to a payment pro rata as far as the fund will go. The soundness of this theory, and the validity of the claims based upon it, are contested at every point.

In the first place, it is contended that it does not appear from the complaint that the Burlings were creditors of Ralston when his trust deed was executed, while it does appear that, if they were creditors in any sense at that time, they ceased to be such on the 24th day of December, 1875, when they assigned their claims to Sharon. This contention cannot be upheld. There can be no doubt that the Burlings were creditors of Ralston. They dealt with him alone, and he did not assume to be acting as agent for any other person. The credit was given to him, and when the Burlings advanced him money at his request a promise to repay it was implied, if not made in express terms. They were creditors to the amount of their advances, and their advances equaled the amount of their notes. This would be true independent of any provisions of the Code, and is clearly so under its definition of debtor and creditor. Civ. Code, §§ 3429, 3430. Nor did the Burlings cease to be creditors by reason of their assignment to Sharon, for they have a right to repudiate an assignment procured by fraud. Still less did the settlement of their notes, and the extinguishment of their liability on that account, destroy their status as creditors, for they contributed $200,000 towards the payment of their notes; and the fact that the notes had already been paid, which was concealed from them, and purposely concealed in order to induce them to make the payment, cannot be used to their disadvantage by Sharon or his successors in the trust. The effect of the transaction as to them was just the same as if they had themselves paid their notes to the extent of $200,000; and the advantage to Ralston's estate was even greater, for it appears that Sharon was able to settle the notes at a considerable discount, and that he used the $200,000 contributed by the Burlings to pay off and extinguish mortgages and other liens upon Ralston's property. For the purpose of the argument upon this point counsel assume, and I am assuming, that Ralston's deed created a trust for the benefit of his creditors, and that Sharon was not only his trustee, but a trustee of all his creditors. This being so, the Burlings had a right to deal with him on the credit of the trust estate. If they paid their notes directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, they had an undoubted right to look to the trust estate for reimbursement; and if they were induced by a fraud of the trustee, practiced for the benefit of the trust estate, to part with their claims against it, they had a right, upon discovery of the fraud, to reassert their claims, and were not compelled to rely upon the personal liability of the trustee for his deceit. If they had known, what is now alleged to be the fact, that Ralston's estate was ample for the payment of all his debts, undoubtedly they would have looked to it for reimbursement. Being induced by a fraudulent concealment of that fact, and of the fact that their notes had been already taken up, to part with $200,000,—which went into the trust fund,—the course they then pursued in consequence of that fraud ought not to shut them out from any benefit they would have enjoyed if the deception had not been practiced. The fact that Sharon and his estate have always been amply sufficient to respond to a personal claim against him for the $200,000, which he induced the Burlings to pay, can make no difference. The right of the plaintiffs in the trust fund and the rule of law is the same as if Sharon had been a man of no means or insolvent.

Another point made by respondents in support of their general demurrer is that the plaintiffs are not entitled to equitable relief, because they do not come into court with clean hands. It is contended that by making out and assigning to Sharon a verified claim against Ralston's estate for the whole amount of their notes they entered into a deliberate conspiracy with Sharon to defraud the estate of Ralston out of the value of the collaterals pledged by him as security for those notes and of all the money saved in the settlement with their creditors. But this, it seems to me, is putting a wrong construction on that transaction. If the notes were paid according to the understanding upon which the Burlings advanced their $200,000, the collaterals would be taken up by Sharon, and would go back into the Ralston estate so far as they were originally his property,—that is to say, Sharon would be accountable to the estate for them; and therefore the estate was entitled to no deduction on that account from the amount of the Burlings' notes, and whoever paid them would have a rightful claim against the trust estate for the amount paid. The understanding was that they were to be paid, not bought in at a discount, and they were to be paid by Sharon for the Burlings, who, in consideration that Sharon was to furnish over a million and a half of dollars for their protection, agreed to assign the entire claim to him. The result was that the estate got back all its securities, and was charged no more than it owed. In only one respect can it be said that the estate was to be defrauded. A trustee cannot make a profit out of his trust. He cannot speculate upon the trust estate, and so Sharon, if he had paid the Burlings' notes in full, could not, in any event, have made a charge against the estate of the whole sum, because $200,000 of it had been contributed by the Burlings. It may be said that they, by putting in a verified claim for the whole amount of their notes, were helping him to make that $200,000 for himself out of the trust estate. But he could only make money in that way out of a solvent estate, and the understanding upon which they made the payment was that the estate was utterly insolvent, and that Sharon was going to advance most of the money to pay their notes out of his own pocket, so that by making a claim for the full amount of their notes, and assigning it to him, he would get a dividend of less amount than his advances. In this view of the transaction, it does not seem that they were attempting any fraud upon Ralston's estate. If carried out according to their understanding and intention, the estate was to get back all its collaterals; it was to be charged no more than Ralston was actually liable for; both the Burlings and Sharon were to be heavy losers, and other creditors were to suffer no prejudice in the dividend.

It is further contended in support of the general demurrer that the Burlings could not retract their assignment to Sharon and regain the position of creditors of Ralston's estate without a rescission of the contract by which Sharon assumed and paid their notes; that they cannot rescind without putting him in statu quo; and that they not only have not restored or offered to restore him to his former position, but they cannot possibly do so. It is a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that on the case made by the complaint there was nothing to be restored to Sharon. In paying the Burlings' notes he simply discharged his duty as trustee, and they were all settled before he received the $200,000. He therefore received that sum without parting with anything. What, under these circumstances, were the Burlings to tender back as a condition of reclaiming their $200,000? Upon the assumption of the creation of an express trust for the benefit of Ralston's creditors by his deed to Sharon (upon which the argument has thus far been considered), and aside from the question of laches or the statute of limitations, there is not, in my opinion, any failure to state a cause of action. But was there such a trust? As to this proposition, which is fundamental to the case, we have been favored with very little argument by counsel for appellants. In their opening brief they content themselves with saying: "That Sharon was a trustee of an express trust, and that William and James W. Burling and the firm of Burling Brothers were beneficiaries thereof is admitted. The deed to Sharon and his declarations thereunder place beyond discussion this proposition." And in the subsequent course of the argument the same declaration has been repeated again and again. But counsel for respondents contend that there never was any express trust in favor of creditors, and that neither of the Burlings has ever had any interest in the trust estate by virtue of the trust deed or any declaration of Sharon made thereunder. The mistake of counsel for appellants in treating this as a conceded proposition seems to have arisen in part from his notion that the repeated allegations in the complaint that Sharon was such a trustee and the Burlings such beneficiaries were confessed by the demurrer. But a demurrer does not confess a conclusion of law or the construction of a written instrument, which is set out in terms, together with the circumstances surrounding its execution. As to these matters the court looks to the terms of the instrument and the facts alleged, and draws its own conclusions and places its own construction. Now, here a reference to the terms of Ralston's deed above set forth will show that it does not mention either of the Burlings by name, or the creditors of Ralston as a class. Looking to its terms alone, no one could infer that Ralston had a thought of creditors in his mind. But the circumstances by which he was surrounded give a clue to his motives, and they may be resorted to for the purpose of determining what his intentions were. What, then, is the intention which they disclose? In my opinion, they add nothing to the intention manifested by the deed itself, and that is an intention on the part of Ralston to create a trust for his own benefit. He was, according to the theory of the complaint, the possessor of an ample fortune, more than sufficient to pay all his debts. He was president of a bank which had just failed as a consequence of his mismanagement, but he had not been guilty of the criminal practices alleged by Sharon, and there was no reason why he should take his own life. In fact he did not do so, for it is alleged that his death, following upon the heels of the bank's failure, was accidental. But he was deeply in debt, and his affairs generally were in such a condition that he felt unable to extricate himself from the difficulties by which he was surrounded. In this situation he turned to his friend and business associate, a man of large fortune and available means, who, on account of their joint interests, would have the strongest motives to prevent a sacrifice of his property to the sudden demands of his creditors. To him he said in effect: "Here is all I have Take it, and deal with it in the best manner you can, according to your judgment, for the protection of our joint interests and of my several interest." Of course, it was incidental to the execution of such a trust that Ralston's creditors should be dealt with and satisfied, because otherwise they would exercise their right to set aside the conveyance; but they did not for that reason acquire a vested interest in the estate, which was in no manner charged with the payment of their claims, either in full or pro rata. Sharon, under the authority conferred, had a right to make any terms of composition or settlement with Ralston's creditors that he could secure, and in so doing he dealt with them at arm's length, for Ralston's deed did not, by its terms, or by the circumstances of its execution, make Sharon their fiduciary, and it does not appear that in dealing with the Burlings or other creditors he made any declarations or representations to the effect that he was charged with any duty as to them. As to this point counsel for appellants, at the close of the oral argument upon the rehearing, asked and obtained leave to file authorities in support of his proposition that the Burlings were beneficiaries of an express trust, but he has failed to produce any that are in point. He cites the provisions of the Civil Code relative to voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors. Section 3449 et seq. But it is clear that they have no application. The assignment did not purport to be for the benefit of creditors, and no inventory or schedule was ever filed. There was never a pretense at any time or by any person that this was an assignment under the statute, and the Burlings especially did not treat it or rely upon it as such.

Considered without reference to the statute, and in the absence of any citation of decided cases or text writers, it would seem to be sufficient to quote the language of Prof. Pomeroy in his discussion of the question as to what words or dispositions are sufficient to create a trust: "No precise form of words is necessary to create a trust, but the intention must be clear. The fact that a trust of lands is created must not only be manifested and proved by a writing properly executed, but it must also be manifested and proved by such a writing what the trust is. The declaration of trust, whether written or oral, must be reasonably certain in its material terms, and this requisite of certainty includes the subject-matter or property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries or persons in whose behalf it was created, the nature and quantity of the interests which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust is left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1009. In view of this doctrine there seems to be no foundation for the claim that Ralston's deed created a trust for creditors, though it did undoubtedly create a trust for Ralston. It empowered Sharon to sell and dispose of the property for his benefit, to advance money to prevent it from being sacrificed, and generally to deal with it as if it were his own; but Sharon was bound to restore the surplus to Ralston on his demand, and to account to him for the entire estate. If this was the effect of the deed according to its terms, how was it changed by Sharon's subsequent declarations? These declarations are referred to in various parts of the complaint, but never set forth in any definite form. The most direct and certain averment as to what they were is found at folio 1040 of the record, where it is alleged that Sharon declared in writing "that said deed of conveyance was intended by said W. C. Ralston to create a trust for the payment of his debts." In another connection Sharon's declarations in writing, though not directly averred, are set forth in greater detail as follows: "That said Sharon intended to do with the estate of said Ralston, so conveyed to him, as if said Ralston had lived, namely, to cover existing and contingent indebtedness of said Ralston to him, said Sharon, and to secure himself on any deficiency that he might suffer in settling the debts and liabilities of the said Ralston, and to secure said Ralston's proportion in certain joint ventures in which said Ralston and he were associated together, and to pay the debts of said Ralston as far as the estate would pay the same, and to compromise and settle as far as possible all claims existing against it. Whatever might be left after payment and settlement of said debts of said Ralston would be accounted tor to the sole legatee and beneficiary of said W. C. Ralston, his widow; and that whatever benefit could be derived from said estate for said widow from his, said Sharon's, careful administration thereof, would be so divided for her benefit." These declarations are perfectly consistent with the deed as above construed. The deed certainly did create a trust, and one of the objects of its creation and a necessary incident to its execution was payment or settlement of Ralston's debts; but the sole beneficiary was Ralston, and after his death his widow. The creditors did not become beneficiaries with a vested interest in the estate merely because, as an incident to the execution of the trust, their claims must be settled. But, even if these declarations had been more certain and definite than they were to the effect that the trust was for the benefit of the creditors, they must have been ineffectual, because this trust was created by a deed executed by the owner of the property, and the rule is that a trust created in writing cannot be varied by a subsequent declaration of the trustee. Perry, Trusts, § 86. If Ralston, by his deed, made himself and his successors sole beneficiaries of the trust, Sharon could not vest an interest in the estate in other beneficiaries of his own selection. My conclusion is that neither by the trust deed nor by Sharon's declarations did the Burlings become beneficiaries of the Ralston trust, with such an interest in the trust estate as entitled them to demand an accounting of the trustees. It is not clear, from the argument of appellant's counsel, that he relies upon the use of the $200,000 obtained from the Burlings to clear off the liens upon the trust estate as a fact constituting the Burlings beneficiaries. He cites no authority to sustain such a claim, and the authorities cited by respondents are against him. The $200,000 is not earmarked or followed into any property in the hands of the trustees; and, although used for the benefit of the trust estate, there was no agreement that it should constitute a lien, and without such agreement by the trustee there could be no lien. New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127, and cases cited.

This disposes of all the grounds relied upon by counsel to establish an express trust of the Ralston estate for the benefit of the Burlings, and it remains only to notice some general arguments in support of the sufficiency of the complaint.

It is much insisted upon that the allegations confessed by the demurrer disclose a case of gross fraud practiced upon William and James W. Burling, for which a court of equity should be eager to afford relief. This is entirely true. Accepting the complaint as a correct statement of the facts, it appears that William Sharon did defraud the Burlings of $200,000, for the recovery of which I have no doubt a cause or causes of action accrued to them immediately upon the payment of the money. But it was a cause of action against Sharon personally, and against the $200,000 so far as it could be traced and identified, and no further. As no facts are alleged by which that money could be traced into any specific property now in the hands of these defendants as trustees either of Ralston or of Sharon, the claim of plaintiffs has become a mere personal demand against Sharon, enforceable like other claims of the same character. This, it seems to me, constituted the cause or causes of action, and the only causes of action which the plaintiffs had when this suit, based upon an entirely different theory, and claiming different relief, was commenced. All that is sought here is an accounting of the Ralston estate, and payment out of that fund, while the facts disclose no right to such accounting or payment in that mode, but only a claim or claims against Sharon's representatives. This, however, is not an action against Sharon's representatives; for, although the defendants are designated in the title of the complaint as trustees of William Sharon, all its allegations, its frame and theory, not to mention the repeated declarations and disclaimers of counsel throughout the argument, demonstrate that they are sued, and that the intention is to charge them, not as representatives of Sharon, but as trustees of W. C. Ralston's estate. In that capacity they are clearly not liable. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss the question of laches or the bar of the statute of limitations, for, irrespective of those questions, it must be held that the demurrer was properly sustained.

Appellants have made no point in the argument upon the refusal of leave to amend, probably for the reason that they have never specified, either in the superior court or in this court, any amendment that they could make or that they desired to make. In the absence of such a specification, it cannot be held that the superior court abused its discretion in denying leave to amend. Martin v. Thompson, 62 Cal. 619. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance. I also concur in the conclusion that the deed from Ralston to Sharon did not create a trust in favor of Ralston's creditors, and the only action which the Burlings had, if any, was against Sharon personally. In this view it is not important whether or not the Burlings were creditors of Ralston. Upon the question of the statute of limitations and laches I adhere to my former opinion (39 Pac. 49), as follows: "Moreover, we think that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, and is stale from laches. Of course, the statutory period has run two or three times, unless the case is saved by the clause of section 338, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that in an action based upon alleged fraud the statute does not commence to run until the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud. This action is founded upon the contract between the Burlings and William Sharon, made on December 24, 1875, which was an executed contract; and the statute commenced to run on that day, except so far as its running was delayed by a want of knowledge of the fraud by which said contract is alleged to have been procured. But 'the means of knowledge are the same thing, in effect, as knowledge itself' (Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 143), and one who makes a charge of fraud, for the first time, many years after its alleged perpetration, must show that within a reasonable time he has used due diligence to discover it, has followed up circumstances which would have put a prudent man upon inquiry, and has not slept upon his rights until the lapse of time and the death of parties charged with the fraud have destroyed the means of a full, fair, and satisfactory investigation in a court of justice. Moreover, in such a case the complaint must state facts from which it will appear to the court that ordinary prudence could not have discovered the fraud within the statutory period. 'The circumstances of the discovery must be fully stated and proved, and the delay which has occurred must be shown to be consistent with the requisite diligence.' Wood v. Carpenter, supra. Statutes of limitation are in great part founded upon the probability that during the course of many years witnesses will die, and recollections of events long past will become indistinct in the memories of the living. In the case at bar sufficient facts are not stated to show that the alleged fraud could not, with requisite diligence, have been sooner discovered. There was great opportunity for discovering the fraud, if any such existed, before the contract between the Burlings and William Sharon was made. That contract was not made in a hurry. Sharon's representations, alleged now to have been false, were not immediately accepted as true, and promptly acted upon. Negotiations were continued for four months. Ralston, as appears from the complaint, was widely known in business circles, and had been accredited with great wealth. It is averred in the complaint that he was perfectly solvent, and that he had real and personal property, which passed to Sharon under the deed, of the aggregate value of $9,000,000. It is averred, also, that he had real property of the value of $6,000,000. If that was the fact, and the Burlings really had a legal claim against Ralston, it is almost beyond comprehension why they did not discover it, if not before the $200,000 contract, at least before the death of William Burling, or before the lapse of the statutory period of limitation. The slightest examination of public records would have put them on the trial of the fact. It does not appear that they demanded an examination of the books, papers, etc., of Ralston. But no discovery was made, and it does not appear that any reasonable efforts were made for a discovery of the alleged facts upon which this action rests until ten years after the date of the contract, and until after the death of said William Sharon. And it is averred that then 'the means by which they obtained any information was by inquiring among their friends and acquaintances whether they, said persons, had any information relating to the dealings of said Sharon with said trust estate, and whether they had any information regarding the property which was conveyed by said Ralston to said Sharon in trust, as aforesaid.' But such means were always within the power of appellants and the Burlings; and there are no sufficient facts alleged to show that the delay is 'consistent with the required diligence.' See Ang. Lim. §§ 187, 190; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88; Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. 670. Moreover, apart from the question of strict statutory limitation, the claim of appellants is too stale to be enforced in a court of equity. 'No rule of law is better settled than that a court of equity will not aid a party whose application is destitute of conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence, but will discourage stale demands, for the peace of society, by refusing to interfere when there has been gross laches in prosecuting rights, or where long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights has accrued. The rule is peculiarly applicable where the difficulty of doing entire justice arises through the death of the principal participants in the transactions complained of, or of the witness or witnesses, or by reason of the original transaction having become so obscured by time as to render the ascertainment of the exact facts impossible.' Hammond v. Hopkins, 143 U. S. 250, 12 Sup. Ct. 418. In speaking of this rule this court, in Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 288, 14 Pac. 791, said: 'It is a material circumstance that the claim was not made until after the death of those who could have explained the transaction.' In the case at bar William Burling and William Sharon, 'the principal participants in the transactions complained of,' were both dead before the commencement of the action. It is quite apparent that no court could do 'entire justice' in the premises without the testimony of William Sharon. Of course, if the suit had been commenced within a reasonable time, and William Sharon had died before his testimony could have been taken, the want of his testimony would simply have been one of those natural misfortunes which sometimes come to litigants. But William Sharon lived for 10 years after the transaction complained of. William Burling died two years after the transaction, fully satisfied—as is averred—that it was a fair one. James W. Burling did business for several years afterwards, and until he became an insolvent was also satisfied with the fairness of the transaction. There was perfect acquiescence by all parties for ten years and while Sharon lived. It was not until he died, and his testimony was forever beyond human reach, that the claim of appellants grew up and took the form of a suit against his successors. It is a claim which equity should not now entertain."

BRADFORD v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 126.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — EQUITY — ENJOINING CREATION OF INDEBTEDNESS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—POWER OF MUNICIPAL OFFICERS.

1. In a proper case, where it is shown that the municipal officers are about to create an illegal indebtedness against the corporation, and to levy and collect a tax for the payment thereof, such acts may be restrained at the suit of a taxpayer.

2. Under Const. art. 11, § 18, as amended in 1892, providing that no municipal corporation, county, or township "shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof," when the revenue of a city necessary for a given year has been determined, and such revenue collected and expended before the expiration of the fiscal year, the city officers cannot, even for the purpose of providing for the pressing wants of the municipality during the residue of such year, incur liabilities to be met from the revenues of a subsequent year.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court of city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Wallace Bradford against the city and county of San Francisco and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Maurice S. Woodhams, for appellant. Rhodes & Rhodes and McKinstry & McKinstry, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought May 14, 1895, to enjoin the defendants, as supervisors and as auditor and treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, from incurring any indebtedness or expenses against said city and county during the months of May and June, 1895, whereby there shall be a deficiency in the income and revenue of said city and county provided for the fiscal year of 1894–95, and from ordering any supplies or materials for said city and county for its maintenance, or any department thereof, whereby there shall be created an indebtedness in excess of the revenue and income provided for said city and county government for said fiscal year 1894–95, and that the board of supervisors be perpetually enjoined from levying any tax, or making any provision for raising any money, for the payment of such deficiency out of the public funds provided for the fiscal year 1895–96, etc.

Defendants interposed a demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained by the court, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered in favor of defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

There is no necessity for a detailed statement of the allegations of the complaint. It sets forth clearly and in detail that the defendants, composing the board of supervisors, prior to the commencement of the fiscal year 1894–95 made an estimate, as by law required, of the revenues necessary to maintain the municipal government during said fiscal year; that in due time they levied a property tax to raise the revenue so necessary; that, by reason of underestimating the necessary expenses and overestimating the revenue to be derived from all sources, the funds of the city for said fiscal year were practically exhausted on the 1st of May, 1895, with salaries of the officers for the city and county for the months of May and June of said fiscal year, amounting to $280,000, to be paid, and the expenses of the various departments of the municipal government, all of which are set out in detail, to be met, which will leave a deficit at the end of the fiscal year of about $350,000; that the city and county has already incurred debts and liabilities in excess of the income and revenue provided for the fiscal year in the sum of about $205,000. Under these circumstances, the board of supervisors is actively engaged in purchasing and securing the necessary supplies and services for the various departments of the city government during the remaining two months of the fiscal year, and, unless restrained, will do so; and, as an inducement to persons who may furnish services and supplies, they, in concert with the other defendants, viz. William Broderick, who is auditor, and James H. Widber, who is treasurer, are promising and intend, and, unless restrained, will levy a tax for the fiscal year 1895–96 sufficient to pay for all supplies furnished and services rendered during the fiscal year 1894–95; that the auditor will audit, and the treasurer will pay, the claims and demands so illegally contracted and incurred, etc., all of which is claimed to be in violation of section 18, art. 11, of the constitution.

The assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the city and county has not been sought or had warranting such expenditure. Section 18, art. 11, of our state constitution, as amended in 1892, reads as follows: "No county, city, town, township, board of education or school district shall incur any indebtedness or liability, in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose, nor unless, before or at the time of incurring such indebtedness, provision shall be made for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also provision to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof on or before maturity, which shall not exceed forty years from the time of contracting the same. Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision shall be void." The original section was precisely the same as the amendment, except that it required the principal of indebtedness contracted under it to be paid within "twenty years," whereas the amendment provides that it "shall not exceed forty years from the time of contracting the same."

A preliminary question is presented by the case as made by the complaint, which, although not urged by counsel, needs to be met at the outset of our deliberations. It is this: Will an injunction lie to prevent municipal authorities from levying and collecting an illegal tax? In Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 171. it was held by this court that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a board of supervisors from incurring liabilities which are not a legal charge against the county. The groundwork of the decision, as enunciated by the learned judge who prepared the opinion, may be said to be: (1) If claims not legally chargeable to the county are allowed, neither the allowance, nor the warrants drawn therefor, create any legal liabilities. (2) If such illegal claims are allowed by the board of supervisors against the county, it will be the duty of the auditor to refuse to draw warrants therefor; and, should he do so, it will become the duty of the treasurer to refuse to pay them. (3) The presumption is, in the absence of allegations to the contrary, that these officers will faithfully discharge their duty in the premises. The same doctrine was maintained upon a similar state of facts, and for like reasons, in Merriam v. Board of Sup'rs, 72 Cal. 517, 14 Pac. 137. The causes for which courts of equity will grant injunctions are assignable to well-known heads. Among these are fraud, breach of trust, multiplicity of suits, inadequacy of the ordinary remedies at law, etc. To entitle a party to relief in equity, he must bring his case under some acknowledged head of equity jurisdiction. In the cases cited above, nothing of this kind was done. The complainants showed an apprehended violation of law on the part of the board of supervisors, but that alone is not sufficient. They failed to show that injury to them of any kind would follow as a legal sequence of such violation of duty.

The case at bar may be differentiated from those mentioned in the following particulars: Here, the presumption that the auditor and treasurer will do their duty, and refuse to audit and pay the illegal demands, is negatived by the express averments of the complaint, which, for all the purposes of this case, are to be taken as true. Here, the illegal tax will be levied and collected, and will become a lien upon the real property of the plaintiff, and is liable to cast a cloud upon the title thereof. Here, the tax, when levied and collected, will cause such an intermingling of the lawful tax with the unlawful that it will be impossible to segregate them, and hence no action to stay the collection of the tax, or to recover back the money unlawfully exacted, can be maintained. Even if money thus paid could be recovered, it would give rise to a multiplicity of suits, which it is an object of equity to avoid. To refuse plaintiff relief here is but to lay the foundation later on, when the tax is levied, for saying to him that, the tax being fair on its face, and there being no constitutional or statutory inhibition as to the extent of the levy, the amount or rate thereof is in the discretion of the board of supervisors, and courts never interfere by injunction with the exercise of discretion by municipal officers. Where a tax is levied for a specific object, and is upon its face in excess of the jurisdiction of the board or officer making the levy, and hence void, the matter can be reached by a writ of certiorari (review). But it is apparent at a glance that no such relief can be had in a case like the present, for the want of such illegality appearing on the face of the record.

We are of opinion that there is nothing in the cases of Linden v. Case and Merriam v. Board of Sup'rs which militates against the right to an injunction in the case at bar.

The question still remains: Will a court of equity restrain the levy and collection of an illegal municipal tax at the suit of a taxpayer and property holder? The authorities on the subject are not uniform, but, upon an examination of a large number of the adjudicated cases, we think the preponderance in number and reason is overwhelmingly in favor of the affirmative of the proposition. Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, treats the subject at length (sections 914–925, 4th Ed.), and reaches substantially the conclusion of the supreme court of the United States declared in Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 601, in which it was said by Mr. Justice Field that, "of the right of resident taxpayers to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to prevent an illegal disposition of the moneys of the county, or the illegal creation of a debt which they, in common with other property holders of the county, may otherwise be compelled to pay, there is at this day no serious question. The right has been recognized by the state courts in numerous cases; and, from the nature of the powers exercised by municipal corporations, the great danger of their abuse, and the necessity of prompt action to prevent irremediable injuries, it would seem eminently proper for courts of equity to interfere, upon the application of the taxpayers of a county, to prevent the consummation of a wrong, when the officers of these corporations assume, in excess of their powers, to create burdens upon property holders. Certainly, in the absence of legislation restricting the right to interfere in such cases to public officers of the state or county, there would seem to be no substantial reason why a bill by or on behalf of individual taxpayers should not be entertained to prevent the misuse of corporate power. The courts may be safely trusted to prevent the abuse of their process in such cases."

The trend of nearly all the later cases is in the same direction. Bayle v. City of New Orleans (1885) 23 Fed. 843; Harrington v. Town of Plainview, 27 Minn. 224, 6 N. W. 777; Willard v. Comstock, 58 Wis. 565, 17 N. W. 401; Scott v. Alexander, 23 S. C. 120; City of Richmond v. Crenshaw, 76 Va. 936; Sackett v. City of New Albany, 88 Ind. 473; Butler v. Detroit, 43 Mich. 552, 5 N. W. 1078; Robertson v. Breedlove, 61 Tex. 316. See Dill. Mun. Corp., supra, where the cases are collected. We conclude, then, that in a proper case municipal officers may, at the instance of a taxpayer, be restrained from contracting illegal debts, and from levying and collecting taxes for the payment thereof, and from enforcing the payment of such taxes.

This brings us to the consideration of the merits of the case at bar. The question presented seems a fairly plain one, and is approached only with that solicitude which follows from a realization of the momentous consequences flowing from its determination. The question, briefly stated, is this: When the revenue of the city and county necessary for a given year has been determined, such revenue collected and expended before the expiration of the fiscal year, can the city officers, for the purpose of providing for the pressing wants of the municipality during the residue of such year, incur debts and liabilities, to be met and discharged from the revenues of a subsequent year? A question somewhat similar in principle arose under the constitution of 1849, which inhibited the legislature from creating any debt in any way (except for the purposes and in the manner therein provided), which should, in the aggregate with previous debts and liabilities of the state, exceed $300,000. The legislature appropriated money which, with the debt due and owing, constituted an indebtedness in excess of $300,000. And in People v. Johnson, 6 Cal. 499, the supreme court held that the attempted appropriation was in conflict with the constitutional provision, and void. It was urged there, as here, that if the constitutional restriction be rigidly enforced, a contingency may arise in which the wheels of government must stop, for want of necessary funds to keep them in operation. The court held, however, that the language of the article there quoted "is too clear and explicit to admit of but one interpretation," and added: "In fact, it would defy the ingenuity of the most subtle intellect to invent a consistent interpretation, other than that which naturally suggests itself from the words of the article," etc. We take much the same view of the section of our constitution quoted above. It is couched in language so plain and explicit as not to be misunderstood, or to leave room for judicial interpretation or other inference than that naturally and irresistibly deducible therefrom. The palpable object of the provision was and is to confine municipal expenditures for each year to the income and revenue of such year, save only in the cases where two-thirds of the qualified electors shall determine, as in the section provided. It places a limit—a check—upon the power of municipal officers to expend money beyond the resources provided for the current year. It is a residuum of power vested in the electors, to be used by them in case of emergency calling for its exercise. The motive which may influence municipal officers to impose a low rate of taxation, so soothing to the taxpayer, and to indulge in the practice of expending large sums of the people's money (a practice always popular with the recipients of public funds), is easily comprehended. To thwart the possibility of such a course may have been an object of the framers of our constitution. Be that as it may, one thing is certain: for causes which seemed good to the framers of our fundamental law, a barrier against indebtedness by municipal officers and local bodies has been created by the constitution. The door has been locked against all indebtedness of these local bodies, and the key placed in the hands of the electors, who alone can use it, and the judiciary may not arrogate to itself the power to undo what has been thus solemnly done. The wisdom or folly of the constitutional provision cannot, in a plain case, furnish us with a factor in the problem for solution. Where the matter is clouded in doubt and uncertainty, such considerations may aid in its solution. We perceive no cause to doubt the object of the provision, or to draw but a single inference from the language used to express the legislative will as contained in section 18.

Counsel for respondent contend with much acumen that the city and county government, having been organized pursuant to law, divided into various departments, and the duty of maintaining those departments devolved upon the supervisors by statutes and ordinances enacted prior to the commencement of the fiscal year 1894-95, no discretion is now vested in the board, and that their plain and manifest duty is to provide those supplies and services, without which the city government cannot exist as an active entity, the disastrous consequence of which is vividly portrayed. We answer this argument by saying the duty of the board of supervisors is, or may be, twofold: First, to provide the funds and revenue to support the government; second, to expend them for such support. The former is the predicate of the latter, without the performance of which primary duty no duty to expend the revenues can arise until the electors shall have authorized such expenditure by a two-thirds vote, etc. It seems to us like a solecism to say that the duty to contract debts and liabilities on behalf of the city exists in a case where the constitution expressly inhibits it. It is true that in Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 Pac. 1128, it was held that the payment of the salary of a public officer, whose office has been created and salary fixed by a law of the state, is not within the prohibition of section 18, art. 11, which section it was held refers only to indebtedness or liability incurred by the act or conduct of the municipal body. It will be observed that the constitutional inhibition runs, not against the legislature of the state, but against the cities, towns, etc., against the several local governments enumerated. If, therefore, the legislature shall create offices and fix the salaries to be paid to them from the local treasuries, or devolve other indebtedness or liabilities upon the city within its legislative power, and without their volition, it only remains for the municipal authorities to comply with such laws of the state. The debts and liabilities of which complaint is made in the case at bar are but the ordinary debts created by the municipality itself, and are of the kind which must be paid out of the revenues of the current year, or the constitutional provision is meaningless.

We think the whole question involved is met and decided in favor of appellant in Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641; Shaw v. Statler, 74 Cal. 258, 15 Pac. 833; Schwartz v. Wilson, 75 Cal. 502, 17 Pac. 449; and McBean v. City of Fresno (Cal.) 44 Pac. 358. Inasmuch as there was no injunction granted in the case, and as the fiscal year during which the threatened tax was to be levied and collected has passed, it is highly probable the case has ceased to be important. The principle, however, still remains, and this, together with the question of costs, has been regarded as of sufficient importance to demand a determination in brief form.

We are of opinion the complaint states a cause of action, and entitles the plaintiff to the relief demanded. We therefore recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer, with leave to defendants to answer.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer, with leave to defendants to answer.

HELLMAN v. SHOULTERS, City Treasurer, et al. (L. A. 8.)[1]

STREET IMPROVEMENTS — BONDS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — STATUTES — TITLES — AMENDMENT — REPEAL—PROOF OF NOTICE—RESOLUTION OF CITY COUNCIL—PUBLICATION—CONTRACTS.

1. Act March 17, 1891, amending Act March 18, 1885, relative to work on streets, does not deprive one of liberty or property without due process of law, because providing that the city council may, in its discretion, determine that if the cost of improvement be more than a certain amount per front foot, where more than a certain amount of assessment against a lot remains unpaid a certain time after notice, a bond running for not more than 10 years, payable in equal annual installments, with interest at not more than 10 per cent. per annum, shall be issued by the city, representing the amount of assessment against the lot unpaid, with the city as obligor, but payable only out of the fund created by the assessment, or, in case of failure of the lot owner to make payment to the city, enforceable against the lot in the manner provided for delinquent taxes.

2. Act March 17, 1891, entitled an "Act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for work on streets within municipalities, approved March 18, 1885,'" is general, because applying to all cities of certain classes, and is uniform, though giving city councils discretion, under certain circumstances, to issue bonds, to represent assessments for improvements, bearing interest not exceeding 10 per cent. per annum.

3. The delegation of power to city councils by Act March 17, 1891, to determine between certain alternative methods for payment of assessments for municipal improvements, is authorized by the provision of the constitution authorizing and directing the legislature to provide for municipal corporations.

4. Act March 17, 1891, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for work on streets within municipalities, approved March 18, 1885,'" by adding thereto an additional part, consisting of certain sections, relative to a system of street-improvement bonds, has expressed in its title but one subject, namely, a system of street-improvement bonds.

5. Such act sufficiently expresses in its title its subject, though the title does not go into the details of the act.

6. Such act, though giving only the sections added, does not violate Const. art. 4, § 24, declaring that "no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title, but in each case the act revised or sections amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended"; the old act being amended only by implication, in that the new act authorizes, in certain cases, the adoption of an alternative procedure, and the inhibition having no reference to amendments by implication.

7. Act March 17, 1891, adding to Act March 18, 1885, relative to work on streets in cities, and consisting of 37 sections, a part relative to a system of street-improvement bonds, consisting of sections 38 to 44, inclusive, is not repealed by Act March 31, 1891, which amended, by re-enacting and publishing in full, certain of the 37 sections of the act of 1885 as amended by St. 1889, p. 157, and expressly repealed all acts and parts of acts in conflict with it; the amendments not making any changes in the act of 1885 in any respect material to the operation of Act March 17, 1891.

8. Nor is Act March 17, 1891, repealed by another act of March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 461), entitled "An act to amend the act of March 18, 1885, by adding thereto new sections to provide the mode of carrying into effect certain provisions of Act 1885, changing grade," merely because the sections thereby added were numbered 38 to 53, inclusive, while the sections added by Act March 17, 1891, relative to a system of street-improvement bonds, were numbered 38 to 44, inclusive; the presumption being that, as such two acts of 1891 referred to very different street work, there was a mistake in the numbering of the sections.

9. Though the record does not show that any proof was made of the giving of notices requisite to give a city council jurisdiction to proceed in a street-improvement matter, the presumption, in an action to enjoin the sale of property to pay the street-improvement bonds, is that the notices were given, and the burden is on plaintiff to show that they were not.

10. An ordinance is a resolution, within Act March 18, 1885, as amended by St. 1889, p. 157, providing that, before ordering any street work to be done, the city council shall pass a resolution of intention to do so.

11. Under Act March 18, 1885, as amended by St. 1889, p. 157, providing that no publication other than that provided for in the act shall be necessary for the validity of any proceedings provided for therein, and requiring a certain publication of a resolution of the city council of intention to do street work, an ordinance passed as a resolution of intention need not be published otherwise than provided by the act, whatever be the provision of the city charter as to publication of ordinances.

12. The validity of street-improvement bonds is not affected by the fact that the street work was done under a contract stipulating that Chinese should not be employed thereon, and that eight hours should constitute a day's work; the contract price not being affected by such stipulation, and it not being legally a part of the contract, for the reason that neither in the resolution of intention to do the work, nor in the specifications, nor elsewhere, prior to the contract, was there any condition relative to such matters.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by I. W. Hellman against H. J. Shoulters, treasurer of the city of Los Angeles, and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. John T. Jones and Murphy & Gottschalk, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to enjoin the sale of property to pay street-improvement bonds. The case was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement, and upon evidence taken, and certain stipulations. Judgment was rendered against plaintiff, and the appeal is from the judgment and an order refusing plaintiff a new trial.

The general question involved in the appeal is whether the defendant Shoulters, as treasurer, had authority to sell the property for the purpose mentioned. That he had no power to sell is contended—First, because the act under which the proceedings were had is unconstitutional and void; and, second, on the ground that the statute, if valid, has not been complied with. It is also claimed that incompetent evidence was admitted at the trial over the objections of appellant.

The proceedings for the street improvement, to pay for which the bond in question here was issued, were inaugurated by ordinance passed April 13, 1891, by the city council of Los Angeles, declaring the intention of the council to improve Eighteenth street. The procedure was under an act of the legislature passed March 17, 1891, and entitled as follows: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places and sidewalks, and for construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885, by adding thereto an additional part numbered four, consisting of sections thirty-eight, thirty-nine, forty, forty-one, forty-two, forty-three and forty-four, relative to a system of street improvement bonds." Among other things, section 38, which that act purports to add to the Vrooman act of 1885, provides that when the cost of such improvement, as estimated by the city engineer, will be greater than two dollars per front foot, bonds shall be issued to represent the cost of the work. The bonds shall be serial, and extend over a period not to exceed 10 years, and payable in equal annual installments, with interest, payable semiannually, not to exceed 10 per cent. per annum. The installments were to be paid to the city treasurer. Under no circumstances was the city to be liable. The next section provides that, when this method of paying for the improvement is pursued, the determination that bonds shall be issued shall be stated in the notice of intention, and in the resolution ordering the work, in the resolution of award, and in all notices of the proceedings required. "And also a notice that a bond will issue to represent such assessment of fifty dollars or more remaining unpaid for thirty days after the date of the warrant or five days after a decision of said council upon an appeal, and describing the bonds, shall be included in the warrant provided for in section nine of this act." The next section provides for the issuance to the contractor of a separate bond representing, upon each lot or parcel of land delinquent for $50 or more, the amount of the assessment against the same. The form of the bond is given. It provides for payment solely out of the fund created by the assessment; for the payment in annual installments with the interest, and that, should default be made in any annual payment upon the principal, or in any payment of interest, the holder is entitled to declare the whole unpaid amount to be due, and have the lot advertised and sold forthwith in the manner provided by law for the sale of land assessed for state and county taxes. There follows a proviso, "that if any person, or his authorized agent, shall, at any time before the issuance of the bonds, present to the city treasurer his affidavit, made before a competent officer, that he is the owner of the lot or parcel of land in said lot, accompanied by the certificate of a searcher of records that he is such owner of record, and with such affidavit said person notifies said treasurer, in writing, that he desires no bond to be issued for the assessments upon said lot or parcel of land, then no such bond shall be issued therefor," etc. The act further provides that the city treasurer shall report all payments upon the principal due on any bond to the superintendent of streets, who must thereupon credit the same on the record of the assessment, and that the assessment shall be a first lien upon the property affected thereby, and the issuance of the bond shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all previous proceedings, and the validity of the lien. The act proceeds, in the next section, to provide that, upon any default to pay an installment or interest, if the holder of the bond demands in writing that the treasurer proceed to advertise and sell the lot, "then the whole bond, or its unpaid remainder, with its accrued interest, shall become due and payable immediately."

Appellant's first point is that the act is unconstitutional and void for several reasons.

(1) "In so far as it attempts to impose a lien to secure a sum of money bearing interest, which the owner cannot pay for 10 years, it is outside of the functions of government." "If," it is said, "the legislature could say that upon the happening of certain events, or upon the failure to do certain things, a man's property should be charged with a sum of money bearing a rate of interest, determined by a municipal council, for ten years, it can fix the charge for a hundred years." This, it is contended, is no part of the power to levy and collect taxes. The power to collect implies a duty on the part of the property owner to pay, and the duty cannot exist unless payment will be received. Therefore, when the statute says that the property owner shall not pay for 10 years, but during that time shall pay interest at a rate to be fixed by the city council, the process is not one of collection, but to compel the property owner to borrow money, and to secure the same by a first lien upon his property, against his will. Counsel think such a statute would be declared unconstitutional, though it does not conflict with any express limitation upon legislative power to be found in the constitution. It is, he says, without the scope of governmental power. It is not necessary, in my opinion, to appeal to a restriction so indefinite and intangible. If the case be such as he contends it is, such a proceeding would, to some extent, have the effect of depriving one of both liberty and property without due process of law. Whenever a municipality issues bonds which constitute a burden upon property within a certain limited district, it can be argued, with some degree of plausibility, that the law is forcing upon property owners within the district the obligations of a contract against their will, and has decreed a lien upon their property to secure it. But counsel for appellant concede that the issuance of such bonds, under proper conditions, is a valid exercise of power. At any rate, it has often been done, and the bonds thus issued held valid. So far as concerns the question of legislative power, I find it difficult to distinguish this case from that considered in Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. 71. The bonds issued in this case are municipal bonds. The city of Los Angeles is the obligor. True, the bonds are payable only out of a special fund, and such is usually the case with bonds issued to pay for local improvements. The incidence of the tax is quite different from that provided in the Case of the Dupont Street Bonds, but I cannot see how that fact affects the question of legislative power. I do not see why the property may not be assessed once for all levies under the act, nor why all taxes may not be levied in advance, to be paid annually. The mode may be unwise, and capable of working inequality and hardship, but that is not a matter for the court. If the matter were left to me, I should say the law is unwise, and absolutely incapable of any beneficial operation, but those are questions exclusively for the legislature.

(2) The agreement to pay interest is the contract of the city, and the rate is a matter of contract. It is conventional interest. If these views are correct, they dispose of several points earnestly discussed by counsel. I agree with appellant that the bond cannot be sustained on the ground that it is a contract made by the property owner, or a lien imposed by his consent. If a strong man has a weak one in his power, and gives his victim the choice of being kicked or cuffed, he cannot defend his battery on the ground that the injured man consented. So, in proceedings to subject property to a burden in invitum, the exercise of a choice of alternative modes of payment offered does not prove consent to the taking. If it were material, I should also agree with appellant that the act does not provide that all owners may object to the issuance of the bond, and thereby prevent the extension of the lien. The act does not in terms provide that any owners may do so, but that only a person who files a certain affidavit, accompanied by a certificate, may do so. No provision is made for those who own property but do not have the record title, nor for lien holders, nor for the case of tenants in common who do not agree in regard to the matter. The fact that all may pay the tax at any time before it becomes delinquent does have a bearing upon the reasonableness of the ordinance, and upon the question raised in regard to the fairness of the discrimination between property owners whose tax is more than $50 and those whose tax is less than that. An opportunity is afforded to all taxpayers to pay, and thus escape the extension of the lien. There is no constitutional provision which expressly requires the uniform operation of municipal ordinances. Nevertheless, where they unjustly discriminate they are sometimes declared unreasonable, and therefore void. I do not think it could be said that the discrimination here noticed is unreasonable.

(3) It is contended that the law is unconstitutional and void because it violates Const. art. 1, § 11, which provides that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation; also, that it violates subdivision 7, § 25, art. 4, which prohibits local or special laws "authorizing the laying out, opening, altering, maintaining or vacating roads, highways, streets, alleys, town plats, parks, cemeteries, graveyards or public grounds not owned by the state"; also, that it is prohibited by the thirty-third subdivision of that section, which prohibits local or special laws in all cases where a general law can be made applicable. Counsel contend that general laws can be made applicable to street improvements, as is shown by the fact that from time immemorial they have been. The lack of uniformity complained of is not altogether, or even chiefly, that the law is made applicable to cities of one or two classes. The act provides that, when the estimated cost of a street improvement shall exceed two dollars per front foot, the city council may, in its discretion, determine that bonds shall be issued to represent the cost of the improvement. They may also fix the rate of interest which the bonds shall bear. This, it is contended, destroys all semblance of uniformity. One street in which the cost exceeds two dollars per front foot may be improved under the rule prescribed in the supplemental act, while the adjoining street is being improved under the provisions of the Vrooman act. Upon still another street work may be in progress for which bonds are provided bearing a different rate of interest. It is only laws of a general nature which must have a uniform operation. And it has been uniformly held that a law is general which applies to all of a class, the classification being a proper one, and that the requirement of uniformity is satisfied if it applies to all of the class alike. In People v. Judge Twelfth District, 17 Cal. 547, it was said: "The word 'uniform' in the constitution, does not mean 'universal.' The section intends simply that the effect of general laws shall be the same to and upon all persons who stand in the same relation to the law; that is, all the facts of whose cases are substantially the same." Therefore, I take it, if the subject of the law is municipalities, and the law operates alike upon all municipalities upon which it was intended to operate at all, each requirement that the statute shall be a general law, and that its operation shall be uniform, it satisfied. Street work has always been a matter of municipal control, and the charters of all cities have provided something in regard to the method of doing it. Where, as in the Vrooman act, the method was provided in a general law which applied to all cities, but which did not constitute a specific section of the charter of any, it was still recognized as a matter of municipal interest, and as something which might appropriately have constituted a part of such charter. And in fact it was made an essential part of each by the general law. In section 6, art. 11, of the constitution of 1879, it was provided that municipal corporations should only be formed under general laws, and that "cities and towns heretofore and hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." By section 8 of the same article, certain municipal organizations were provided for, whose charters could be amended once in two years in a mode specifically indicated in the constitution. Soon after the constitution was adopted the question arose as to whether this very Vrooman act was a general law, within the meaning of this provision. On one hand it was contended that laws were not "general," within the meaning of this provision, which only applied to all cities and towns, as to them changing their powers, but that such general laws were only laws general in the sense that they extend throughout the state, and the requirement was that such laws should operate alike within and without municipalities. But this court held in Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 73, 14 Pac. 615, that the Vrooman act was a general law, within the meaning of that constitutional provision. This ruling has been steadily adhered to ever since. It is now, therefore, the settled law of this state that a statute which changes the powers and duties of municipal officers in important respects is a general law, and has a uniform operation, if it is made applicable to all cities, or to all of a class. If the Vrooman act was a general law in that sense, then this supplemental act must be so. If the subjects upon which the law is to operate are municipalities, it is obvious that the fact that alternative modes of procedure are open to the choice or submitted to the judgment of the council is no proof of lack of uniformity.

(4) It is objected to the act of the legislature under which the work was done that it is void because it improperly delegates legislative power to the city council, in that it vests in the council the power to create and extend the lien of the assessment, and to fix a special rate of interest. In contemplation of law, the city is the debtor, and the rate of interest is conventional. The bond act is not, therefore, a local or special statute regulating the rate of interest on money, nor does it authorize the council to regulate the rate of interest. As to the matter of the lien, the bond act is no more a local act authorizing, creating, or extending a lien than is any act providing a lien for municipal taxes. All such bonds, made payable by taxation upon land in a prescribed district, are in effect a lien upon such land; for, although the assessments are annual, when made they constitute a first lien, and whoever buys the property must take subject to the burden until the bonds are paid. It is fair to the counsel for the respondent to say that they do not take the view here advanced, but claim that the extension of the lien and the exaction of interest are penalties for delinquency, and, further, that the lot owner, by failing to pay within 30 days, and by failing to object to the bond in the mode provided, consents to the extension of the lien, and the condition as to interest. It is also suggested that there is a delegation of legislative power, in that the act vests the council with the discretion to pursue one of several schemes for improving streets. All powers, or at least all powers of a legislative character, exercised by the city council, are delegated powers. The right to so delegate all powers which are of a municipal nature is expressly given to the legislature, when by the constitution it is authorized and directed to provide for municipal corporations. The power to improve streets is admittedly in the category of municipal powers. The entire matter might have been confided to the local council. Here the authority of the local legislature is limited to certain alternative methods, all within the authority which can be so delegated.

2. Appellant further contends that the bond act is void because not passed by the legislature in the mode prescribed by the constitution. It violates, he says, section 24, art. 4, because (1) two subjects are expressed in the title; (2) no subject is sufficiently expressed in the title; and (3) it amends the Vrooman act, but does not re-enact and publish at length the sections amended.

(1) The act, we have seen, purports to be an act to amend the Vrooman act by adding certain sections thereto, relative to a system of street-improvement bonds. If the reference to the former act expresses a subject, it is by reference to the title of that act; and if the further subject mentioned in the title is included in, or logically may be so included, then two subjects are not expressed in the title. And such is plainly the case. The title of the former act is stated in the title of the bond act. It is an act to provide for work upon streets, courts, etc., within municipalities. Now, it is quite obvious that a system of street-improvement bonds may be one of the modes of paying for work upon streets. The act is therefore to add an additional part to the Vrooman act in relation to a system of street-improvement bonds. That is a matter which is included within the general subject of the former act. I think the law is not open to the objection. The title plainly says that the proposed law has reference to only one subject, to wit, a system of street-improvement bonds.

(2) Counsel for appellant says a title of an act which should simply declare that it was an act relative to a system of street-improvement bonds would not express in its title anything of the nature of the bond act. There might be a system of street-improvement bonds which did not look to an assessment on the property for their payment. They might be simply municipal bonds. I think, in this case, the bonds are simply municipal bonds; but, however that is regarded, the title sufficiently expresses the subject of the act. It certainly is not required that the title shall disclose all details of the act. I see nothing in the constitutional provision which requires that the title shall disclose the purpose and scope of the act. It is enough if it intelligibly refers the reader to the subject to which the act applies, or which is affected by it.

(3) It is claimed that the law is void because it violates that part of section 24, art. 4, which declares that "no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title, but in each case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended." But an act is not revised, nor a section amended, within the purview of the above inhibition, by an act which adds new sections which leave in full operation all the language of the statute which it purports to amend. A question somewhat similar was considered in Earle v. Board, 55 Cal. 492. The act, called the "Traylor Act," was "An act to add a new section to the Political Code to be known as section 1618, relating to the salaries of school teachers in cities having one hundred thousand or more inhabitants." The Code provided that such salaries should be fixed by the board of trustees of school districts. The Traylor act directly fixed the salaries in the class of cities named. The objection was made that the act was a special and local law. An attempt was made to show that it was a general law, because it was an amendment to the Code, which was general. Mr. Justice Ross, speaking for the court, said that the act was in no sense an amendment to the Political Code, and asked, "If an amendment, what does it amend,—the Political Code, or some particular section of it?" In the title to the bond act, it is stated that it is an act to amend the Vrooman act, but also to amend it only by adding new sections relating to a named subject. Now, it has been held that an act which thus adds new sections is not an amendment, within the meaning of the restriction. Certainly, the words used by the legislature will not make an act an amendment to a former act when it is in fact not so. The meaning of the language is explained in the title to the act, which shows that it is not necessarily an amendatory act. In my opinion, this wording is false, and does no harm. Certainly, there was no injury done by calling attention to the existing law. But counsel says it is in fact what it purports to be, and does amend the old law in many important respects. Many supposed changes made are mentioned,—mainly, that, while the former act does not expressly say so, it sets out a mode of procedure to be followed in such matters, and thus implies that the procedure prescribed is the only mode in which the council can act in such matters. The bond act provides that in certain cases the council may pursue a different mode. It may provide for bonds, and the various notices required differ, in that in all of them it must be stated that bonds will issue. It is evident that, if this amends the Vrooman act at all, it does so only by implication. It does not purport to amend any section of that act. It simply adds new sections as a whole, relating to a subject which is stated. As already said, every word and sentence of the prior act is left in full operation and effect, although, if this were otherwise, it would not therefore be an amendment. By implication it affects the operation of the Vrooman act, for it empowers the board, in certain cases, to adopt an alternative procedure. But, although it may be admitted that, in a sense, this amends the prior law, it is not within the evils aimed at by the inhibition, and to apply it to statutes which amend others by implication would almost prohibit legislation. To say that every statute which thus affects the operation of another is therefore an amendment of it, would introduce into the law an element of uncertainty which no one can estimate. It is impossible for the wisest legislator to know in advance how every statute proposed would affect the operation of existing laws. This matter is fully discussed by Judge Cooley in People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481. He says: "The mischief designed to be remedied was the enactment of statutes in terms so blind that legislators themselves were sometimes deceived in regard to their effect, and the public, from the difficulty of making the necessary examination and comparison, failed to become apprised of the changes made in the laws. An amendatory act which purported only to insert certain words, or to substitute one phrase for another, in an act or section which was only referred to, but not republished, was well calculated to mislead the careless as to its effect, and was perhaps sometimes drawn in that form for that express purpose. Endless confusion was thus introduced into the law, and the constitution wisely prohibited such legislation. But an act complete in itself is not within the mischief designed to be remedied by this provision, and cannot be held to be prohibited by it without violating its plain intent." On the other hand, as we have seen, to hold that the inhibition refers to amendments by implication is to cause confusion, and unnecessarily to obstruct legislation. It must be held, therefore, that the provision does not apply to amendments by implication. See, on this point, Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 270, 22 Pac. 176; University of California v. Bernard, 57 Cal. 613; Ex parte Pollard, 40 Ala. 100; Anderson v. Com., 18 Grat. 300; School Directors of Union School Dist. v. School Directors of New Union School Dist., 135 Ill. 464, 28 N. E. 49; State v. Geiger, 65 Mo. 313; State v. Hancock, 54 N. J. Law, 393, 24 Atl. 726; Lockhart v. City of Troy, 48 Ala. 584; Cooley, Const. Lim. 180, 181, and numerous cases cited in the notes.

3. It is contended that the bond act was repealed before the proceedings in question here were taken. In fact, it is claimed that it had been twice repealed.

(1) The bond act was passed March 17, 1891, and took effect immediately. Appellant claims that it purported to amend the Vrooman act by adding certain sections thereto. Precisely what the act was, we have considered. It did purport to add to that act sections numbered from 38 to 44. At the same session, and on March 31, 1891, the legislature did amend, by re-enacting and publishing in full, sections 2–5, 7, 9, 24, 26, 34, 35, and 37 of the Vrooman act. This act also took effect from and after its passage, and expressly repealed all acts and parts of acts in conflict with it. Section 3 of the amended act prescribes the procedure in ordering work done, and, as counsel claims, adds two new features. The city council may require an estimate of the cost to be made by the city engineer, and whenever the work is deemed of more than local or ordinary public benefit, or whenever the total estimated cost will exceed the total value of the lots and lands assessed, if charged to the frontage, the council may make the expense chargeable upon a district to be formed. Now, it is said, here is a provision for the very same exigency provided for in the bond act, to wit, a case where the cost will exceed two dollars per front foot, and not a word said about bonds. But these features were already in the Vrooman act when the bond act was passed. The Vrooman act had been amended in that respect in 1889. St. 1889, p. 157. Counsel contends, however, that this fact makes no difference; for the law, as revised, did make material changes in the procedure, and does not include the alternative mode mentioned in the bond act. Therefore the legislature did not wish the continuance of that alternative. The amendments did not, so far as I can discover, change the Vrooman act in any respect material to the operation of the bond act. The choice of the alternatives was entirely with the council. I am unable to discover in the revision any indication of an intention to repeal the bond act. Where portions of an act are amended, it is not to be considered as repealed and re-enacted as amended, but the portions not altered are deemed to continue. Pol. Code, § 325.

(2) But appellant says that, if the bond act was not repealed by the revisory act, it certainly was by another act passed also at the same session of the legislature,—March 31, 1891. St. 1891, p. 461. That act was entitled "An act to amend an act entitled [here inserting the title to the Vrooman act], by adding thereto certain new and additional sections to provide the mode of carrying into effect certain provisions of said act changing grades." It proposes to amend the original street act by adding thereto sections 38 to 53, inclusive. The point is that these very numbers from 38 to 44 are used in the bond act. Though both acts treat of matters under the same general subject,—street improvements,—still they refer to very different street work. They do not interfere at all with each other. They do not amend existing statutes, but each proposes to add new sections. It is not a case, therefore, where an amended section provides that section so and so shall read thus. The implication of repeal, if any, arises entirely from the presumption that the legislature did not intend that there should be two sections bearing the same number in the same act. But this implication is not of itself sufficient to effect a repeal. It will rather be presumed that the sections were numbered by mistake.

4. It is contended that, admitting the validity of the act, the bond is void for irregularities in the procedure. In one respect, I hardly understand the mode in which counsel on both sides have presented these questions. The action was brought to enjoin a sale under the bond act, on the ground that there was no valid lien. The act providing for the bonds being valid, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that the proceedings were so defective that there was no valid lien, and that the city council had no right to sell the land. Numerous matters are averred in the complaint, which, being proven, appellant contends, would show that the bonds are void. Among these are allegations that the required notices were not given. No answer was filed, but it was stipulated that all the allegations of the complaint are deemed denied. The burden was therefore upon the plaintiff all the way through, even as to the negative allegations that certain necessary notices were not given. The case was tried upon certain stipulations as to facts. In some parts of the stipulations what notices were given is stated, and, in others, not that certain notices were given, but that certain officials, at named dates, made affidavits stating the facts showing due notice, if such affidavits were competent to prove the facts. Appellant makes the point that these affidavits are not competent to prove what was done. They were not made until long after the orders were made which could be made only after the notices were given. But if the validity of the procedure did not depend upon the fact that proof was made a matter of record, but upon the fact that due notice was given, then the onus was upon the plaintiff to prove no notice was given or that the notice given was insufficient. The best we can do is to suppose that the notices which the affidavits tend to prove were given, and there were no other notices. If, in any respect, there is a failure in this regard, it is a failure on the part of the plaintiff to make out his case. The case cannot be treated as though the bondholder was put to proof of the validity of his bond. The Vrooman act, as amended in 1889, provided that, before ordering any work to be done, the council shall pass a resolution of their intention to do so, which shall be published and posted for two days as directed in section 34 of the act. Section 34 provided for the publication in a paper to be designated by the council, and, further, that "no publication other than that provided for in this act shall be necessary to give validity to any of the proceedings provided for therein." The city charter of Los Angeles declares (section 39) that ordinances finally adopted shall be published in some daily newspaper, or posted, and, until such posting or publishing, no ordinance shall be valid; and, in regard to street work, that the notice of intention shall be published at least 10 days before it shall take effect. Counsel contends: (1) The street law may control as to street work, but the charter must control as to the mode in which the council shall express its intention. (2) The mode adopted was by ordinance, and, although a resolution might be passed under the street law, an ordinance must be adopted in the mode provided in the charter. The street law does not provide for the ordinances. And (3) the two laws are not inconsistent, because the street law provides for no publication of a resolution in order that it may take effect, but for publication after it has taken effect. Therefore both provisions can stand.

The stipulation shows that the notice was published for two days only. An ordinance is also a resolution, or at least, so far as this statute is concerned, they are equivalent. City of Los Angeles v. Waldron, 65 Cal. 285, 3 Pac. 890. The street law provides a complete scheme or procedure for street work, and, so far as it goes, governs. The charter cannot make a different procedure by requiring more or less, otherwise there would not be a uniform operation of the law for all cities of a class. As to publication, the street law expressly provides that no other shall be necessary for the validity of the procedure. The ordinance, in this regard, is in the form suited to the charter of Los Angeles, and provides that the clerk shall cause the same to be published for two days, and thereupon it shall take effect. Counsel says this publication was before it took effect, and the publication required by the street law is after it has become a valid resolution. So far as it affects the proceeding, it is a distinction without a difference. Under either view, the publication is essential to the validity of the resolution, or at least of proceedings under it, and nothing can be done under it until published. Under either view, the resolution is finally passed before publication. Whether we say it is a subsisting ordinance, though it can have no effect as an ordinance, or that it takes effect only after publication, when for the first time it becomes operative as an ordinance, is a matter of taste. As each order was made in the procedure authorizing the improvement to be made, the record does not disclose that any proof had been made that the notices had been given which were requisite to give the council jurisdiction to proceed. Does this raise a presumption, in a proceeding of this character, that they were not given? If the holder of the bond were plaintiff, and it were held that he must go behind the assessment, and show authority to make the bond, such might be the rule. But it has been held, over and over, that the assessment itself makes a prima facie case in favor of its validity. I think, therefore, the laboring oar was with plaintiff to the end, and that merely showing that there was no record proof of notices did not shift the burden. That the fact, and not record evidence of the fact, gives jurisdiction, seems to be settled. Ede v. Knight, 93 Cal. 162, 28 Pac. 860; Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887; Perri v. Beaumont, 88 Cal. 108, 25 Pac. 1109; Heinlen v. Heilbron, 94 Cal. 636, 30 Pac. 8. Looking through this part of the record, however, and conceding that the notices which the affidavits tended to prove were given as stated, and not otherwise, they seem sufficient.

5. Appellant next contends that the contract under which the work was done was void because in it the contractor agreed to employ no Chinese, and no one more than eight hours per day. It is said that these provisions in the contract are void, and render the whole contract so, for such restrictions would naturally increase the cost of the work. That those provisions in our constitution which prohibit the employment of Chinese labor on public works are void, because in conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution, is maintained on both sides. We do not find it necessary to affirm either position. Neither in the resolution of intention nor in the specifications, nor elsewhere, was there a condition in regard to what should constitute a day's work, or against Chinese laborers. The condition did not, therefore, affect the price paid. It is of no consequence to the lot owner. Neither was it, on the supposition made, legally a part of the contract. Why it was there, I do not know. Perhaps the contractor desired it. Possibly, such are the prejudices upon the subject that he could procure laborers on better terms with the provision in the contract. At all events, the street superintendent had no power to make a contract other than that authorized by the council, and upon which bids were invited. Chambers v. Satterlee, 40 Cal. 519. The judgment and order are affirmed.

McKENZIE v. SCOTTISH UNION & NATIONAL INS. CO. (Sac. 42.)

INSURANCE — WARRANTY — WATCHMAN CLAUSE — BREACH—EFFECT—CONSTRUCTION.

1. That an employé of insured, who worked about the insured buildings during the day, and slept at night in a house about 350 yards distant therefrom, visited the buildings several times during the night, is not a compliance with a warranty in the policy that a watchman should be kept on duty "constantly day and night in and immediately about" the insured buildings.

2. Breach of a promissory warranty in an insurance policy avoids it, irrespective of its materiality.

3. Civ. Code, § 2629, providing that the insurer shall not be exonerated by the negligence of insured or his agent, does not prevent a policy from being avoided by failure of insured's agent to employ a night watchman about the premises, as directed by insured, under a promissory warranty requiring a watchman to be kept about the insured premises.

4. A sawmill which has stopped running for the winter is "shut down," within the meaning of such term in a provision of an insurance policy, though men are employed about the premises shipping lumber therefrom, and the machinery has not been dismantled and put in shape for the winter.

Action by W. H. McKenzie against the Scottish Union & National Insurance Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Frank H. Short, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover for loss by fire upon insurance policy. Briefly stated, the facts are as follows: "On February 20, 1893, the defendant company executed in favor of one James Karnes its policy of insurance, insuring the said Karnes against loss by fire of a certain sawmill and the machinery therein contained, for one year from and after said date. One of the stipulations of the policy was as follows: 'Warranted by the insured that during such time as the within-described buildings or works are idle or not in operation, whether closed for repairs or during the absence of workmen, or otherwise (except as otherwise herein stated), one or more watchmen shall be on duty constantly, day and night, in and immediately about the said buildings or works; and, if the said buildings or works shall at any time remain shut down for more than thirty (30) days, notice shall be given this company, and permission to remain so shut down be obtained and indorsed hereon, or this policy shall be null and void.' Permission granted for the above-described mill to remain idle until May 1, 1893. On September 22, 1893, Karnes transferred the insured property to plaintiff; and on September 26, 1893, with the consent of the company, assigned to him the policy of insurance thereon. On December 8, 1893, the property was destroyed by fire. The amount of the loss was fixed by appraisal, and the only questions in the case arise out of alleged breaches of the watchman's warranty clause, which we have quoted." The facts in this connection are as follows: The plaintiff took possession of the property under his conveyance of September 22, 1893, in the latter part of October. The mill did not run from the date of plaintiff's purchase until it was burned, on the 8th day of December, 1893; but there was a quantity of lumber on hand which had been previously sawed, and which was transferred to plaintiff, and plaintiff had men employed in shipping this lumber. No application was at any time made by plaintiff, or on his behalf, to the defendant company, for leave to have the insured buildings or works described in the policy shut down or remain idle and not in operation, and no consent thereto was made or given by the defendant, or indorsed on the policy. The plaintiff did inform Mr. Shepard, the local agent at Fresno, that the mill had been shut down. This was shortly after the mill had been shut down. The mill in question was a steam sawmill for sawing logs into lumber, and for making trays, sweat boxes, etc.

The testimony in reference to the watchman at the mill tends to show that plaintiff was not himself at the mill. He says that on the last of October or first of November, as he thinks, he employed one C. H. Smith to go to the mill, take charge of the property, and watch it generally, and gave him authority to employ men, as he wanted them, to move out the lumber. He was employed to watch the mill, and to employ men and prepare the lumber for shipment. C. R. Smith was a witness on behalf of plaintiff, and, after stating that he was experienced as a lumberman and had worked at the mill prior to plaintiff's purchase, said, in substance, that plaintiff employed him on the 7th or 8th of November, 1893, to go to the mill, take charge of the property, and to do everything necessary to its protection, to see to shipping the lumber and everything of that kind, and to send the bills to him. "He told me to keep a watchman up there; * * * to keep a night watchman just as long as I thought it necessary to do it; and to take the night watchman off whenever I thought the property was safe without one; and to use my own judgment in regard to it, and I done so. I kept a night watchman at Mr. McKenzie's expense after I went up there. I think thirteen days I had a night watchman." He then explained that he found the watchman asleep; discharged him; McKenzie (plaintiff) paid him; and after that he (Smith) did the night watching himself. Smith, with three or four men, were working during the day getting lumber out for shipment. Smith slept in a house about 350 to 400 yards from the mill, from which house the mill was only partially visible. Plaintiff told the witness that he did not think it necessary to employ a watchman after the storms came, and said to him, "Whenever it starts to rain or snow, you let the night watchman go;" and, after the 14th of October, Smith "did all the watching that was done, both day and night." His habit was to remain up until 10 o'clock p. m., go to the mill at that hour, look around, go to his house, and to bed, "and then wake up in the middle of the night, perhaps two or three o'clock, and go down to the mill again, and take a walk around down through there, and would then go back and retire for the balance of the night." On the night of the fire (December 8, 1893), Smith and the men in his employ were in the house aforementioned, when he heard the bark of a dog; whereupon he went to the mill, and apparently found everything all right, whereupon he returned to the house, and went to bed; it being then about 11:15 o'clock. At about 12:15 a. m. he awakened, and found the mill on fire; and, when he reached the premises, the tray house was fallen in. The belts, pulleys, etc., had been taken off the machinery, and housed; the cylinders opened and oiled; and all that was deemed necessary to protect the machinery for the winter had been done from the middle to the last of November, or perhaps as late as December 5th. Smith worked during the day with the other men in shipping lumber,—superintending them, and did not "work hard," and at night watched, as before stated. On his redirect examination, Smith stated that plaintiff stated to him "that, in order to protect the insurance policy, he had to have a night watchman, and instructed me positively we had to have a night watchman at the mill; but he gave me discretion to employ a night watchman at his expense, or do it myself," etc. He also gave it as his opinion as a millman that the mill was not shut down when it stopped working, but only when it was dismantled for the winter.

The plaintiff and Smith were the only witnesses in the case. Many of the expressions here referred to or quoted were repeated in one form or another, but the foregoing is believed to be a fair synopsis of the evidence upon the mooted points.

Upon the close of the testimony on behalf of plaintiff, counsel for defendant moved the court to grant a nonsuit, upon the grounds: (1) That it appeared from the evidence that continuously from the 26th day of September, 1893, down to and including the date of the destruction of the property by fire, the insured buildings or works were idle, and not in operation, and that no watchman was on duty constantly day and night, etc., as required by the policy of insurance; and (2) upon the ground that the insured buildings or works were shut down for more than 30 days prior to the time of the fire, within the meaning of the warranty, and that at no time did the insured apply to or obtain from defendant permission that said works should remain shut down, nor was any consent thereto given or indorsed on the policy. The court overruled the motion, to which ruling counsel for defendant excepted, and the ruling is assigned as error. The cause was then submitted to the jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of plaintiff. This appeal is from a final judgment rendered upon the verdict, and from an order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

We shall first consider what may be termed the "watchman clause" in the policy, which we repeat: "Warranted by the insured that during such time as the within buildings or works are idle or not in operation, whether closed for repairs or during the absence of workmen, or otherwise (except as otherwise herein stated), one or more watchmen shall be on duty constantly, day and night, in and immediately about said buildings or works, * * * or this policy shall be null and void." "Warranties," as is said by May in his work on Insurance, at section 157, "are distinguished into two kinds: Affirmative, or those which allege the existence at the time of insurance of a particular fact, and avoid the contract if the allegation be untrue; and promissory, or those which require that something shall be done or omitted after the insurance takes effect and during its continuance, and avoid the contract if the thing to be done or omitted be not done or omitted according to the terms of the warranty." In the matter of affirmative warranties, depending upon the statements made by the insured in his application, much discussion and some variance of opinion is to be found in the cases, touching their materiality to the risk, whether made for other purposes than a warranty, whether immaterial, unguarded, or superfluous, etc. In the present case we are confronted with no difficulty of this character. The case is one of an express promissory warranty, which has been defined as follows: "An express warranty is a stipulation inserted in writing on the face of the policy, on the literal truth or fulfillment of which the validity of the entire contract depends. By a warranty the insured stipulates for the absolute truth of the statement made, and the strict compliance with some promised line of conduct, upon penalty of forfeiture of his right to recover in case of loss should the statement prove untrue, or the course of conduct promised be unfulfilled. A warranty is an agreement in the nature of a condition precedent, and, like that, must be strictly complied with. Whether the fact stated or the act stipulated for be material to the risk or not is of no consequence, the contract being that the matter is as represented, or shall be as promised; and unless it prove so, whether from fraud, mistake, negligence, or other cause, not proceeding from the insurer, or the intervention of the law or act of God, the insured can have no claim. * * * One of the very objects of the warranty is to preclude all controversy about the materiality or immateriality of the statement. The only question is, has the warranty been kept? There is no room for construction, no latitude, no equity. If the warranty be a statement of facts, it must be literally true; if a stipulation that a certain act shall or shall not be done, it must be literally performed." May, Ins. § 156, and cases cited. The foregoing quotation is but the enunciation in brief form of a principle laid down by all the writers on the subject of insurance, and enunciated in the leading cases of this country and England. In Wood v. Insurance Co., 13 Conn. 533, a leading case on the subject of warranty, Sherman, J., said: "If a house be insured against fire, and the language of the policy is 'warranted, during the policy, to be covered with thatch,' the insurer will be discharged if during the insurance the house should be covered with wood or metal, although his risk is diminished; for a warranty excludes all argument in regard to its reasonableness, or the probable intent of the parties." Marshall on Insurance (page 249), in discussing the question, says: "It is also immaterial to what cause the noncompliance is attributable; for if it be not in fact complied with, though, perhaps, for the best of reasons, the policy is void." Parties may contract as they please. When a condition precedent is adopted by them in their contract, the courts will not inquire as to its wisdom or folly, but must exact its strict, or at least substantial, observance.

When we apply these rules of law to the language of the warranty in the present case, and to the acts of the insured in compliance therewith, we are forced to the conclusion that there was neither a literal nor a substantial compliance with the terms of the warranty. The mill was idle and not in operation from the latter part of September until the date of the fire in December. To have a watchman who during the night only visited the works before bedtime, and again at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and who during the rest of the night slept in a house from 350 to 400 yards from the mill, and from which it was only partially visible, is far from complying with a covenant or warranty that "during such time as the within-described buildings or works are idle or not in operation, whether closed for repairs or during the absence of workmen, or otherwise, one or more watchmen shall be on duty constantly, day and night, in and immediately about the said buildings or works." We assume that during the day the witness Smith and the men engaged with him in removing lumber from the mill yard were in such proximity to the mill as to enable them to watch it; but to sleep over a fifth of a mile from it at night, and to only visit it twice during each night, was not to be on duty as a watchman constantly, and immediately about the buildings; and, as was said in Rankin v. Insurance Co., 89 Cal. 203, 26 Pac. 872: "In the case before us the terms of the warranty are explicit as to the time of keeping a watch, and, on the undisputed evidence, we think the court ought to have held that the plaintiffs had not complied therewith." We concur also in the further remark of Paterson, J., in that case, that "we do not need a dictionary, nor law books, nor the testimony of an expert, to tell us that a man who is employed to watch in the daytime, and who is permitted to sleep at night, is not a watchman at night." See, also, Wenzel v. Insurance Co., 67 Cal. 440, 7 Pac. 817; Trojan Min. Co. v. Fireman's Ins. Co., 67 Cal. 27, 7 Pac. 4; Wood, Ins. 439; Id. (2d Ed.) 433–439.

The respondent contends that there was testimony tending to show that plaintiff employed a competent watchman to watch the premises day and night, and, if there was any negligence, it was that of the watchman, and that he is exonerated by section 2629 of the Civil Code. That section is as follows: "An insurer is not liable for a loss caused by the willful act of the insured; but he is not exonerated by the negligence of the insured, or of his agents or others." The ordinary negligence of the insured and his agents has long been held as a part of the risk which the insurer takes upon himself, and the existence of which, where it is the proximate cause of the loss, does not absolve the insurer from liability; but willful exposure, gross negligence, negligence amounting to misconduct, etc., have often been held to release the insurer from such liability. To set at rest questions involving the different degrees of negligence, and the results following therefrom, we may reasonably suppose, was the object of the framers of our Civil Code. Under section 2629, supra, the nice distinctions often made necessary are dispensed with; and the general proposition is established that no form of negligence on the part of the insured, or his agents or others, leading to a loss, avoids the policy, unless it amounts to a willful act on the part of the insured. The Code thereby sets at rest a fruitful cause of litigation. This section was not intended, however, to absolve the insured from the performance of those acts which he has expressly covenanted to perform. To do this would be not to measure his conduct and obligations under the contract, but to abrogate it. When the insured in the present case warranted, in case the mill was idle and not in use, to have a watchman on duty constantly, day and night, in and immediately about the buildings or works, he bound himself to the performance of specific acts, from the performance of which no negligence could exonerate him. It may well be that had the plaintiff complied with the warranty by keeping a watchman on duty, as specified in the policy, that negligence of the watchman as to the manner of discharging such duty would come within the letter and spirit of sction 2629, supra. Whether this result would follow in such a case it is unnecessary to determine, as the question is not involved. The case at bar does not present an instance of the negligent performance of a contract of warranty, but of an entire omission to perform a vital portion of such contract. The object of promissory warranties is usually to bind the insured to the performance of certain acts which but for such warranty he would not be bound to perform. Ordinary negligence by the insured did not, prior to the adoption of our Code, release the insurer from liability; yet it has always been held that the conditions of an express promissory warranty were binding upon the insured according to their tenor and legal effect. All that our Civil Code has done in relation to negligence is to declare that his negligence shall not, or that of his agent, etc., shall not, exonerate the insurer. But the same Code provides that "a policy may declare that a violation of specified provisions thereof shall avoid it; otherwise the breach of an immaterial provision does not avoid the policy." Civ. Code, § 2611. Section 2612 is as follows: "A breach of warranty, without fraud, merely exonerates an insurer from the time that it occurs, or where it is broken in its inception prevents the policy from attaching to the risk." The whole article of the Code on warranties would be rendered practically inoperative if mere negligence could abrogate the several provisions thereof.

Counsel for respondent relies upon Sierra Milling, Smelting & Mining Co. v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 76 Cal. 235, 18 Pac. 267, in support of his contention here. That case involved the liability of an insurance company under a similar clause in reference to a watchman. The facts showed a substantial compliance with the terms of the warranty, and the only thing in the case tending to uphold the contention here is an expression in the opinion not necessary to the determination of the case, wherein the learned commissioner who wrote the opinion, in alluding to the allegations of the answer, says: "To us this seems to be nothing more than an allegation of negligence on the part of the watchman, and for this the plaintiff was not responsible, under section 2629 of the Civil Code." The expression was evidently only used to show that, in the view of the writer, the section referred to qualified the character of the services required by a watchman, who was at his post substantially as required by the letter of the warranty, and has no application to a case in which the watchman required to be on guard was quietly sleeping over 1,000 feet away. As the evidence of plaintiff all showed affirmatively a nonfulfillment of the warranty, the court, in the present instance, should have granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit; and the verdict of the jury, on precisely the same evidence, was contrary to law.

2. We are also of opinion that there was a violation by plaintiff of the further clause in the warranty under which, "if the buildings or works shall at any time remain shut down for more than thirty (30) days, notice shall be given this company, and permission to remain so shut down be obtained, and indorsed hereon, or this policy shall be null and void." The testimony of plaintiff is full and explicit to the effect that the mill was idle and not in use from September 25th to December 8th, the date of the fire. No lumber was cut, and nothing was done in or about the property except to take away and ship lumber previously cut, except that in the latter part of November they prepared the machinery for winter, by removing belts, etc. It is true that the witness Smith gave it as his opinion that the mill was not "shut down" as long as they were shipping lumber; but we see nothing in the testimony to call for the opinion of an expert. To say that a sawmill is shut down when it is not running and is idle is to use an expression which is perfectly plain and easily understood by the average layman, and calls for no expert opinion. To assert the contrary is idle. It would be but little more unreasonable to say that a train standing at a station had not stopped, because freight was being delivered from the cars. The plaintiff said in his testimony: "I told Mr. Shepard that it was shut down. Mr. Shepard is the local agent of the defendant here at Fresno. I told him that the mill had been shut down. This was after the mill had been shut down,—shortly afterwards. I made no application to Mr. Shepard or anybody else to indorse consent upon the policy, and, as a matter [of] fact, I never obtained written consent from Mr. Shepard or anybody else to have the mill remain shut down." Under such circumstances we are of opinion that there was a violation of the second clause of the warranty in not applying for and procuring the consent of the insurer to be indorsed upon the policy for more than 30 days after the works shut down.

We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

SPOONER v. CADY. (Sac. 36.)[1]

UNLAWFUL ATTACHMENT—DISSOLUTION—LIABILITY OF SHERIFF—ATTORNEY'S FEES—DAMAGES.

1. Where a sheriff, in attaching property, was not guilty of any oppression, fraud, or malice, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 3294, but acted fairly in all respects, and simply performed the duties required of him as a public officer, exemplary damages will not be allowed against him on dissolution of the attachment.

2. Where the only evidence of money properly expended in the pursuit of personal property which has been wrongfully converted (made a measure of damages under Civ. Code, § 3336) is that plaintiff made a note for a gross sum to an attorney, in full payment of all expenses of the proposed suit, from its commencement to its determination, and it does not appear what, if any, expenses were incurred, except that at the end of the controversy plaintiff had judgment for her costs, the money paid by plaintiff to her attorney cannot be properly taken into account, in estimating her damages.

Goodwin & Goodwin, for appellant. Shinn & Shinn, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that on the 28th day of September, 1892, plaintiff was the owner, in possession, and entitled to the possession, of certain described personal property, which was and is of the value of $13,000; that on said day the defendant wrongfully, and without her consent, took said property from the possession of plaintiff; that on the 3d day of October, 1892, plaintiff demanded of defendant the possession of said property, but to deliver possession thereof to plaintiff defendant refused, and still refuses, to her damage, etc.; "that, by reason of said taking and detention of said property by defendant, plaintiff has been compelled to properly and necessarily expend a large amount of time and money in pursuit of said property; and that a fair compensation for the time and money so properly expended by plaintiff in pursuit of said property is the sum of three thousand dollars." Wherefore, judgment is asked (1) for a return of the property, or, in case a return thereof cannot be had, for the sum of $13,000, the value thereof; (2) for the sum of $3,000, as compensation for the time and money properly expended by plaintiff in pursuit of said property; (3) for costs of suit. The original complaint was filed October 3, 1892. The answer denies that on the day named, or at any other time, the plaintiff was the owner, or in possession, or entitled to the possession, of the property described in the complaint, or of any portion thereof, and denies that she had properly or otherwise expended any money or time in the pursuit of said property; and it alleges that defendant was the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of Lassen county, and that as such officer he took into his possession the said property as the property of M. E. Spooner (the husband of plaintiff), to whom it then belonged, under and by virtue of two writs of attachment which were regularly issued out of the superior court of Placer county in actions commenced therein against said M. E. Spooner, and which were placed in his hands for service. And in a supplemented answer, subsequently filed, it is alleged that in October, 1892, the said writs of attachment were discharged, and that on November 15th, following, by order of court, all of said property was delivered by defendant to the plaintiff. The case came on regularly for trial before a jury on August 30, 1894, and evidence as to the plaintiff's ownership and possession of the property at the time of its attachment was introduced on both sides. It was proved that the property—consisting mostly of live stock—was situated on a ranch in Lassen county, which was claimed by plaintiff, and known as the "Spooner Ranch," and that it remained there after the attachment as before, and that while there, in his custody, defendant paid plaintiff, for the pasturage of the stock, the agreed rental value of the land. And it was admitted that all the property attached was returned to plaintiff by defendant, as alleged in his supplemental answer. To show the damage sustained by plaintiff by reason of the attachment, A. L. Shinn, her attorney, testified: That, before commencing the suit, plaintiff asked him what it would cost her. "I told her it was difficult to say what the cost would be; it might be a long suit, and cost her a good deal of money, but I would take the case, and pay all expenses, give my services, and take the chances of getting out. She asked what I would charge, under those conditions. I told her $2,000. She said, 'That is not enough. Make it $2,500.' I said: 'I will not quarrel with you on that. I don't know how I will get out of it.'" That she then gave him her promissory note for $2,500 due one day after date, and that he was to pay all expenses from the first, and that she paid the note in full in November after the property was returned. He further testified that $500 would be a reasonable attorney's fee for commencing the action, and that $1,200 would be a reasonable fee for commencing and prosecuting the action up to its final determination. The court instructed the jury very fully in regard to the law bearing upon the questions presented for decision, and, among other things, told them that, if they should find for the plaintiff, they must find "the value of the property, and assess the damage caused her by the taking and detention of the property. The measure of damages (the property having been returned) is legal interest on the value of the property from the time of taking, and so long as it was held under attachment, and a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended by plaintiff in pursuit of the property, in computing which you may include a reasonable attorney's fee, which attorney's fee must have been actually paid." The verdict was: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find for plaintiff, and find the value of the property taken to be $9,000, and assess her damages at $1,500." Of the damages so assessed, plaintiff was allowed, by an order of court, to waive the sum of $256, and thereupon judgment was entered that the plaintiff recover of and from the defendant the sum of $1,244 damages, and her costs of suit, taxed at $265.55. From that judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The only question which need be considered is that relating to the damages awarded to the plaintiff. There was no ground for allowing exemplary damages. Such damages may be given in an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed. Civ. Code, § 3294. But here there was no evidence tending to show that the defendant had been guilty of any oppression, fraud, or malice. On the contrary, he appears to have acted fairly towards the plaintiff in all respects, and to have simply performed the duties required of him by law as a public officer. Section 627 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "In an action for the recovery of specific personal property, if the property has not been delivered to the plaintiff, or the defendant, by his answer, claim a return thereof, the jury * * * may, at the same time, assess the damages, if any are claimed in the complaint or answer, which the prevailing party has sustained by reason of the taking or detention of such property." And section 3336 of the Civil Code provides: "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: * * * (2) A fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property." Assuming, without deciding, that in a case like this the plaintiff is entitled to recover a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property, the question then is, does the evidence show such an expenditure of either time or money by the plaintiff as entitled her to the damages awarded? It is apparent that the expenditure must be limited to the time during which the property was detained, and that it cannot be extended beyond the time when the property was returned. There was no evidence that the plaintiff expended any time in pursuit of the property, nor, if she did, as to what was the value of that time. There was no ground, therefore, for allowing her any compensation for time expended. And the only evidence as to money expended was that she gave to her attorney her promissory note, and subsequently paid the same, as before stated. That note was for a gross sum, and was to be in full payment of all expenses of the proposed suit, from its commencement to its final determination. No sum was named or agreed upon as the attorney's fee for his services in the case. And it does not appear what, if any, expenses were incurred, except that, at the end of the controversy, plaintiff had judgment for her costs, in the sum of $265.55. Under these circumstances, could the money paid by plaintiff to her attorney, or any part thereof, be properly taken into account, in estimating her damages? It has been strongly intimated by this court that money paid for attorney's fees in pursuit of property is not within the rule of damages declared by section 3336 of the Civil Code. Greenbaum v. Martinez, 86 Cal. 462, 25 Pac. 12; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325. But the question has never been definitely decided. The general rule is that counsel fees are not recoverable by the successful party in actions either at law or in equity, and it has been held in cases of aggravated trespass, where exemplary damages might be allowed, that attorney's fees for prosecuting the action could not be taken into consideration in estimating the damages. Howell v. Scoggins, 48 Cal. 355; Falk v. Waterman, 49 Cal. 224; Sedg. Dam. (8th Ed.) § 234. In Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857, which was an action like this, the court said: "The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the court that two hundred dollars is a fair compensation for the time and money expended by the plaintiff in the pursuit of the property. All the evidence bearing upon this question is the fact that plaintiff gave her note for two hundred dollars to her attorneys as a fee for their services in the case. That is wholly insufficient to support the judgment in that regard." Counsel for respondent invoke the rule declared in injunction cases, where the preliminary injunction had been dissolved, and, in an action on the injunction bond, it was held that counsel fees might be recovered. But in Mitchell v. Hawley, 79 Cal. 301, 21 Pac. 833, it is said: "The allowance of counsel fees in suits on injunction bonds is exceptional, and it should not be carried beyond the point to which former decisions have taken it. In the injunction suit in which the bond now before us was given, the attorneys for defendants were given five hundred dollars in gross for all their services in the case. They made an effort to get the temporary injunction dissolved, but failed. Afterwards the injunction was ended by the dismissal of the action." And it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any sum for counsel fees. In Bustamente v. Stewart, 55 Cal. 115, the court quoted with approval the following language found in High, Inj. §§ 473, 474: "A reasonable amount of compensation paid as counsel fees in procuring the dissolution of an injunction may be recovered in an action upon the bond, if the injunction was improperly or wrongfully issued; the amount being limited to fees paid counsel for procuring the dissolution, and not for defending the action." In San Diego Water Co. v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 101 Cal. 216, 35 Pac. 651, it was held, where no effort was made to dissolve a preliminary injunction, except that the case was tried on its merits, and a dissolution of the injunction was made by the final judgment, and the attorneys were simply employed to try the case, and were paid for that purpose, and no other, that counsel fees could not be recovered as damages upon the injunction bond; and see Curtiss v. Bachman (Cal.) 42 Pac. 910. Without deciding whether, under the provisions of section 3336, Civ. Code, attorney's fees can ever be treated as money properly expended in the pursuit of the property, and therefore recoverable, we think it clear that, in view of the authorities above cited, the plaintiff in this case was not entitled to recover for such fees. Interest on the value of the property during the time it was held under attachment would amount to about $78. The case should be remanded, with directions to the court below to modify the judgment by striking out all the damages awarded the plaintiff, except the sum of $78; and in all other respects the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to modify the judgment by striking out all the damages awarded the plaintiff, except the sum of $78; and in all other respects the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

AVERY v. MAUDE. (L. A. 93.)

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — COUNSEL FEES — PLEADING—JUDICIAL NOTICE—PRESUMPTIONS.

On foreclosure of a mortgage, which provides for the payment of a reasonable counsel fee, plaintiff need not allege nor prove employment of counsel as a prerequisite to a recovery of fees, for the court will take judicial notice that one signing the complaint as attorney is an attorney of the court, and it will be presumed that he was employed by plaintiff, and is to be paid a reasonable fee for his services.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by Louisa S. Avery against A. C. Maude for foreclosure of a mortgage. From that part of a judgment in favor of plaintiff allowing counsel fees, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gorham & Pendegast, for appellant. H. C. Campbell and T. W. Lockhart, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage, and judgment was rendered therein in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note secured by the mortgage, and also in a certain amount for counsel fees. The defendant has appealed from that portion of the judgment allowing counsel fees, and urges in support of his appeal that it was not alleged in the complaint, or shown at the trial, that the plaintiff had actually paid or agreed to pay any counsel fees whatever, or that she had employed any counsel to prosecute the action. It is alleged in the complaint that by the terms of the mortgage the appellant agreed to pay all costs and expenses of foreclosure, including counsel fees at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the amount of the debt, and that the same should become due upon the filing of the complaint; and it is further alleged that 5 per cent. is a reasonable counsel fee to be allowed the plaintiff. This allegation of the terms of the mortgage is not denied, but the defendant denied that 5 per cent. is a reasonable counsel fee to be allowed the plaintiff, and alleged that the plaintiff had never employed any counsel to prosecute any action, and had never paid or promised to pay any counsel fee, or incurred any liability for such fees. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should either allege in her complaint or show at the trial, as a prerequisite to her right to recover for counsel fees, that she had employed counsel to prosecute the action, or the amount which she had agreed to pay for their services. The complaint in the action is signed "H. C. Campbell, Attorney for Plaintiff." The court would take judicial notice that he was an attorney of the court, and, in the absence of any other evidence, his signature to the complaint authorized the presumption that he had been employed by the plaintiff to prosecute the action, and that she had become liable to pay him a reasonable fee for his services. It was shown at the trial that 5 per cent. upon the amount of the debt would be a reasonable fee in the case, and, as the appellant offered no evidence in support of his averments, the court was justified in allowing that amount. Rapp v. Gold Co., 74 Cal. 532, 16 Pac. 325; Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 25, 41 Pac. 24. The judgment is affirmed.

MAGLINCHEY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(S. F. 295.)

RAILROADS — INJURIES TO INFANT — MEASURE OF CARE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries received by a boy 17 years old, while attempting to pass between the cars of a freight train to reach a passenger train which he intended taking, an instruction that no recovery could be had if the boy possessed mental capacity to realize the danger to which he was subjecting himself, because the law is that one going into a place of danger assumes the risk, without any restriction as to the qualified measure of care and caution required of one not of full age, was not objectionable, where such qualifications were repeatedly given, and specifically applied in other instructions.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by William Maglinchey, an infant, by his guardian ad litem, Henry Maglinchey, against the Southern Pacific Company. There was a judgment for defendant, and, from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Holman and E. H. Shaw, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to recover for personal injuries. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The injury occurred September 30, 1894, and the plaintiff was 17 years of age in the May preceding. He resided with his father in Berkeley, and came to the West Berkeley station, situate at the corner of Third and Delaware streets, to take the local train to San Francisco. He arrived too late for the train he intended to take, and left the station, and went to watch some boys playing marbles, and when he returned to take the next passenger train, and when he was on the opposite side of the street, a freight train came between him and the passenger train, and blocked Delaware street, as he testified; that he waited four or five minutes, and was afraid he would be left, and undertook to cross between two freight cars on the bumpers, when, without notice by bell or whistle or any warning, the freight train started, and his foot was caught between the bumpers, and injured.

The only error specified by appellant is that the court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction: "And further, in this same line of instruction, I say to you that if you find that he was old enough to know what he was doing at this time; that he was old enough to realize, and had mental capacity enough to realize, that he was going into a dangerous place; that he understood the danger that would be likely to occur to him in climbing across this freight car to reach the passenger train, and chose to take the chances of being injured in his endeavor to get over that freight car,—then he cannot recover, because the law in this case assumes that if a man or a youth voluntarily goes into a place of danger, having knowledge and reasoning capacity sufficient to enable him to determine whether it is or is not dangerous, he cannot recover, because the theory on which this action is predicated is that there has been some breach of duty on the part of the railway company, and that the boy in this case himself was free from negligence."

Several instructions requested by plaintiff, stating with great fullness and particularity the qualifications of the general rule as to due care and caution when applied to one not of full age, had been given by the court, the effect of which, appellant claims, was nullified by the instruction excepted to which was last given. A few passages from these instructions may be quoted: "You cannot measure the act of an infant by the standard applied to an adult person of ordinary prudence. * * * The degree of care exercised by an infant does not require the judgment and thoughtfulness that would be expected of an adult. In judging of the conduct of a boy of the years of this plaintiff, it is expected there should be found impulsiveness, indiscretion, and disregard of danger, and his capacity is measured accordingly. A boy may have all the knowledge of an adult respecting the dangers which would attend a particular act, but, at the same time, he may not have the prudence, thoughtfulness, and discretion to avoid them which are possessed by ordinarily prudent persons of mature years. Hence the rule that the child is not guilty of negligence if he exercises that degree of care which, under like circumstances, a person of his age and capacity would exercise. Whether the plaintiff exercised such a degree of care is for you to decide." These qualifications were reiterated in varying language and form of expression in almost every instruction given. The instruction complained of, though not as full and clear as several of the preceding ones, was not inconsistent with them; and the jury cannot be presumed to have forgotten or disregarded them. The proposition is not controverted that the degree of care and prudence to avoid danger, when applied to children, is that which may reasonably be expected of children of like age, experience, and capacity; but as childhood precedes maturity, and grows into it, the standard by which due care is measured also changes, and each year becomes less marked, until it becomes merged in that by which the care and prudence of men are measured, such change being accelerated or retarded by natural or acquired capacity. These things are so familiar to all men, not only from observation but from individual experience, that it is incredible that the repeated and explicit instructions of the court upon that subject should have been forgotten or overlooked. In the instruction immediately preceding the one excepted to, the court said: "Now, taking this case which is about to be submitted to you, it is for you to say, having seen this young man, this young lad of some eighteen years of age, and noticed his demeanor upon the stand, whether or not he, under the circumstances of this case, exercised such care as could reasonably be expected of a boy of his age." The alleged conflict consists solely of the omission to repeat again the oft-repeated qualification above quoted, and not in the statement of some inconsistent proposition which might have misled the jury. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

FOX v. HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MIN. CO. et al. (S. F. 296.)

JUDGMENT—ENTRY—CONSTRUCTION OF MANDATE

Where, after appeal, an action was remanded, with direction to the trial court to enter a judgment as of the date of its former judgment against certain of the defendants for a certain amount on one of the issues presented, and that there be a new trial as to other defendants and as to all defendants on other issues, such mandate does not authorize the entry of more than a single judgment in the action, which should not be entered until after trial of the issues still undetermined. Harrison and Garoutte, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by M. W. Fox against the Hale & Norcross Silver Mining Company and others. From a judgment against defendants Alvinza Hayward and H. M. Levy, they appeal. Reversed.

W. F. Herrin, Lloyd & Wood, and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for appellants. W. T. Baggett and L. D. McKissick, for respondent. W. H. H. Hart, for Hale & Norcross Silver Min. Co.

VAN FLEET, J. On a former appeal herein (Fox v. Mining Co., 108 Cal. 369, 41 Pac. 308, where the purposes and history of the action are fully stated), the cause was remanded to the superior court, with these directions: "The judgment appealed from is set aside, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment as of the date of its former judgment against Alvinza Hayward and H. M. Levy, for the sum of $210,197.50, with interest from that date, upon the issue presented by the claim for having paid an excessive price for milling the ore in the Mexican and Nevada mills; and upon that issue the order denying a new trial as to these defendants is affirmed. As to the other appellants, except the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, the order denying a new trial as to this issue is reversed, and a new trial thereon ordered. Upon the issue presented by the claim for damages sustained by reason of the imperfect and fraudulent milling, the order denying a new trial is set aside as to all the appellants; and the court is directed upon the evidence already taken in the case, and such other evidence as may be presented by either party, to make findings in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed." Then follow some specific suggestions as to particular facts to be found, not pertinent to be here noticed. Upon the going down of the remittitur upon that appeal, the superior court, on motion of the respondent, and against the objection of the appellants, immediately, and without awaiting the determination of the issues as to which a new trial had been so granted by this court, and before the same had been disposed of, rendered and had entered therein a judgment against the defendants Alvinza Hayward and H. M. Levy, upon the issue as to which the order denying them a new trial had been affirmed, for said sum of $210,197.50, with interest, etc., and making reservation of the other issues as to which a new trial had been granted, substantially in the language of the judgment of this court above recited. From this judgment the defendants Hayward and Levy now appeal.

The main contention of appellants, and the only point we find it necessary to notice, is that the judgment as entered was unauthorized by law or the directions of this court; that there can be but one final judgment in a case, and, as the judgment herein finally determines the rights of the parties as to one of the issues only, leaving and reserving others to be thereafter tried, it is premature and contrary to the course of law. That the judgment as entered is final in form and character as to the issue involved therein no question is made; nor is it controverted that the general rule in this state, as elsewhere, is that there can be but one final judgment in an ordinary civil action or proceeding. It is not necessary for the purposes of this appeal to decide whether or not this case is a suit in equity (as to which see Thomp. Corp. §§ 4472, 4479; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 236a et seq.); nor whether, in a suit in equity in this state, several judgments, each finally determining some of the rights of the parties, can be entered (as to which see Code Civ. Proc. § 647; Thompson v. White, 63 Cal. 505; Watson v. Sutro, 77 Cal. 609, 20 Pac. 88; Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527). This court has no power to review its own final judgments; and we cannot now inquire whether our judgment on the former appeal was or was not warranted by law. The only question we can consider on this appeal is whether the judgment now appealed from was entered in accordance with the mandate of this court. It is, however, certain that the cases, if there are any, which can be taken out of the general rule above stated (that but one judgment, final in effect, if not in form, can be entered), must be altogether exceptional and dependent upon some special considerations. No such considerations have been brought to our attention in this case, nor were any such referred to in our former opinion. In construing our former judgment, therefore, the fair presumption is that no direction to enter a final judgment on some of the issues, in advance of the trial on the remaining issues, was intended. On examining the terms of that judgment, we are unable to find any plain or distinct direction of that kind. The court below was directed to enter a judgment as of the date of its former judgment on the issue as to which a new trial was denied; and as to the remaining issues a new trial was granted. No direction was given as to when the particular judgment ordered should be entered; and the presumption is that it was intended that it should be entered at the same time as, and should constitute a part of, the final judgment to be rendered on all the issues in the case, in accordance with the general course of proceeding in like cases. Nothing less than explicit language to the contrary would justify any other interpretation. We are therefore of opinion that the court below was not authorized to enter the judgment appealed from until all the issues between the parties before the court should be determined; and that, when the court shall have filed its findings upon the issues as to which a new trial has been ordered, it will then be its duty to render a single judgment upon the whole case, which shall include the judgment so heretofore directed to be entered.

It may be added, in justice to the learned judge of the court below, and to counsel for plaintiff, that the language of our former judgment was, perhaps, not happily chosen or altogether clear in this respect, and was possibly, standing alone, open to the construction insisted upon by plaintiff. But when regarded in the light of the general rule of procedure applicable in like cases, as above indicated, such construction cannot, for the reasons stated, be indulged. The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by M. W. Fox against the Hale & Norcross Silver Mining Company and others. From a judgment against him, defendant James Cross, executor, appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Herrin, Lloyd & Wood, and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for appellant. W. T. Baggett and L. D. McKissick, for respondent. W. H. H. Hart, for Hale & Norcross Silver Min. Co.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the executor of the last will of W. S. Hobart, deceased, from a judgment entered against him in said action. The judgment is alike in all substantial respects with the judgment in the case of Fox v. Mining Co. (S. CLINE v. ROBBINS. (Sac. 64.)[1]

MORTGAGE—BILL TO REDEEM—FORM OF JUDGMENT —EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. An action to have a deed absolute on its face declared a mortgage, and for an accounting and other relief, is in the nature of a bill to redeem; and the decree should not be for foreclosure, but that on payment of the amount due within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, the mortgage shall be adjudged to be satisfied, and that if not so paid the action shall be dismissed.

2. To allow plaintiff in a bill to redeem to testify to receipts by defendant of income from the property, where his testimony was based on what he had been told by water-rent payers, was harmless error, the difference between the amount to which he thus testified and that admitted by defendant being slight.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by John T. Cline against H. A. Robbins to have a deed declared a mortgage, for an accounting, and for other relief. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Thos. S. Ford, for appellant. J. M. Walling, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. It is averred in the complaint that on November 5, 1890, plaintiff executed a certain deed of conveyance of certain property known as the "Cline Waterworks," and appurtenances, to the defendant; that while said deed, upon its face, conveyed the title of said property to defendant, yet it was intended by the parties to be a mortgage, as security for the payment by plaintiff to defendant of the sum of $785, with interest at 9 per cent. per annum; and that it was understood between said parties that upon the payment of said sum of money and interest the indenture should become void, and defendant should reconvey the property to plaintiff. It is further averred that defendant wrongfully took possession of said property, and has received the income thereof, which should be applied to the payment of the said averred mortgage. It is further averred that said income so received by defendant is more than sufficient to satisfy the amount secured by said mortgage aforesaid. but that if, upon an accounting, there should that statute. The judgment should be affirmed.

WHITE v. WHITE. (S. F. 485.)

APPEAL—FILING OF TRANSCRIPT—PRACTICE.

Under rule 2 of the supreme court, requiring an appellant to file a transcript of the record within 40 days after the appeal is perfected and the bill of exceptions and statement (if there be any) are settled, a refusal of the trial judge to settle a proposed bill, or its disallowance, are to be regarded as having the same effect as a settlement, and, unless followed by steps to review such action, or looking towards procuring such settlement, within 40 days thereafter, the respondent is entitled to a dismissal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Motion to dismiss the appeal for failing to file the transcript within the time prescribed by rule 2 of this court. Motion granted.

T. C. Spelling, for appellant. Henry E. Highton and Walter H. Linforth, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The judgment from which the appeal is taken was entered in the superior court February 9, 1895, and the appeal therefrom was perfected April 13, 1895. The plaintiff gave notice of his intention to move for a new trial on the 19th of February, 1895, and on March 29th served his proposed bill of exceptions and statement of the case on said motion, to which the defendant proposed amendments. December 6th the proposed bill and amendments came on for settlement before the judge, and he, deeming that the proposed bill did not correctly set forth the proceedings had in the case, outlined the nature of the bill which he would settle, and directed the plaintiff within 60 days from that date to prepare and serve upon the defendant a bill of exceptions in accordance therewith, and gave to the defendant 30 days thereafter within which to propose amendments thereto, after which the usual and statutory proceedings in reference to settlement were to be had. Under this order the plaintiff served his proposed bill of exceptions upon the defendant January 27, 1896. The defendant proposed no amendments thereto, but on February 17th moved the judge to disallow the same, and, after argument thereon in behalf of the respective parties, this motion was granted, and an order made by the judge disallowing the said bill of exceptions. Thereafter, March 2d, the appellant presented the same ex parte to the judge, and requested him to settle and certify the bill, or to fix a day for such settlement; and upon such application the judge refused to settle or certify the same, or any bill of exceptions. No statement or bill of exceptions having been filed, the motion for a new trial was denied February 17th, and no appeal has been taken from that order. After the refusal of the judge to settle the bill of exceptions, the appellant took no further steps or action towards obtaining its settlement, or for the filing of a transcript in this court, and on April 7th the respondent gave notice to the appellant of the present motion to dismiss the appeal.

Rule 2 of this court requires the appellant to file a transcript of the record within 40 days after the appeal is perfected and the bill of exceptions and the statement (if there be any) are settled; and by rule 5 it is provided that, if the transcript be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may, on motion of the respondent, and notice thereof to the appellant, be dismissed. Upon such motion the respondent is only required to show in the first instance that more than 40 days have expired since the perfecting of the appeal, and, in the absence of any further showing on the part of the appellant, the appeal will be dismissed. The rule, however, provides that, if there be a bill of exceptions or statement, the appellant may have 40 days after the same is settled within which to file the transcript. As such a case creates an exception to the time limited by the rule, the burden is upon the appellant to show that he is within the exception, and he must show the existence of such facts as will enable him to avail himself of the exception,—either that a bill of exceptions or a statement has been settled, and that 40 days have not elapsed since the date of its settlement, or that proceedings for its settlement are still pending before the judge. If the time within which the bill of exceptions or statement may be proposed or settled has not expired, or if proceedings for its settlement are still pending before the judge and undetermined by him, the appellant cannot be said to be in default for failure to comply with the rule for filing the transcript. A refusal of the judge to settle the proposed bill, or a disallowance of the same after proceedings for its settlement have been taken before him, should be regarded, for the purposes of the rule, with the same effect as its settlement. The appellant would not know until such action by the judge that the bill would not be settled, and a reasonable construction of the rule would allow him the same time after such disallowance within which to file the transcript as if the bill of exceptions had been settled at that date instead of being disallowed. In the present case the bill of exceptions was disallowed by the judge February 17, 1896, and the appellant thereafter took no steps to review this action of the judge, or looking towards the settlement of the bill, and the present motion was made after the expiration of 40 days therefrom. The fact that a previous motion to dismiss the appeal was pending did not of itself extend the time within which the appellant might file the transcript. Whether the pending of such motion would have been deemed by the court a sufficient ground for extending the time for filing the transcript need not be considered. The appellant made no application for such extension, and the respondent is entitled to enforce the rights conferred upon him by the rule. Shain v. Lumber Co., 98 Cal. 120, 32 Pac. 878. The document which was presented to the judge for settlement as a bill of exceptions consisted of the "findings of fact and conclusions of law" made upon the hearing of the application for a supplemental and final decree, together with the "decree" entered thereon, from which the present appeal was taken; and also a copy of the notice of appeal with proof of its service, and a recital that a sufficient undertaking on appeal had been filed with the clerk. Neither of these matters would be properly included in a bill of exceptions. The first two were already matters of record, and did not need the authentication of the judge in a bill of exceptions in order to have them considered upon appeal; and the notice of appeal and undertaking on appeal were made subsequent to the matter appealed from, and could in no way have affected the action of the court. The motion is granted.

HUGHES et al. v. ALSIP. (Sac. 29.)[1]

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL — NOTICE — DEFECTS — WAIVER BY APPELLEE—RULINGS—REVIEW—ATTORNEY'S FEE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY AFTER VERDICT.

1. A ruling on a motion for a new trial will not be reviewed where the notice of motion fails, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, to state whether the motion will be based on affidavits, minutes of the court, bill of exceptions, or statement.

2. On appeal both from a judgment and an order denying a new trial, the appellee does not waive objections to defects in the notice of motion for a new trial by presenting amendments to the appellant's bill of exceptions.

3. Where plaintiff united in a single action several causes of action on separate assessments against the same defendant, and recovered on all, he was entitled to a single attorney's fee of $15, under St. 1885, p. 157, § 12, authorizing suit against the owner of land assessed to enforce the assessment, and providing that, if successful, plaintiff shall recover $15, as an attorney's fee, in addition to the taxable costs.

4. After verdict, and in the absence of a demurrer, an averment in a complaint, which has referred to the city council as the "board of trustees," that notice was posted "at or near the office door of the said board of trustees," is sufficient to show compliance with a law requiring it to be posted "on or near the council chamber door of said council."

Action by Hughes & Twaddle against E. K. Alsip. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Modified.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. White, Hughes & Seymore, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Action to foreclose several liens for street assessments in Sacramento city. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The motion for a new trial cannot be considered, though that question is not of much consequence here, because nearly all of appellant's points are made on the alleged insufficiency of the complaint. The notice of motion for a new trial does not state what it will be based on; that is, it does not state whether it would be made upon affidavits, minutes of the court, bill of exceptions, or statement, as required by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Respondents are not estopped from making this point because they presented amendments to a certain bill of exceptions proposed by appellant, and took part in the settlement of said bill. Appellant had the right to a bill of exceptions to be used on his appeal from the judgment, and an objection by respondents that his notice of motion for a new trial was defective would not have affected his right to have the bill settled. He could have waived his motion for a new trial, and still have been entitled to his bill of exceptions. If this contention of appellant were about a statement on motion for a new trial, it would present a different aspect. The respondents moved in the court below that the motion for a new trial be dismissed for the defect in the notice above stated. The only questions in the case arise upon the judgment roll; that is, whether the complaint, to which no demurrer was interposed, is sufficient, after trial on the merits, to sustain the judgment, and whether the judgment grants any unauthorized relief.

Where there has been no demurrer, and the case has been tried on its merits, an appellate court will not reverse a judgment for plaintiff on account of alleged deficiencies of the complaint, unless it entirely fails to state material facts necessary to constitute a cause of action. Merely defective or imperfect statements of such facts will not warrant a reversal. They will be considered as cured by the verdict. Treanor v. Houghton, 103 Cal. 53, 36 Pac. 1081; Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. 659; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 167; 1 Chit. Pl. 673. In the case at bar, appellant makes many objections to the sufficiency of the complaint which we do not deem called upon to notice in detail. It is enough to say that the complaint, as a whole, states a cause of action upon which respondents were entitled to the judgment rendered. Indeed, it is not clear that any of the necessary averments can be considered as defectively or imperfectly stated. In answer to appellant's leading points, we may say that the complaint shows that the city council or board of trustees did sufficiently determine the work to be done so as to acquire jurisdiction; that the work was sufficiently described in the resolutions of intention; that it was not left to the discretion of the superintendent of streets to determine how much work was to be done, but that it was to be done in accordance with specifications prepared by the city surveyor, and filed with the board, upon which the bids were made; that the posting of notice "at or near the office door of the said board of trustees" is a sufficient averment of a compliance with the provision of the law requiring the notice to be posted "on or near the council chamber door of said council"; and that the substance of the warrants, and the returns thereon, are sufficiently averred, at least in the absence of a demurrer, and after trial, at which, it is presumed, all essential facts were proven.

Six different causes of action, arising out of assessment liens against six different lots belonging to appellant, are united, each being stated in a separate count. No objection is made that these different causes of action are improperly united, but in the judgment the respondents are given a statutory attorney's fee of $15 for each of the said six causes of action. Appellant contends that respondents are entitled, under section 12 of the act (St. 1885, p. 157), to only one attorney's fee of $15, and this contention must be sustained. The said section provides that "the contractor, or his assignee, may sue, in his own name, the owner of the land, lots or portions of lots assessed * * *; and in all cases of recovery under the provisions of this act the plaintiff shall recover the sum of fifteen dollars, in addition to the taxable costs, as attorneys' fees." This clearly means a $15 attorney's fee for each action, no matter how many causes of action it may include. The consideration that, if respondents had brought six separate actions and had recovered judgment in each, the burden of the costs against appellant would have been heavier, does not change the plain language of the statute. A plaintiff may, perhaps, sometimes consider that if he should bring several actions, instead of one, and should be defeated, the burden of costs against him would be heavier. At all events, under the language of the statute, if he brings only one action he can get only one attorney's fee. The judgment will therefore have to be modified in this respect. The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify the judgment by striking out the words and figures, "and for $15.00 attorney's fees," wherever they occur, except in the first subdivision of said judgment. The judgment as thus amended will stand affirmed.

STRATTON'S ESTATE v. MORGAN et al.

(S. F. 279.)

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. Testatrix, in an olographic will, after bequeathing certain personal property, gave "to E., my large mirror. He has been a good young man to us"; and then specified certain other articles to be given to him, such bequest being followed by the words, "I reserve the right to sell any article if we need the money." Following this clause, and separated therefrom by a large space, were the words, "Common bedsteads * * * and all the rest of the furniture and all money in whatever shape he will have full control after all expenses is paid of my sickness and death," after which came the signature of testatrix, and at the left, lower down, was written, "My husband, Thomas Stratton." Held, that the husband, not E., was the residuary legatee.

2. Evidence of certain unfriendly treatment of testatrix by her husband is not admissible to show that she intended to exclude him from her will.

3. A motion to dismiss an appeal for failure of the transcript to show service of notice of appeal on one of the parties will be denied, where proof of service is made at the hearing of the motion.

Department 1. Appear from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Petition by the administrator of Georgiana Hanham Stratton, deceased, for the distribution of the estate. From a judgment ordering distribution of the residuary estate to Eugene F. Smith, defendants Morgan and others appeal. Reversed.

Spalsbury & Burke, for appellants. W. M. Beggs, W. A. Beasley, and John G. Jury, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The administrator with the will annexed of the above estate presented to the superior court a petition for the distribution of the estate, alleging therein that the residue thereof was bequeathed by the decedent to her husband, Thomas Stratton. This distribution was contested by the respondent herein, and upon the hearing of the application the court distributed the residue in the hands of the administrator to him. We are of the opinion, however, that upon a proper construction of the will the testatrix intended that her husband should be the residuary legatee of her estate. The will is an olographic one, and the following is a copy thereof:

“CALIFORNIA WATSONVILLE SATA CRUZ CO }
“March 8th 1893 }

“I, Mrs Georgiana Hanham Stratton

“My last will, is, Within Two monnths of my death I give to my Stept daghter Mrs Mary Ellen Hanham Smith now reside in Stockton Cal.

“Common Beadsteads with Feather Bead and all the rest of the Furniture and all Money in what Ever Shape he will have full controle after all Expenses is Paid of my sickness and death

Mrs Georgiana Hanham
“my Husband Stratton
“Thomas Stratton.”

From the foregoing copy of the will it will be seen that after apportioning her personal belongings to some of her female friends she mentions the respondent, to whom she gives a large mirror, and then, as if to give a reason for making him one of her beneficiaries, says, “He has been a good young man to us.” She then specifies certain other articles of furniture to be given to him, and, after enumerating these articles, inserts after them the following clause: “I reserve the right to sell any article if we need the money.” This clause would be peculiarly appropriate in a gift to a stranger, but would be entirely unsuitable in a gift to her husband; and from its position in the will, being applicable to the articles previously enumerated rather than to those subsequently named, tends to show that in the mind of the testator she intended them to form a bequest distinct from the other articles. By the “we” therein referred to, as by the “us” in the early part of the bequest to the respondent, the testatrix evidently referred to her husband and herself. A further indication that this portion was a separate bequest in her mind, rather than a continuation of the prior bequest to the respondent, appears from the fact that after writing this reserving clause a space considerably greater than between the written lines on the page is left blank before the concluding bequest is written. There is no legatee named in the body of this concluding portion of the will, but underneath, and at the left hand thereof, are written the words, “my husband Thomas Stratton.” Taken by themselves, these words have no apparent connection with the other portions of the will, but the testatrix must be deemed to have written them with the intention that some effect should be given them, and that intention, so far as it can be gathered from the will itself and the circumstances under which it was executed, is to be ascertained by the court, and effect given thereto accordingly. The order in which the words of a will are written is not determinative of the testator's intention, and under a well-recognized rule this order will be transposed, if thereby the intention of the testator can be ascertained. So, too, a word that has been manifestly omitted, and is essential to an understanding of the intention of the testator, will be supplied. Mitchell v. Donohue, 100 Cal. 202, 34 Pac. 614. If these words had been written at the beginning of this concluding portion of the will, even without any words of gift, the intention of the testatrix that her husband should have this property would be undoubted. So, too, if they had been written at the close of the will in direct continuation thereof, prior to the signature of the testatrix, the same intention would have been manifest, even if the preposition “to” had been omitted. The statute does not require that an olographic will shall be “subscribed by the testator at the end thereof.” It is sufficient that it be “signed” by him (Civ. Code, § 1277), and this signing may be at the beginning or in any part of the document. 1 Jarm. Wills (6th Ed.) p. 113. See In re Walker's Estate (Cal.) 42 Pac. 815. When authenticated by his signature, all the remaining portion of the document is to be construed as expressing his will; and effect, if possible, is to be given to all of the language found therein.

The testatrix did not name an executor for her will, but in the portion under consideration is the clause, “He will have full control after the expenses is paid of my sickness and death.” She must be assumed to have known that, in the absence of an executor named in the will, her husband would be entitled to the administration of her estate, and would be the person to pay the expenses of her sickness and death; and her declaration that “he” will have full control must be held to have referred to him. It is very clear that the person thus referred to as “he” is the one to whom she intended to give her common bedsteads, and all the rest of the furniture, and the use of the phrase “all the rest” of the furniture is quite cogent for holding that the furniture thus disposed of constituted a different bequest from that made to the respondent. If she had intended that the respondent should have all her furniture, and be her residuary legatee, this expression would have been unnecessary. The same person, however, who is to receive "all the rest" of the furniture is the "he" who will have full control of her estate. We think that the language of her will sufficiently shows that she intended that this person should be her husband. The finding of the court that these words were intended to be merely descriptive of the testatrix is without any support, either from the will itself or from the evidence offered at the hearing. Aside from being a very unusual mode to be employed by a wife for describing herself,—one would have expected her to say "wife of Thomas Stratton" after her signature,—the position of the words is inconsistent with this conclusion of the court.

The testimony of the witnesses to their observation of certain unfriendly treatment of the testatrix by her husband should not have been admitted by the court. Such testimony is incompetent to authorize a conclusion that either of them intended to exclude the other from his estate. None of these witnesses testified to anything more than their own observation; nor did they testify that the testatrix had ever expressed any other than the most wifely feeling towards her husband, and it is not to be assumed that she would disregard her duty as a wife merely because in the opinion of others her husband had been unkind to her. Temporary bickerings and passionate utterances between husband and wife are consistent with conjugal affection, and with a devotion of each to the other in preference to all other persons. For the same reason the court should not have received evidence of the friendly conduct of the respondent towards the testatrix.

A motion was made to dismiss the appeal herein for failure of the transcript to show a service of the notice of appeal upon the administrator of the decedent's estate. At the hearing of this motion, proof of such service was made, and the ground for the dismissal was thus obviated. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. CAVANAUGH. (Cr. No. 123.)

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS—PRIMARIES—OFFENSES—APPLICATION OF STATUTE.

The "Purity of Elections Act" (St. 1893, p. 12), entitled "An act to promote the purity of elections by regulating the conduct thereof, and to support the privilege of free suffrage by prohibiting certain acts and practices in relation thereto, and providing for the punishment thereof," does not apply to primary elections, which are merely creations of political parties and associations, and may be held at such times and places, and on such terms and conditions, as may seem fit.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

B. W. Cavanaugh was indicted for a violation of the "Purity of Elections Act." A general demurrer to the indictment was sustained, and the state appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. Johnson & Johnson and C. T. Jones, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was charged by indictment with the commission of a felony. A general demurrer was sustained to the indictment, and the people appealed. The prosecution is based upon an alleged violation of the "Purity of Elections Act." St. 1893, p. 12. The charging portion of the indictment alleges that defendant "did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly give to one George Vice a certain sum of money, to wit, the sum of one hundred dollars, in lawful money of the United States of America, to induce said George Vice to procure, at a certain Republican primary election which was duly and regularly called by the Republican county central committee of the Republican party at Sacramento county, in the state of California, and was to be and was duly and regularly held in Sacramento county, state of California, on the 25th day of August, 1894, the election of certain persons, to wit [naming them] as delegates to a certain Republican county convention to be held in Sacramento city, state of California, on Tuesday, the 28th day of August, 1894, which said convention was duly and regularly called for the purpose of nominating candidates for the various legislative, county, district, township, and city offices to be voted for at the next general state election." It will be observed that defendant was charged with attempting, by the use of money, to influence the election of certain delegates at a Republican primary election. It is now claimed that the "Purity of Elections Act" does not apply to primary elections, and this court is in accord with such contention. A primary election is purely a creation of political parties and associations. These parties and associations may hold such elections, or they may not. It is not compulsory upon them, and, if they do hold such elections, they may hold them at such hours, at such places, and upon such terms and conditions, as to them may seem fit. While there is a law upon the statute books providing the machinery for holding primary elections, it is not in any sense mandatory upon political parties to invoke its provisions, but, upon the contrary, a resort to its provisions is a mere matter of choice. It follows from the foregoing that no importance can be attached to the words found in the indictment stating that this primary election was "duly and regularly called"; for these words are not equivalent to the statement, and do not even convey the idea, that it was held under the provisions of the Political Code, inasmuch as such election could have been "duly and regularly called" in entire disregard of the provisions of that Code, for, as we have seen, political parties are a law unto themselves, as to the conduct of primary elections.

Another question presents itself, which cuts deeper than the one to which we have already adverted. The attorney general has been able to place his finger upon but a single provision of this law which looks towards the support of this indictment, and that provision is subdivision 3 of section 19. Among other things, section 19 provides: "It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by himself or through any other person: (1) To pay, lend or contribute, or offer or promise to pay, lend or contribute, any money or other valuable consideration to or for any voter, or to or for any other person, to induce such voter to vote or refrain from voting at any election * * * (2) To give, offer or promise any office, place or employment, or to promise to procure or endeavor to procure any office, place or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce such voter to vote or refrain from voting at any election. * * * (3) To make any gift, loan, promise, offer, procurement or agreement, as aforesaid, to, for or with any person in order to induce such person to procure, or endeavor to procure, the election of any person or the vote of any voter at any election." The word "election," as here used in subdivision 3 and the other subdivisions of section 19, does not refer to primary elections. The "Purity of Elections Law" is entitled "An act to promote the purity of elections by regulating the conduct thereof, and to support the privilege of free suffrage by prohibiting certain acts and practices in relation thereto, and providing for the punishment thereof." In the body of this act may be found the word "election" a hundred times or more, and it may be said in every instance that it is plainly apparent that the word is not used as applying to primary elections. The words "primary election" are found in the act, in subdivision 8 of section 19, and in section 25, but in neither of these places in the law does this indictment find any support. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

LOOSE v. STANFORD. (S. F. 11.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—EVIDENCE—CONTRACTS.

Plaintiff, while his mare was on the ranch of defendant's decedent, entered into negotiations for its sale to decedent, through an agent authorized to sell only the mare. Subsequently, after the mare had given birth to a colt, the agent testified that he sold both to decedent, the communications between the parties being by telegraph. Plaintiff permitted decedent to retain possession of the colt for 12 years, during the first three of which the colt developed as a wonderful trotter, and, during the time, asked decedent to give him an additional sum as a gratuity, on account of his good luck in the purchase. Held, that a finding that plaintiff sold both the mare and colt to decedent would not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by W. A. R. Loose against Leland Stanford, which, on the death of defendant, was continued against Jane L. Stanford, his executrix. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes and Frank Shay, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought December 2, 1891, against the testator, Leland Stanford, to recover possession of a trotting mare commonly known as "Hinda Rose," or for the recovery of $50,000, the value of said Hinda Rose, in case a delivery of said mare cannot be had, and $25,000 damages, etc. Defendant answered, denying the ownership of plaintiff; averred that about February, 1880, he purchased said Hinda Rose from the plaintiff, and ever since has been, and still is, the owner of, and in possession of, said mare, etc. Defendant further pleads the bar of plaintiff's cause of action under subdivision 3 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant departed this life pendente lite, and Jane L. Stanford, the executrix of his last will, was substituted as defendant. The claim of plaintiff was presented to the executrix for allowance, and was by her rejected, which matters were set up by supplemental complaint. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, written findings filed, in favor of defendant, upon the issues of ownership and the statute of limitations, upon which findings judgment went for defendant, from which judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The entire question in the case turns upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court. Counsel for appellant contend that there is practically no dispute as to the facts, and that the issues involved are of law. They then proceed to demonstrate that, upon the facts as assumed by them, Leland Stanford was the bailee of a mare known as "Beautiful Bells"; that, while in his possession, this mare gave birth to the colt Hinda Rose; that plaintiff sold the mare, but not the colt, to Stanford; that as a result the animal Hinda Rose remained in possession of Stanford, as bailee, for some 12 years, when plaintiff demanded possession of her, which was refused; that this refusal operated as a conversion; and that, as the action was brought within three years next thereafter, the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations, and hence that plaintiff is entitled to recover. Assuming the premises of appellant's counsel to be correct, we agree fully with their conclusion. We think, however, that, while there is no substantial conflict in the evidence as to the main probative facts, the inferences to be deduced therefrom—the ultimate facts upon which the case turns—are open to grave doubt; and while, upon the case as presented by the record, we are not impelled with mathematical certainty to the result reached by the court below, there are yet cogent reasons leading to such result. The testimony is too lengthy for recapitulation. The following summary will convey some idea of its trend. The plaintiff lived at Bodie, Mono county, and was the owner of Beautiful Bells, a brood mare. Defendant, Leland Stanford, was the owner of Palo Alto ranch, upon which he was conducting the business of stock-breeding, and rearing trotting and running horses. In March, 1879, plaintiff caused his mare Beautiful Bells to be sent to Stanford's stock farm, where she was mated with Electioneer, a stallion owned and kept by Stanford. The mare remained on the ranch until the following spring, when, on February 27th, she gave birth to a colt, the subject of the litigation in this cause. Early in the winter, Stanford had seen and admired Beautiful Bells, and had authorized Harris F. Covey, his superintendent, to purchase her, if he could do so at a reasonable figure. F. W. Covey, who was at times secretary, and at others assistant superintendent of the stock farm, held a power of attorney from plaintiff authorizing him to sell Beautiful Bells to Stanford for $2,000. This was more than Stanford was willing to give, and the negotiations were broken off until the month of March or 1st of April, 1880 (after the birth of the colt), when plaintiff telegraphed accepting an offer on behalf of Stanford to pay $1,200, and remit a bill of $200 and upward, ranch fees, etc., upon the mare. The money was paid to plaintiff, and the mare and colt sold to Stanford, or, as the witness F. W. Covey says: "Under that power of attorney, I sold Beautiful Bells and her filly, and made the transfers on the books of the Palo Alto stock farm at that date. The books show placed to the credit of Leland Stanford." The negotiations for the sale were both before and after the birth of the filly, of which last fact plaintiff was advised; and Stanford understood, and has always claimed, that he purchased both the dam and colt. Thus matters rested for, say, 11 years, during which the filly, Hinda Rose, was trained as a trotter, making phenomenal speed, and in her yearling, two and three year old, form, beating the then world's record for trotters. At three years of age she broke down, and became useless as a trotter, whereupon she was placed in stock as a breeder, but has never produced any colts. In the month of November, 1891, plaintiff called at the Palo Alto stock farm, was introduced to Senator Stanford, and stated to the latter, according to the testimony of Marvin, one of the witnesses, "that as she had turned to be such a valuable brood mare, and as he had bought her from him, he thought he could afford to give him something. He stated, 'Senator, I have no claim on you whatever, but I think you could afford to give me something.'" Several other witnesses who were present at the same conversation stated, in effect, that plaintiff claimed that, as Beautiful Bells had done so well, he thought Stanford would be willing to do something for him, etc. Hinda Rose was not mentioned in this conversation. Plaintiff was a witness in his own behalf, and only stated that he never sold, or authorized the sale of, Hinda Rose. The court below may well have reasoned something in this wise: (1) Plaintiff must have known of the renown attained by Hinda Rose, or he would not have been so deeply impressed with the success of Beautiful Bells, whose only claim to greatness, so far as appears, consisted in her being the dam of the former. (2) Knowing of the success of the colt, it is preposterous to suppose that he considered himself its owner, and yet for 11 years never mentioned the fact, or asserted his claim of ownership. (3) The claim that Beautiful

Bells had done so well for Senator Stanford that plaintiff supposed the former would be willing to do something for him was not compatible with his claim of ownership, for the reason that if Hinda Rose belonged to him he was the fortunate man, and not Stanford. These and other circumstances, not very important when considered singly, but all pointing in a given direction, were, we think, when combined, sufficient to warrant the court below in finding that the negotiations which began before the birth of the colt, and were not consummated until it was in esse, culminated in the sale of both, and were so understood by the plaintiff at the time, as it certainly was by the defendant; and, as a consequence, warranted the finding of the ultimate fact of ownership in defendant, and the further finding, as a sequence thereof, that the claim of plaintiff was barred under the three-years limitation of the statute. It must be borne in mind that defendant, Stanford, did not himself conduct the negotiations, and that Harris F. Covey, who acted for him, had died before the cause was tried. F. W. Covey, who held the power of attorney from the plaintiff, was not authorized thereby to sell the colt, but the final sale was the result of telegraphic communications; and, as they are lost, we can only conclude as to the result of them by the circumstances and conduct of the parties, all of which are consistent with a sale, and inconsistent with any rational theory of continued ownership in plaintiff. We therefore recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

PLATT v. BUTCHER. (No. 18,324.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—CONTRACT REQUIRED TO BE IN WRITING—EXTENSION BY PAROL.

Under the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6), requiring "an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or commission" to be in writing, a valid extension of such a written agreement cannot be made by parol.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by G. N. Platt against William Butcher. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. A. Lamont, for appellant. A. J. Dobbins and Chas. A. Swisler, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by a real-estate broker to recover commissions upon a sale of real estate. Judgment went against defendant, and he appeals. The contract of employment was in writing, and by its terms was to remain in full force and effect until September 1, 1885. A short time prior to that date, by parol agreement, the time for performance was extended; and during such extension of time the broker found a purchaser for the land, and a sale was made. The merits of the present litigation are dependent solely upon the validity of the parol agreement extending the time for performance.

By section 1624 of the Civil Code, certain contracts are declared invalid "unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent. * * * (6) An agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or commission." And this provision of law is invoked to defeat plaintiff's claims. But section 1698 of the same Code declares that a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise; and plaintiff insists that the parol extension of time for the performance of the original written contract, coupled with the fact that he found a purchaser within such extension, to whom the land was sold, constitutes an executed parol agreement, and thereby validates the contract. Plaintiff has no cause of action, upon the showing made. The parol agreement in this case was a covenant to extend the time for the performance of a certain contract. If that covenant be construed as one in effect covering all the terms of the original written contract, then it was not an alteration or variation of that contract, but the creation of a new one, and, to be valid, should have been in writing. If the covenant be simply and solely one extending the time for the performance of a prior written contract, it cannot be that "oral agreement" spoken of in said section 1698; for it is not the original contract, as altered, which must be executed, but the oral agreement alone, and an oral agreement simply extending time cannot be executed, for there is nothing to execute. No affirmative action is required. Such an agreement calls for nothing to be done, and expires by mere lapse of time.

Another view of this matter, even more conclusive against plaintiff's contention, presents itself: An oral agreement does not alter a contract in writing until it becomes an executed oral agreement. The oral agreement relied upon in this case was not valid when made, for it was not executed at that time. According to plaintiff's claims, it was not executed until months after September 1, 1885,—the time fixed for the expiration of the original contract itself. Upon September 1, 1885, the written contract expired by express provision, unless some valid agreement then in existence kept it alive, but at that time there was no valid agreement in existence. The oral agreement was no agreement until executed, and it was not executed until long after that date, and when executed there was no existing contract in writing which might or could be altered. The date when an oral agreement takes effect as altering a written contract is the date when it is executed. It then has the same effect as an agreement in writing of that date altering the original contract. Under the facts of this case, at the time the oral agreement was executed there was no contract in writing upon which an executed oral agreement could take effect. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

TATE v. FRATT. (Sac. 28.) 1

PARTY WALLS—RIGHT TO MAKE ADDITIONS—OPINION EVIDENCE—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO FINDING—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. The east wall of plaintiff's building was the west wall of defendant's, and by it the joists of both buildings were supported. The wall from the base to the grade was 16 inches thick, from there to the ceiling 12 inches, and above the ceiling to the top of the fire wall 8 inches, the offset being on plaintiff's side. Held, that the wall must be considered as a party wall throughout its whole extent, upon which either party had the right to make additions.

2. Where a witness testifying as to a survey and monuments incidentally stated, "I do not think the down-town monuments were changed," the remark was inconsequential, and the overruling of an objection thereto was not prejudicial.

3. An inadmissible remark having been made before the making of an objection to its admission, the proper remedy was by motion to strike out, a failure to adopt which constituted a waiver of objection.

4. A witness, being asked if he could tell whether plaintiff's or defendant's building was constructed first, answered that defendant's building was first erected, and gave the facts showing such to be the case. Held, that the testimony was not objectionable, as being opinion evidence.

5. An objection to a finding of fact containing no specification of the particulars wherein the finding was not justified by the evidence will not be considered on appeal.

Action by J. D. Tate against F. W. Fratt to enjoin defendant from making additions to a party wall. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Hart, for appellant. Holl & Dunn, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff and defendant are the owners of adjacent lots, situate in the block bounded by I and J and Third and Fourth streets, in the city of Sacramento, each lot having a frontage of 20 feet on J street, and a depth of 100 feet. Many years ago, brick buildings, then two stories high, but now only one story above the grade of J street, were erected on these lots by the grantors of plaintiff and defendant. Up to 1881 defendant's building extended back from J street only 70 feet, but in that year it was enlarged so as to cover the whole lot. The east wall of plaintiff's building is the west wall of defendant's building, and by it the joists of both buildings are supported. This wall, at its base and extending as high as the present grade of J street, is 16 inches thick, and above that to the ceiling joists it is 12 inches thick, and from there to the top of the fire wall, about 4 feet, it is 8 inches thick; the offset of 4 inches being on the plaintiff's side of the wall. The defendant concluded to add another story to his building, and for that purpose commenced to build up the said 8-inch wall. When he had built it up about 6 feet, the plaintiff brought this action to obtain an injunction restraining him from constructing the new wall or any wall on the old 8-inch wall. It was alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff was the owner of the lot on which his building stood, and of a strip of land along the west side of defendant's lot about 8 inches in width; that the said wall was wholly on his land, and was owned by him; that the wall was not sufficient in strength to support a building higher than his own building; that defendant had commenced to construct, and was engaged in constructing, on the top of the east wall of plaintiff's building, another and additional wall, eight inches in thickness, and that he intended to construct the same about 14 feet high, and make it the west wall of the second story of the building east of plaintiff's building; and that defendant was constructing the said wall with 6 openings for windows therein, facing to the west, and over the top of plaintiff's said building. The defendant, by his answer, alleged that he was the owner of the west quarter of lot 7, on which his building was constructed, and denied that plaintiff was the owner of a strip of land along the west side of said lot, about 8 inches or any number of inches wide, or ever had possession thereof; alleged that the wall in controversy stands wholly upon his lot, and no part thereof stands or ever stood upon land belonging to the plaintiff; alleged that neither the plaintiff nor his grantors ever owned the said wall or had any possession thereof, other than such as he or they acquired by using the same to insert therein and rest upon it the floor and ceiling joists and roof timbers of his building, and to inclose the eastern side of said building; alleged that, before he was informed of this proceeding to enjoin him, he had commenced the construction of a second story upon his building, and had constructed a new wall,

1. Rehearing denied.

8 inches thick and about 6 feet high, on top of the old 8-inch wall, which was intended to form the western wall of his said second story; and denied that he intended to construct the new wall to a greater height than 10 feet and 6 inches; denied that he intended to make any openings for windows or for any other purpose in said new wall, except such as had already been made before the injunction was granted; and alleged that he was ready and willing to close up said openings and windows with a solid brick wall.

The court found, among other things, that the wall in controversy stands wholly upon the defendant's lot; that "this wall when originally built was intended as a party wall, and when it was afterwards raised in height, and extended further back, it continued to be a party wall, and the same now is, and during all the dates and time mentioned in the complaint it was, a party wall, and has been used as such by the adjacent owners ever since its construction, except the north thirty feet thereof, which was not used by defendant until he extended his building back the additional thirty feet in 1881, but this extension was built as and for a party wall, and has been used as such by the defendant continuously since 1881"; that the new wall which defendant had commenced to build "does not interfere in any way with plaintiff's building, and it does not endanger the said party wall on plaintiff's said building"; and that "the eight-inch wall constructed by the defendant on top of said party wall is a solid wall, and has no opening for either doors or windows." And, as conclusions of law, the court found that the defendant had a right to raise said party wall to the height of his second story by constructing an eight-inch wall on the top thereof, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction restraining defendant from constructing said wall; that the plaintiff had not been damaged by any act of the defendant; and that the defendant was entitled to judgment dismissing the action. Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

Most of the findings of fact above referred to are assailed as not justified by the evidence, but we do not deem it necessary to follow the arguments of counsel in their discussion of these questions. The principal question in the case is, was the wall on which defendant had commenced to build a party wall? We think it clearly appears from the evidence that it was, and that the court was fully justified in so finding.

Whether the said wall stands wholly upon defendant's lot or not is a question which need not be considered. It arose only incidentally, and the finding upon it would not be determinative as to the true line between the lots if the wall should be torn down, and a controversy should then arise as to that line. It is not necessary that a party wall should stand half upon each of the adjoining parcels of land. It may stand half upon each, or wholly upon one, and may or may not be the common property of the two proprietors. Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) p. 386; Bloch v. Isham, 92 Am. Dec. 289. And it seems to be settled law that, where there is a party wall, each of the owners may increase the height thereof when it can be done without injury to the adjoining building, and without impairing the value of the cross-easements to which the adjoining proprietor is entitled. Brooks v. Curtis, 10 Am. Rep. 545; Graves v. Smith, (Ala.) 6 South. 308; Everett v. Edwards (Mass.) 22 N. E. 52. Here the evidence was quite sufficient to show that the wall could be constructed without injury to the adjoining building.

The finding that the new wall constructed by defendant "is a solid wall, and has no opening for either doors or windows," is objected to as not sustained by the evidence or by the pleadings. But the statement contains no specification of the particulars wherein this finding is not justified by the evidence, and the objection as to the sufficiency of the evidence cannot therefore be considered. It will be presumed, and nothing to the contrary appears, that before the trial defendant had closed up the openings in the wall, which he at first left, as he stated in his answer he was ready and willing to do. We do not think any supplemental answer was necessary setting up the fact that he had closed the openings.

Two rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence are urged as erroneous.

The witness Boyd was a surveyor, and, in giving his testimony, stated: "I do not think the down-town monuments were changed." Counsel for plaintiff then objected to the witness testifying as to what he thought about the matter, and the objection was overruled. The witness had been testifying about certain monuments, and a survey made by Mr. Bassett, and incidentally made the said remark. No motion was made to strike the remark out, and the witness went on testifying as to the facts without objection. It is clear that there was no prejudicial error in the ruling complained of as to this witness, for two reasons: (1) The remark objected to was entirely inconsequential. (2) The remark was made before the objection, and, if counsel deemed it injurious to his case, a motion should have been made to strike it out.

The witness Goodell had lived in the city of Sacramento 43 years, and was an architect by profession, and had been engaged in the business of his profession for 25 years. He was asked: "Could you tell, from your examination, as to whether Tate's building or Fratt's building was constructed first?" The question was objected to by counsel for plaintiff, upon the ground that the answer would involve a matter of opinion, and the testimony was not admissible. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered: "Fratt's building was constructed first. There is every evidence to prove it." He then went on to state the reasons why he knew it must be so. The witness was not asked his opinion, but whether he could tell which building was constructed first; and, in giving his answer, he stated the facts within his knowledge and observation, and not his opinion. The ruling was therefore proper, but, if otherwise, we fail to see that the plaintiff was in any way prejudiced by it.

The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

ANDERSON v. PACIFIC BANK. (S. F. 270.)

BANKS—SPECIAL DEPOSITS—INTEREST.

1. Plaintiff, under an agreement with a bank, deposited with it $2,000, to secure the bank and the sureties it might procure, from liability as bail, and received a receipt reciting the deposit, and that it was payable on return of the certificate and release from liability on bail bond. The money, without the consent of plaintiff, went into the bank vaults through the regular channels. Held, that the deposit was special, and therefore, on the insolvency of the bank, plaintiff did not stand merely in the same position as the general creditors of the bank.

2. On refusal of the bank to return the money, the liability on the bail bond having terminated, plaintiff is entitled to interest from the date of the demand, and not from the date of the termination of liability as bail.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Sawyer & Burnett, for appellant. H. W. Hutton, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment given in favor of plaintiff under the following facts: Plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby defendant agreed to furnish bail for Harry Christian and Martin Olsen, who had been held for trial before the superior court. To protect defendant, and the sureties it might furnish, from liability or loss, plaintiff agreed to deposit with defendant the sum of $2,000 in gold coin as a pledge. Plaintiff delivered the money to McDonald, the acting president of the bank, leaving it with him in the president's room. He received from the bank the following acknowledgment: "Edw. Anderson has deposited in this bank two thousand dollars ($2,000), in gold coin, payable to self or order, on return of the certificate properly indorsed. (Payable only on release of bonds.) (Not subject to check.) R. H. McDonald, Jr., Vice President. W. S. Morse, Teller." The money afterwards, but without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, went into the bank vaults, through the regular channels. The bonds were furnished, and neither defendant nor the sureties were subjected to any liability or loss thereunder. Subsequently, the defendants in the criminal charge were surrendered into custody by their bondsmen, and plaintiff thereafter, upon February 26, 1894, made demand upon defendant, which had meanwhile become insolvent, for a return of the money pledged. The bank refused a return, and this action was instituted.

Under this statement, which is taken from the findings, appellant contends that the facts disclose a general, and not a special, deposit with the bank, and that, upon the bank's insolvency, plaintiff stands in the same position as that occupied by the general creditors of the institution. It is unquestionably true that one making a general deposit with a bank in the usual course of business parts with title to the moneys deposited. In the case of a special deposit, however, which is a mere bailment, the rule is the same with banking institutions as with individuals. Whether the special deposit be under a contract of bailment for the better protection of the bailor's property, or under a contract of pledge as security for some specific obligation of the pledgor, title does not pass to the bailee or pledgee, but remains in the pledgor. The pledgee acquires no right to make general use of the property. Civ. Code, §§ 1835, 2888. It would seem, therefore, that in this case the question is completely disposed of by the finding of the court that the money was given and received as a pledge, and by the additional finding that it was afterwards carried into the bank's vaults through the regular channels without the knowledge or consent of the pledgor. But, indeed, all of the circumstances found substantiate the ultimate finding that the deposit was a special one, while none are inconsistent with it. Defendant demanded a delivery to it of $2,000, not for banking purposes, but to protect the bondsmen it might procure. There was reason why the plaintiff should make a special deposit of $2,000 with the bank as bailee, and none at all why he should make a commercial deposit of that sum. The money was delivered in a manner strictly in accord with the idea of a pledge, but quite inconsistent with the notion of an ordinary banking deposit. The so-called "certificate of deposit" issued by the bank is not a certificate of deposit, but a mere receipt, expressing, though briefly, the contract of pledge. Every contract by which possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge. Civ. Code, § 2987. Under such a contract, the fact that the bank afterwards wrongfully commingled and used the funds, if it did do so, cannot be urged by it in defense as effecting any change in the contractual relations and rights of the parties. It would be but allowing it to plead its own wrongdoing to its own advantage. Henderson v. O'Conor, 106 Cal. 385, 39 Pac. 786; Massey v. Fisher, 62 Fed. 958; Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54.

There is nothing in the case of Association v. Jacobs, 141 Ill. 261, 31 N. E. 414, upon which appellant relies, which can aid his contention here. The plaintiff in that case sued to recover the sum of $6,000 deposited by it with the banking house of Kean & Co., as indemnity on an appeal bond. But, as the court declares, the plaintiff gave its check to Kean & Co., which was cashed by that house; and the funds thus received with the knowledge of plaintiff were mingled and used with the general funds of the bank, and there was nothing in the certificate of purchase issued and received by plaintiff which indicated a special deposit. The court merely finds from a review of the evidence that it was not established that the deposit was special. In the case at bar the trial court finds a special deposit, and does not find a commingling and use of the money with plaintiff's knowledge. Indeed, it does not find any such commingling and use at all. It merely finds that after its reception, and without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, the moneys "went into the bank vaults through the regular channel." The bank vaults are the usual and proper places for the reception and keeping of special deposits. The finding strictly means no more than that the money went into the bank vaults as a special deposit in the regular manner.

The court allowed plaintiff, as damages, legal interest upon the money from the date upon which Christian and Olsen were surrendered by the sureties. But while plaintiff was entitled to a return of his money immediately after this event, defendant was not in default until its refusal, after demand, to make restoration of it. Not being in default, it should not be charged with interest as damages. This demand was actually made by plaintiff upon February 26, 1894, from which date plaintiff is entitled to interest as compensation. The judgment is ordered modified accordingly, each party to bear his respective costs upon this appeal.

CLUNIE v. SIEBE. (S. F. 498.)

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—MISREPRESENTATIONS AS TO VALUE.

Pol. Code, § 3648, providing that any property willfully concealed, removed, transferred, or misrepresented by the owner, to evade taxation, on discovery, must be assessed at not exceeding 10 times its value, and section 3649, providing that any property discovered by the assessor to have escaped assessment for the last preceding year, if owned by the same person who owned or controlled it for such preceding year, may be assessed at double its value, have no application where property in a preceding year has been assessed too low through misrepresentations of the owners.

Department 1. Petition by Andrew J. Clunie for a writ of mandamus to compel John D. Siebe, as assessor of the city and county of San Francisco, to assess the property of the Market Street Railway Company as required by Pol. Code, §§ 3648, 3649. Writ denied.

Andrew J. Clunie, in pro. per. Foshay Walker and Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The petitioner seeks by this proceeding to compel the respondent, who is the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco, to assess the property of the Market Street Railway Company as required by sections 3648 and 3649 of the Political Code, upon the ground that said property escaped assessment and taxation for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1895, by reason of misrepresentations of the officers of said corporation as to the value of said property. It is alleged in the petition that the said corporation on the first Monday of March, 1895, was, and thence hitherto has been, the owner of certain real and personal property situated in the city and county of San Francisco, subject to taxation, and that said property has been during all of said time of the actual cash value of $17,500,000, and would have been taken in payment of a just debt due from said corporation for that sum of money; that between the first Mondays of March and July of the year 1895 said corporation, through its officers and agents, willfully and falsely represented to the respondent, while he was endeavoring to ascertain the full cash value of said property in order that he might assess the same for the purposes of taxation for said fiscal year, that the full cash value of said property did not exceed the sum of $3,883,866; that in fact said officers and agents of said corporation then knew that the said property was of the value of $17,500,000, and that said representations were made with the design and for the purpose of evading taxation upon said property for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1895; that the respondent, as such assessor, assessed the property for that fiscal year at the sum of $3,883,866; that in fixing the amount of said assessment he relied upon the statements made to him by the officers and agents of said corporation, and that by reason of their misrepresentations he was induced to assess the property at that valuation, instead of its actual value, and that thereby said corporation escaped taxation for that fiscal year upon the sum of $13,616,134, the difference between the full value of said property and the amount for which it was assessed; that the respondent is now engaged in assessing property in said city and county of San Francisco for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1896, and has been notified by the petitioner that said corporation escaped taxation as aforesaid for the preceding fiscal year, and has been demanded to assess the same as provided by sections 3648 and 3649 of the Political Code; and that, unless directed by the mandate of this court, he will not comply with this demand. These sections of the Political Code are as follows:

"Sec. 3648. Any property willfully concealed, removed, transferred or misrepresented by the owner or agent thereof to evade taxation, upon discovery must be assessed at not exceeding ten times its value, and the assessment so made must not be reduced by the board of supervisors.

"Sec. 3649. Any property discovered by the assessor to have escaped assessment for the last preceding year, if such property is in the ownership or under the control of the same person who owned or controlled it for such preceding year, may be assessed at double its value."

We are of the opinion that the facts presented by the petitioner herein do not authorize the application of either of these sections. It is not alleged that any "property" of the Market Street Railway Company "escaped assessment" for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1895, or that any of its property was concealed, removed, or transferred by it to evade taxation for that year, or that there has been any "discovery" of any property that was not assessed for that fiscal year. On the contrary, it is alleged that the property of said corporation was assessed by the respondent for that fiscal year, and, in the absence of any qualifying clause, this must be held to include all of its property. The further allegation that the amount at which it was assessed was caused by the willful misrepresentation of its value by the officers and agents of the corporation is not equivalent to a charge that the corporation, or any of its officers or agents, made any misrepresentation of the property itself. The statute does not require, or even authorize the owner of property to make any representation to the assessor of its value, and it is not to be assumed that the legislature intended that the owner should be visited with a penalty for a misrepresentation in reference to a matter upon which it had not authorized or required him to make any representation whatever. By section 3629 of the Political Code, the assessor is authorized to demand from the owner of property a statement containing a list of all the property owned by him on the first Monday of March, preceding; and by section 3650 he is required to prepare an assessment book, in which must be specified, in separate columns, the value of all such property. There is no provision of the statute requiring the owner to place any value upon his property, but the assessor is chosen by the people for the express purpose of exercising that function. It is not claimed that the Market Street Railway Company failed to give to the respondent the statement provided for by section 3629, or that its property was not exhibited to him, and full opportunity offered to examine the same and determine its value; and it cannot be held that, even if the owner has willfully misrepresented to the assessor the value of his property, he has thereby misrepresented his property, if he has at the same time given to that officer a full and correct statement of the several items of that property, and exhibited the property itself. The assessor is himself required to ascertain and determine the value of the property, and for that purpose may make such inquiries or receive such information as he desires; but the valuation which he finally places upon the property is his own act, whether it results from the exercise of his own judgment, or from the representations of the owner or of a stranger. If he has erred in his estimation of this value, the statute has provided a board of equalization as the tribunal for the correction of such error, which, by section 3673 of the Political Code, is authorized to "make the assessment conform to the true value of such property in money," and if no correction is made by that body the valuation made by the assessor is final. The assessment of property for the purposes of taxation is a function of the executive department of government, but the proceeding contemplated by the petition herein would transfer that function to the judicial department of the government. In order to determine whether there had been any misrepresentation of the value of the property, it would be necessary to ascertain its actual value; and for a court to enter upon this investigation would be to step beyond the boundaries of its constitutional jurisdiction, and intrude within those which, in the division of governmental functions, have been by the organic act placed elsewhere. The writ is denied.

SCRIVANI v. DONDERO. (S. F. 254.)

Appeal—Review—Granting of New Trial.

The rule that an appellate court will not disturb a verdict where there is evidence to sustain it does not apply with equal force to the trial judge, who saw and heard the witnesses, and an order granting a new trial will not be reversed unless there has been an abuse of discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by Batisto Scrivani against Charles Dondero. Plaintiff appeals from an order setting aside a verdict in his favor and granting a new trial. Affirmed.

Geo. P. Burke, for appellant. Julius Lee, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution. There was a verdict and judgment for $500 in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted. Plaintiff appeals from the order granting a new trial.

The order appealed from states no ground for the decision, but the motion was made upon the ground, among others, of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; and, as the record is presented, the order must stand or fall upon the correctness of the ruling on that question. Appellant contends that the court below abused its discretion in granting the order upon the ground stated. This court has uniformly held that motions for new trial are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial courts, and that their action thereon will not be disturbed unless there has been a manifest abuse of discretion. In this case there is a substantial conflict of evidence material to the issue. In Sherman v. Mitchell, 46 Cal. 577, the appeal was from an order granting the defendant a new trial, as to which the court said: "In Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 569, we said: 'In this court, when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, we decline to set aside a verdict or finding of facts as being contrary to the weight of evidence, solely because we have had no opportunity to observe the manner of the witnesses and to decide upon their credibility. But this reason does not apply to the district judge, and, though it is the peculiar province of the jury to decide upon the facts submitted to them, generally, in doubtful cases, the verdict ought not to be set aside as contrary to the weight of the evidence, nevertheless, if the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, and is convinced that it is clearly against the weight of the evidence, it is his duty to set it aside, even though there may have been some conflict in the testimony.'" In Warner v. Thomas Cleaning Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 Pac. 960, the court said: "It is * * * settled law that when the evidence is conflicting the trial court is authorized to review it, and if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial. Bjorman v. Redwood Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024, and cases cited." In Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 Pac. 715, this court said: "It is a cardinal doctrine of this court, the oft enunciation of which has rendered it monotonous, that, where upon a question of fact the testimony in the court below involves a substantial conflict, the action of such court below will not be disturbed." See, also, Curtiss v. Starr, 85 Cal. 376, 24 Pac. 806; Townsend v. Briggs, 88 Cal. 230, 26 Pac. 108; Crooks v. Miller, 89 Cal. 35, 26 Pac. 615; Jones v. Sanders, 103 Cal. 678, 37 Pac. 649; In re Carriger's Estate, 104 Cal. 81, 37 Pac. 785. The rule invoked by appellant is that which prevails in the appellate court. The lower court is not governed by the same rule. Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 178, 38 Pac. 715; Wilson v. Railroad Co., 94 Cal. 168, 29 Pac. 861; Sherman v. Mitchell, 46 Cal. 577; Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 569. The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re CHOPE. (No. 15,664.)

Insolvency Proceedings—Parties—Sufficiency of Petition—Prayer for Discharge—Excess of Assets over Liabilities—Judicial Notice.

1. Notice of appeal by a creditor from an order adjudging petitioner to be insolvent, and appointing a temporary receiver, need not be served on the receiver, under Insolvent Act 1880, § 67, which requires service only on the "adverse party."

2. Notice of appeal by a creditor from an order adjudging petitioner to be insolvent need not be served on creditors who have not, at the time such appeal is taken, filed proofs of their claims, or in any manner appeared.

3. A creditor may appeal from an order adjudging petitioner to be insolvent, though he has filed proof of claim in such proceeding.

4. A petition in insolvency which avers that petitioner desires to be discharged from his debts and liabilities, as required by Insolvent Act 1880, § 2, is sufficient, though it does not conclude with a formal prayer for such discharge.

5. A petition in insolvency which alleges that petitioner "is unable to pay his debts in full, and is an insolvent within the true meaning and intent" of the insolvency act, is sufficient, if not denied, to authorize an adjudication of insolvency, though the accompanying schedule shows that the assets exceed the liabilities.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county.

Petition in insolvency by Arthur H. Chope. From an order declaring petitioner insolvent, fixing a date for the meeting of creditors, and appointing a receiver to take charge of the estate until the appointment of an assignee, Columbus Waterhouse, one of his creditors, appeals. Affirmed.

Ford & Burnell, for appellant. J. F. Coonan, for respondent.

BRITT, C. On December 16, 1893, Chope filed in the superior court of Humboldt county a paper purporting to be his voluntary petition in insolvency, and on the same day the court made an order, under section 6 of the insolvent act of 1880, as amended in 1891, declaring him insolvent, fixing January 20, 1894, for the meeting of creditors, and appointing the sheriff of the county a receiver to take possession of his estate and keep the same until the appointment of an assignee. On January 11, 1894, Columbus Waterhouse, one of the creditors named in the schedules accompanying said petition, took the present appeal to this court from the said order of December 16th. Notice of the appeal was served on no one but the attorney of Chope.

Respondent has moved for a dismissal of the appeal on the grounds: (1) That the notice thereof was not served on the receiver and on the other creditors of the petitioner; and (2) that Waterhouse cannot prosecute the appeal, because, since taking the same, he has proved and filed a claim for his debt in the court below. The motion is not well founded. The notice of appeal from the order adjudicating the petitioner to be insolvent, like similar notices in ordinary civil cases, was to be served on the "adverse party." Insolvent Act, § 67; Code Civ. Proc. § 940. The receiver appointed by the court was the mere instrument of the law and of the court for the temporary preservation of the debtor's property, and was in no sense a party to the proceeding adverse to the creditors. It would be as appropriate to call the sheriff or his keeper of attached property a party adverse to the plaintiff or defendant in an action where the process of attachment has been employed. As to the other creditors named in the debtor's schedule, it is not shown that they had, when the appeal was taken, filed proofs of their claims or in any manner appeared in the proceeding. They were therefore not parties to whom notice of the appeal was requisite. Chinette v. Conklin, 105 Cal. 465, 38 Pac. 1107; Code Civ. Proc. § 1014. If it be true that the appellant made claim and proof of his debt in the superior court, the fact does not estop him to pursue his appeal. That proof of claim by the creditor and his right of appeal in such a case may stand together is the necessary postulate of the decision in Stateler v. Superior Court, 107 Cal. 536, 40 Pac. 949.

The appellant's case rests upon certain alleged defects in Chope's petition. This did not conclude with a formal prayer for the debtor's discharge, and hence appellant says it was no petition at all. It did, however, contain a distinct averment, as required by section 2 of said act, that the petitioner desires to be discharged from his debts and liabilities. No other prayer was necessary. A schedule accompanying the petition showed that some of the creditors reside at "Eureka," and others at "San Francisco." Appellant claims that this was insufficient, in that no county or state is specified. The better practice would certainly be to indicate in the schedule the state, as well as the locality within the state, of each creditor's residence; but in this instance judicial notice is taken that both Eureka and San Francisco are incorporated cities in the state of California. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 241, 27 Pac. 604; Cole v. Segraves, 88 Cal. 103, 25 Pac. 1109; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220.

It is further objected that no case of insolvency is made out by the petition, because the schedules showed petitioner's assets to amount to $2,900 in value, and his debts to be $2,272.07 only. This showing is not necessarily inconsistent with a state of insolvency. In re Ramazzina (Cal.) 42 Pac. 970. The petitioner alleged that he "is unable to pay his debts in full, and is an insolvent debtor within the true intent and meaning" of the act of 1880. No doubt this averment may be controverted by the creditors, or any of them; and, if put in issue, it should be established by the debtor as a fact. Hunt v. His Creditors, 9 Cal. 45; In re Thomas (Cal.) 44 Pac. 327. But we think it was quite sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of the court to declare the petitioner insolvent. The motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied, and the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

RANDOL v. ROWE. (S. F. 33.)

SET-OFF—ESTOPPEL TO PLEAD.

An equitable estoppel to plead a set-off of a note in an action on an account against defendant, which had been assigned to plaintiff by the maker of the note, did not arise out of the assignor's direction to defendant, after the assignment, to pay the amount of the account to plaintiff, and defendant's silence as to his possession of said note, it not appearing that plaintiff had knowledge of such request.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by J. B. Randol against William Rowe on an account. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Campbell, for appellant. C. L. Witter and D. W. Burchard, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The facts of this case briefly stated, are as follows: In July, 1893, one Z. H. Martin sold and delivered to the defendant a certain quantity of hay, for which the agreed purchase price was $541.17. On or about July 15, 1893, defendant paid Martin, for and on account of the hay, the sum of $194.37, leaving a balance still due therefor of $346.80. On August 2, 1893, Martin assigned and transferred his said claim to the plaintiff, who has ever since been the owner and holder thereof. On February 25, 1893, Martin executed and delivered to one Hornberger his negotiable promissory note for $675, payable 30 days after date, with interest; and thereafter, on July 25, 1893, Hornberger indorsed and transferred the said note to the defendant, who has ever since been the owner and holder thereof. Before the said transfer there was paid on the note the sum of $75, and the balance of principal and interest remains due and unpaid. On July 14, 1894, the plaintiff commenced this action to recover the sum of $346.80, with interest, alleged to be due on his said assigned claim, and the defendant pleaded as a counterclaim thereto the said note assigned to him. The court below allowed the counterclaim, and gave judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that defendant recover his costs. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, upon the judgment roll, and contends that the court erred in allowing the counterclaim.

Substantially the same question as that involved in this case arose, and was quite elaborately discussed, in Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 286, 35 Pac. 876, and the decision was adverse to the contention of appellant here. That decision we consider decisive of this case, and a further discussion of the question is therefore unnecessary.

The point is made that "the defendant is estopped by his tortious silence from asserting the alleged counterclaim." This point is rested upon a finding of the court which is as follows: "That after the said assignment by Z. H. Martin to the plaintiff, and about the 4th day of August, 1894, said Z. H. Martin told the defendant thereof, and requested him to pay said assigned claim to plaintiff, and the defendant made no objection or response thereto, and neither then or theretofore, nor at any time until afterwards, gave notice or made any mention to plaintiff or said Z. H. Martin of the assignment of said note to him." The year, as above written, should probably be 1893, and not 1894; but, whether so or not, we see no ground in the facts found for invoking the doctrine of estoppel. The well-settled rule is that, to create an equitable estoppel, the person sought to be estopped must do some act or make some admission to influence the conduct of another, which act or admission is inconsistent with the claim he proposes now to make, and the other party must have acted on the strength of such act or admission. At the time named, Martin had no interest in the transaction, and it does not appear that the plaintiff ever knew of the interview referred to, and certainly it cannot be said that his conduct was ever influenced thereby. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

BURNS v. SENNETT et al. (S. F. 31.)

FELLOW SERVANTS—STEVEDORE'S CREW—SLINGMAN AND RIGGER.

The slingman of a stevedore's crew employed to load a vessel, whose duty it is to stand on the wharf and attach the hoisting tackle to the articles to be loaded, is a fellow servant of the riggers, whose duty it is to set up and rig the hoisting apparatus to the vessel.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Patrick Burns against Sennett & Miller for personal injuries. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for appellant. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit entered upon the conclusion of the hearing of plaintiff's testimony. All of the evidence is presented by bill of exceptions. Upon the former appeal in this case (Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916), it was held that, under the evidence before the court, the duty of defendants was fulfilled when they furnished to the employés suitable material and appliances for the construction and support of the hoisting tackle. As the task of setting up or rigging these appliances, and of safely maintaining them, was a part of the duty of plaintiff's fellow employés, the defendants were not liable to plaintiff for injuries which might have resulted to him from a negligent performance of that duty. These propositions are not here questioned. But it is strenuously insisted that the evidence adduced upon the new trial presents a different state of facts, and establishes that the riggers of the vessel were not fellow servants of the injured man. A most careful examination of the testimony fails to support this claim. It would be profitless to set forth at length the explanations of the different witnesses, but the following brief quotation from the testimony of plaintiff serves as a fair illustration of all: "The foreman of the stevedore firm hires a gang of men, and takes them on board the ship. He directs four or five to go up and rig the vessel,—the gear,—and just as soon as the gearing is finished we all start to work. That is the usual practice." In view of this evidence, and of the opinion upon the former appeal, where the questions are elaborately considered, the judgment is affirmed.

STONE v. BANCROFT. (S. F. 171.)

CONTRACT—PARTNERSHIP OR EMPLOYMENT—ACTION FOR SALARY.

1. A contract between plaintiff, S., and defendant, B., recited that B. was conducting a publishing business under the name of the H. Co., about to be incorporated, and that, in consideration of the valuable services rendered by S. in connection therewith, B. sells and assigns to S. a tenth interest in said company, on the following conditions: S. is to devote all his time for not less than 10 years to the publication and sale of the works which the H. Co. may take up. On the incorporation of the H. Co., one-tenth of the shares shall be issued to S.; but, if he fails to carry out his agreement, said one-tenth interest shall be forfeited to B., provided that, in case of the death of S. before expiration of five years, he having fulfilled his agreement to that time, then one-half of said one-tenth interest shall become the property, unconditionally, of the heirs of S. The salary of the said S. shall be $350 per month. Held, that this was not a contract of partnership, but of hiring.

2. Under such contract, B. is liable to S. for his salary, though the H. Co. receives the benefit of his services.

3. One properly sues on his contract of employment for his salary, rather than for damages for breach thereof, where he has not been discharged, and has held himself in readiness, though he has rendered no services, because no work has been offered him.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action by N. J. Stone against H. H. Bancroft. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. McCutcheon, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought to recover upon a written contract for 14 months' salary, at the rate of $350 per month, commencing upon January 1, 1892. The verdict of the jury was in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

A general demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and also a special demurrer to the point that the complaint was ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible in various particulars. The consideration of this demurrer leads us to an examination of the contract made by these parties, for that contract is set out in full in the complaint. The material parts thereof recite: "This agreement, made in San Francisco, California, by H. H. Bancroft and N. J. Stone, witnesseth: That in consideration of the valuable services done by the said Stone in conducting the publication and sale of the historical works of the said Bancroft, the business formerly being conducted as the Bancroft Works Department of A. L. Bancroft & Co., but now being done, and shortly to be incorporated under the laws of California, as the History Company, the said Bancroft hereby sells and assigns to the said Stone a one-tenth interest in the said History Company, plates, paper, stock, money, outstanding accounts, or other property of said company, upon the following conditions: The said N. J. Stone is to devote his whole time and best energies, so far as his health and strength shall permit, for a period of not less than ten years from the date of this agreement, to the publication and sale of the historical works of H. H. Bancroft, and of such other works, and conduct such other business, as may be from time to time taken up and entered into by said History Company. The said Stone agrees not to enter into or engage in, directly or indirectly, any other mercantile or manufacturing business, or any other business or occupation which shall in any wise absorb his mind and strength, or interfere with his interest or efforts on behalf of the said History Company during the said term of ten years. Upon the incorporation of the History Company, one-tenth of the whole number of shares shall be issued and delivered to the said N. J. Stone; but should the said Stone fail in any wise to carry out this agreement, or any part thereof, in its full letter and spirit, then the said one-tenth interest in the said History Company shall be forfeited and revert to the said H. H. Bancroft; provided, and it is distinctly understood and agreed, that, in case of the death of the said N. J. Stone before the expiration of five years from the date of this agreement, the said Stone having fulfilled all the conditions of this agreement up to that time, then one-half of the said one-tenth interest of the said Stone in the History Company shall go to his heirs, and be their property unconditionally. The salary of the said Stone shall be $350 a month."

We think the only fair interpretation to be given this contract is that Bancroft was to pay Stone $350 per month for his services. There is but a single theory that can be advanced looking to a contrary construction, and that is to the effect that this contract between Bancroft and Stone constituted them partners (Stone possessing a one-tenth interest in the partnership), and that, consequently, the salary of said Stone was to be paid by the partnership. Upon a mere cursory examination of the contract, it is plainly evident that it does not, and was never intended to, create a partnership between these two parties. This is patent from the fact that it was contemplated in the writing itself that in the near future the "History Company" was to be incorporated. It is doubly apparent when we consider that the one-tenth interest in the property given by Bancroft to Stone failed to vest any absolute title in him, but was dependent upon conditions, and liable to be forfeited and revert to Bancroft at any moment. That Stone had no such interest in this business as to constitute him a partner is further made plain when we look at the provision of the contract wherein it is expressly stipulated that, if Stone should die within five years from its date, then only one-half of the one-tenth interest should pass to his heirs. To hold these parties partners under the agreement would make Stone's salary dependent upon the profits of the business. There is nothing contained therein to indicate any such intention, and it is certainly not so provided. We conclude that the contract should be construed as a contract of hiring of Stone by Bancroft at an agreed price of $350 per month. There are no other matters of law raised by the demurrer of sufficient importance to demand our attention.

Within a few months after the aforesaid agreement was entered into, the History Company was incorporated, with a capital stock of 100 shares, 10 of which were issued to Stone, in pursuance of the agreement, and he was thereupon elected vice president of the corporation. Prior to the agreement with Stone, and the subsequent incorporation, Bancroft was the sole owner of the business, conducting it under the name of the History Company. For several years after incorporation, the business progressed amicably and prosperously, and then differences arose. No salary was forthcoming, and this litigation resulted. It is now insisted by appellant that, during the 14 months covered by this litigation, respondent is not entitled to any salary, for the reason that he performed no service. It must be borne in mind that this action is not one for damages based upon the breach of a contract of hiring, but is an action based upon the contract itself, upon an express promise to pay, and in this regard the complaint was advisedly framed, for the evidence of both the plaintiff and defendant expressly shows that he (Stone) was never discharged from his employment; and, if he was hired for a term of 10 years at a monthly salary, until he was discharged by his employer, or voluntarily gave up the employment, we know of no legal reason why his employer's promise to pay is not binding and enforceable in an action at law. The evidence may well be said to be conflicting as to the amount of work done by plaintiff during the term covered by the complaint, but the action of the jury, followed by the decision of the trial court, as to these matters, is binding upon us. And, even conceding that during a great portion of this time plaintiff was not working at all, yet if he was ready and willing to work at all times if work had been offered, and no work was offered, and he had not been discharged, then the contract was in full force, and his right of action upon it cannot be gainsaid. It is no defense to an action upon the contract under such circumstances to say that plaintiff has not performed his duties thereunder. It was said in the early case of Webster v. Wade, 19 Cal. 292: "In the present case, the steamer upon which Collins was employed as steward was laid up by the defendant in pursuance of a contract made by him to that effect with other parties; but the defendant did not notify Collins that he should no longer employ him, and Collins continued at all times ready to perform the services required by the contract. The mere laying up of the steamer did not, of course, terminate the relation of the defendant as employé, or release him from his obligations to the steward [Collins]." It was further said in that case that a discharge of the employé without cause did not defeat an action upon the contract. But it would seem that in later years the true rule has been recognized to be that an action in damages for the breach is the proper remedy in such a case. Bancroft was president of the corporation, and it is evident that neither he nor the History Company wanted the plaintiff to assist in the conduct of the business. At the same time, plaintiff was not discharged, and there is evidence in the record to indicate that the intention of Bancroft was not to discharge him, but rather to make his position as an employé so unpleasant and disagreeable as to cause him to withdraw from the contract under which he began his labors. The many petty annoyances to which he was subjected by defendant can only be accounted for upon such ground. The reason for this course of conduct may possibly be found in a desire upon Bancroft's part to cause Stone's withdrawal from the firm without legal cause; for such withdrawal would have resulted in the forfeiture and reversion of Stone's stock to his benefit, as provided in the agreement. There is evidence in the record pointing in the direction indicated; but, whatever may have been Bancroft's reason in not openly and directly discharging Stone, it is immaterial, for the fact remains that he was never discharged, and the further fact remains that he never voluntarily withdrew from the employment, or relinquished his claims under the contract, and those are the salient facts which justify this action. The many cases cited by appellant holding that, if a servant be wrongfully discharged, his remedy is by damages upon the breach of the contract, have no weight here, for there is no discharge in this case.

The point is made that, if plaintiff rendered service, such service was rendered to the History Company, and not to the defendant. While Bancroft and the History Company prior to its incorporation were actually one, and practically one after its incorporation, and thus service rendered to the History Company was in effect service rendered to Bancroft himself, still, in order to show the weakness of appellant's contention in this respect, we are not even forced to that position. It is in no way material to this case to determine who received the benefit of Stone's services. He was hired by Bancroft to perform labor in the publication of certain literary works, and Bancroft was to pay his salary. Stone was to do this work under the contract, and whether Bancroft or the History Company or some one else got the benefit of his labor is a matter immaterial, as not bearing upon Bancroft's liability.

There are many exceptions taken to the rulings of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence; but, upon an examination of them, we find a majority not well taken, and others, even if meritorious in the abstract, still are of minor importance, and not prejudicial. Neither can we say that plaintiff violated his contract by engaging in other business during this time. That matter was fairly submitted to the jury upon the evidence and the law, and a finding made against appellant's contention.

Much complaint is made to the instructions given to the jury as to the law of the case. We will not review many of them in detail, but, as fairly illustrative of appellant's position, we cite the following: "(1) If you find from the evidence that the said N. J. Stone performed the services required of him by said contract, or that he was willing and ready at the time, and has continued willing and ready, and in the manner required by said agreement, to perform said services, but was prevented from doing so by the defendant or under his directions, you should find in favor of the plaintiff. (2) There is testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was not discharged from employment under said agreement, either by the defendant or the History Company. Under this state of facts, the plaintiff was simply bound to hold himself in readiness to perform such services as may have been required of him by the said defendant or the History Company. If you find from the evidence that he was not required or allowed by either the said company or the said defendant to perform any services, but held himself in readiness to execute the contract in accordance with its terms, such readiness to perform is equivalent to performance. (3) If you find from the evidence that the defendant, either by himself or in conjunction with others, prevented the plaintiff from discharging the duties required of him under the said contract, the defendant cannot complain of the nonperformance of acts or duties which he himself prevented; and the plaintiff in such case, and in so far as he was prevented from performing by the acts of the defendant, is entitled to the salary mentioned in the complaint, the same as if all the duties required by said contract had been performed." Our views already expressed are in full accord with this law declared by the trial court. Bancroft testified that Stone was not discharged, and counsel for appellant in his brief concedes that he was not discharged. There being no question of Stone's discharge from employment in the case, the contractual relation still existed between them; and, Stone being ready and willing at all times to perform the services which he agreed to perform, he is in a position to rely upon the contract. The instructions quoted only cover this principle of law, and are entirely sound.

There is no substantial merit in the other points made by appellant. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

PEOPLE v. RANGOD. (Cr. 127.)

RAPE—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. An indictment for rape of a female under 14 years old need not allege force and want of consent.

2. The positive statements of the prosecutrix in a rape case, with the corroborative fact that defendant was seen coming from her room at 5 o'clock in the morning, is sufficient to support a verdict of guilty.

3. The failure to caution the jury as to the danger of convicting defendant in a rape case on the sole testimony of prosecutrix is not reversible error, where defendant does not request it.

4. Where the prosecutrix is materially corroborated, it is not proper to caution the jury as to the danger of convicting defendant on the sole testimony of prosecutrix, and an intimation that her testimony should be carefully scanned is all that is warranted.

5. An instruction that "any penetration," however slight, is sufficient in a rape case, is not objectionable because of the omission of the word "sexual," where there are instructions defining the offense, which, when read in connection with the former, show that sexual penetration is referred to.

6. On a trial for rape of a female under 14 years old, the materially objectionable features of evidence of acts of intercourse by defendant with prosecutrix, other than the specific one charged, were not objected to, and no exception was reserved; and, as soon as its purpose was clear, the judge stopped further inquiry, and in a manner that must have indicated to the jury that they should consider only evidence of the one act. Held, that there was no prejudicial error, if any; especially, where it appeared that, in view of the other evidence, defendant could not have been materially affected by the objectionable evidence.

Edward Rangod was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. A. Mendelsohn and H. H. Appel, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. The defendant was convicted of rape, committed upon a girl under 14 years of age, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial.

1. The demurrer to the information was correctly overruled. The offense was charged substantially in the language of the statute, and this was sufficient. People v. Mills, 17 Cal. 176; People v. Burke, 34 Cal. 661. It was not necessary to allege force by the defendant, and want of consent of the child. Facts not required to be proven need not be alleged. In this instance it was alleged that the offense was committed upon a female under the age of 14 years, and in such case force and want of consent are immaterial factors in the offense. Pen. Code, § 261; People v. Verdegreen, 106 Cal. 215, 39 Pac. 607.

2. There is no tenable ground for the claim that the evidence does not sustain the verdict. The positive statements of the prosecutrix as to the facts, with the corroborating fact that the defendant was seen coming from her room at the unseemly hour of 5 o'clock in the morning on the occasion testified to, left only the question whether the jury would give credence to the testimony, and this is concluded by their verdict in the affirmative.

3. Nor do we find any error in the giving or refusal of instructions. The first complaint on this head is that the court erred in submitting the case to the jury without cautioning them as to the danger of convicting the accused upon the sole testimony of the prosecutrix. In the first place, the failure to give such caution, even in a proper case, without its request at the hands of the defendant, would not constitute reversible error. But, in the next place, any suggestion of the kind in this instance would not have been pertinent to the case made by the evidence, since it did not rest upon the unsupported testimony of the prosecutrix. She was distinctly and materially corroborated by other evidence, and, under the circumstances, any such instruction might well have been construed by the jury as an intimation from the judge that he did not regard the corroboration as material or worthy of consideration, which would have been clearly improper. Furthermore, the judge did distinctly intimate to the jury that the testimony of the prosecutrix should be carefully scanned, and this was going as far in this regard as he was warranted under the circumstances. The jury were told that "any penetration," however slight, is sufficient, in a case of rape; and it is urged that the instruction was erroneous because of the omission of the qualifying word "sexual," since it is only sexual penetration which will constitute the offense. But we do not regard the omission as material, in view of the other instructions defining the offense, and which, read in connection with the one under consideration, very clearly disclosed to the jury that it was sexual penetration which was referred to in the latter. There are no further objections under this head calling for particular notice. The defendant cannot be heard in criticism of the instruction upon the credibility of witnesess, even if erroneous, since it was given at his request, and, so far as the portion now criticised is concerned, in his own words. As to the requested instructions refused, they are fully covered by those given.

4. We do not regard the action of the court upon the effort of the prosecution to introduce evidence of acts of intercourse by the defendant with the prosecutrix, other than the specific one charged, as prejudicial error, if error it be. The materially objectionable features of the evidence called out were not objected to, or any exception reserved; and as soon as the purpose of the prosecution was made clear to the judge, any further inquiry in that direction was stopped, and in a manner which must have clearly indicated to the jury that it should consider only evidence as to the one act. But, furthermore, even if the objectionable evidence which did come before the jury was considered by them, we do not think, in view of the other evidence in the case, that the defendant could have been materially affected thereby, and the judgment should not, therefore, be reversed on that ground. The judgment and order are affirmed.

HOLLER v. EMERSON. (S. F. 169.)[1]

PUBLIC LANDS—SURVEYS—SUFFICIENCY—LOCATION OF SECTION CORNERS.

1. Where the north line of a government section is actually run, and the northwest corner of the southwest quarter section located, the northwest section corner is located by running a line due north from the northwest corner of the southwest quarter section until it intersects the north line, and the point of intersection will be the true northwest corner; and this method should be adopted though the length of the north line being given as 80 chains, and the northeast section corner established, it would appear that a point on the north line 80 chains due west from the northeast section corner would establish the northwest section corner.

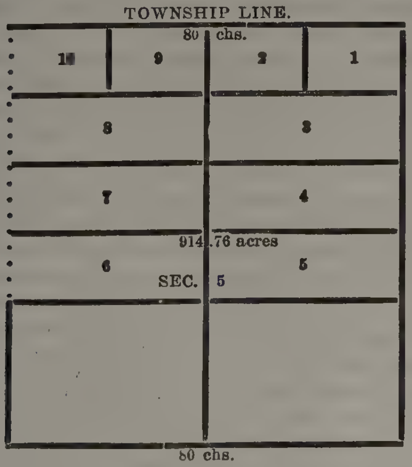
2. Where all the lines of the north half of a section were actually run, but the west, the survey was sufficient to authorize the issuance of a patent.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. W. Crump, Judge.

Action by B. Holler against Samuel R. Emerson. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. J. Hudson, for appellant. Sheridan & Sayre, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover possession of a small tract of land. Plaintiff and defendant are patentees from the United States government to lots 2 and 9, respectively, of section 5 of a certain township and range. The result of this litigation is dependent upon the proper location of the division line between these aforesaid lots. The section is found in the northern tier of sections of the township, and contains something in excess of 900 acres. It is depicted upon the official map of the township as follows:



It will be observed, from the plat, that the exterior lines of the section are marked out upon the ground by the government survey, save a portion of the western boundary line. It further appears by the field notes that such line was never run. The surveyor general, in platting the survey, projected a line due north from the northwest corner of the southwest quarter (an established corner) to the township line, as a dividing line between sections 5 and 6, and thereupon divided the excess of the section as appears from the plat. The true line between lots 2 and 9 is dependent upon the location of the quarter-section corner upon the township line,—a corner which was not established by the government surveyor. Hence it follows that the location of that corner is dependent upon the location of the northwest corner of the section (an unestablished corner); for it must be conceded that the quarter-section corner should be located at a point equidistant from the northeast and northwest corners of the section. The trial court held that the northwest corner of the section should be located by running a line north to the township line from the established corner at the northwest corner of the southwest quarter. This, also, was evidently the view taken by the surveyor general when he platted the township from the field notes, and we think it entirely sound. If the government surveyor had fully performed his duty, and run this line, he would have run it due north to the township line; and there, at the point of intersection, would have been the true corner, and there we should now hold it to be. Appellant contends, with reason, that the map shows the north line of the section to be 80 chains in length, and, there being no monument to indicate the northwest corner of the section, it should be established by running west upon the township line from the northeast corner of the section 80 chains, the course and distance thus controlling in the absence of monuments. If the boundary lines under consideration had been established by private survey, we would attach much weight to this contention, but such is not the case. We are now engaged in tracing a government survey for the purpose of locating the exterior lines of a section, and, in the interpretation of that survey, we are bound to take into consideration the rules and principles applicable to the laying out of townships by government surveyors. Invoking these principles, we know that the western boundary line of section 5, when it reaches the township line, terminates; and, there being no reason apparent why it should not do so, we are also bound to assume that the western boundary line runs due north to the township line. These conditions being true, the point where this line intersects the township line will be the corner of the section, beyond any question. To establish the corner at a point 80 chains west of the northeast corner of the section would cause the western boundary line to assume a northeasterly course, and also cause section 6, adjoining upon the west, to present a most unsightly and irregular appearance. Again, let us assume that the government surveyor in fact did locate upon the ground the northwest corner of section 5, and that the monument there placed has been lost. Defendant is certainly in no more favorable position in this litigation than if such were the case. Yet, upon that assumption of the fact, we are clear that the corner should be relocated exactly as it has been done here. And the 80 chains given upon the map as the length of the north line could not be used for the purpose of locating the lost corner, but such corner would be established by a line running due north to the township line.

There is no merit in defendant's contention that, by reason of the surveyor's failure to run upon the ground a portion of the western boundary line of the section, therefore the north half of the section has not been surveyed, and consequently no title vested in plaintiff to lot 2 by the patent issued from the government. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 535 OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY v. HAMILTON.

(Sac. 63.)

New Trial—Proposed Statement—Settlement—Stipulation—Order—Holidays—Judicial Business.

1. A proposed statement for new trial should insert nothing, in extenso at least, but what is pertinent to the questions made by the moving parties, and necessary for their proper consideration; Code Civ. Proc. § 648, providing that the objection must be stated with so much of the evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain it, "and no more."

2. Refusal to settle proposed statement for new trial is not justified because of reference to certain records, thus, "In minute book of said board appears the following order on page 331: (Here insert)," though in the engrossed statement the order would have to be set out.

3. A stipulation extending defendant's time for preparing proposed statement for new trial, and reciting that it is agreed on the part of defendant that he will use his utmost endeavors to have the statement settled, is not an agreement limiting the time for settlement, so that further extension cannot be had by order of the court.

4. A mistake in an order extending defendant's time in which to prepare, serve, and file statement of the case and affidavits "on appeal," instead of for new trial, will be disregarded; notice of intention to move for new trial having been served, and a prior stipulation extending time having referred to "statement on motion for new trial," and it being impossible that plaintiff should have been misled by the mistake.

5. Defendant's right to settlement of statement on motion for new trial will not be defeated though there was no settlement within the time limited by stipulation and order for preparing, serving, and filing the statement, it having been prevented by plaintiff.

6. A stipulation extending time for preparing statement for new trial, and providing that it need not be filed, having been acted on, is binding, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 283, declaring that an attorney may bind his client in any of the steps of an action by his agreement filed with the clerk, "and not otherwise."

7. Service of a statement for new trial is not "judicial business," within Code Civ. Proc. § 134, declaring that judicial business shall not be transacted on holidays.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by reclamation district No. 535 of Sacramento county against J. H. Hamilton. From an order, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Albert M. Johnson, William M. Sims, and J. C. Catlin, for appellant. Armstrong & Bruner, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from an order refusing to settle defendant's statement on motion for a new trial, and dismissing said motion. After the service of defendant's proposed statement, the plaintiff, upon due notice, mover the court to refuse to settle the same, and to dismiss defendant's motion for a new trial, and to deny the same, upon the following grounds: (1) "That it is a mere skeleton statement, and does not substantially conform to the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure." (2) "That the same was not served within the time allowed by law, nor within the time to which the court had jurisdiction to extend the time, and the court made no order extending the time for preparing and serving the statement on motion for a new trial." (3) "On the further ground that said alleged statement on motion for a new trial was not served upon a judicial day, but was served upon the day of a general election." The court below granted the motion upon the second ground, and, while saying that it was not necessary to pass upon the other grounds, expressed the opinion that they were insufficient to sustain the motion. Respondent, however, insists that, if the motion was properly granted upon any or either of the grounds specified, the order must be affirmed, and discusses all of them.

1. It is true the appellant's proposed statement should be a fair one; but nothing should be inserted, in extenso at least, but that which is pertinent to the questions made by the moving party, and necessary for their proper consideration. The first alleged defect in said proposed statement pointed out by respondent is an illustration of the proper mode of preparing statements. It is as follows: "Plaintiff offered in evidence the following documentary evidence: Minutes of the board of trustees of reclamation district No. 535, showing order employing J. C. Boyd, engineer; also the report of said engineer to the board of trustees." No objection or exception was made, and no question seems to be made thereon, and therefore a copy of the minutes would only incumber the transcript, and increase both labor and expenses. If, however, for any reason, the opposite party deemed the whole or some part of the minutes essential to his protection upon the hearing of the motion, or upon appeal, it would be allowed as an amendment by the court upon the settlement of the statement, upon its materiality being shown. The Code provides: "The objection must be stated with so much of the evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain it, and no more." Code Civ. Proc. § 648.

It is further objected that reference is made to certain records, thus: "In minute book of said board appears the following order on page 331: (Here insert.)" This is common practice in preparing proposed statements. It is seldom that proposed statements are not amended, and almost invariably it becomes necessary to rewrite them. The reference to the document or record, with the remark "Here insert," notifies the opposite party that it is to become part of the statement. Such reference would, of course, not be sufficient in the engrossed statement. Such engrossed statement would be a "skeleton statement," as declared in People v. Bartlett, 40 Cal. 146, and Bush v. Taylor, 45 Cal. 112, cited by respondent. We see no such defects in this proposed statement as would justify the court in refusing to settle it.

2. We think the court erred in granting respondent's motion upon the second ground therein stated. The 10 days allowed by statute for serving the proposed statement expired October 4th, but was extended by stipulation of counsel until October 8th, and on that day was extended by order of the court to and including the 22d, and on that day again extended by order until and including November 6th, on which last-named day it was served. These orders extended the time 29 days, and the stipulation 4; in all, 33 days. Respondent's contention seems to be that the court had no power in any event to extend the time for a period which, added to the time allowed by the stipulation, would exceed 30 days. But he goes further, and says that "the Code limits the power of the court to extend the time allowed by the Code alone." From his argument we infer that he claims that the stipulation cut off the power of the court to extend the time at all. But these questions have been settled by Curtis v. Superior Ct., 70 Cal. 390, 11 Pac. 652, and Simpson v. Budd, 91 Cal. 488, 27 Pac. 758, and need not be discussed.

Respondent contends, however, that the stipulation limits the time, "by agreement," to the 8th day of October, in which to prepare, serve, and file the statement. The language of the stipulation in that regard is: "It is also agreed on the part of the defendants in said cases that they will use their utmost endeavors to have the statement of the case settled by the judge, and will, at as early a day as possible, have their transcript on appeal printed," etc. This was not an agreement that they would waive their right to prepare the statement and move for a new trial if they failed to serve their statement on the day named.

Some questions are also made upon the form of the orders made by the court, extending time. The orders were each in the following form, the dates only being different: "Good cause appearing, it is hereby ordered that the defendants in each of the above-entitled cases have to and including the 6th day of November, 1894, in which to prepare, serve, and file their statement of the case, and affidavits on appeal to the supreme court of the above said cases." Notice of intention to move for a new trial had been served, and the stipulation extending time referred to the "statement on motion for a new trial." It is impossible that respondent should have been misled by the error, and informalities and mistakes which do not mislead must be disregarded.

It is also said that the stipulation and orders were for time to "prepare, serve, and file" the statement, and as the statement cannot be "filed" until it is settled, and as there was no settlement of the statement attempted within the time limited by the order, that the defendants were too late; that the order limited the settlement and filing, as well as the preparation and service. But that could not have been intended upon the one side, or so understood upon the other. Counsel might reasonably stipulate against delay on his own part, but would not be likely to stipulate against delay on the part of opposing counsel, when his delay might terminate the case, and, through mere delay on his part, win a victory.

It is further contended that the stipulation and orders above mentioned were never filed. The bill of exceptions contained in the record recites: "Defendant's counsel introduced, as filed before the hearing of said motion, the following stipulations and orders, which were received in evidence." There are two answers in this contention: First. The above statement imports that they were filed before the hearing. Second. Respondent's counsel expressly stipulated in writing that the orders and stipulation extending time need not be filed. Counsel for respondent cites section 283, Code Civ. Proc., to the effect that an attorney shall have authority (1) "to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court, and not otherwise." They also cite rule 23 of the superior court of Sacramento county, which is of similar purport. The above section of the Code was carefully considered by this court in bank in Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30

Pac. 529. It was there said, speaking of said section: "It is not intended to enlarge or abridge the authority of the attorney, but only to prescribe the manner of its exercise. Preston v. Hill, 50 Cal. 53. The section does not require a construction that in no instance shall an agreement which the attorney may make in behalf of his client be binding, unless entered in the minutes of the court or filed with the clerk. Its provisions have reference to executory agreements, and not to those which have been wholly or in part executed; and it was with reference to oral agreements of an executory character that the court said, in its opinion in Borkheim v. Insurance Co., 38 Cal. 628: 'Of such agreements, therefore, there can be no specific performance.' If, under the terms of a mutual stipulation which was only verbal, one party has received the advantage for which he entered into it, or the other party has at his instance given up some right or lost some advantage, so that it would be inequitable for him to insist that the stipulation was invalid, he will not be permitted to repudiate the obligation of his own agreement upon the ground that it had not been entered in the minutes of the court. Himmelmann v. Sullivan, 40 Cal. 125; Hawes v. Clark, 84 Cal. 272, 24 Pac. 116; People v. Stephens, 52 N. Y. 306. If the party admits that he made such verbal stipulation, it will be as binding upon him as if it had been entered in the minutes of the court. Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. 36; Reese v. Mahoney, 21 Cal. 306." The duty of counsel to himself, the court, and the profession in such cases, where his client has not interfered or dissented, is clear, and need not be discussed.

3. The third ground of respondent's motion was that the statement was served on a nonjudicial day, November 6, 1894, that being the day of a general election. This objection is exceedingly technical. That day being a holiday, the statement might have been served the next day. Code Civ. Proc. § 12. Counsel for respondent insists, however, that the service of the statement was "judicial business," the transaction of which is prohibited by sections 133 and 134, Code Civ. Proc. Section 133 provides: "Courts of justice may be held and judicial business transacted on any day, except as provided in the next section." Section 134, as amended in 1893 (St. 1893, p. 187), omitting the enumeration of the holidays, is as follows: "No court shall be open, nor shall any judicial business be transacted, on * * *, except for the following purposes: (1) To give, upon their request, instructions to a jury when deliberating on their verdict. (2) To receive a verdict or discharge a jury. (3) For the exercise of the powers of a magistrate in a criminal action, or in a proceeding of a criminal nature; provided, that the supreme court and the superior courts shall always be open for the transaction of business; and provided, further, that injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued and served on any day." The amendment consists in inserting the words "and the superior courts" after the words "supreme court," in the third exception. This amendment would settle the question before us but for a clause in our constitution which provides that the superior courts "shall be always open (legal holidays and nonjudicial days excepted)." Article 6, § 5. But the service of this statement was not "judicial business." Section 134 is a qualification of section 133, which relates solely to courts of justice. However that may be, the act in question was merely ministerial, and not judicial. In the Law Dictionary by Rapalje & Lawrence, "judicial acts" are defined as those "requiring the exercise of some judicial discretion, as distinguished from ministerial acts, which require none." Many of the cases referring to judicial acts and the service of writs on dies non relate to acts done on Sunday, and which were held invalid under statutes prohibiting the transaction of any secular business upon that day, and therefore have no application here. In re Worthington, 7 Biss. 455, Fed. Cas. No. 18,051, a judgment docketed on Christmas day was held valid, upon the ground that the act was ministerial, and not judicial. In Nevada v. California Mining Co., 13 Nev. 203, the undertaking on appeal was executed on Sunday, and that was held not to be "judicial business." Whipple v. Hill, 36 Neb. 720, 55 N. W. 227, is a stronger case than this. There the first Monday in September is, by statute, a legal holiday, known as "Labor Day"; and the statute provides: "No court can be opened, nor can any judicial business be transacted, on Sunday or any legal holiday, except: (1) To give instructions to a jury then deliberating on their verdict. (2) To receive a verdict or discharge a jury. (3) To exercise the powers of a single magistrate in a criminal proceeding. (4) To grant or refuse a temporary injunction or restraining order." Comp. St. 1893, c. 19, § 38. It was there held that the issuance of a writ of attachment on a debt past due is a purely ministerial act, and does not fall within the inhibition of the statute. The court said: "The language of the section is plain and unambiguous, and should not be extended by judicial interpretation beyond the plain import of the words used. Had the legislature intended to debar courts or court officers from performing ministerial acts upon holidays, words suitable to express such intention would have been employed. If the transaction of all legal business was forbidden on such days, as is the case in some of the states, we would grant that the order in question would be void; but the statute does not so provide. It is the opening of courts and the transaction of judicial business on legal holidays which the law forbids.

This intent is clearly manifest." In Smith v. Ihling, 47 Mich. 614, 11 N. W. 408, it was held that the issuing of a summons by a justice of the peace was a ministerial act, not forbidden by the statute. In Weil v. Geier, 61 Wis. 414, 21 N. W. 246, it was held that the statute providing that "no court shall be opened or transact any business on a legal holiday" (Rev. St. § 2576) does not prohibit a justice of the peace from issuing a summons on that day, that being a purely ministerial act. At common law, Sunday is dies non juridicus, and judicial acts cannot be done on that day, though other acts may be, unless prohibited by statute. Story v. Elliot, 8 Cow. 27. What has been said sufficiently answers the authorities cited by respondent.

The order refusing to settle the defendant's statement on motion for new trial, and dismissing said motion, should be reversed, with directions to settle said statement and hear said motion.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order refusing to settle defendant's statement on motion for new trial is reversed, with directions to settle said statement and hear said motion.

HOVEY v. BRADBURY. (S. F. 88.)[1]

RES JUDICATA TRUSTS—CONDUCT OF TRUSTEE—REPUDIATION—LACHES—ESTOPPEL.

1. Plaintiff confided to defendant's intestate, as trustee, certain shares of corporate stock, with instructions to look after his interests therein. At various times defendant's intestate acknowledged the trust. Actions having been brought by third parties against the intestate, a large amount of stock standing in his name, including that belonging to plaintiff, was attached, and in the judgments rendered in such actions, among other things, the stock was decreed to belong to intestate. Plaintiff was not a party to these actions, nor was he cognizant of them. Held, that these judgments could not be pleaded in estoppel of plaintiff's claim to the stock.

2. Though the conduct of a trustee amounted to a repudiation of the trust, such repudiation cannot set in motion the statute of limitations, nor raise the bar of laches, unless it was unequivocally brought to the knowledge of the beneficiary.

3. Where a trustee holding certain shares of corporate stock has acknowledged his trust from time to time, though failing to account for dividends on the stock, it was not laches for the beneficiary to refrain from taking an action to enforce an accounting under the trust till over two years after the death of the trustee.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanders, Judge.

Action by Asa E. Hovey against William B. Bradbury, as personal representative of James McCord, deceased. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Thos. V. O'Brien, for appellant. H. G. Platt, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Plaintiff pleaded that he was the owner of 465 shares of the capital stock of the Cable Railway Company, that he intrusted this stock to James McCord, who held it as his trustee until his death, after which it passed into the hands of defendant as the personal representative of McCord. He asked a judgment declaring the trust, and decreeing an accounting of the dividends received upon the stock. No demurrer was interposed. Defendant, for answer, made denial, set up by way of estoppel judgments in certain actions involving and affecting the title to the stock, and pleaded the statute of limitations and stale claim. The principal defense and chief contention of appellant is the laches of respondent. The following facts were established upon the trial without substantial controversy: Hovey, while living in San Francisco, was the inventor and owner of certain valuable patent rights. These rights were transferred to the Hovey Patent-Right Company, and for them Hovey was to receive one-seventh of the capital stock of that corporation. The Cable Railway Company succeeded to the interests of the Hovey Patent-Right Company under an agreement whereby Hovey was to receive 465 shares of the stock of the former corporation. Before this stock was issued to him, Hovey moved to Chicago, where he continued to reside with his family. He and McCord were intimate friends, and when he left he confided all of his interests to McCord, in the implicit trust and upon the express understanding that McCord would use his best efforts in managing and protecting them. Thus in time, and under this agreement, Hovey's 465 shares of stock were issued to and in the name of McCord. Hovey knew that McCord so held the stock, but was satisfied, because of his faith in McCord, and because of the advice of some of his fellow stockholders, that he should leave the stock in the hands of some trustworthy friend in California, who might vote it in case of a contest for corporate control. It was in 1881 that Hovey moved to Chicago. In 1884, McCord visited him there; again in 1886; and still again in 1888. Upon each of these visits McCord spoke of Hovey's stock; told him that it had earned dividends, the exact amounts of which he did not remember; and promised at each visit to forward a full statement of account upon his return to California. He did not do so. In 1889, McCord died, and in 1891, Hovey, who, after McCord's death, had written to California about his property, with inconclusive results, commenced his action. That McCord held Hovey's stock under these circumstances the evidence does not permit us to doubt. Besides Hovey's testimony, there is that of Maurice Schmitt, J. L. Schmitt, and Robert F. Morrow, fellow incorporators with Hovey and McCord, who fully corroborate plaintiff, and who separately bear evidence to admissions made by McCord of the nature and terms of his trusteeship. It is beyond peradventure from all this uncontradicted evidence that McCord, during his lifetime, fully and repeatedly recognized his obligations to plaintiff. While Hovey was thus living in Chicago, two actions were commenced against McCord. To neither of these was Hovey a party, nor does it appear that he ever had the slightest knowledge of them. One—the case of Schmitt v. McCord—was an action to recover $3,000, in which 930 shares of the cable company's stock standing in the name of McCord, and including the Hovey 465 shares, were attached. This attachment, by agreement of the parties, was released, and the stock deposited with one McClure, in pledge to await the result of the action. Thereafter McClure died, and his administrator commenced the second action in interpleader to have the rights of the McCord estate (McCord also having died) and of the Schmitts to the stock settled and determined. By this action the stock was decreed to belong to the McCord estate, subject to the payment of the Schmitt judgment.

The judgments in these actions manifestly present no estoppel against plaintiff's claim. He was not a party to them, nor charged with notice of them. Nor do they present any circumstance of laches upon the part of plaintiff. No act or omission of his induced McCord to do or refrain from doing anything in connection with them. Hovey was in entire ignorance of the litigation, and McCord let him remain so. There is no doubt that the conduct of McCord in this matter amounted in law to a repudiation of his trust. But before such repudiation can operate to set in motion the statute of limitations, or to raise the bar of laches, the repudiation must be clearly and unequivocally brought to the knowledge of the cestui que trust. Laches is imputable to him only when he fails to act after knowledge of repudiation. But in this case the facts were never made known to Hovey. Nor when we come to view plaintiff's conduct generally can there be seen any act or omission upon his part which would justify so stern a treatment of his claim as its rejection under the doctrine of laches. That doctrine, as has been said, is neither technical nor arbitrary. It is not designed to punish a plaintiff. It can be invoked only where to allow the claim would be, because of the claimant's own acts, to permit an unwarranted injustice. It looks to the peace of society, and not to the punishment of the claimant, even if he has been negligent. Whether or not the doctrine applies depends, and must depend, therefore, upon the circumstances of each case. It is usually applied where a plaintiff, with knowledge that his rights have been invaded or his trust repudiated, has submitted to unconscionable delay, during which other rights have arisen, founded somewhat upon his silence and acquiescence. But it is never permitted to be invoked merely to aid a faithless trustee in consummating his wrong. Nor was it ever designed to be a check upon the right of a person to impose confidence and trust in another. It is well said in the case of Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, L. R. 5 P. C. 221, 8 Eng. R. 196: "Where it would be practically unjust to give a remedy, either because the party has, by his conduct, done that which might fairly be regarded as equivalent to a waiver of it, or where, by his conduct, and neglect, he has, though perhaps not waiving that remedy, yet put the other party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if the remedy were afterwards to be asserted, in either of these cases lapse of time and delay are most material. * * * Two circumstances, always important in such cases, are the length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party, and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy." When we come to consider the conduct of the plaintiff in this case, we find that he permitted McCord to take the stock in his (McCord's) own name. A third person dealing with McCord upon the faith of his apparent ownership of the stock would undoubtedly be protected against any claims of Hovey, but no rights of third persons are here involved. Plaintiff also permitted McCord to retain the stock after his repeated failure to account to him for its dividends; but during all of this time it is to be remembered that McCord never repudiated the trust, and that plaintiff had, and continued to have, the utmost confidence in his fidelity and integrity. They were intimate friends. McCord's failures to account did not amount to a repudiation of the trust, for each failure was followed by an express acknowledgment of the trust, and admission of his fault, and a promise to repair it. The years which elapsed before plaintiff finally demanded through the courts an accounting was not unreasonable in view of the relations which existed between him and his trustee. The negligence of McCord in accounting, and his failure to turn over the dividends, injured no one but the plaintiff, and it was an injury which he certainly had the right to overlook without exposing himself to the charge that he was justifying McCord in treating the property as his own. By no word or act or omission of plaintiff was McCord given any right, even the slightest, to suppose that Hovey had surrendered into his absolute ownership the property which he held in trust. He did nothing to induce McCord to think that the stock was his, nothing to lead McCord to change his position in the slightest degree. His mere forbearance to call the trustee to a strict account could not have been taken advantage of by McCord in his lifetime, and cannot avail his representative after his death. Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that the conduct of the plaintiff is to be considered in the light of the fact that McCord had never repudiated the trust, or done any act within the knowledge of Hovey which amounted to a repudiation. It was only after McCord's death, and his failure to obtain any satisfactory statement from his relatives and representatives of the condition of the trust, that he was first put upon notice of repudiation. Within 2½ years after McCord's death this action was instituted. Such delay, as explained by the evidence, was not unreasonable, and, indeed, if unexplained at all, would not raise either the bar of the statute nor justify the claim of a stale demand. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HELLMAN v. MERZ et al. (L. A. 55.)

SALE OF DECEDENT'S LAND — PUBLICATION OF NOTICE—RECOVERY OF DEPOSIT—INTEREST.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1549, providing that, when a sale of decedent's real property is ordered to be made at private sale, notice stating a day on or after which sale will be made must be published in a newspaper for two weeks successively next before such day, held, that publication, from the 5th to the 19th day of the month, of a notice, naming the 21st day thereof as the day on or after which sale would be made, was insufficient.

2. A bidder at a private sale of a decedent's real estate, ordered by court, has a right to refuse to comply with his bid, and to recover his deposit, on the ground that the publication of notice did not comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 1549, where the affidavit of publication existing at the time of his bid shows insufficient publication, though, after hearing in his action, an amended affidavit is filed showing sufficient publication.

3. Though a will give executors power to sell decedent's land without any order of court, still, where a deposit and bid is made for a proposed private sale, to be authorized by an order of court, and an order for private sale is obtained, and such a sale is confirmed, its validity will depend on the sufficiency of publication of notice required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1549, in case sale of decedent's real estate is ordered to be made at private sale.

4. Judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover deposit on a private sale made by executors of decedent's real estate will not be reversed because entered against defendants individually, objection that defendants were sued as individuals and not as executors not having been raised by demurrer or answer.

5. In an action by a bidder at a sale by executors of decedent's land to recover his deposit on the ground of the invalidity of the sale, interest should not be allowed prior to the demand for return of the deposit.

Action by Maurice S. Hellman against H. Merz and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Modified.

H. A. Barclay, for appellants. McLachlan & Cohrs, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover from defendants the sum of $500, money had and received by them for the use of the plaintiff, with interest thereon from December 10, 1891. The plaintiff had judgment as prayed for, and the defendants appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

On December 10, 1891, defendants, as executors of the last will of D. Mahlstedt, deceased, executed to plaintiff a written contract, which, after acknowledging the receipt of $500, "being a deposit and part payment on account of a bargain and sale made" to him of a certain described lot or tract of land, proceeds: "Said tract of land above described having been sold to said Maurice S. Hellman this day for the sum of $16,000, less mortgage of $10,000, provided that the undersigned make this agreement with the understanding that it shall be considered merely as a bid in advance of the order of the court authorizing a sale of said property, and that the executors of said estate shall not be held to accept said bid in case they secure any higher bid, nor shall they be in any manner bound by this agreement, or liable thereon, either as individuals or executors, but, in case no higher bid is received, they will accept a bid for said property for the amount of $16,000, provided no higher bid is received, the balance to be paid as follows: The sum of $5,500 15 days after delivery of abstract of title, showing above sale confirmed by superior court, the balance being balanced off by mortgage thereon for $10,000 to German Savings & Loan Society. The title to said above lands to prove good, or no sale, 15 days being allowed to examine abstract and pass upon title after said abstract is delivered. If the remaining payments be not made according to the agreement and contract, the above-mentioned deposit to be forfeited without recourse. If title prove defective, said deposit to be returned. Above sale subject to confirmation by superior court of Los Angeles county. Title to be clear and free of all incumbrances except mortgage mentioned above." In pursuance of this agreement, defendants made application for and obtained from the court an order for a private sale of the property. Plaintiff put in a bid of $16,000, and his bid was accepted, and the sale confirmed; but, because of certain defects in the proceedings, he refused to accept a conveyance of the property. Thereupon, to obviate such defects, defendants made application for, and on April 1, 1892, obtained, a new order for the sale of the property at private sale. Notice of this sale was published in a newspaper, and plaintiff again put in a bid of $16,000. His bid was accepted, and the sale to him was confirmed by an order of court. Defendants thereupon executed and tendered to plaintiff a deed of the property, but, on the advice of his attorneys that the deed would not pass a good title, he refused to accept the same. Thereafter, on September 2, 1892, plaintiff demanded of defendants a return of his deposit, but they refused, and ever since have refused, to return the same, or any part thereof.

This action was commenced December 9, 1893, and on January 3, 1894, defendants made application to the court for another order for the sale of the said property. On January 16th, before their application was acted upon, defendants filed their petition, setting out the facts of the sale to plaintiff, the confirmation thereof, the tender of a deed, and refusal to accept the same, and praying that the order of confirmation be set aside; and on the same day the order of confirmation was duly vacated and set aside. On January 19th defendants served notice on the plaintiff that they had made application for an order for the resale of the said property, "for the purpose of selling said property, and ascertaining the deficiency, if any, which may be due upon said sale, in case the amount realized on such resale does not cover the bid heretofore made by you, and the expenses of the sale to you." Thereafter an order for the resale of the property was obtained, and on February 19, 1894, defendants sold the same to one George Zobelein for the sum of $15,000, which sale was subsequently duly confirmed by the court, and a deed for the property was executed and delivered by defendants to the said purchaser. The facts as to the resale were set up in a supplemental answer, and the prayer was for judgment that the $500, deposited by plaintiff, be retained by defendants, and applied in payment of the deficiency resulting from the resale, and that they recover from the plaintiff the further sum of $500, the balance of said deficiency. The court found, among other things, that the sale under the order made on April 1, 1892, was irregular and invalid; "that the notice of such sale was defective, in that the same was not published for two weeks successively before the day on or after which said sale was to be made; that the proof filed May 2, 1892, with the return of said sale, showed publication of such notice for 15 consecutive days, commencing April 5, and including April 19, 1892, each day inclusive, and giving notice that said sale was to be made on or after April 21, 1892; that at the time of the making of said bid by plaintiff such proof was the only evidence on file or possessed by plaintiff, as to the time and manner of publication of said notice; that the said sale was further irregular and invalid, in that the terms of sale were advertised to be 'the assumption of the payment of a mortgage of ten thousand dollars ($10,000), and the interest thereon, given by the said D. Mahlstedt in his lifetime to the German Savings & Loan Society of San Francisco, the balance to be paid in cash, United States gold coin, upon the confirmation of sale by superior court, deed at expense of purchasers'; that such terms were not in accordance with the bid of plaintiff, or the terms of the agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendants as to the purchase of said property; and that a deed by said executors, pursuant to said last-mentioned proceedings, would convey no title to plaintiff." And as conclusions of law the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the sum of $500, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from December 10, 1891, and that defendants were not entitled to recover anything upon the counterclaim set up by them.

Appellants contend that these findings were not justified by the evidence, and whether they were justified or not is the principal question involved in the case. Section 1549 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, when a sale of real property is ordered to be made at private sale, notice of the same must be published in a newspaper for two weeks successively next before the day on or after which the sale is to be made. The notice must state a day on or after which the sale will be made. The rule is well settled that proceedings for the sale of the real property of a decedent are statutory, and that such a sale will be void unless the requirements of the statute are complied with. In re O'Sullivan, 84 Cal. 444, 24 Pac. 281; Hartley v. Croze, 38 Minn. 325, 37 N. W. 449, and cases cited. In the last-named case there was a sale by the administrator of certain real property belonging to an estate, under a statute which required notice of the sale to be published "for three weeks successively next before such sale." Notice of the sale was published in a weekly newspaper for three successive weeks, but not during the last week next before the day named for the sale, there being an interval of nine days between the completion of the last publication and the day of sale. The sale was made on the day appointed therefor, and was subsequently reported to and confirmed by the court, and in pursuance thereof a deed of the property was executed and delivered to the purchaser. The question was as to the validity of the sale, and it was held that the failure to publish the notice during the said interval of nine days was a fatal defect, and that the sale was therefore void, and the deed conveyed no title. In this case the notice of sale named April 21, 1892, which was Thursday, as the day on or after which the sale would be made, and it was published in a daily newspaper from the 5th to the 19th day of that month, as shown by the affidavit of the publisher, which was returned and placed on file, and was the only evidence of publication until after the case was tried and submitted for decision. This publication was insufficient to meet the requirements of the statute, for if publication in a daily paper may be omitted for one day, then it may be omitted for two or more days, and there can be no certainty as to when the last publication must be made.

After the hearing of the cause defendants procured and filed an amended affidavit, showing that the notice was in fact published from the 5th to the 20th of April, 1892, inclusive, and they now claim that any apparent defect in the publication which existed before the filing of the new affidavit was thereby obviated and cured. The obvious answer to this claim is that plaintiff was justified in acting upon the facts as they were shown to exist when he made his bid on May 2, 1892, and when, thereafter, on the advice of his attorneys, he refused to accept the deed, and demanded the return of his deposit. The case must therefore, in our opinion, be decided upon the facts as they were presented at the trial, and without any consideration of the amended affidavit.

By the will of the decedent the executors thereof were given full power and authority to sell and convey the property of the estate, or any portion thereof, without any order of court; and it is claimed that the sale to plaintiff should therefore be held valid, notwithstanding any defects or irregularities in the preliminary proceedings taken to effect it. But the deposit and bid of plaintiff were made for a proposed sale to be authorized by an order of court, and it was such a sale only which was confirmed. Under these circumstances the decision must rest upon the validity of the sale as made, and not upon the supposed validity of a sale which might have been made under authority given in the will. It follows from what has been said that, by reason of the insufficient publication of the notice of sale, the attempted sale to the plaintiff was ineffectual and void, and that the deed made and tendered in pursuance thereof would have passed no title.

It is further claimed that the judgment should be reversed because it was entered against the defendants individually, while they were liable, if liable at all, only as executors of the estate; and it is said that they had settled their accounts as executors, in which account was included the $500 in question. This claim cannot be sustained. No objection to the action on the ground that defendants were sued as individuals, and not as executors, was raised by demurrer or answer. They accepted the deposit under an express agreement that they would return it if the title should prove defective. They evidently held the money when this action was brought, and when they were thereby clearly notified that plaintiff claimed its return. They must also have held the money nearly, if not quite, up to the time of the trial; for in their supplemental answer, filed only a short time before the trial, they prayed for judgment that the said $500 be retained by them and applied in payment of the alleged deficiency. And, if they did not, they should have retained the money until judgment was rendered, and then have applied it as thereby directed.

The judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff was for $644.40, and costs of suit. Plaintiff was not entitled to interest on his deposit before he demanded its return on September 2, 1892. From that time to the date of the judgment, January 25, 1895, the interest would amount to only $83.87. The cause should be remanded, with directions to the court below to amend the judgment by striking therefrom the sum of $60.53; and, as thus amended, the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to amend the judgment by striking therefrom the sum of $60.53; and, as thus amended, the judgment and order are affirmed.

LEWIS v. COLGAN, Comptroller.

(Sac. 164.)

STATE BOARD OF EXAMINERS—POWER TO APPOINT EXPERT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TITLE OF ACT.

1. Under Const. art. 4, § 32, forbidding the legislature to pay, or to authorize the payment of, any claim made under a contract "not expressly authorized by the law," the appropriation in Act March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 280), "for salary of expert to board of examiners," is unavailable for that purpose, there being no express antecedent authority in the board to appoint such expert.

2. The performance of quasi judicial acts by the state board of examiners in auditing claims does not make such board a judicial body, with implied power to appoint an expert and other necessary assistants at the expense of the state.

3. The several members of the state board of examiners, which consists of the governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney general, do not, by virtue of their appointment on such board, carry with them, for exercise therein, the power conferred on them as executive officers, but have only such authority as relates to them as members of the board.

4. Act March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 280), entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the government," etc., among which is an appropriation "for salary of expert to board of examiners," cannot be construed as creating the office of expert to such board, since the act would to that extent be unconstitutional, as embracing a subject not expressed in the title.

Mandamus by Thomas A. Lewis to compel Edward P. Colgan, as state comptroller, to draw his warrant in favor of plaintiff for an amount claimed to be due him as expert to the state board of examiners. A demurrer to the answer was sustained, and a peremptory writ granted. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Devlin & Devlin, Barham & Miller, and A. E. Bolton, for appellant. R. B. Carpenter, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Mandamus against the defendant, as comptroller of the state of California, commanding him to draw his warrant in favor of the plaintiff upon the treasurer of said state for the sum of $166.66⅔, as salary due plaintiff from the said state for services as expert to and for the state board of examiners during the month of July, 1895. An alternative writ of mandate issued to defendant, who demurred to the verified petition, and, upon his demurrer being overruled by the court, answered the petition. Plaintiff moved to strike out the fourth paragraph of defendant's answer, and demurred to the residue thereof. The motion to strike out was granted, and the demurrer sustained, and a peremptory writ granted. Defendant appeals, and the cause comes up on the record illustrated by a bill of exceptions. The substance of the verified petition upon which the writ issued is that "on the 28th day of June, 1895, plaintiff was employed by the state board of examiners as expert for said board of examiners, at an annual salary of two thousand dollars, payable monthly, and necessary traveling expenses in the business of said employment"; that he entered upon the discharge of the duties of such employment July 1, 1895, and continued to act as expert, etc., during the month of July, whereby there became due him from the state of California the sum of $166.66⅔. The board of examiners duly audited, allowed, and approved his claim for said sum of money. The comptroller, upon demand, refused to draw his warrant on the state treasurer in favor of the plaintiff therefor. The more formal portions of the petition are here omitted.

The question presented in the whole case practically relates to the duty of the defendant as comptroller, upon the foregoing facts, to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner on the state treasurer. The petitioner does not specify any authority on the part of the board of examiners to employ him as an expert, and our attention is not called to any statute or law conferring such authority, unless it is to be found in the statute in relation to appropriations, hereinafter mentioned. The petitioner contents himself with stating as a fact that he "was employed by the state board of examiners as expert," etc. The act making appropriations for the support of the government of the state of California, for the forty-seventh and forty-eighth fiscal years, approved March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 280), makes an appropriation as follows: "For salary of expert to board of examiners, four thousand dollars." "For traveling expenses of board of examiners and expert, two thousand dollars." The board of examiners is the creature of the statute, and consists of the governor, the secretary of state, the attorney general, and the secretary of the board, who is an ex officio member, and only authorized to act in the absence from the capitol of any two members. St. 1893, p. 182; Pol. Code, § 364. The law provides for a secretary and assistant secretary for the board, and a clerk. Pol. Code, §§ 654–685. Provision is also made for the appointment by the board of a "printing expert," to examine and report upon the character and value of printing done for the state. Id. § 679. Beyond these provisions we are not aware that the board of examiners is authorized by any positive law to appoint or employ any subordinates, assistants, or employés. The duties of the state board of examiners are prescribed by section 654 et seq., article 18, c. 3, tit. 1, pt. 3, Pol. Code. Among these duties the board is required to examine the books and accounts of the comptroller and treasurer, to count all moneys in the state treasury, and, under section 672, to audit all claims against the state which are not especially exempted from the provisions of that section, other than claims for official salaries, and claims upon the contingent fund of either house of the legislature.

The contention of appellant is that no office can be created by the general appropriation bill, and that the appropriations named therein can only be expended for some object antecedently authorized. As to the first branch of the proposition, it is sufficient to say that the appropriation bill from which we have quoted does not make any attempt to create an office or agent, or to authorize the appointment by others of any officer or agent, or to employ servants or assistants. It simply appropriates given sums of money for specific objects therein named, and among them a given amount "for salary of expert to board of examiners." Had the legislature attempted by the appropriation bill to do more than to appropriate money, that portion of it would have been void, because the object was not stated in the title of the act, which is "An act making appropriations for the support of the government of the state of California for the forty-seventh and forty-eighth fiscal years." Section 24 of article 4 of the constitution provides that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title." As bearing upon the latter branch of the proposition, viz. that an appropriation can only be expended for some object authorized by law, it is pertinent to say that, under section 31 of article 4 of the constitution, the legislature is deprived of the power to give or lend the credit of the state, "nor shall it have power to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value to any individual," etc. Section 32 of the same article provides, so far as applicable here, as follows: "The legislature shall have no power to * * * pay, or to authorize the payment of, any claim hereafter created against the state, * * * under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law; and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts shall be null and void."

Respondent contends, in substance, that the board of examiners, in auditing and allowing or rejecting claims against the state, acts judicially, and that, as a judicial body, the board has power to appoint such assistants and subordinates as may be necessary to discharge its duties. It has often been held that all independent departments of government are vested with governmental functions, and may, as an incident of the powers conferred, exercise such incidental powers as are necessary to a due exercise of the express powers conferred. Under this head, it has been held that courts of record, and especially courts of last resort, may, when necessary to the conduct of their business, and where no suitable provision has been made therefor by the other departments of the government, procure suitable places in which to hold court, provide fuel, lights, suitable furniture, appoint necessary janitors, clerks, bailiffs, etc. These authorities are founded upon the principle that no one department of the government can be divested of its power to act by the willful or negligent conduct of the other co-ordinate departments. The board of examiners is not, however, in any proper sense, a judicial body; and were it so, and in the exercise of functions properly belonging to the judicial department of the government, its organization would be void under section 1 of article 3 of the constitution, which provides that the powers of the government "shall be divided into three separate departments; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of those departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except as in this constitution expressly directed or permitted." The membership of the board of examiners is composed of the highest officers of the executive department of the state. Their exalted position, we may suppose, was regarded as a guaranty of their character, capacity, and fitness for the important duties imposed upon them as members of the board. When the board, pursuant to the statute, examines, audits, adjusts, and allows or rejects claims against the state, its acts are so far of a judicial character that their decision as to the facts is conclusive, unless reversed on appeal. Black, Judgm. § 532. Like considerations apply to similar acts by boards of supervisors, county commissioners, and auditors. Colusa Co. v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373. It would hardly be contended, we think, that the performance of these quasi judicial acts by local boards of audit, constitutes them judicial bodies and draws to them all the incidental powers of courts of justice. The board of examiners is a creature of the statute, possessing no authority except that conferred upon it by the law of its creation. In its relation to the several departments of the government, it is simply a local board, exercising limited powers, taking to itself nothing of authority not clearly conferred or necessarily implied from the language of the statute under which it acts, and from which its authority emanates. The several officers composing the board do not, by virtue of their appointment to membership on such board, carry with them, for exercise therein, the powers conferred upon them by the constitution or general laws, but only such as relate to them in their capacity of members of the board. If the board of examiners, by virtue of the duties imposed upon it, may appoint an expert, then, by parity of reasoning, boards of supervisors, county commissioners, auditors, and other like bodies and individuals, performing like or similar services, should be entitled to make like appointments. We are of opinion the board of examiners possesses neither the inherent nor delegated power to make such appointment, and that the attempt so to do was in excess of the authority of the board, and void. Under the constitution of this state adopted in 1849, the foregoing conditions might have existed without detracting from the right of the petitioner to the salary appropriated for his benefit. The legislature was not under it, as now, restricted in that respect. As was said in Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 350: "It may appropriate [the public moneys] to claims which have no legal obligation, and are founded only in justice. Of the propriety of the appropriation, as of the expediency of the taxation, it is the sole judge. With the exercise of the power in either case the judiciary cannot interfere." Under section 32 of article 4, supra, of the present constitution, however, it may not appropriate money to pay any claim founded upon any agreement or contract "made without express authority of law, and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts shall be null and void." We think the record shows that the agreement or contract by which petitioner was to serve as an expert to the board of examiners was "made without express authority of law," and hence that the appropriation in payment thereof was in violation of the constitution, and that the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained.

The motion to strike out a portion of defendant's answer was properly granted.

The matter set up in the fourth paragraph was irrelevant matter, not material to the defense.

We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to plaintiff's verified petition.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to plaintiff's verified petition.

ROWE v. BLAKE et al. (S. F. 226.)

JUDGMENT—ORDER OF SALE—COLLATERAL ATTACK—GENERAL FINDING—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Where an order of sale has been issued under a judgment, it is sustained by the same presumptions of regularity as attach to the judgment itself; and, though erroneous, the order is not absolutely void, and cannot be questioned in a collateral attack on the proceedings of the court which resulted in the order.

2. The general finding that a judgment sued on "has been wholly put in execution and satisfied" is sufficient to sustain a judgment for defendants, when not inconsistent with special findings, and the evidence has not been brought up on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by William B. Rowe against P. H. Blake and others to enforce a judgment. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Henderson (J. D. Thornton, of counsel), for appellant. William H. Fifield, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal from the judgment, upon the judgment roll, the sole question being whether the findings support the judgment. The action is based upon a judgment obtained by one Latham against these defendants in another suit, foreclosing a lien upon certain lands, and directing a sale thereof in satisfaction of the lien—the object of the present action by the plaintiff, claiming as assignee of Latham, being to enforce said judgment by procuring a sale of the property therein directed to be sold. It was held on a former appeal herein that the action would lie, and that the complaint stated a cause of action. Rowe v. Blake, 99 Cal. 167, 33 Pac. 864. The complaint alleges that the judgment sued upon was recovered in 1879, and that the assignment by Latham to plaintiff was made in 1884. These allegations are not denied, but the defense relied upon by the defendants was that the judgment had, before such assignment and the bringing of the present action, been put in execution and satisfied by a sale of the property. Upon this issue the court found these facts: "In the year 1882 one George W. Osborn claimed to have become the owner of said decree, and to have lawfully succeeded to the interests of said Latham therein; and on the 25th day of May, 1882, at the instance of said Osborn, the superior court here made and entered an order directing that an order of sale upon and in execution of the said decree of Latham v. Blake and others be issued by the clerk here, under the seal of the court, and be delivered to the sheriff of this city and county, commanding him to sell the said lands and premises in the said decree described, pursuant to the terms of said decree, and in execution and enforcement thereof. Said order, as thus made and entered upon the minutes here, has not been appealed from, vacated, or in any wise set aside or modified; and pursuant thereto an order of sale, in due form, was on the 26th day of May, 1882, issued by the clerk here, attested by him, and under the seal of the court, and delivered to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco on the next day thereafter, by the terms of which said order said sheriff was enjoined and commanded, among other things, to proceed to notice for sale, and thereupon to sell at public outcry, all the said premises in the said decree described, and to apply the proceeds of such sale, when made, as in said decree and order further directed, and that he make report of his acts and doings thereunder, within a time therein in said order named and specified. Accordingly, on the 22d day of June, 1882, after notice duly given and published, the said sheriff, in virtue of the said decree and the said order of sale in his hands, did expose to sale at public outcry, and did sell to the highest bidder at said sale, the said lands and premises, and the whole thereof, and did receive therefor from said bidder, who was the purchaser, the sum of one thousand six hundred and thirty dollars. A certificate of sale, in the usual form, and containing the customary recitals, was thereupon delivered by the sheriff to the said purchaser. No redemption from said sale has been made, and in due time thereafter a deed of conveyance, in due form, was delivered by the sheriff to said purchaser, purporting to convey to him the said premises in said decree described, and therein adjudged and decreed to be thereafter sold according to law by said sheriff. Neither the said order of sale of May 25, 1882, nor the said proceedings of said sheriff thereunder, has or have been vacated, set aside, modified, or in any wise disturbed, but they remain in full force and virtue. The said decree in the said second amended complaint set forth has been wholly put in execution and satisfied, and no part thereof remains unsatisfied."

The ground upon which it is urged that these findings fail to warrant the judgment in favor of defendants is, in brief, that it affirmatively appears therefrom that the process under which it was attempted to sell the property in satisfaction of the decree in suit was issued at the instance of one not authorized to control it; that, the ownership of Latham and the assignment to plaintiff not being denied, the latter alone must be held to have had the right and authority, under the law, to control the judgment, and the only one on whose application process could competently issue; that consequently the order of sale issued and executed at the instance of Osborn, a mere stranger to the judgment, was wholly void, and the proceedings had thereunder without legal effect. It is undoubtedly true, as an abstract proposition, that the owner of a judgment is the one on whose demand process may regularly and properly issue thereon; but is it true, as urged by appellant, that the findings show that the process was not so issued in this instance? There can be no question that the court wherein a judgment is entered has control of such judgment, and authority to direct the issuance and execution of process thereunder in the interest of the party entitled thereto, and necessarily, as incidental to such power, that of determining in any instance who is entitled to process. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 128, 385; McAuliffe v. Coughlin, 105 Cal. 268, 38 Pac. 730. Here it appears that the court, in the exercise of such jurisdiction, made an order, at the instance of Osborn, that an order of sale issue. Manifestly, this involved a determination that Osborn was the party entitled to have and control process, and this determination, it seems to us, is conclusive upon the plaintiff's rights in this action. It is true that there is no express finding that Osborn was the owner of the judgment at the time of his application, or that the application was other than ex parte, and without notice or opportunity to Latham to appear and be heard in opposition thereto. But it must be observed that this is not a direct, but a collateral, attack upon the proceedings of the court which resulted in such order, and in such case every intendment is to be indulged in support of the regularity of those proceedings and such determination; and we are bound to presume, if necessary to sustain the validity of the order, that the application therefor was regularly made upon notice to the parties interested, and that the court, upon competent evidence, found and determined that Osborn was at the time the owner of the judgment, and for that reason entitled to have process for its execution. See Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074; Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 Pac. 411. The order was sufficiently pleaded and found (Weller v. Dickinson, 93 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. 854), and is to be sustained by the same presumptions of regularity as attach to a judgment, and is not subject to be overthrown otherwise than in a direct proceeding for the purpose. However erroneously the court may have acted in the premises, it being within its jurisdiction to make the order, its order is not absolutely void, and mere error cannot affect its binding effect for present purposes. This being true, the process issued in pursuance of such order was not void, even if erroneous, and the proceedings taken thereunder in execution of the judgment are protected by the same presumptions of regularity as attach to the judgment itself. "A collateral attack can no more be made upon an erroneous execution than upon an erroneous judgment. Like erroneous judgments, an erroneous execution is valid until set aside upon a direct proceeding brought for that purpose, and until set aside all acts which have been done under it are also valid. In a collateral action it cannot be brought in question, even by a party to it,—much less, as in this case, by a stranger to it." Hunt v. Loucks, 38 Cal. 382. Independently of these considerations, we think the general finding that the judgment sued on "has been wholly put in execution and satisfied" is sufficient, of itself, to sustain the judgment, whether such finding be regarded as a conclusion from the special or probative facts found, or as an independent finding. If the former, it is not inconsistent therewith; and, if the latter, the appeal being upon the judgment roll, without the evidence before us, it is conclusive. And in such case, even if the probative facts did not, in our judgment, sustain the general finding, the latter would control, since to hold otherwise would be to determine that the evidence did not justify the decision, and that cannot be done in this mode. Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 305, 38 Pac. 740, and cases therein cited. The judgment is affirmed.

WAYMIRE et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO & S. M. RY. CO. et al. (S. F. 227.)

CORPORATIONS—SUIT BY STOCKHOLDERS—INJUNCTION—FORECLOSURE—DEFENSES.

1. In an action by stockholders to enjoin the foreclosure of a trust deed securing bonds issued by a railroad corporation, and to compel a reconveyance of the bonds, it was alleged by plaintiffs that the bonds had been fraudulently transferred without consideration; that no demand had been made that an action be instituted by the corporation, because it would not have been complied with; that a complete and effectual defense could not be made in the foreclosure action because the individual holders of the bonds were not parties. Held, that the facts alleged were available as a defense to the foreclosure action and insufficient to support an injunction, it not being shown that the corporation would not properly defend the foreclosure.

2. Being the principal defendant in the foreclosure action, the corporation was not at liberty to institute an action in another court to enjoin further proceedings in foreclosure, but was bound to plead the facts alleged in plaintiff's complaint by answer or by cross complaint in the foreclosure action.

3. In such case, where the corporation refuses to answer, or to prosecute its defense in good faith, the stockholders may intervene, and prove all material facts essential to a complete and effectual defense, and cause the necessary parties to be brought in.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by James A. Waymire and others, stockholders, against the San Francisco & San Mateo Railway Company and others, to enjoin the foreclosure of a trust deed against the corporation. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

VANCLIEF, C. In May, 1891, the defendant railway company issued to the defendant trust company 1,100 bonds, each for $1,000, in trust, to be sold for the use of the former company, and, to secure the payment of said bonds, executed to the trust company a trust deed of all its property, consisting of street railroads, franchises, and all personal property pertaining thereto. The bonds bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and contain a provision to the effect that, upon certain defaults in the payment of interest, the trustee may elect to declare the principal due, and foreclose the trust deed. In alleged compliance with these provisions, the trust company, on May 10, 1894, commenced an action in the superior court of San Francisco against the railway company to foreclose the trust deed, and for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the property conveyed by the trust deed, and to operate the same pending the action. On April 6, 1895, and pending the aforesaid action to foreclose the trust deed, this action was commenced by James A. Waymire and six other stockholders of the railway company, "on behalf of themselves and all other shareholders and creditors of the railway company," to enjoin the trust company and its beneficiaries, the bondholders, from further prosecuting said foreclosure action, on the alleged grounds that, by a conspiracy and collusion of the directors of the railway company with the directors of the construction company (a majority of such directors of each company being the same persons), said bonds had been fraudulently, and without consideration, transferred to the defendants the S. S. Construction Company, C. A. Spreckels, John A. Buck, Nicholas Ohlandt, Charles H. Buck, and John C. Ohlandt, and also to enjoin these defendants from selling or otherwise disposing of said bonds pending this action. The specific ultimate relief prayed for is that the sales and transfers of bonds to the last above-named defendants be adjudged fraudulent and void, that said defendants may be ordered to redeliver the bonds to the trust company for the proper use of the railway company, and that the injunction against the further prosecution of the foreclosure suit may be made perpetual. The court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon dissolved the temporary injunction and dismissed the action. The plaintiffs appeal from the order dissolving the injunction, and from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone.

If the demurrer was properly sustained, of course, the injunction was properly dissolved. Therefore the only question for decision is, did the court err in sustaining the demurrer? I think the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer. The alleged fraudulent acts of the directors and others were directly injurious to the corporation, and the relief asked is for the direct benefit of the corporation. The stockholders were only indirectly injured by the wrongs complained of, and would be only incidentally benefited by the judgment asked. Therefore, as a general rule, the action should have been brought by, and in the name of, the corporation; but when, upon proper demand by stockholders, the corporation wrongfully refuses to institute an appropriate action, or when it appears that such demand by stockholders would have been unavailing and fruitless, an action may be instituted and prosecuted by a stockholder for the direct and immediate benefit of the corporation, and for the incidental benefit of the stockholders. Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145; Cogswell v. Bull, 39 Cal. 320; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 Pac. 788; Spell. Priv. Corp. § 612.

In this case it is alleged in the complaint that the stockholders made no demand that an action be instituted by the corporation, "for the reasons that such demand would not be complied with, and we fruitless, and that the plaintiffs are ad that there is doubt whether said railwapany can maintain such action; that tlense herein urged will not avail to deaid action of foreclosure, and will not bplete and effectual, because the personning said bonds are not parties thereto; to these allegations, it should be obse (1) That so far as the facts alleged in tlplaint entitle plaintiffs to the relief pray for, or to interpose any obstruction action to foreclose the trust deed, to tktent the facts alleged are available as ase to the foreclosure action. It seems countable that plaintiffs were advised tlts which would entitle them to a judgnullifying the sale and transfer of the bond perpetually enjoining the further pron of the action to foreclose the deed of tould not be made available as a defenshe foreclosure action. (2) Even if thkholders had demanded that the corporinstitute an independent suit, such demanld have been properly refused, for the rthat, being the principal defendant in tl to foreclose the deed of trust, the coon was not at liberty to institute an actianother court, nor in the same court, in further proceedings in the foreclosuon, but was bound to plead the facts all plaintiffs' complaint herein by answ if necessary to aid the defense, by cmplaint in the foreclosure action. PomJur. §§ 1371, 1372; High, Inj. § 52; R Co. v. Ramsay, 45 N. Y. 637; Grahanailroad Co., 118 U. S. 161, 6 Sup. Ct. 1009vley v. Davis, 37 Cal. 268; Judson v. P61 Cal. 562; Wilson v. Baker, 64 Cal. 47c. 253; Spell. Priv. Corp. § 612. (3) If rporation refused to answer the fore complaint, or, having properly and fulvered, probably would not prosecute thse in good faith, then, upon a proper aion to the court, the stockholders woul been permitted to intervene, and to pleaprove all material facts alleged in theplaint in this action, and also to causeecessary parties to be brought in. Civ. Proc. §§ 387, 389, 442; Cook, Stockh. & Corp. Law, § 659; Bronson v. R Co., 2 Wall. 283; Bayliss v. Railway Biss. 193, Fed. Cas. No. 1,140; Morrill ufacturing Co., 46 Minn. 260, 48 N. W In this case, however, it is not alleg the corporation has refused or failed y to answer the complaint in the foreclosure suit, nor that it will not defend in good faith; and, as to this, counsel for appellant, in his brief, says: "In justice to the lower court, I venture to state that the railway company filed an answer in the foreclosure suit setting up most of the facts alleged in the complaint in this case, and praying a dismissal," on the ground that the bondholders, upon whose requisition the action was brought, obtained those bonds "by fraud, and without consideration, or with notice of those facts, and therefore such requisitions conferred no authority upon the trust company to institute proceedings," but asked no other relief. If the mere dismissal of the foreclosure suit on the ground that it was prematurely commenced was all the relief sought by the corporation, that fact (assuming, as we must, that the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint are true) was probably sufficient evidence of bad faith on the part of the corporation to entitle the stockholders to intervene. But, however this may be, the stockholders had no better right to maintain this action to enjoin or obstruct the prosecution of the foreclosure action upon grounds or facts available as a defense to that action, or which entitled them to affirmative relief merely in aid of, or as a necessary consequence of, such defense, than had the corporation; and it is plainly apparent that the matters alleged in the complaint herein were available as a defense to that action, and that, so far as affirmative relief is asked, it is either in aid of such defense, or a necessary legal consequence thereof. If the defense of fraud in the transfer of the bonds be found true, it will necessarily and conclusively follow that the fraudulent transfer was void, and that the bonds should be restored to the trust company; and I see no reason why it might not have been so expressly adjudged in the foreclosure action, provided that the facts alleged in plaintiffs' complaint had been stated by them in an intervention complaint in that action, and provided, further, that the claimants of the bonds had been brought in as parties to that action, as we have seen they might have been. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.
